Although not expressly guaranteed in the CRP, the right to interpretation and translation can be regarded as a corollary of the following constitutional principles and rights: the principle of equality (Article 13); the right to a fair trial (Article 20 par. 4); the right of defence (Article 32 par. 1); and the guarantee of an accusatory structure and the right to ["material confrontation"] (Article 32 par. 5).

Interpretation (oral): a court interpreter is a “language mediator” whose presence allows a person who does not speak or understand Portuguese to meaningfully participate in the proceedings. [Translation (written):] a translator converts a written document or audiotape recording from the source language into a written document in the target language.

The rules on translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved in a _civil lawsuit_ (in the judicial courts) are set out in Articles 133 and 134 of the CPC. The language in the process is Portuguese, with the following exceptions (Art. 133, paras 2 and 3 of the CPC): where foreign nationals who cannot speak Portuguese have to give evidence in the Portuguese courts, an interpreter shall be appointed for them, when necessary, in order to facilitate communication, under oath. The intervention of an interpreter as set out above shall be limited to that which is strictly required. Article 135 of the CPC regulates the intervention of an interpreter when a deaf-mute person is to give a statement to the court and whenever the judge finds necessary. The judge, on its own motion ( _ex officio_ ), or by request of the parties, orders that the party shall present the translation of documents that are originally written in one or more foreign languages, or, if there are doubts about the reliability of the translation(s) presented by the party, the judge orders that the party shall present additional translations authorised by a notary or authenticated by a diplomatic or consular officer of the country of the respective foreign language. The judge may determine that the document is to be translated by an expert designated by the court where the previous options are not possible (Article 134 of the CPC).[107]

In an _administrative lawsuit_, since neither the CPTA or the CPA have specific rules on the necessity of intervention of an interpreter or the translation of documents when there is a foreign party that does not understand the Portuguese language, the above-mentioned rules of the CPC are subsidiary (Article 23 of the CPTA).

The procedural expenses for interpretation and translation in courts are to be paid by the interested party within 10 days from the order of the judge regarding the need for such procedural intervention. If the interested party does not have sufficient economic means, the expenses are paid in advance by the Institute of Financial Management and Infrastructures of Justice ( _Instituto de Gestão Financeira e Equipamentos da Justiça_ – IGFEJ) (Article 20 of Regulation of Procedural Costs - _Regulamento das Custas Processuais_ - RCP[108]).

In a _criminal process_, Article 92 of the CPP provides the right to interpretation and translation safeguards the procedural rights of the defendant set in Article 61 par. 1 of the CPP[109]. Regarding who is entitled to the right to interpretation: any procedural participant whose primary language is not Portuguese and who has a limited ability to read, speak, write or understand Portuguese (“limited Portuguese proficient” or “LPP” individuals), procedural participants with hearing or speech impairments, irrespective of their position in the procedure (Art. 93). Regarding how to assess the necessity of an _interpreter_, judicial authorities decide, upon informed discretion, whether to appoint an interpreter. Decision on its own motion ( _ex officio_ ) or upon request of the defence lawyer, prosecutor, etc., whom is recognised the right to challenge the decision in appeal. The criminal procedure law recognises the defendant’s right to benefit, without any costs, from the services of another interpreter of his choice to mediate the communication between him and his counsel, subject to “professional and procedural secrecy”, and the evidence obtained through the violation of secrecy obligations is rendered inadmissible in court (Art. 92 paras 3, 4 and 5 of the CPP). Concerning the interpreter as an expert witness, interpreters are subjected to the expert’s activity rules (Art. 92 par. 8 of the CPP). They must “swear” (commit) to make a faithful, accurate and impartial interpretation (Art. 91 par. 2 of the CPP). The CPP is unclear as to which qualifications a court interpreter must possess and how those qualifications should be obtained (formal educational training, life experience, etc.). The right to translation: Article 92 par. 6 of the CPP refers solely to the necessity to convey into Portuguese documents which are written in a foreign language and not officially translated. The CPP establishes no legal standard by which judges can properly assess the necessity of interpretation; there is neither an official certification or registration for interpreters nor a mechanism to easily assess the quality of the interpreter’s performance. It is not clear the extent of the right to translation of documents and the consequences of the lack of a written translation as to the exercise of procedural rights[110].

Regarding the costs of interpretation and translation in criminal procedures: where the right to interpretation applies, it must be provided without costs to the person involved, even when the person is the accused and he/she is convicted at the end of the proceedings (Art. 92, paras 2 and 3 of the CPP). The defendant has the right to benefit, without any costs, from the services of another interpreter of his/her choice to mediate the communication with the appointed counsel (Art. 92 par. 3 of the CPP).

In addition, for acts of the _Public Administration_, Article 88 par. 5 of the CPA provides that the deadline for notifying a foreign interested party of an administrative act shall always be deferred for 30 days if the act is not translated into the language of the foreign person or into a language that the said person may understand. In such case, the RCP is not applicable because the notification of a foreign party of an administrative act by the Public Administration is not a court procedure, so the costs of translation are an expense of the interested party.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure.
1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Rules on evidence are provided in Articles 410 to 526 of the CPC. Without prejudice to the rules on burden of proof, the law allows evidence to be obtained on the initiative of the judge, which means that the judge shall carry out or order, even if on their own motion (ex officio), all the necessary proceedings required for establishing the truth and for the due process of law.

The judge may, at any stage in the proceedings, call for the parties to appear in person to give evidence regarding the facts which are of relevance for the decision in question. It is the judge’s responsibility to carry out or order, including on their own motion (ex officio), all the actions necessary to determine the truth and true nature of the dispute with regard to the facts that should be known. This responsibility includes requesting information, technical opinions, plans, photographs, drawings, objects or other documents necessary for clarifying the truth. Such requests can be made to official bodies, the parties disputing the case or third parties. However, this legal possibility is not used often.

The investigation of things and people made by the court, whenever it considers it appropriate to do so, on its own initiative or at the request of either of the parties, shall be done in such a way as to safeguard the intimacy of private and family life and human dignity, and should be solely aimed at clarifying any fact which is relevant for the decision in question. For instance, the court can carry out an on-the-spot visit or order a reconstruction of events to be undertaken, if it believes this to be necessary.

The judge may, on their own motion (ex officio), order evidence to be given by experts (Article 467 of the CPC). When, in the course of a court case, there are reasons to presume that a person who has not been called as a witness has knowledge of facts which are important for making a correct decision in the case, the judge should order that that person be summoned to give evidence in court (Article 526 of the CPC).

Regarding the evaluation of evidence, the following limits apply. Where evidence presented by a party has not been obtained legally by such party, such evidence cannot be taken into account (i.e. evaluated) by the court. The parties may, until the start of oral pleadings in the first instance, request permission to provide statements regarding facts in which they have personally been involved or of which they have direct knowledge. The court freely considers the statements of the parties, except where they involve a confession.

In an actio popularis judgment, the powers of the judge are very far reaching, namely with regard to collecting evidence and suspending the effects of the refuted act. The judge is not bound by the evidence presented by the parties but can collect further evidence on their own initiative (Article 17 of the APL).

Foreign court decisions regarding private rights may serve as elements of proof before a Portuguese court. The judge will have discretionary power to decide on the value of such proof (Article 978 of the CPC). However, the decision must fulfill the objective criteria set out in Article 980 of the CPC, and in particular there shall not be any doubt as to the authenticity of the document that contains the court decision; it must have been decided in accordance with the law of the country in which it has been pronounced; it must have been decided by a foreign court whose competence is legally established in accordance with the law of that country and should not be of the exclusive competence of the Portuguese courts, etc.[111].

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

One can introduce new evidence, there is no preclusion. A final decision can be subject to an extraordinary appeal of revision on the grounds of new documentary evidence being presented that the party did not know about before, or could not use before, as long as such new documentary evidence can by it itself change the final decision in a way more favourable to the losing party (Article 696 subpar. c) of the CPC).[112]

New evidence not presented in the administrative procedures can be presented in the court procedures.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.

The experts (in civil process) can be called upon by the parties or by own motion of the judge. In general, the same procedural rules apply whether the expert is called upon by the party or by the court (the judge). There is one important difference in respect of the responsibility (onus) of bringing the expert to court when the expert comes from outside the jurisdiction district of the court. In such a case, the onus is on the party that has called upon the expert, which must ensure that the expert appears in court. If the expert has been called upon by the judge, the court pays all the travel expenses in advance (Article 467 par. 1 and Article 473 paras 1 and 2 of the CPC). In the criminal process, experts can also be called upon by the parties or by own motion of the judge (Article 154 of the CPP).

Article 9 par. 2 of Law no. 35/98 states that ENGOs may ask public laboratories to carry out tests (analysis) on any environmental component. This legal provision specifies that such request shall be duly reasoned and it is not expressly stated whether the request or the test carried out by the public laboratory should be free of charge.

In Portugal, the only publicly available list of experts concerns those with expertise in value of assets within the framework of the procedures for the declaration of public utility and administrative possession of expropriation procedures prescribed by the Expropriations Code (Law nr. 168/99 of 18 September).

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

Expert opinions are freely appraised by the judge (Article 489 of the CPC), which means that there is total discretion in the appraisal of such opinions which are not binding for the court.

As regards to criminal actions, the general rule for assessing the various kinds of proofs is free appraisal by the judge (Article 127 of the CPP). Nevertheless, regarding experts’ opinions, as a general rule that kind of proof is binding on the judge (Article 163 par. 1 of the CPP). Whenever the conviction of the judge differs from the expert opinion, the judge must state the reasons for the divergence (Article 163 par. 2 of CPP).

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The court requests an expert opinion from an expert establishment, laboratory or official entity, or appoints an expert. The parties can give their opinion on the appointment of the expert and reach an agreement (Article 467 par.1 of the CPC). The expert opinion is provided by a collegial set of three experts if the case is complex, or by a single expert if the case is deemed to be simpler (Article 467 and Article 468 par.1 subpar. a) of the CPC). As with civil actions, in criminal actions where the expert opinion involved proves to be of special complexity or requires knowledge of distinct subjects, it may be requested from several experts working in a collegial or interdisciplinary manner (Article 152 par. 2 of the CPP). In court actions where the value of the action is below 30,000 Euros[113], the judge always requests a single expert (Article 468 par. 5 of the CPC).

The court may call upon an expert for translation of documents provided in a foreign language where the translation is not provided by the parties (Art. 134, par. 2 of the CPP).

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

The same rules apply in general as for experts called upon by the court. The parties may agree to call upon a collegial set of experts even if the judge did not determine that the case is complex (Article 468 par. 1 subpar. b) of the CPC).

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

Under Portuguese law, individuals and associations can be exempted from the payment of procedural fees. The first mechanism for partial or full exemption from fees relies on legal aid, which is available to people and non-profit organisations that would otherwise lack sufficient financial means. The second is the option of bringing actio popularis (a class action lawsuit). In general, if a lawsuit is filed with the intent to serve the public interest (which is the case for environmental matters), the law exempts institutions and individuals from judicial costs if they win the case. If they lose, on the other hand, the costs are declared – at the judge’s discretion – as a fraction of the usual value\textsuperscript{114}. Normally the party has to pay experts’ fees. If the party has benefited from legal aid, experts’ fees are paid by the IGFEJ. Special court fees have to be paid if the process includes expert opinions and “it is commonly accepted that expert fees are often too expensive to cover the real costs of good experts. In that case, either the appellant pays the difference or chooses another expert”\textsuperscript{115}.

With regard to the administrative offences process, Article 58 par.1 subpar. c) and g) of Law 50/2006 provides that the costs of the process include the costs of experts and any examinations or expert reports. The costs are met by the defendant if there is a final decision imposing a fine or any other sanction. If the defendant does not lose the process, the costs are met by the State (Article 58 pars. 2 and 3).

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

As stated above (question 1.4, 1)), as a general rule it is mandatory to be represented in court by a lawyer. There is a list of designated pro bono lawyers or trainees available in the Portuguese Bar Association (Ordem dos Advogados Portugueses – OA\textsuperscript{116}) within the System of Access to Justice and to the Courts. Portuguese lawyers may be certified by the OA as specialist lawyers, including in the environmental field according to the Regulation of Specialized Lawyers [117].

The OA has a public search engine which allows access to information concerning the professional data (names, addresses and registry numbers) of all lawyers and trainee lawyers in the country, but this engine does not allow searching by specialised field.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is pro bono assistance in the event of insufficient economic means.

There is, however, no system in place providing for free assistance to those who would not otherwise be left without legal assistance.

In the civil process (also applying in this instance to administrative process), as a general rule it is mandatory to be represented in court by a lawyer. A person cannot stand before court without being represented by a lawyer (Articles 40 and 58 of the CPC), namely in court actions in which the final decision can be appealed and in actions proposed in the superior courts (Art. 40, par. 1, subpar. a), b) and c) of the CPC). In these cases, if the person does not designate a lawyer, the court designates a lawyer (from the lists provided by the OA for such effect – see this question 1.6, 1) above), but the lawyer’s fees are to be paid by the person at the end of the process. A party in a lawsuit can be represented by his/herself or by a trainee lawyer or by a legal agent in cases where the final decision cannot be appealed (Art. 40 and 42 of the CPC). That means a party can be by itself in court if the value of the action is lower than 5,000 Euros\textsuperscript{118}.

As regards criminal process, it is mandatory for the defendant to be represented by a lawyer (Article 64 of the CPP). Moreover, it is also mandatory for the ‘injured party’ to be represented by a lawyer (Article 70 of the CPP). Finally, civil parties (when a claim for damages has been deducted in a criminal case) may be represented by a lawyer and it is only mandatory to be represented by one when, due to the value of the claim, if deducted separately from the criminal action, the representation by a lawyer would be mandatory in accordance with the law of civil procedure.

In the criminal process, when a person cannot stand before court without being represented by a lawyer, namely when a defendant is hold to be interrogated by a judge or when the defendant participates in a court hearing. In such cases, if the defendant is absolved, he/she does not need to pay the lawyer’s fees. If the person is convicted, he/she must pay all court expenses, including the lawyer’s fees at the end of the process.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

The Portuguese government provides a practical online Guide with Q&A on the following: what is included in the legal aid (which judicial fees or costs can be exempted and which judicial fees or costs can be paid in instalments); who can apply for legal aid (natural persons and non-profit organisations), including access to the online simulator on the Government’s Social Security webpage; how to apply, including detailed steps; where to apply.

The Portuguese Bar Association (Ordem dos Advogados) also provides detailed practical online information on legal aid (information on list of pro bono lawyers in question 1.6, 1) above).

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

The Portuguese Bar Association.

2) Register or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

As in the above response to Question 1.1.5, 3), in Portugal the only publicly available list of experts concerns those with expertise in value of assets within the framework of expropriation procedures. In Portugal, there is not a public database of legal translators or interpreters. There is a private entity, the Portuguese Association of Translators, which provides an online search engine for translators.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The List of NGOs which are active is in Order no. 2226/2020 of 10 February 2020, List of NGOs and equivalent active in the National Registry up to 31 December 2019\textsuperscript{119}.

ENGOs with national status: QUERCUS - Associação Nacional de Conservação da Natureza; LPN - Liga para a Proteção da Natureza; GEOTA - Grupo de Estudos de Ordenamento do Território e Ambiente; Federação Portuguesa de Cicloturismo e Utilizadores de Bicicleta; AGROBIO - Associação Portuguesa de Agricultura Biológica; Liga Portuguesa dos Direitos do Animal; Liga de Amigos de Conimbriga; ABAE - Associação Bandeira Azul da Europa; CPADA - Confederação Portuguesa das Associações de Defesa do Ambiente; FAPAS - Fundo para a Proteção dos Animais Selvagens; Associação Portuguesa dos Amigos dos Castelos; SOS Animal - Associação Portuguesa de Socorro Animal de Portugal.

ENGOs with regional status: Associação P/Estudo e Defesa Património Natural e Cultural do Concelho de Mértola; Associação de Estudos e Defesa do Património Histórico e Cultural de Castelo de Paiva; Associação Cultural - Amigos da Serra da Estrela; Associação de Defesa do Património da Região de Leiria; Associação de Defesa do Património de Sintra; Aventura; ONGA - TEJO - Organização Não-Governamental do Ambiente; URZE - Associação Florestal da Encosta da Serra da Estrela; AEPGA - Associação para o Estudo e Proteção do Gado Asinino; GRUPO FLAMINGO - Associação de Defesa do Ambiente.

ENGOs with local status: ACAB - Associação Cultural Azurara da Beira; Núcleo de Defesa do Meio Ambiente de Lordelo do Ouro - Grupo Ecológico; Associação de Defesa do Paio de Tornada – PATO; Associação de Defesa do Património Arouqueço; Associação de Defesa do Património de Sintra; ONGaia - Associação de Defesa do Ambiente; Centro de Arqueologia de Almada; Núcleo Cicloturista de Sesimbra - Associação de Defesa do Ambiente; Associação dos Amigos do Parque Ecológico do Funchal; ALAMBI - Associação para o Estudo e Defesa do Ambiente do Concelho de Alenquer; Liga dos Amigos de Setúbal e Azeitão; Associação de Defesa do Ambiente de Cacia e Esugeira (ADACE); APASADO - Associação de Proteção Ambiental do Sado; Linha de Defesa - Associação de Defesa do Ambiente; Alto Relevo - Clube de Montanhismo; A. V. E. - Associação Vimaranesa para a Ecologia; GPS -
1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

General rules on challenging an administrative decision (not judicial) by an administrative body are provided in Articles 184 to 199 of the CPA[122]. There are two types of challenging administrative decisions: administrative complaints (Articles 192 and 193 of the CPA[123]) and administrative appeal (Article 191 of the CPA[124]). The latter can be in the form of a hierarchical appeal (Article 193 to 198 of the CPA[125]) or a special administrative appeal (Article 199 of the CPA). The following time limits apply[127]: for both administrative complaints and administrative appeals against an unlawful omission of an administrative act, the time limit is one year starting from the date of the infringement of the obligation to issue a decision by the administrative body; when a notification of the administrative act is the interested party is required, the time limit is 15 days starting from the date of the notification; for any other interested parties of the acts not subject to compulsory publication, the time limit is also 15 days starting from when one of the following occurs: notification, publication, knowledge of the act or execution of the act. The time limit for requesting a mandatory hierarchical appeal is 30 days calculated from notification that the administrative act has been committed or such act becoming known. The time limit for requesting an optional hierarchical appeal is the same as the time limit for judicially challenging the act at stake (Article 193 par. 2 of the CPA). These same rules also apply to the time limit for a special administrative appeal (Article 199 par. 5 of the CPA).

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ.

The general deadline set for delivery of acts by the Public Administration is 10 days[129] (Article 86 of the CPA). There are also rules regarding tacit acts (implied decisions) in Article 130 of the CPA concerning the mechanism of tacit approval, which only occurs in cases expressly provided by law or regulation when there is no notification of the final decision regarding a request made to the competent body within the legal time limit. Article 130 par. 2 of the CPA states that there is tacit approval if the notification of the act is not dispatched until the first working day starting from the time limit for issuing the decision. Instead of the above-mentioned means for challenging administrative acts, the following rules apply (Articles 192, 195 and 198 of the CPA): The time limit for the competent administrative body to deliver a decision on an administrative complaint is 30 days (which can be a decision to revoke, annul, modify or replace the complained act, or to carry out the act unlawfully omitted). The time limit for delivering a decision on a hierarchical appeal by the body which has committed or omitted the act is 15 days. This time limit is 30 days if there are opponents. As a rule, the superior administrative body shall deliver a decision concerning the hierarchical appeal within 30 days starting from the date of referral of the process to the body responsible for deciding upon it, or within maximum 90 days if new or additional evidence is necessary. The time limit for delivering a decision on a request to suspend an administrative act during the process of challenging an administrative act is 8 days[130] (Article 189 par. 3 of the CPA).

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

It is possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court. As a result of the constitutional principle of access to justice, the fundamental right of effective judicial protection of the legally protected rights or interests of the administered[131] is guaranteed, including: the recognition of such rights or interests; the challenging of any administrative acts harming such rights or interests, regardless of the form of the act; the obligation to deliver... administrative acts legally due; and the adoption of injunctive measures. Citizens also have the right to challenge administrative rules with external effectiveness harming their legally protected rights or interests (Articles 20 par. 2 and 268 pars. 4 and 5 of the CRP).

According to Article 163 par. 2 of the CPA, annulable administrative acts may be challenged before the competent administrative court within the time limits legally set out.

Any administrative act can be challenged directly before court depending on two conditions: the challenged administrative act must have external effectiveness and produce immediate legal effects (Articles 51 and 54 par. 1 of the CPTA). The so-called condition of "external effectiveness of administrative acts" means susceptible to changing the situation of third parties, i.e. entities that are external in relation to the author of the act.

The second condition means that the administrative acts can only be challenged starting from the moment when they become effective.

The challenging of acts before the administrative courts includes both the request for judicial annulment (Article 37 par. 1 subpar. (a) of the CPTA) and the request for conviction to deliver the due administrative act (Articles 37 par. 1, subpar. (b), 51 par. 4, 66 par. 3 and 67 par. 4 subpar. (b) of the CPTA). Administrative action can be used to obtain a condemnation of the competent body to deliver, in a given deadline, the administrative act that was unlawfully omitted or denied (Article 66 of the CPTA).

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

There is no deadline for the court to adopt the final decision, but there are intermediate deadlines. According to the CPTA (Article 29), intermediate court orders are to be issued within the general deadline of 10 days. The same deadline is valid for public prosecutors.

Both the CRP and the CPTA refer to "reasonable time". The courts are subject to the constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, which guarantees that every party intervening in a procedure has the right to obtain a decision in reasonable time and through a fair trial (Article 20 par. 4 of the CRP). This principle, as mentioned above, is a result of the fundamental right of access to justice provided in Article 20 par. 2 of the CRP and is implemented by Article 2 of the CPTA. For each legally protected right or interest there is a corresponding adequate protection before the administrative courts (Article 2 par. 2 of the CPTA).

However, as pointed out by Prof. Aragão, "practice has proven to be quite far from reality", which is reflected in the EU justice scoreboard showing "the bad Portuguese scorings regarding timeliness".

Additionally, the administrative courts must ensure that it is possible to obtain, through urgent and necessary declarative means, the adequate protection in situations of temporal constraint, as well as the precautionary measures required to safeguard the utility of the judgments in the declarative process. The administrative courts must also ensure the execution of their judgment, namely the judgment against the Administration, be it by issuing a judgment that produces the effect of the due administrative act when the delivery and content of such act are strictly bound or by providing that it becomes materialised (Article 3 paras. 3 and 4 of the CPTA).

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The general principle is that the administrative action can be brought to the court at any time (Article 41 CPTA) without prejudice to specific time limits regulated in special provisions concerning the matter of each claim.

In a judicial challenge of an administrative act, there is no time limit for the challenge. For challenging annulable acts, the following time limits apply: one year for the public prosecutor, 3 months for any other party (Article 58 of the CPTA). These time limits start from the moment that the knowledge of the administrative act has been issued. In a process to condemn the Administration to deliver a due act, the right to bring action to court expires within one year starting from the legal deadline that the administration was due to comply with to deliver such act; in the event of rejection, refusal to appraise a request or a claim aimed at replacing an act of positive content, the deadlines of one year for the public prosecutor and 3 months for any other party are applicable (Article 69 of the CPTA). In a process aimed at declaring the unlawfulness of rules issued under administrative provisions, the declaration of such unlawfulness may be requested at any time (Articles 72 and 74 of the CPTA). Rules issued under administrative provisions fall under the concept of administrative regulation, including general and abstract legal rules which aim at producing legal external effects within the exercise of administrative legal powers (Articles 135 of the CPA). A request aimed at obtaining invalidity of contracts that may be subject to an administrative act may be brought to the court within the same time limits provided for in the act with the same subject and identical regulation of the concrete situation (Article 77-B of the CPTA).

Insofar as concerns the stages of the proceedings of every administrative process, the supplementary procedural time limit for the parties is 10 days. For judges, members of the Public Prosecution and court clerks, the deadlines in the administrative process are the same as in civil procedures. The deadline for judicial orders (i.e. orders issued by the judge within administrative court procedure) and for requests of the Public Prosecution is 10 days, except when the law sets special deadlines, or 2 days for urgent or expedient matters. If a judge does not comply with a legal deadline within 3 months, the judge shall state in writing the reason for such delay. The court clerks send every month to the president of the court a list of cases where such 3-months delay occurs and the president of the court sends such information within 10 days to the body that has disciplinary competence (Article 29 of the CPTA).

In the early stages of the process, if the court verifies that the claim of the author is grounded but there are obstacles that make it impossible to satisfy such claim, the deadline for the parties to reach an agreement concerning economic compensation is 30 days with a possibility of an extension up to 60 days. If the parties do not reach an agreement, the author has a time limit of 30 days to request that the economic compensation be fixed by the court (Article 45 par. 1 subpar. d) and par. 2 of the CPTA).

When presenting the initial application to the court, the parties shall: present the evidence (list of witnesses and/or documents); request other evidence if the reply concerns a new request of the response (Article 85-A par. 3 of the CPTA). If the reply concerns the pleas of the response or any other party are at any time. The decision on such request shall be decided within 5 days and take into account the evidence showing that there is a serious likelihood of veracity of the alleged facts and, if such likelihood exists, the suspension of immediate execution shall be ordered. The cumulative legal criteria for deciding on the suspension of the challenged administrative act are the following: that the immediate execution of the challenged administrative act would cause irreparable damage or damage difficult to repair by the addressee of the act; and that the suspension of the challenged administrative act does not cause higher damage to the public interest. However, this last criterion is rarely present: court decisions have reportedly been essentially pro-development, considering that suspension of public or private projects, activities or construction works is always likely to cause higher damage to the public (economic) interest than continuing with implementing the legal act and executing the initial project.

Also, the author of the administrative act itself, or the body competent to decide on the appeal, may, ex officio, suspend the act using those cumulative criteria. These rules do not prejudice the right to request the suspension of an administrative act before the administrative courts (Article 189 of the CPA).

Additionally, in judicial administrative appeals the following suspensive effects should be taken into account:

For pre-contractual litigation, there is automatic suspensive effect of the challenged act or of the execution of the contract (Article 103-A of the CPTA).

The suspension of the effectiveness of an administrative act or of an administrative rule can be requested as an injunction (precautionary measure) (Article 112 par. 2 of the CPTA). In this case, the administrative body and the beneficiaries of the act are forbidden, after the notification, to initiate or continue the execution. Exception occurs when they recognise that acceptance of the deferral[149] of execution of the said act would be seriously damaging to the public interest upon referral of a grounded resolution to the court pending the injunction measure (Article 128 par. 1 of the CPTA). If said act is already executed, such execution is an obstacle to suspension of the effectiveness of said administrative act. If the suspension can raise relevant utility concerning the facts that the act still may produce or will produce for the applicant or for the interests that the applicant is defending or could defend in the main process (Article 129 of the CPTA).

Article 143 of the CPTA concerning judicial remedy against judgments of the administrative courts (that is, from judgments of lower-level administrative courts to higher-level administrative courts) sets out that the ordinary appeal[151] has suspensive effect on the appealed judgment; the other kinds of appeal do not suspend the appealed judgment[152].

Finally, if there is a requirement to initiate arbitral administrative judgment, all the time limits applicable to judicial administrative procedures are suspended (Article 183 of the CPTA).

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

There is a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority. At any stage of the administrative proceedings, the body responsible for the final decision is also competent, ex officio or upon request of the interested party, to order the necessary provisional measures.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

In actions of contractual pre-litigation where automatic effective suspension cannot take place (see question 1.7.2, 1)), the author may request to the judge the adoption of interim measures aimed at safeguarding against the risk of having a situation of fait accompli when the time comes to issue the judgment. The interim measures will be refused if the damages resulting from adopting such measures are deemed to be higher than those resulting from not adopting said measures, if such damage cannot be avoided or mitigated by adopting different measures (Article 103-B pars 1 and 3 of the CPTA).

In administrative proceedings, provisional measures shall be deemed necessary when there is a reasonable fear that, without such measures, a situation of fait accompli could occur or that damages of difficult reparation for public or private interests could occur, provided that, once Those interests are weighted, it is predictable that the damages resulting from said measures are not higher than the damages that said measure aims to avoid. The reasoned decision to order or amend any provisional measure does not require a previous hearing, and the validity deadline shall be freely fixed in the decision. The revocation of provisional measures shall be reasoned. All administrative acts ordering provisional measures are liable to be challenged in administrative courts (Article 89 of the CPA).

In addition, in the event of a conflict of competences between administrative bodies, if serious damage may result from the inaction of the bodies in conflict, the judge designates the authority that should exercise interim competence on anything deemed urgent (Article 138 of the CPTA).

In a popular action process, even where the law does not grant suspensive effects to the appeal, the judge can do so, suspending the act or the decision under judgment (Article 18 of the APL).

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

There is immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced. The general rule for all optional challenging of administrative acts (i.e. actions of challenging administrative acts that are deemed non-mandatory) is non-suspensive effects, which means that the administrative act is immediately executed irrespective of the appeal introduced. This general rule has two exceptions, as per the response to Question 1.7.2, 1) above: where the law expressly states suspensive effect; 2) where the author of the act, or the body responsible for deciding on the appeal, ex officio or upon request by the interested party, considers that immediate execution of the act would cause irreparable damage or damage difficult to repair by the addressee of the act, and that suspension of the challenged administrative act does not cause higher damage to the public interest (Article 189 par. 2 of the CPA).

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

The administrative decision is not suspended once challenged before the court at the judicial phase, unless the party requests an injunction measure of suspension of the effectiveness of the administrative act in the judicial phase.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

An interim order of an injunction measure is possible. The applicant can make such request at an early stage[154] of the injunction measure process. The injunction process is the court process to request for injunctive relief. The judge shall decide on such request, issuing the interim order within the maximum time limit of 48 hours. The judge may decide, ex officio (that is, even if the applicant did not make a request), to issue an interim order for the injunction measure (including the concrete injunction measure requested by the applicant or another injunction measure that the judge finds more adequate) (Article 114 par. 4, Article 116 pars. 1 and 5, and Article 131 par. 1 of the CPTA). In the subsequent phases of the injunction process[155], during pendency of the process there is also the possibility for an interim order of the injunction measure on the grounds of a supervenient modification of the factual or legal circumstances. The interim order cannot be challenged and is immediately notified to the persons and bodies that must comply with it. Where such persons or bodies do not comply with the interim order, the applicant can use the above-mentioned possibility of declaration of ineffectiveness of the wrongful execution acts. During pendency of the injunction process, the defendants may request the dismissal or amendment of the interim order. In this case, the judge shall hear the applicant and accept evidence within 5 days. The decision to dismiss the interim order can be challenged (Article 131 par. 2 to 7 of the CPTA). Injunction measures may consist of the following: suspension of effectiveness of an administrative act or rule; interim permission for the interested party to initiate or continue a certain activity or behaviour; request for interim regulation of a legal situation, namely through the imposition on the Administration of the payment of a certain amount as interim reparation; or summons to adopt or refrain from a certain behaviour by the Administration or by a private person for alleged infringement or founded fear of infringement of national administrative law or Community law[156] (Article 112 par. 2 subpar. a), d), e), g), i) of the CPTA).
Where an injunction measure is not possible, there is an additional possibility for bringing another kind of rapid judicial action called a summons, which can take two forms: the summons to provide information, consult on processes or issue a certificate; the summons to protect rights, freedoms and guarantees. In both types of summons, if the Administration, private person or competent body (as applicable) does not comply with the summons, the judge shall order the payment of a penalty (Articles 108 par. 2 and 111 par. 4 of the CPTA).

Finally, there is a possibility to convert the action of summons to protect rights, freedoms and guarantees into an injunction process if the injunction measure is not sufficient to address the situation at stake (Article 110º-A of the CPTA).

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

The Regulation of Procedural Costs (RCP – see question 1.4, 4 above) provides for the calculation of the costs to initiate a procedure. It contains the quantitative and procedural rules about all costs in any kind of process, regardless of its judicial, administrative or fiscal nature, and tables of values of judicial fees.

It is not possible to know beforehand the overall costs of litigation, given that the costs depend on multiple factors (some of which are not regulated, as in the cases of expert fees or producing evidence such as buying satellite images). But it is possible to estimate, based on worst case scenario calculations, the maximum amount of costs.

The procedural costs cover: (i) the judicial fee; (ii) the charges; and (iii) the parties’ costs.

The judicial fee corresponds to the amount due for the introduction of the process by the interested party and is calculated based on the value of the action (Table 1 of the RCP). The first or only instalment of the judicial fee shall be paid within the time limit for practicing the corresponding act. The second instalment shall be paid within 10 days after notification of the final hearing (Articles 3 par. 1, 6 par. 1, 11, 14 paras 1 and 2, and 14-A of the RCP).

The charges covered by procedural costs are referred to in Article 16 of the RCP and may include:

- reimbursement of expenses paid in advance, for example by the IGFEJ for interpreters, translators or experts, and of all the costs regarding legal aid, including the lawyer’s fees;
- payment to external entities for services or documents provided;
- compensation to witnesses; or
- payment of travel expenses for acts made outside the court, for example inspection of certain facilities.

These procedural costs shall be paid by the applicant or by the interested party immediately or within 10 days starting from notification of the order of the corresponding procedural step (Article 20 of the RCP).

The parties’ costs include the costs that each party has incurred in the process and for which such party is entitled to be compensated due to condemnation of the counter-party (Article 447 par. 4 of the CPC). The final sum of costs is elaborated by the clerks of the first instance court within 10 days starting from the moment when the final judgment is considered res judicata (Article 29 of the RCP). If the value of the sum to pay is 306 Euros or more (3 Units of Account - UC), the person responsible for the payment may require payment by instalments (Article 33 of the RCP).

In brief, the costs of access to justice in Portugal can be classified as follows: (1) judicial fees, which can be minimised; (2) costs of an attorney, which are mandatory for court actions - even when access to a lawyer is granted by legal aid, representation is assigned by the OA, (3) costs for further substantiation of the case with opinions from relevant sources (technical or legal), which are at the expense of the plaintiff.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

There are special judicial fees due for the procedural and injunction processes established under Table II of the RCP. When the judge finds that the issue or proceedings are especially complex, the judge may determine the payment, at the end of the process, of a higher value, always within the limits established in Table II of the RCP (Article 7 pars. 4 and 7 of the RCP). There are other special cases, with limit values for judicial fees established in Table I-B of the RCP, which include: the processes for judicial challenge of the decision regarding legal aid; summons to provide information, consult on processes or issue a certificate (Article 12 of the RCP).

The values to pay depend on the value and complexity of the process and are in the following ranges: 1 UC to 20 UC, which is currently 102 Euros to 2040 Euros (Table II of the RCP); 0.5 UC to 8 UC, which is currently 51 Euros to 816 Euros (Table I-B of the RCP). A deposit is not required, but the applicant must pay the judicial fee in advance. At the end of the process, if the value of the process is over 275,000 Euros, an addition judicial fee of 1.5 UC (which is 153 Euros) shall be paid for each additional fraction of 25,000 Euros of process value.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

The general principle is that no one should be obstructed or prevented from accessing justice in defence of his/her rights for social, cultural or economic reasons. The State has the duty to inform citizens regarding the Law through publications and other means of communication in order to allow for a better exercise of the rights and respect of duties.

According to the Law on Access to Justice (Article 161) (transposing Directive 2003/8/CE on access to justice in cases involving other Member States), the following natural persons are entitled to legal aid as long as they prove to be in a situation of economic insufficiency: Portuguese and Community citizens; foreign citizens and stateless persons with a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU; foreign citizens without a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU – if the laws of their countries of origin have reciprocal rights; persons with usual domicile or residence in a Member State of the EU different from the Member State where the process will run (cross-border disputes).

Economic insufficiency depends on assessment of the income, assets and permanent expenditure of the household. Legal aid is possible not only in court procedures but also in administrative procedures.

Legal aid covers the following categories:

- Exemption of judicial fee and other process charges of the process: no need to pay any judicial fee or other expenses regarding the process;
- Phased payment of the judicial fee and other charges of the process: payment of the judicial fee and other expenses regarding the process in instalments;
- Appointment and payment of compensation of advocate: the OA appoints a lawyer, paid by the Ministry of Justice (MJ), when there are no means to pay for one;
- Appointment and phased payment of compensation of advocate: the OA appoints a lawyer and the legal fees are paid in instalments;
- Payment of compensation of the pro bono lawyer: the lawyer defending in a criminal process (criminal court) or in an administrative offence process is appointed by the Court, the Public Prosecutor or the bodies of criminal police and is paid by the MJ.
- Phased payment compensation of the pro bono lawyer: the lawyer defending in a criminal process when the natural person is a criminal defendant (criminal court) is appointed by the OA, through said court. The defendant shall pay the compensation of this lawyer to the MJ in instalments.
- Appointment of an execution agent: a clerk from the court is appointed to take care of proceedings regarding the execution of a judgment (for example, a seizure).
4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Non-profit legal persons have the right to the following categories of legal aid: exemption of judicial fee and other charges of the process, appointment and payment of compensation of advocate, payment of compensation of the pro bono lawyer and appointment of an execution agent.

Article 7 par. 3 of the Law on Access to Justice stating that legal persons which are profit organisations (like companies) do not have right to legal aid was declared unconstitutional by two cases from the TC[164]. This means that legal persons with profitable scope are also entitled to legal aid as long as they can prove to be economically insufficient to bear the costs themselves. Economic insufficiency depends on assessment of the income, assets and permanent expenditure of the legal person.

Legal aid is possible not only in court procedures but also in administrative procedures[165]. Detailed information on legal aid is available online. To apply for legal aid, it is necessary to complete a form available on the Social Security website, to be delivered personally to any service of the Social Security or sent by electronic mail and accompanied by all the necessary documents, including an identification document (Citizen Card or Passport) and tax declaration. Other documents may be requested in particular situations, which are clearly listed on the website.

The Portuguese Government makes available online a practical guide concerning all the mechanisms of legal protection, including how to request legal aid. There is also a simulator to calculate who has the right to legal protection.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

There are other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance. The legal protection also includes, besides legal aid, the mechanism of legal interests or rights are harmed or threaten to be harmed. However, this does not apply to non-profit organisations.

6) Does the 'loser pays' principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The general rule on costs is that the losing party shall bear the procedural costs incurred by the successful party during the course of the proceedings, including a limited amount for recovery of lawyers' fees. However, if a party is deemed to have litigated in bad faith, it may be ordered to compensate the other party for its expenses, including lawyers' fees. In the case of class actions, such as actio popularis, claimants are exempted from the payment of judicial costs in the event of partial granting of the claim[166] (Article 20 of the APL). The consequence of losing an actio popularis is to pay only half of the judicial costs instead of the total judicial costs, as is customary in any other kind of court process. Insofar as concerns ENGOs, “the losing party pays principle” applies when the ENGO totally loses the action, i.e. when the ENGO loses all the requests that were brought before the court. In the event that some of the requests are accepted, the loser pays principle does not apply.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filling fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

The following exceptions apply to the obligation to pay the second instalment of the judicial fee (see question 1.7.3, 1 above): in administrative actions where the process does not need a final hearing; administrative actions that were suspended within the possibility to select priority processes, except if the author requests the continuation of their own process (Article 14-A of the RCP)[167].

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

National rules on environmental access to justice are provided by Law no. 26/2016 of 22 August 2016 approving the regime of access to administrative and environmental information and of re-use of administrative documents, which transposed Directive 2003/4/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 28 January 2003 on public access to environmental information and repealing Council Directive 90/313/EEC and Directive 2003/98/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 17 November 2003 on the re-use of public sector information.[168] The main source of information is the APA website (see question 1.3. 1 above), which provides structured information relating to: information systems on water, air, EIA, SEA; waste, dams, fluorinated gases; and dissemination of general information on national laws and European legislative acts, taxes, chemicals, bathing water, international cooperation, etc.

More structured dissemination is available on the website of the Lisbon Office of the Attorney General, which includes notes regarding legal amendments and cross-references to other legislation.

Additionally, the University of Porto has structured information explaining the content of the Law[169] and cross-references to other legislation.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

Information on access to justice shall be ensured in accordance with the principles of administrative activity, namely: equality, proportionality, justice, impartiality and cooperation with private citizens[168]. Article 2 of Law 26/2016 regulates the principle of open administration (established in Article 17 of the CPA). However, neither this principle nor the rights to access administrative documents and to request environmental information from the administrative bodies (Article 4 par. 4 of Law 26/2016) ensure the provision of information related to access to justice during administrative procedures.

The website [170] has information regarding the system of justice (namely criminal and juvenile justice), bodies and entities, services, legislation, case-law, registers and alternative means of solving conflicts.

However, this website does not have information on how to challenge decisions or from whom applicants should request such information.

The judicial action of summons to provide information, consult on processes or issue a certificate (Articles 104 et seq of the CPTA) can be introduced if the public administration does not give full satisfaction to requests made within the exercise of the right to procedural information or the right of access to administrative archives and registries. The regime of summons constitutes a special autonomous procedure for verifying the reasons for the rejection of requests made by private parties to public authorities in this context. According to Articles 104 to 108 of the CPTA, such procedure, created to respond precisely to these situations, is characterised by its speed and effectiveness: the procedural deadlines are reduced, the decision period is shortened — tending to be less than one month (Article 107 of the CPTA) — and the court may order the imposition of a penalty payment in the case of conviction of the requested party for each day of delay in complying with the decision issued — Article 108 par. 2 of the CPTA).

Moreover, established as an “urgent procedure” under Article 36 par. 1 subpar. (d) of the CPTA, it benefits from a special procedure for ensuring prompt and timely access to the data and/or documents sought: once the application has been filed, the judge orders the administrative entity to respond within 10 days and, in the event of a positive decision, the judge determines the period within which the request must be fulfilled, which cannot exceed 10 days. In the event of non-compliance with the summons without acceptable justification in the timeframe indicated, there is possible cause for the imposition of penalty payments and the establishment of civil, disciplinary and criminal liability (Articles 107 and 108 of the CPTA).

In relation to costs — bearing in mind that this was also an issue raised in the draft report — we must take into account the catalogue of guarantees mentioned above, as there is significant variation depending on the means used by individuals to respond to the refusal of access to the information sought.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

The sectoral rules in place (EIA/ IPPC[169] and plans and programmes) provide the following with regard to access to information and access to justice in environmental matters[170]: Article 37 of the EIA Law provides information on access to justice (administrative complaints and appeal to the courts). Annex
IV.2. § of the Industrial Emissions/IPPC Law provides that information on administrative complaint and administrative appeal must be disclosed to the public during public participation.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

There are no express rules on access to justice information per se to be provided in the administrative decision and in the judgment[171].

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Since neither the CPA nor the CPTA provide any rules regarding translators/interpreters in procedural acts[172], the rules of the CPC are subsidiary (Articles 1 and 23 of the CPTA)[173], which means that when the CPTA does not regulate a certain matter, the rules of the CPC on such matter apply. Article 80 par. 1 subpar. e) of the CPTA states that the court clerks should refuse the initial application if it is not written in Portuguese. The following exceptions apply (Art. 133, paras 2 and 3 of the CPC): where foreign nationals who cannot speak Portuguese have to give evidence in the Portuguese courts, an interpreter should be appointed for them, if necessary, in order to facilitate communication, under oath.

The judge, on their own motion (ex officio), or by request of the parties, orders that the party should present a translation of documents that are originally written in one or more foreign languages, or, if there are doubts about the quality of the translation(s) presented by the party, the judge orders that the party should present an additional translation certified by a notary or authenticated by a diplomatic or consular officer of the country of the respective foreign language. The judge may determine that the document should be translated by an expert designated by the court if the previous options are not possible (Article 134 of the CPC)[174].

The court’s procedural expenses for interpretation and translation are to be paid by the interested party within 10 days from the order of the judge regarding the need for such procedural intervention. If the interested party does not have sufficient economic means, the expenses are paid in advance by the Institute of Financial Management and Infrastructures of Justice (Instituto de Gestão Financeira e Equipamentos da Justiça – IGFEJ) (Article 20 of the RCP).

In addition, for acts of the Public Administration, Article 88 par. 5 of the CPA provides that the deadline for notifying a foreign interested party of an administrative act shall always be deferred for 30 days if the act is not translated into the language of the foreign person or into a language that the said person understands. Such translation shall be at the expense of the interested party.

1.8. Special procedural rules

In Portugal, specific EIA rules are set out in DL Decree-Law 151-B/2013 of 31 October 2013, which establishes the legal regime of the environmental impact assessment (EIA) of public and private projects likely to have significant environmental effects, as last amended by Decree-Law 152-B/2017 of 11 December (DL 151-B/2013).

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The main challenge regarding access to justice is not standing but rather the time it takes (years) to get a final decision and the cost of lawyers’ fees, especially after the 2008 crisis, when it became even harder to find any pro bono lawyer. Expert fees and the cost of gathering evidence can be deterrent factors as well. Nevertheless, the following should be noted with regard to screening in the Portuguese legal framework:

- The projects listed under Annex II of DL 151-B/2013 (transposing Annex II of the EIA Directive) shall be subject to EIA if they are considered likely to have significant effects on the environment on the basis of their location, dimension or nature according to screening criteria fixed under Annex III by decision of one of the following competent authorities:
  - The EIA authority[176] (Article 1 par. 3 subpar (b)(iii));
  - The licensing authority (Article 1 par. 3 subpar (b)(iii));
  - A member of the Government (Article 1 par. 3 subpar (c)).

In addition, the licensing authority may examine projects on a case-by-case basis according to screening criteria fixed under Annex III (Article 3 par 1 and par 11 subpar(a)).

Any interested party may challenge any decision, act or omission that is against the rules of DL 151-B/2013 (including the above-mentioned decisions) either by means of administrative review (through administrative complaint or administrative appeal) or by means of judicial administrative review (Article 37 of DL 191-B/2013)[177].

Both individuals and ENGOs have standing to pursue court actions against infringements by public authorities, namely as established under the Environmental Framework Law, including to right to full and effective review of the legally protected environmental rights and interests and the right to popular action. The above-mentioned decisions can be challenged by means of judicial challenge of administrative decisions given that they are administrative decisions (administrative acts), namely by requesting their judicial annulment (Article 37 par. 1 subpar. (a) of the CPTA) (see questions 1.1, 1, 1.4, 1 and 1.7.1 above).

Public participation is an essential procedural aspect of the EIA process for ensuring the involvement of the public in the decision-making process and includes public consultation (Article 2 subparas r) and m)). Public concerned means the holders of subjective rights or of legally protected interests with regard to decisions taken in the administrative proceedings of EIA, as well as the public affected or likely to be affected by such decisions, namely the ENGOs (Article 2 subpar. s)). The public concerned has the right to participate in the public consultation (Article 29 par. 2). Formal public participation is not mandatory in order to have standing for challenging the decisions issued under DL 191-B/2013.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Prior to the beginning of the EIA process, the proponents[178] may introduce to the EIA authority[179] the Proposal for Definition of the Scope of the EIA (Proposta de definição de âmbito do estudo de impacte ambiental - PDA). The PDA is the document prepared by the proponent in the phase of definition of scope of the environmental impact study[180] containing a summary description of the type, characteristics and location of the project and the identification, analysis and selection of the significant environmental aspects that may be affected and that must be addressed by the environmental impact study. The PDA shall have a declaration of intent to start the project. The EIA authority shall promote the constitution of the Evaluation Commission (Comissão de avaliação - CA). The PDA may be subject to a public consultation stage, on the initiative of the proponent or upon a decision of the EIA authority. A public consultation stage means public participation to collect comments, suggestions and other inputs of the concerned public. The definition of the scope of the environmental impact study is binding for two years on the proponent, the EIA authority and the external entities whose opinions were taken into account, except if during those two years changes of circumstances occur (Article 12 and Article 2 subparas e) and q)).

Any interested party (that is any individual or any ENGO) may challenge any decision, act or omission issued against the rules of DL 151-B/2013 either by means of administrative review (through administrative complaint or administrative appeal) or by means of judicial administrative review (Article 37 of DL 191-B/2013).
Access to justice is possible, but the courts consider that it is up to the Administration to decide which impacts to consider. The discretionary technical powers of the Administration can only be controlled by the Courts in cases of “manifest error”. A real-life example is not considering the impacts on cetaceans when authorising an oil drilling project for oil prospection near the coast. The courts refused to control this decision and the ENGOs that filed the injunction process were held responsible to pay all the court fees[181].

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

The decision on conformity of the environmental impact study by the EIA authority may be challenged either by means of administrative review (through administrative complaint or administrative appeal) or by means of judicial administrative review. All challengeable decisions, acts or omissions must be disseminated, namely via a website, by the EIA authority, the CCDR and the local authorities (Article 37 and Article 31 par. 2 of DL 191-B/2013). The time period for challenging an administrative act is one year for the Public Prosecutor in the first three months and for every other party, starting from the notification, publication or knowledge about the act or about its implementation. In some cases, the three months can be postponed, namely “given the ambiguity of the regulatory framework applicable” or the difficulties in the identification of the appealed act, or its categorisation as an act or as a norm (Article 58 of the CPTA).

In the judicial impugnation of administrative norms there is no time limit (Article 74 of the CPTA). Those who are being harmed — or fear being harmed in the near future — by a norm whose application was refused by the courts in three cases can ask the court for a general declaration of illegality. This request is mandatory for the Public Prosecutor (Article 73 of the CPTA). The judicial decision has erga omnes binding force, retroactive effects (ex nunc) and leads to the revalidation of all repealed norms. Rarely, for reasons of legal security, fairness, or public interest of exceptional importance, the judge can declare the illegality with ex nunc effects.

An appeal against failure to adopt regulations necessary for the implementation of laws is also possible. In this case, the court will set a period no shorter than six months for the administrative authorities to adopt the rules (Article 77 of the CPTA).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The administrative act of licensing or authorising projects under DL 151-B/2013 may be challenged either by means of administrative review (through administrative complaint or administrative appeal) or by means of judicial administrative review. All challengeable decisions, acts or omissions must be disseminated, namely via a website, by the EIA authority, the CCDR and the local authorities (Articles 22, 31 par. 2 and 37 of DL 191-B/2013).

During the post-evaluation proceedings, the concerned public have the right to communicate in writing to the EIA authority any information or relevant data on the environmental impacts caused by the project (Article 26 par. 7).

All the reports and documents related to EIA, including the reports on the public consultation, must be made available in the electronic one-stop-shop[182] (Article 30).

Both individuals and NGOs can challenge the final authorisation, given that it is an administrative decision (administrative act) that can be challenged through the means of challenge of administrative decisions described above (see questions 1.4 and 1.7.1).

Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

The administrative court cannot act on its motion. The judicial review is dependent on the challenge by the interested party. In an actio popularis judgment, the powers of the judge are quite far reaching, namely in collecting evidence and suspending the effects of the refuted act. The judge is not bound by the evidence presented by the parties but can collect further evidence on their own initiative (Article 17 of APL).

The scope of the trials before administrative courts is not mere legality control. Every legally protected right or interest must have adequate protection from the administrative courts[184] (Article 2 par. 2 of the CPTA).

All administrative acts with external effects are subject to appeal, regardless of their legal form, mainly where they are likely to affect the rights or interests protected. The appeal should not aim solely at declaring the act void on the basis of its illegality, but should also aim at the condemnation of the administration to practise the due act (Article 51 of the CPTA). In the final ruling, the court gives the administration a deadline to issue the act which was illegally omitted or denied, and may in some cases also impose in the same final ruling of condemnation the payment of a progressive fine designed to prevent any delay in enforcement of the final ruling (Article 66 of the CPTA).

The applicant may request the declaration of nullity or of illegal omission of an administrative act due simultaneously with a second request for condemnation of the Administration to adopt the acts and operations needed to reconstruct the situation that would have existed if the contested measure had not been practiced. If the due act that the administration is deemed to adopt involves the formulation of pure administrative opinions or typically administrative judgments, then the court cannot determine the precise content of the action to be taken but must clarify the guidelines and the obligations to be observed by the administration (Article 95 par. 5 of the CPTA).

Failure to exercise the right to challenge a measure contained in a statute or regulation does not preclude the right of appeal of its implementing acts or application. Failure to exercise the right to challenge a measure not individually identifying its addressees does not prevent appeal against implementing acts or application acts whose recipients are individually identified (Article 52 of the CPTA). Even confirmative acts can be challenged, as long as the former act has not been contested or notified (even if it has been published) (Article 53 of the CPTA).

At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

DL 151-B/2013 does not set out specific rules on this issue. Decisions, acts or omissions are challengeable at any stage, provided they meet the above-mentioned requirements set out in the CPA and the CPTA concerning the means of challenge. Omissions can be challenged after the date when they were due (90 days or one year depending on weather the omission was a regulation or an administrative act). Any administrative act (or omission) can be challenged directly before the court depending on the following conditions: the challenged administrative act or omission must be susceptible to changing the situation of third parties and produce immediate legal effects (Articles 51 and 54 par. 1 of the CPTA). The challenging of acts or omissions before the administrative courts includes both the request for judicial annulment (Article 37 par. 1 subpar. (a) of the CPTA) and the request for conviction to deliver the due administrative act (Articles 37 par. 1, subpar (b), 51 par. 4, 66 par. 3 and 67 par. 4 subpar. (b) of the CPTA). Administrative action can be used to obtain a condemnation of the competent body to deliver, within a given deadline, the administrative act that was unlawfully omitted or denied (Article 66 of the CPTA) (see question 1.7.1. 3) above).

Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

DL 151-B/2013 does not set out such a requirement.

In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
Any interested party may challenge any decision, act or omission either by means of administrative review or by means of judicial administrative review (Article 37 of DL 191-B/2013) and it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing before the national court.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? The constitutional right is implemented through the principle of effective judicial protection, which includes the right to a fair trial (Article 2 of the CPTA). The principle of equality must also be observed in the relations of the Public Administration with individuals (Article 6 of the CPA).

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation? DL 151-B/2013 does not set out a specific rule on timely judicial procedure[185]. The constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, implemented by Article 2 of the CPTA, applies, including the right to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable time (see question 1.7.1, 4) above). There is no deadline for the court to adopt the final decision, but there are intermediate deadlines. According to the CPTA (Article 29), intermediate court orders are to be issued within the general deadline of 10 days. The same deadline is valid for Public Prosecutors.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions? The only injunctive relief provided for in DL 151-B/2013 is the injunction seizure (precautionary) available to the body responsible for the application of fines for environmental offences provided in Article 39 (Article 40). There are no special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions.

At any stage of the administrative proceedings, the body responsible for the final decision is competent, ex officio or upon request of the interested party, to order the provisional measures deemed necessary if there is a reasonable fear that, without such measures, a situation of fact accompli could occur or that damages of difficult reparation for public or private interests could occur. Also, it is possible to request injunction measures before the administrative court, and in the early stage of the court procedure of an injunction process (that is, where a judge decides on a request for an injunction measure) the applicant can also request that the judge issue an interim order (see question 1.7.2 above).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

Portugal-specific IPPC/IED rules are set out in Decree-Law no. 127/2013 of 30 August 2013, which establishes the legal regime of industrial emissions applicable to integrated pollution prevention and control, and also the rules intended to avoid or reduce emissions to air, water and soil and the generation of waste, transposing Directive 2010/75/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 November 2010 on industrial emissions (integrated pollution prevention and control)[187].

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable? The stages of challenging decisions are the stages corresponding to delivery of final decisions by APA: Exploration Licence, a final decision concerning licensing of the exploration of a waste incineration and co-incineration installation (Article 3 subpar. d)); Final decision on the Environmental Licence (EL) request. Such final decision is delivered within 80 days from receipt of the request or 50 days in the case of installation with projects subject to prior EIA proceedings (Article 40 paras. 1 and 2). Final decision issued concerning the request of the operator for licensing of the waste incineration and co-incineration activity (Article 61 par. 1). Final integrated decision issued concerning the licensing request, duly reasoned and preceded by the various opinions of the consulted entities (Article 74 par. 1)[188]. This final decision shall be issued by APA within 10 days starting from the inspection carried out by the Coordinating Authority[189] (Article 85 par. 2).

All final decisions are challengeable through all means (judicial and non-judicial) of challenge of administrative acts above-mentioned. There are no special rules applicable to NGOs or citizens. All the administrative rules mentioned above apply.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Portugal-specific IPPC/IED rules do not provide for an early stage of permit procedures (i.e. the screening stage).

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Portugal-specific IPPC/IED rules do not provide for a scoping stage.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions? Prior to the final decision on the EL proceedings, the Coordinating Authority may issue a decision regarding the request for authorisation of an industrial installation. Industrial installations may cover the following activities: activities listed in Annex I, which includes industries in the energy sector, the waste management and other activities and installations for the production and processing of metals sector, the mineral industry sector and the chemical sector; activities using organic solvents with consumption thresholds higher than the thresholds provided for in Annex VII. Such decision of the Coordinating Authority on the request for installation authorisation is challengeable (Articles 2 par. 1 and 34 par. 3).

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation? The public can challenge the final authorisation through administrative complaint or optional hierarchical appeal, and through judicial challenge (paragraph 2, subpar. I of Annex IV). Judicial challenge includes by means of actio popularis.

7) Scope of judicial review - control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

DL 127/2013 does not provide specific rules on this. The administrative court cannot act on its motion. The judicial review is dependent on the challenge by the interested party.

In an actio popularis judgment, the judge has the power to collect evidence and suspend the effects of the refuted act (Article 17 of the APL). The scope of trials before administrative courts is not mere legality control. Every legally protected right or interest must have adequate protection from the administrative courts[190] (Article 2 par. 2 of the CPTA).

All administrative acts with external effects are subject to appeal, mainly when they are likely to affect the rights or interests protected. The appeal does not aim solely at declaring the act void on the basis of its illegality, but should also aim at condemnation of the administration to practise the due act (Article 51 of the CPTA). The court may impose on the Administration the payment of a progressive fine designed to prevent any delay in enforcement of the final ruling (Article 66 of the CPTA). The court cannot determine the precise content of the due act to be taken by the Administration, but must clarify the guidelines and obligations to be observed by the administration (Article 95 par. 5 of the CPTA).

8) Is it possible to challenge any decisions, acts or omissions through administrative challenge (administrative complaint or administrative appeal) and through administrative judicial challenge. At what stage are these challengeable?

DL 127/2013 does not provide specific rules on this. Any administrative act can be challenged directly before court depending on two conditions: the challenged administrative act must be susceptible to changing the situation of third parties and produce immediate legal effects (Articles 51 and 54 par. 1 of The constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, implemented by administrative challenge (administrative complaint or APA website). Imminent threat of damage to the environment is included in the scope of DL 147/2008 (Article 2). All interested parties are entitled to submit to the respective practical instructions natural or legal persons, including ENGOs. If the request for action has been submitted by electronic means, the communication shall also be by electronic means. The only injunctive relief provided for in DL 127/2013 is the injunction seizure available to the body responsible for the application of fines for environmental offences (Article 113). There are no special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions. At any stage of the administrative proceedings, the body responsible for the final decision is competent, ex officio or upon request of the interested party, to order the provisional measures deemed necessary if there is a reasonable fear that, without such measures, a situation of fait accompli could occur or that damages of difficult reparation for public or private interests could occur. Also, it is possible to request injunction measures before the administrative court, and in the early stage of the court procedure of an injunction process (that is, where a judge decides on a request for an injunction measure) the applicant can also request that the judge issue an interim order (see question 1.7.2).

14) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

It is mandatory to inform the following in the dissemination of licensing requests: namely, in the process of public consultation: possibility of challenging decisions, acts or omissions regarding the rules of Chapter II of DL 127/2013(193) through administrative challenge (administrative complaint or administrative appeal) and through administrative judicial challenge (Annex IV par. 1 and par. 2 subpar. f) of DL 127/2013).

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13. In Portugal, specific rules relating to the application of Article 12 (Request for action) of Directive 2004/35/EC are set out in Article 18 of Decree-Law no. 147/2008 of 29 July 2008 establishing the legal regime concerning environmental liability for environmental damage, as last amended by Decree-Law no. 13/2016 of 9 March 2016 (DL 147/2008), and the rules relating to the application of Article 13 (Review procedures) in the CPA and the CPTA.

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

The only requirements set out in DL 147/2008 regarding Article 13(1) of the ELD are that the interested persons shall be natural or legal persons: (a) affected or likely to be affected by the environmental damage or (b) having sufficient interest in the environmental decision-making relating to the damage or to the imminent threat to such damage, or alternatively (c) alleging the impairment of a right or a legitimate protected interest as required by administrative procedural law (Article 68 of the CPA - see question 1.4, 1) and 1.7.1, 4) above). DL 147/2008 does not set out specific rules on requirements needing to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court. Rules of the CPTA regarding judicial administrative appeals are applicable (see questions 1.7 above).

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

The only deadline set in DL 147/2008 is the statute of limitation of 30 years (Article 33). Appeals must be introduced within the general time limits of judicial administrative appeals (see question 1.7.1, 5) above).

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

The competent authority may request that the request for action be accompanied by the relevant information and data supporting the observations submitted in relation to the environmental damage in question, whenever the original elements raise doubts (Article 18 par. 3).

4) Are there specific requirements regarding “plausibility” for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific requirements. However, the competent authority assesses the feasibility of the request for action on a case-by-case basis, namely by determining if there is damage to the environment and if the applicant of the request for action has legal standing (Article 18 par. 4).

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

There is no certain manner required and/or time limits set. The law only requires notification and does not specify the means: the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court. Rules of the CPTA regarding judicial administrative appeals are applicable, including the right to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable time (see questions 1.3, 1) and 1.7.1, 4) above).

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

The constitutional right is implemented through the principle of effective judicial protection, which includes the right to a fair trial (Article 2 of the CPTA).

Articles 3 par. 2 and 4 of the CPC (which also apply to administrative court procedures) establish the adversarial principle (principle that both parties have the right to be heard) and the statute of substantial equality of parties before the courts, which are implemented in Articles 7 A par. 3, 58 par. 3 and 87 par. 4 of the CPTA regarding, respectively, the duty of procedural management, the deadlines for challenging null administrative acts before court, and the right of the parties to clarify or correct the facts presented in the initial stage of administrative court procedures. The principle of equality must also be observed in the relations of the Public Administration with individuals (Article 6 of the CPA) as well.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

DL 127/2013 does not set out a specific rule on timely judicial procedure(191). The constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, implemented by Article 2 of the CPTA, applies, including the right to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable time (see questions 1.3, 1) and 1.7.1, 4) above).

Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat to such damage, or alternatively (c) alleging the impairment of a right or a legitimate protected interest as required by administrative procedural law (see question 1.7.2)?

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing before national court.

The only requirements set out in DL 147/2008 regarding Article 13(1) of the ELD are that the interested persons shall be natural or legal persons: (a) affected or likely to be affected by the environmental damage or (b) having sufficient interest in the environmental decision-making relating to the damage or to the imminent threat to such damage, or alternatively (c) alleging the impairment of a right or a legitimate protected interest as required by administrative procedural law (Article 68 of the CPA - see question 1.4, 1) and 3) above).

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13. In Portugal, specific rules relating to the application of Article 12 (Request for action) of Directive 2004/35/EC are set out in Article 18 of Decree-Law no. 147/2008 of 29 July 2008 establishing the legal regime concerning environmental liability for environmental damage, as last amended by Decree-Law no. 13/2016 of 9 March 2016 (DL 147/2008), and the rules relating to the application of Article 13 (Review procedures) in the CPA and the CPTA.

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

The only requirements set out in DL 147/2008 regarding Article 13(1) of the ELD are that the interested persons shall be natural or legal persons: (a) affected or likely to be affected by the environmental damage or (b) having sufficient interest in the environmental decision-making relating to the damage or to the imminent threat to such damage, or alternatively (c) alleging the impairment of a right or a legitimate protected interest as required by administrative procedural law (Article 68 of the CPA - see question 1.4, 1) and 3) above).

DL 147/2008 does not set out specific rules on requirements needing to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court. Rules of the CPTA regarding judicial administrative appeals are applicable (see questions 1.7 above).

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

The only deadline set in DL 147/2008 is the statute of limitation of 30 years (Article 33). Appeals must be introduced within the general time limits of judicial administrative appeals (see question 1.7.1, 5) above).

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

The competent authority may request that the request for action be accompanied by the relevant information and data supporting the observations submitted in relation to the environmental damage in question, whenever the original elements raise doubts (Article 18 par. 3).

4) Are there specific requirements regarding “plausibility” for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific requirements. However, the competent authority assesses the feasibility of the request for action on a case-by-case basis, namely by determining if there is damage to the environment and if the applicant of the request for action has legal standing (Article 18 par. 4).

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

There is no certain manner required and/or time limits set. The law only requires notification and does not specify the means: the decision of approval or rejection of the request for action is notified through communication to the interested parties within 20 days (Article 18 par. 4). Interested parties means natural or legal persons, including ENGOs. If the request for action has been submitted by electronic means, the communication shall also be by electronic means (Article 21 par. 3). The national competent authority (APA) provides on its website the online form for submitting requests for action and the respective practical instructions (195). The annual report of environmental damages occurred is also available on the APA website. Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat to such damage?

Imminent threat of damage to the environment is included in the scope of DL 147/2008 (Article 2). All interested parties are entitled to submit to the competent authority any observations relating to instances of imminent threat of damage to the environment of which they are aware and shall be entitled to ask the competent authority to take action under DL 147/2008 (Article 18 par. 1).
Imminent damage means sufficient probability of occurrence of damage to the environment in the near future (Article 11 par 1 subpar. b). Additionally, imminent threat caused by an operator due to the exercise of their activities initiates objective liability (i.e. liability regardless of guilt) and subjective liability (Articles 12 par. 1 and 13 par. 1). In case of imminent threat of damage to the environment, the operator shall adopt the necessary preventive measures and shall inform the competent authority about such measures. The competent authority may at any moment demand that the operator supply information and adopt the preventive measures in case of imminent threat. The competent authority may execute the necessary preventive measures at the expense of the operator. If the imminent threat may affect the public health, the competent authority shall inform the national and regional health authorities (Article 14 pars. 1, 4, 5 and 6).

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The competent authority is the APA (Article 29 of DL 147/2008).

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
The MS does not require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings. As stated above in 1.7.1, 3), it is possible to challenge a first level administrative decision directly before court.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Portugal has, since 6 April 2000[196], been a Party to the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context (Espoo Convention), which is an integral part of Portuguese law under Article 8 of the CRP (see question 1.1, 5)).

Insofar as concerns sectoral rules, the following apply:

EIA consultations: The Portuguese State shall enter into consultations with States potentially affected regarding the environmental effects of a project in their territories and regarding the measures envisaged in order to avoid, minimise or remedy such effects. Whenever a project is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or if a Member State so requests, the APA sends a description of the project, together with any available information on its possible transboundary impact and on the nature of the decision which may be taken, to the authorities of the potentially affected State, at the latest by the time limit for publicising the EIA proceedings. When the consultation proceedings are concluded, the APA sends the DIA and final decision on the licensing or authorisation of the project (Articles 32, 33 and 34 of DL 151-B/2013). Such final decisions are challengeable either by means of administrative review (through administrative complaint or administrative appeal) or by means of judicial administrative review. Failure to send information or to send such final decision on the licensing or authorisation of the project to the Member State concerned is challengeable either by means of administrative appeal against illegal omission or by means of judicial administrative appeal against omission of due act.

SEA consultations: When a plan or programme being prepared is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or where a Member State likely to be significantly affected so requests, the competent authority shall send such plan or programme to the authorities of such Member State. In the event that the Member State wants to have consultations regarding such effects or measures, a timeframe shall be agreed as well as the rules ensuring that the consultations are held and the public is informed within a reasonable timeframe (Article 8 of Decree-Law no. 232/2007 of 15 June 2007[197] , [198]). Failure to send the plan and to allow for a consultation timeframe is challengeable either by means of administrative appeal against illegal omission or by means of judicial administrative appeal against omission of due act.

The CPC provides rules (also applicable to administrative judicial procedures) on translation and interpretation to foreign persons participating in judicial processes. The judge has the power to order presentation of translated documents, and an interpreter shall be appointed by the court when foreign nationals who cannot speak Portuguese have to give evidence in the Portuguese courts (Articles 133 and 134 of the CPC).

2) Notion of public concerned?
The notion of public concerned set out in Article 2 par. (s) of DL 151-B/2013 is in line with Directive 2011/92/EU and Article 55 of the CPTA: ‘public concerned’ means holders of subjective rights or legally protected rights in respect of decisions taken in the EIA administrative procedure, and also the public affected or likely to be affected by such decisions, including environmental non-governmental organisations.

DL 232/2007 on SEA does not include a notion of public concerned.

Some authors argue[199] that the right of access to justice is not exclusive to Portuguese citizens, but also citizens "outside Portuguese territory due to phenomenon of cross-border pollution".

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

NGOs of the affected country can have standing as long as they declare in court that they have a direct and personal interest, namely by having been harmed in their rights or legally protected rights by the challenged act (Article 55 of the CPTA).

Appeals shall be submitted to the administrative court geographically competent (Articles 16 to 22 of the CPTA) and within the deadline for submitting judicial administrative reviews. The time period for challenging an administrative act is three months starting from the notification, publication or knowledge about the act or about its implementation.

Insofar as concerns the legal regime of ENGOs (Law 35/98), it is not clear whether it is also applicable to NGOs from another Member State, namely insofar as concerns the standing of ENGOs to request judicial summoning of the public authorities to allow consultation on documents and processes and to issue the due certificates (Article 5 par. 3) or to promote before the competent authorities the administrative means of environmental protection and to initiate and be involved in the administrative proceedings (Article 9 par. 1). In fact, Article 7 par. 3 classifies ENGOs into three types, not including ENGOs from other Member States: national ENGOs, regional ENGOs and local ENGOs. This means that only these ENGO have standing in the means of judicial challenge referred to in Article 10 of Law 35/98. In short, Law 35/98 does not have express rules that can be applicable to the standing of ENGOs from other countries, including other Member States.

However, insofar as concerns legal aid, it is explicitly stated that foreign citizens from other Member States are eligible for legal protection (see question 1.7.3, 3) above). The following individuals are entitled to legal aid: foreign citizens and stateless persons with a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU, foreign citizens without a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU (if the laws of their countries of origin have reciprocal rights); and persons with usual domicile or residence in a Member State of the EU different from the Member State where the process will run (cross-border disputes).

Foreign individuals are not strictly excluded from requesting injunctive relief or interim measures.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Individuals of the affected country can have standing as long as they declare in court that they have a direct and personal interest, namely by having been harmed in their rights or legally protected rights by the challenged act (Article 55 of the CPTA).

The CPC, which is subsidiary to the CPTA[200], provides several rules applicable where the defendant is a foreign individual (that is, the legal standing to be demanded in court). But there are no rules applicable to the legal standing of the author of a judicial action for foreign persons or individuals. The only rule concerning the possibility of a foreign individual standing in court is on the determination of territorial competence of the court, i.e. which court in the Portuguese territory is competent under Article 80 paras. 1 and 2 of the CPC. The general rule concerning the territorial competence of the court is the court of the location of the defendant. However, if the defendant has domicile and residence in a foreign country, and if such defendant is not found inside the territory of Portugal, there is an inversion of the former rule: the territorially competent court is the court of the location of the domicile of the author. In such a case, if the domicile of the author is also in a foreign country, the territorially competent court is the court of Lisbon.

The following individuals are entitled to legal aid: foreign citizens and stateless persons with a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU; foreign citizens without a residence permit valid in a Member State of the EU (if the laws of their countries of origin have reciprocal rights); and persons with usual domicile or residence in a Member State of the EU different from the Member State where the process will run (cross-border disputes) - see question 1.7.3, 3) above[201].

Foreign individuals are not strictly excluded from requesting injunctive relief or interim measures.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

Insofar as concerns the EIA consultation regime, whenever a project is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or if a Member State so requests, the APA sends a description of the project, together with any available information on its possible transboundary impact and on the nature of the decision which may be taken, to the authorities of the potentially affected State, at the latest by the time limit for publicising the EIA proceedings, that is 5 days after delivery of the decision on the conformity of the environmental impact study by the EIA authority (Articles 33 par. 1 and 15 of DL 151-B/2013).

The SEA consultation regime is not entirely clear on this matter, besides providing that a plan or programme being prepared that is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or where a Member State likely to be significantly affected so requests such plan or programme, shall be sent to the concerned Member State. After approval of the plan or programme, it shall also be sent to the Member States that participated in the consultations (Articles 8 and 10 par. 3 of DL 232/2007).

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

Insofar as concerns the EIA consultation regime, whenever a project is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or if a Member State so requests, after the APA has sent a description of the project, together with any available information on its possible transboundary impact and on the nature of the decision which may be taken, to the authorities of the potentially affected State, the potentially affected State can declare, within 30 days, that it wishes to participate in the EIA proceedings (including individuals or ENGOs from the affected State). The deadline for providing access to justice for members of the public from other affected countries is the following: at the latest by the time limit for publicising the EIA proceedings (Article 33 par. 2 and Article 2 par. (s) of DL 151-B/2013). The deadline for any party from an affected State to administratively challenge the outcome of the EIA proceedings and/or the related administrative act (permit etc.) is the same as for nationals: for administrative challenge, the deadline is one year, 15 days or 30 days, depending on the kind of administrative challenge (see Question 1.7.1, 1) above). As for the deadline for judicial challenge, the general principle is that the administrative action can be brought to the court at any time without prejudice to the specific time limits as described in Question 1.7.1, 5) above.

The SEA consultation regime does not have specific timeframes for this.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Information on access to justice is a mandatory element to be included in the announcement of publicising the public consultation periods. The parties shall receive information concerning the possibility of challenging any decision, act or omission in relation to the rules of DL151-B/2013, through administrative complaint or administrative appeal, and through judicial administrative challenge, according to the CPA and the CPTA respectively (Annex IV par. (r) of DL 151-B/2013)[202].

The SEA consultation regime does not provide specific details on how information should be provided to the parties.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

The CPC provides rules on translation and interpretation for foreign persons participating in judicial processes. The following rules are applicable:

The judge, on its own motion (ex officio), or by request of the parties, orders that the party shall present the translation of documents that are originally written in one or more foreign languages, or, if there are doubts about the reputation of the translation(s) presented by the party, the judge orders that the party shall present additional translations certified by a notary or authenticated by a diplomatic or consular officer of the country of the respective foreign language. The judge may determine that the document is to be translated by an expert designated by the court where the previous options are not possible (Article 134 of the CPC).

The language in the process is Portuguese, with the following exceptions (Art. 133, par. 2 and 3 of the CPC): where foreign nationals who cannot speak Portuguese have to give evidence in the Portuguese courts, an interpreter shall be appointed for them, where necessary, in order to facilitate communication, under oath. The involvement of an interpreter as set out above shall be limited to that which is strictly required.

9) Any other relevant rules?

Insofar as concerns capacity to bring an action before a court, a branch of an organisation with headquarters in a foreign country may have such capacity only if an obligation is at stake contracted by a Portuguese person or by a foreign person with domicile in Portugal (Article 13 of the CPC).

Insofar as concerns the notions of res judicata and litis pendentis, an action filed in a foreign court is irrelevant, unless otherwise established in international conventions (Article 580 of the CPC).

Insofar as concerns the effectiveness of decisions of foreign courts, they must be subject to a process of confirmation and revision in a Portuguese court, unless such decision from the foreign court are used only as evidence which will be freely appraised by the judge (Article 97B of the CPC).

Insofar as concerns legalisation of documents issued in foreign countries: without prejudice to community regulations or other international acts, the authentic documents issued in foreign countries are considered official if the signature of the officer is recognised by a Portuguese diplomatic or consular agent in the respective country (Article 440 of the CPC).

Insofar as concerns the sectoral rules replied above to Question 1.7.4, 3), the following rules apply regarding cross-border impacts:

In the legal regime of EIA of public and private projects likely to have significant environmental effects and in the legal regime of IPPC, the Portuguese State shall consult the State or States likely to be affected on the environmental effects of a project or an installation in their respective territories and on the measures foreseen to avoid, minimise or mitigate such effects (Article 32 of DL 151-B/2013). The competent authorities of a Member-State likely to be affected may formally express that they are willing to participate in the EIA proceedings, and the results of the public participation in such Member-State shall be taken into account in the EIA proceedings or in proceedings for licensing of installations. The final decision concerning the licensing or authorisation of the project or installation is sent by the APA to the competent authorities of the Member-State concerned (Articles 34 and 43 of DL 151-B/2013 and 43 and paragraphs 2, (i) and 8 of Annex IV of DL 127/2013).

Insofar as concerns cross-border damages to the environment, when there is damage to the environment that affects or is likely to affect the territory of another Member State, the competent authority shall immediately inform the members of the Government in charge of foreign affairs, environment and, if necessary, health. Such members of Government are then competent to send to the competent authorities of the Member States concerned all the relevant information and establish the articulation mechanisms with such authorities (Article 24 of DL 147/2008).
The police regulations were issued up to 2011 by the Civil Governors, which body was made extinct de facto by the Government in 2011 (by Decree-Law 114/2011 which transferred all the competences of these bodies to other administrative bodies such as the Municipalities, the Public Security Police, the Republican National Guard and the National Authority of Emergency and Civil Protection). However, the CRP, the most recent version of which dates from 2005, still contains a transitory disposition stating that the Civil Governors are the body competent to represent the Government in each respective territorial district (Article 291 of the CRP) – this transitory constitutional disposition is valid only until the administrative regions are implemented in the country, which has not yet occurred. CRP consolidated version available here.

[2] The police regulations were issued up to 2011 by the Civil Governors, which body was made extinct de facto by the Government in 2011 (by Decree-Law 114/2011 which transferred all the competences of these bodies to other administrative bodies such as the Municipalities, the Public Security Police, the Republican National Guard and the National Authority of Emergency and Civil Protection). However, the CRP, the most recent version of which dates from 2005, still contains a transitory disposition stating that the Civil Governors are the body competent to represent the Government in each respective territorial district (Article 291 of the CRP) – this transitory constitutional disposition is valid only until the administrative regions are implemented in the country, which has not yet occurred. CRP consolidated version available here.

[3] Article 2, par.1 of Law no. 11/87
[5] Translation of Articles 9 and 66 of the CRP.

[15] Lei n.º 83/95, de 31 de Agosto sobre o Direito de participação procedimental e de acção popular (full consolidated text).

[18] Code of Civil Procedure (Código de Processo Civil – CPC) approved by Law no. 41/2013 of 26 June 2013, as last amended by Law no. 117/2019 of 13 September 2019 (Lei n.º 4/2013, de 26 de Junho, alterado pela última vez pela Lei n.º 117/2019, de 13/09) (full consolidated text). For word by word quotation in English of Articles 59, 62, 63 and 94 of the CPC, see How to proceed – Portugal.

[20] Lei n.º 19/2014 de 14 de Abril.
[23] Decre-Law no. 48/95 of 15 March, as last amended by Law no. 102/2019 of 6 September, approving the Penal Code (consolidated text).
[25] CPTA approved by Decree-Law no. 214-Q/2015, as last amended by Law 118/2019, which changes profoundly the previous version of the CPTA (consolidated text).
[26] Article 9.
[29] Decreto-Lei n.º 4/2015, de 7 de Janeiro (full text which has not undergone any changes).
[31] Law no. 35/98 of 18 July 1998, as amended by Law no. 82-D/2014 of 31 December 2014 (consolidated text).
[34] Aragão, 2012, page 29. Also see page 23 for a broad description of environmental case-law.
Articles 9.3 and 9.4 of the Aarhus Convention in the Member States of the European Union.

Law no. 52/2008
Implementation report - Portugal
How to bring a case to court - Portugal

Acórdão do STJ n.º 990/10.5T2OBR.C3-A.S1
de 14/04/1999.

Acórdão do STJ n.º 07A1340
CCDR Norte
de 26/01/2006.

A problemática do reenvio prejudicial
Law no. 3/2004
Acórdão do STJ n.º 98B1090
de 16/06/1999.

Overview of the court system in Portugal

Jurisdiction - Portugal

CCDR Lisboa e Vale Tejo
Tribunal Constitucional

Preparatory ruling requested by a defendant within an administrative offence appeal
Preliminary ruling before the CJEU

Guia prático do reenvio Prejudicial
Center for Studies Judiciaries.

For general information on alternative means for resolving disputes in Portugal, see How to bring a case to court - Portugal.
Queixa Ambiental, IGAMAOT

The right to interpretation and translation in Criminal Proceedings: Portuguese Law Standards

Decree-Law no. 34/2008

Portuguese Bar Association

Development of an Assessment Framework

NGOs may intervene in administrative proceedings according to Article 68, par. 2 of the CPA. NGOs may intervene in judicial proceedings according to Article 31 of the CPC.

Source page 105 of Study on EU implementation of the Aarhus Convention in the area of access to justice in environmental matters – Final report (September 2019)

An assistant in criminal process is a participant who can intervene during inquiry and instruction, providing evidence and requiring diligences, promote prosecution and make the suit proceed even if the Public Ministry did not charge the defendant, and finally can bring an appeal from the decision when he is affected by it.

More on the handling of processes in Portugal and costs for access to justice can be found on page 4 of Development of an Assessment Framework on Environmental Governance in EU Member States - Country fiche Portugal March2019

The Portuguese Bar Association is a Public Association created in 1926 that represents the law practitioners (i.e. Lawyers and trainee lawyers, which are obliged to register in OA in order to exercise such professions) and acts independently from the State bodies with a free and autonomous nature. All the Information in English available here.

How to proceed? - Portugal

Article 31 of the CPC.

Procedural rights of the defendant in Article 62 of the CPP: to be present and to participate actively in the proceedings; to be informed on the charge; to be heard by the court or the judge; to have the assistance of a counsel.

See also above Question 1.3, 5).

This value corresponds to half of the value of the jurisdiction of the second instance judicial courts (the courts of appeal) - Art. 44 of the Law of Organisation of Judicial System.

Criteria for the value are based not only on the plaintiff’s economic situation, but also on the reasons for dismissal (substance of the complaint or procedural reasons).

An administrative complaint means a complaint against the body that was itself responsible for committing (or omitting) the challenged administrative act.

See also above Question 1.3, 5).

5,000 Euros is the value of the jurisdiction of the first instance courts – Art. 44 of Law no. 62/2013 of 26 August 2013 approving the Law of Organisation of Judicial System - Lei da Organização do Sistema Judiciário.

The Law of Organisation of Judicial System, as last amended by Law no. 27/2019 of 28 March. Full updated consolidated text of the RCP, including annex Tables of values of judicial fees.

See also above Question 1.3, 5).

This value corresponds to half of the value of the jurisdiction of the second instance judicial courts (the courts of appeal) - Art. 44 of the Law of Organisation of Judicial System.

Criteria for the value are based not only on the plaintiff’s economic situation, but also on the reasons for dismissal (substance of the complaint or procedural reasons).

An administrative complaint means a complaint against the body that was itself responsible for committing (or omitting) the challenged administrative act.

See also above Question 1.3, 5).

5,000 Euros is the value of the jurisdiction of the first instance courts – Art. 44 of Law no. 62/2013 of 26 August 2013 approving the Law of Organisation of Judicial System - Lei da Organização do Sistema Judiciário.

The law does not exclude such possibility, the hierarchical appeal may be used for the following purposes: challenging administrative decisions issued by bodies subject to the hierarchical powers of superior bodies; or responding to administrative decisions unlawfully omitted by bodies subject to the hierarchical powers of superior bodies.

An administrative complaint means a complaint against the body that was itself responsible for committing (or omitting) the challenged administrative act.

See also above Question 1.3, 5).

5,000 Euros is the value of the jurisdiction of the first instance courts – Art. 44 of Law no. 62/2013 of 26 August 2013 approving the Law of Organisation of Judicial System - Lei da Organização do Sistema Judiciário.

The law does not exclude such possibility, the hierarchical appeal may be used for the following purposes: challenging administrative decisions issued by bodies subject to the hierarchical powers of superior bodies; or responding to administrative decisions unlawfully omitted by bodies subject to the hierarchical powers of superior bodies.

A special administrative appeal means an appeal against administrative acts committed or omitted by a body of the indirect administration (see question 1.3 - 1) above).

The rules for calculating the time limits in administrative proceedings are set out in Article 87 of the CPA: the deadlines are suspended on Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays. This means that all administrative time limits should be counted in working days. By contrast, the rules for calculating civil time limits are set out in Article 279 of the Civil Code and in Article 144 par. 2 of the CPC: the deadlines are continuous and not suspended on Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays.

The concepts of mandatory or optional administrative complaints and appeals are as follows: administrative complaints and appeals are mandatory when the possibility of access to judicial means depends on such complaints and appeals; they are optional when the judicial action does not depend on such complaints and appeals. According to Article 185 of the CPA, the complaints and appeals are only mandatory when deemed as such by the law.
[129] Also Nesbit, 2019, page 38 concerning “deadlines for provision of environmental information” reports that [Portugal has a] “basic deadline of 10 days”.

[130] See question 1.7.2. 5) below.

[131] The “administered” means all the addressees of the acts practised by the Public Administration.

[133] See case-law from the Central Administrative Court of the South of 4 July 2019 n.º 2412/17.1 BELSB (Acórdão do Tribunal Central Administrativo Suí n.º 2412/17.1BELSB de 04/07/2019: “Nos termos dos art.º 51.º e 54.º, n.º 1, do CPTA, são impugnáveis os actos administrativos com eficácia externa e que produzam efeitos jurídicos imediatos”).

[135] All decisions within the exercise of legal-administrative powers can be challenged provided that they are aimed at producing external legal effects on a concrete and individual situation, even if such decisions do not end a procedure, and including decisions issued by authorities not integrated in the Public Administration and by private bodies acting in the exercise of legal-administrative powers (Article 51 par. 1 of the CPTA and Article 148 of the CPA).

[136] The concept of an administrative act that can be challenged before court shall be characterised by reference to the concept of an administrative act of Article 148 of the CPA, which is understood as the decisions that, within the exercise of legal-administrative power, are aimed at producing legal external effects on an individual and concrete situation. On the other hand, Article 2 par. 1 on the scope of the CPA determines who is competent to deliver administrative acts, stating that the CPA is applicable to the conduct of any bodies, regardless of their nature, adopted within the exercise of public powers or regulated by provisions of administrative law (free adaptation from source in Portuguese, Cadilha, CEJ, April 2017, page 28).

[138] Extensive analysis of the CPTA rules on challenging administrative acts before court can be found in Caldeira, Marco "A impugnação de actos no novo CPTA: âmbito, delimitação e pressupostos", in “Comentários à revisão do EATAF e do CPTA”, AAFDL, 2016, retrieved from "A Revisão do EATAF e do CPTA.

[139] The principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, in a reasonable time, and through a fair trial, a judicial decision with the force of res judicata concerning each request that has been properly brought to the court as well as the possibility of executing such judicial decision and obtaining the injunction measures, preventive or conservatory, or ensuring the useful effect of the decision (Article 2 par. 1 of the CPTA).

[140] See EU Justice Scoreboard portal, the 2020 EU Justice Scoreboard Fact sheet | July 2020 and the respective report.

[141] Declarative process means the original process as opposed to the execution process, i.e. the process to execute a judgement of a declarative process.

[143] For the form of counting the deadlines of Article 98 of the CPTA, the civil rule set out in Article 279 of the Civil Code applies (Source: Carvalho, Ana Celeste "A Reforma do Código de Processo nos Tribunais Administrativos", 30 October 2015, page 16).

[144] For further developments, see Blanco de Morais, Carlos, "Novidades em matéria da disciplina dos regulamentos no código de procedimento administrativo", page 4.

[145] Supplementary means it is a general time limit applicable for the parties if the law does not set other specific legal time limits.

[146] The initial application means the first application presented by the party that starts the process brought to the court.

[147] Carvalho, October 2015, pages 16 et seq.

[148] Source: Q&A on administrative challenges, University of Porto.

[149] Deferral means postponement.

[150] The main process means the original process during which the injunction has been requested.

[151] There are two kinds of ordinary judicial remedy (ordinary appeals): apelação and revista (Article 140 of the CPTA).

[152] Article 143 par. 2 of the CPTA refers to a non-exhaustive list of appeals that do not have suspensive effect.

[154] The moment of such early stage is when the judge makes a liminal appraisal of the process regarding procedural orders, including the notification of the defendant.

[155] Articles 117 to 127 of the CPTA provide the procedural rules on all stages of the injunction process.

[156] Community law means EU law.

[158] The value of 1 Unit of Account (Unidade de Conta – UC) is currently 102 Euros. The annual update of the UC is determined in the Annual Budget Law: the update of this value is currently suspended (article 210 of Law no. 2/2020 of 31 March - Annual Budget Law for 2020), so the value of the UC is the same as it was in the previous year.

[159] As described in section 3.3.2. Q4 of Environmental Governance Assessment Portugal

[161] See question 1.4, 1) above.

[162] See question 1.4, 1) above.

[167] In administrative procedures, the judicial fees are reduced to 90% if the party introduces the respective requirements in conformity with the formulary and practical instructions of Order no. 341/2019 of 1 October 2019 (Article 6 par. 9 of the RCP) applicable to the administrative process of the mass procedures provided in Article 99 par. 3 of the CPTA. The mass procedures litigation occurs when there is administrative action concerning the practice or omission of administrative acts with more than 50 litigants. However, such mass litigation is only possible in the following adamanent cases that are not relevant to environmental cases: public recruitment competitions; proceedings of public examinations; public recruitment proceedings.

[168] These principles are regulated in Articles 6 to 9 and 11 of the CPA.

[170] See questions 1.8 below.

[171] See questionnaire on “Administrative Justice in Europe – Portugal” of the Association of the Councils of State and Supreme Administrative Jurisdictions of the European Union, which does not include any such express obligation to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment, available here and here. See also the Portugal report of the comparative report on Access to justice in Europe: an overview of challenges and opportunities by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA).

[172] Case-law 2938/16.4BELSB of 19 April 2018 of the Central Administrative Court of the South: “There is no legal rule imposing on the court the translation of the letter of notification of a party who is a foreign citizen and does not know the Portuguese language”. Acórdão do Tribunal Central Administrativo Sul n.º 2938/16.4BELSB de 19/04/2018 “Não existe norma legal que imponha ao tribunal a tradução da carta de notificação da parte, cidadão estrangeiro e desconhecedor da língua portuguesa, para depar em juízo (contrariamente ao que sucede com o regime do seu depoimento em juízo, em que se encontra garantida a tradução para o que for estritamente indispensável – art. 133.º, n.ºs 2 e 3, do CPC), tanto mais que o seu defensor foi igualmente notificado para o acto.”

[173] As stated above in question 1.4, 3).

[174] See also point 8 (In which language can I make my application) of How to bring a case to court - Portugal

[176] The national EIA authority is APA.

[177] The means of administrative review are the following:

- administrative complaint or administrative appeal challenging administrative acts, either by requesting their revocation, annulment, modification or replacement, or by reacting against unlawful omission of administrative acts because of violation of the duty to decide, requesting that the intended act shall be delivered (Article 184 par. 1 of the CPA); and
- administrative complaint or administrative appeal requesting modification, suspension, revocation or declaration of invalidity of administrative regulations that are directly harmful to the legally protected rights or interests of the interested party (the interested parties for this purpose shall be the plaintiff of the complaint or the applicant of the appeal) and administrative complaint or administrative appeal against unlawful omission of administrative regulations (Article 147 of the CPA).

The means of judicial review are the following:

- challenge of administrative acts;
- condemnation to practise due administrative acts;
- condemnation to refrain from practising certain acts;
- challenge of rules issued under administrative law;
- condemnation to emit rules due under provisions of administrative law;
- recognition of subjective legal situations directly arising from legal-administrative rules or from acts practised under provisions of administrative law;
- recognition of qualities or of fulfilment of requirements;
- condemnation of the Public Administration or private persons to refrain from certain behaviours;
- condemnation of the Administration to adopt the conducts necessary to restore violated rights or interests, including in de facto situations where there is no legitimate title;
- condemnation of the Administration to comply with duties to provide that arise directly from legal-administrative rules and do not concern issuing a challengeable administrative act or that are constituted by legal acts practised under provisions of administrative law, and that may concern the payment of a certain amount, the delivery of a certain thing or the provision of a certain fact;
- civil liability of legal persons;
- interpretation, validation or execution of contracts;
- refund of unjust enrichment; and
- legal relations between administrative bodies (Article 37 par. 1 of the CPTA).

[178] Proponent means the natural or legal person, public or private, introducing a request for authorisation or for licensing of a project (Article 2 subpar p)). Proponent means the developer in the sense of Article 1(2)(b) of EIA Directive (Directive 2011/92/EU).

[179] According to Article 8 of DL 151-B/2013, the EIA authority is APA (see question 1.3, 1) above) or the Regional Spatial Planning Commissions (Comissões de Coordenação e Desenvolvimento Regional – CCDR (see question 1.3, 1) above).

[180] The environmental impact study means the document prepared by the proponent within the EIA process containing a summary description of the project, the identification and evaluation of the positive and negative likely environmental impacts, the predictable evolution of the factual situation if the project were not executed, the environmental management measures to avoid, reduce and remedy the expected adverse impacts, and a non-technical summary of such information (Article 2 subpar. j)). This meets the requirement of Article 5 of Directive 2011/92/EU.

[181] Case-law of the Central Administrative Court (TCA) of the South of 21 February 2019 no. 243/17.8BELLE revoked the injunction ordered in August 2018 by a first instance administrative court – court a quo – required together by ENGOs and a civil organisation (ALMARGEM, QUERCUS and SCIAENA association for marine science and cooperation) against the administrative body General Directorate of Natural Resources, Safety and Maritime Services of the Ministry of the Sea and two counter-stakeholder business corporations. The administrative appeal brought to the second instance TCA of the South decided that the injunction requirement of periculum in mora was not proved and that the public interest of possible harm on cetaceans and other marine fauna did not prevail and in consequence condemned the appealed ENGOs and civil organisation to pay all the court fees. It is worth highlighting that the first instance decision suspended the effects of the administrative act that authorised the private use of national maritime space – “título de utilização privativa do espaço marítimo nacional (TUPEM)” – and summoned the counter-stakeholders to stop all prospection and execution works. This injunction was challenged by the Ministry of Sea and those stakeholders (the appellants), arguing that the public discussion process should not be deemed flawed and the court a quo could not substitute the discretionary power of the administrative body APA, among other allegations raised by the appellants (Acórdão n.º 243/17.8BELLE de 21/02/2019 do Tribunal Central Administrativo Sul (“ALMARGEM (…), SCIAENA – Associação de Ciências Maríneas e Cooperação e QUERCUS (…) requereram providência cautelar (…) contra a Direcção-Geral de Recursos Naturais, Segurança e Serviços Marítimos e o Ministério do Mar, indicando como contrainteresadas a (…), e a …, SA (…)”). Further comments on other environmental judgments can be found in Gomes, Carla Amado, e-book “DIREITO DO AMBIENTE Anotações jurisprudenciais Dispersas”, 2017.

[182] Portal Participa, launched in 2015, is used for information dissemination and participation in environmental issues.

[184] A comprehensive list of the rights with granted administrative protection includes: “the recognition of subjective legal situations arising directly from administrative or legal acts; the recognition of individual qualities or fulfilment of conditions; the recognition of the right to refrain from behaviours and, in particular, to refrain from adopting administrative acts in the case of threat of future injuries; the annulment or declaration of nullity or inexistence of administrative acts; the condemnation of the administration to pay, to deliver things or perform facts; the condemnation of the administration to repair damages (in natura or by monetary compensation); the resolution of disputes concerning the interpretation, validity or enforceability of administrative contracts; the declaration of illegality of administrative norms; the condemnation of the administration to practise administrative acts, material acts or operations due according to the law or necessary to restore subjective legal situations; the injunction to provide information, allow access to documents or issue certificates; or the adoption of appropriate interim measures to ensure the effectiveness of the decision. Source: Aragão, 2012, page 15.

[185] In particular, DL 151-B/2013 does not set out a rule similar to Article 11 of Directive 2011/92/EU stating that the procedure before a court of law “shall be fair, equitable, timely and not prohibitively expensive”.

[188] The exploration of the waste incineration or co-incineration installation can only take place after this final decision on the licensing request.

[189] The Coordinating Authority is responsible for coordination of the licensing proceeding or authorisation of activities covered by DL 127/2013 (see this question 1.8.2, 5) below), and for delivering authorisation or licensing for the installation, modification and exploration of such activities.

[190] A comprehensive list of the rights granted with administrative protection includes: “the recognition of subjective legal situations arising directly from administrative or legal acts; the recognition of individual qualities or fulfilment of conditions; the recognition of the right to refrain from behaviours and, in particular, to refrain from adopting administrative acts in the case of threat of future injuries; the annulment or declaration of nullity or inexistence of administrative acts; the condemnation of the administration to pay, to deliver things or provide facts; the condemnation of the administration to repair damages (in natura or by monetary compensation); the resolution of disputes concerning the interpretation, validity or enforceability of administrative contracts; the declaration of illegality of administrative norms; the condemnation of the administration to practise administrative acts, material acts or operations due according to the law or necessary to restore subjective legal situations; the injunction to provide information, allow access to documents or issue certificates; or the adoption of appropriate interim measures to ensure the effectiveness of the decision. Source: Aragão, 2012, page 15.

[191] In particular, DL 127/2013 does not set out a rule similar to Article 25(d) of Directive 2010/75/EU stating that the review procedure “shall be fair, equitable, timely and not prohibitively expensive”.

[192] The dissemination of licensing requests takes place in two stages: dissemination of information on the process that will be made available to the public consultation; dissemination of the process to the public concerned for comment (paragraph 1 of Annex IV).

Stage (a) includes the following elements:
- identification of the request;
- identification of the operator (i.e. any natural person or any private or public legal person that intends to explore an installation or is the owner of an installation - Article 3, subpar. pp) of DL 127/2013);
- identification of the environmental technical officer (i.e. the technical officer appointed by the operator, responsible for the environmental management of the waste incineration and co-incineration installation and/or main interlocutor during the licensing procedure and the issuing of licences (Article 3 subpar. zz));
- identification and location of the installation;
- indication of the elements included in the licensing request and all additional elements;
- location and date where and when the relevant information is made available and the respective means of availability;
- duration of the consultation period;
- if applicable, the existence of DIA or EIA process pending;
- subject to cross-border EIA or consultation between the Member States;
- indication of the authorities that can supply relevant information and the authorities responsible for receiving observations or questions, and the respective time limits;
- explicit statement that the licence or the installation exploration authorisation can only be issued after delivery of a positive final decision;
- and indication of the possibility of challenging any decision, act or omission concerning the rules of chapter II of DL127/2013 (i.e. concerning the installations developing the activities listed in annex I) through administrative complaint or optional hierarchical appeal, and through judicial challenge, according to, respectively, the CPA and the CPTA.

Stage (b) is concluded with the collection of comments from the public concerned after dissemination of the process.

[193] That is, rules concerning the installations developing the activities listed in annex I, which includes industries in the energy sector, the waste management, production and processing of metals sector, the mineral industry sector and the chemical sector.

[194] See also case C-529/15.

[198] For instance, Gomes (2014) (see Question 1.4, 3).

[199] See question 1.7.4, 5 above.

citada Lei, prevê-se, de forma expressa, que a protecção jurídica abrange os estrangeiros e apátridas em situação de insuficiência económica comprovada. Porém, no que diz respeito aos estrangeiros, a protecção jurídica apenas lhes é concedida quando tenham título de residência válido num Estado-membro da UE, ou quando tenham noutro Estado, desde que o direito de protecção jurídica seja atribuído aos portugueses pelas leis do respetivo Estado (cf. art. 7.º, n.º 2 da Lei n.º 34/2004, de 29-07 e Portarias n.º 10/2008, de 03-01 e n.º 1085-A/2004, de 31-08).

[202] Other mandatory elements to be included in the publication of public consultation periods listed in Annex IV include: identification of the proponent; identification of the project and its location; indication that the project is subject to EIA proceedings when the public consultation stage of Article 15 occurs; indication that the project is subject to proceedings for checking its environmental conformity; indication that the project is subject to consultation between the Member States, where applicable; indication of the documents integrating the EIA proceedings and the location and date where and when they are available and other relevant information and means of availability; indication of the documents integrating the environmental conformity checking proceedings and the location and date where and when they are available and other relevant information and means of availability; duration period of the public consultation and means of its implementation; identification of the EIA authority; identification of the authority competent to issue the Declaration of Impact Assessment (DIA); identification of the authority competent to issue the decision on the environmental conformity of the execution project; identification of the authority competent to license the project; identification of the authorities responsible for supplying relevant information on the project; identification of the authorities responsible for receiving opinions, suggestions and other inputs and the respective time limit; explicit statement that the licence or authorisation for the project can only be issued after issuing of the DIA, the declaration on environmental conformity of the execution project or the time limit for issuing such DIA or declaration (tacit decision); time limit for issuing the DIA; and time limit for issuing the decision on environmental conformity of the execution project. Last update: 18/12/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1: Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling inside the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

There is broad access to justice beyond EIA and IED based on effective judicial protection. The following legal acts fall within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of EIA and IED Directives:

- Decree-Law no. 150/2015 of 5 August 2015 establishing the regime of prevention of major accidents involving dangerous substances and limitation of their consequences for human health and the environment (DL 150/2015) ([6]), transposing Directive 2012/18/UE (Seveso III).

Other environmental regimes not transposing Directives:

Law no. 17/2014 of 10 April 2014 approving the Sea Management and Planning Law ([12]).

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law?

The general statutory rules of the CPA and the CPTA apply to the legal instruments identified in the previous section, namely on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge). As replied above to Question 1.4, 2), in this regard there are no different or special rules applicable in sectoral legislation, since the general rules stated above apply to all sectoral legislation. Those general rules concerning who can challenge an environmental administrative decision and standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals and on procedural time limits are described above in Questions 1.4, 1) and 3) and 1.7.1.

Law 58/2005 (the Water Law transposing Water Framework Directive 2000/60/EC) establishes that an interested party (that is, an applicant for a water use permit) has the right to request prior information from the national water authority (APA) concerning the possibility of use of water resources for the intended purpose, but the information given only constitutes legally protected rights or interests (that is, that are able to give legal standing to holders of such rights or interests) inasmuch as it is recognised by DL 226-A/2007, which implements the Water Law (Article 56 of Law 58/2005). The provisions of DL 150/2015 (transposing Directive 2012/18/UE on the control of major accident hazards involving dangerous substances) on access to justice are in line with Article 23 of the Directive and expressly ensure to the public the right to seek a review, in accordance with the rules on environmental... access to justice[13], and to administratively challenge, through optional administrative complaint or hierarchical appeal, any acts or omissions of a competent authority, respectively, in relation to the request for information provided in Article 31 and to the public participation provided in Article 11(1)[14] (Article 34 of DL 150/2015). Such rights derive from the general rules of the CPA and the CPTA.

The definition of public concern is in conformity with the Directive: it means the public affected or likely to be affected by, or having an interest in, the taking of a decision on any of the matters covered by Articles 8 and 11[15], and, for the purposes of this definition, environmental non-governmental organisations (ENGOs) are deemed to have an interest (Article 3 subpar. q) of DL 150/2015).

DL 146/2006 ensures the right to public information: The noise strategic maps and action plans shall be disseminated by electronic means and physically by the competent authorities, such as the municipal authority and the APA (Article 13).

DL 142/2008 does not regulate what information to the public or the right to challenge comprise, but expressly regulates the intervention of ENGOs in the process of collection and treatment of wild animals and the cooperation of public and private authorities with ENGOs for the development of captive breeding programmes (Articles 33 and 34).

Regarding the effectiveness of the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law, the following examples show that national case-law refers to community law (Directives) rather than to CJEU case-law[16]:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Reference number and date</th>
<th>Issues addressed</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>STA 0996/06 25 September 2012[17]</td>
<td>Development plan of the Natural Park Sintra-Cascais; principle of trust; principle of proportionality; land use plan; right to participation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 047310 15 February 2007[18]</td>
<td>Expropriation of public utility; highway; waters; Natura Network; aquifer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 46273A 8 July 2000[19]</td>
<td>Suspension of the effects of administrative acts; serious injury of public interest; environmental law; environmental protection</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 031535 14 October 1999[20]</td>
<td>Transposition of Directive; immediate effect; preliminary ruling; protection area; Vasco da Gama bridge</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Administrative complaint; tacit rejection; fees; wind farms; municipal orders

In administrative appeals and applications for judicial review, the judges have a large degree of discretion, since there are no clear criteria defined in the legislation or case-law. The judge has to balance the public and private conflicting interests. There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedures that court procedures should be timely. There is no general or specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered[24].

According to Article 2 of the CPTA, the principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, within a reasonable time, a judicial decision that is considered res judicata deciding on the claims presented before the court, as well as the possibility to obtain interim measures, be it anticipatory or protective, to ensure the effectiveness of the decision. For promotion of access to justice, all procedural rules should be interpreted in order to promote the emission of substantial judgments on the merits of the claims (Article 7 of the CPTA). This means an obligation on the judge to ensure that the judicial procedures proceed quickly.

However, there are studies that address the question of slowness of justice and length of court proceedings in Portugal[25].

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative review and the judicial review cover both procedural and substantive legality.

The scope of trials before administrative courts is not mere legality control. Every legally protected right or interest must have adequate protection from the administrative courts[26] (Article 2 par. 2 of the CPTA).

All administrative acts with external effects are subject to appeal, regardless of their legal form, mainly when they are likely to affect the rights or interests protected. The appeal does not aim solely at declaring the act void on the basis of its illegality, but should also aim at the condemnation of the administration to practise the due act (Article 51 of the CPTA). In the final ruling, the court gives the administration a deadline to issue the act which was illegally omitted or denied, and may in some cases impose additionally, in the same final ruling of condemnation, the payment of a progressive fine designed to prevent any delay in the enforcement of the final ruling (Article 66 of the CPTA).

The applicant may request the declaration of nulity or of illegal omission of an administrative act due simultaneously with a second request for condemnation of the Administration to adopt the acts and operations needed to reconstruct the situation that would have existed if the contested measure had not been practised. If the due act that the administration is condemned to adopt involves the formulation of pure administrative opinions or typically administrative judgments, then the court cannot determine the precise content of the action to be taken but must clarify the guidelines and the obligations to be observed by the administration (Article 95 par. 5 of the CPTA).

Failure to exercise the right to challenge a measure contained in a statute or regulation does not preclude the right of appeal of its implementing acts or application. Failure to exercise the right to challenge a measure not individually identifying its addressees does not prevent appeal against implementing acts or application acts whose recipients are individually identified (Article 52 of the CPTA). Even confirmative acts can be challenged as long as the former act has not been contested or notified (even if it has been published) (Article 53 of the CPTA).

In an actio popularis judgment, the powers of the judge are quite far reaching, namely in collecting evidence and suspending the effects of the refuted act. The judge is not bound by the evidence presented by the parties but can collect further evidence on their own initiative (Article 17 of APL).

In Portugal the scope of review is very broad as the courts can look at all aspects of legality of the decisions challenged.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. On the contrary, the CPTA establishes that the use of means of administrative review suspends the deadline for introducing judicial review of the challenged administrative decision. Such deadline only continues to run after notification of the decision issued on the administrative review or after the legal deadline.
4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing before the national courts. The Water Law transposing Water Framework Directive 2000/60/EC ensures participation of the interested parties in the process of planning (Article 26 of Law 58/2005), establishing the principle of participation and the right of access to information. The national water authority must promote the active participation of both natural and legal persons (Article 84 of Law 58/2005). Within administrative proceedings relating to water, all natural and legal persons have the right to procedural information according to the CPA and the legislation concerning environmental information. All natural and legal persons have the right to access information on water originated or held by competent authorities, which may be subject to a fee to cover the costs of making the information available (Articles 86 and 88 of Law 58/2005).

The right to public participation in the decision-making process is also ensured in the following regimes: prevention of major accidents (Article 11 of DL 150 /2015 in line with Article 15(2) of Directive 2012/18/EU); waste management (Article 18-A of DL 178/2006); plans of action concerning environmental noise (Article 14 of DL 146/2006); nature and biodiversity conservation (Article 14 of DL 142/2008).

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There is a case similar to preclusion worth mentioning: appeal to the Constitutional Court is only possible if, in the previous judicial procedures, the argument of unconstitutionality of a legal rule was raised (Article 70 par. 1 indents (b) and (f) of Law no. 28/82 of 15 November 1982, as last amended by Organic Law no. 4/2019 of 13 September 2019).

Insofar as concerns the general rules applicable to judicial administrative reviews (Articles 37 et seq. of the CPTA), the following restrictions apply: In the context of civil liability of the Public Administration for unlawful administrative acts, the court can decide if a certain act is illegal, even if such act does not meet the challengeable requirements, i.e. if an unchallengeable act is at stake (this means even if such act is not an administrative act with external effects, because only administrative acts with external effects can be subject to administrative appeal). Without prejudice to this possibility, the effect of annulment of the unchallengeable act cannot be obtained through judicial review (Article 38 of the CPTA). An act is unchallengeable when it is not substantiated in a unilateral decision of the public authority, not directed at generating a consequence and not creating, modifying or extinguishing a right or duty or making a legal determination (this derives a contrario from the legal notions of administrative act in Article 148 of the CPA and challengeable acts in Article 51 of the CPTA).

The condemnation to refrain from practising certain acts can only be requested if it is likely that the acts issued would harm the legally protected rights or interests and that the use of such means of challenge is indispensable (Article 39 of the CPTA).

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? The constitutional right is implemented through the principle of effective judicial protection, which includes the right to a fair trial (Article 2 of the CPTA). The principle of equality must also be observed in the relations of the Public Administration with individuals (Article 6 of the CPA).

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? The constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, implemented by Article 2 of the CPTA, applies, including the right to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable timeframe (see questions 1.3, 1) and 1.7.1, 4) above).

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? General administrative rules apply. See question 1.7.2 above.

In the noise regulations, the competent authorities may determine urgent injunction measures deemed indispensable to avoid serious damage to human health and to the well-being of the populations resulting from activities that violate the noise regulations (Article 27 of DL 9/2007).

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost rules on bringing a challenge on access to justice in these areas are the same as replied above to Question 1.7.3., as general rules apply. The following legal regimes implement the provisions on access to justice and effective judicial protection set out it Articles 20 and 268 of the CRP: cost of access to justice, protection from justice and protection from acts of the Public Administration. Justice shall not be denied to a person not having sufficient economic means, which is implemented by the legal mechanism of legal aid. The Public Administration is subject to the principle of proportionality (Article 266 of the CRP and Article 7 of the CPA), which in this context means that proportionality is a general safeguard against prohibitive costs.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

In transposing Directive 2001/42/EC on the assessment of the effects of certain plans and programmes on the environment, DL 232/2007 addresses the need for better use of the EIA mechanism a priori before submitting certain projects to a prior EIA regulated by DL 151-B/2013 (see question 1.8.1 above), allowing for EIA of such projects at a time when the options for the decision-making process are less restricted.

The scope of DL 232/2007 includes plans and programmes:

(a) which relate to agriculture, forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, waste management, water management, telecommunications, tourism, town and country planning, or land use and which set the framework for future development consent of projects subject to EIA listed under Annexes I and II of DL 151-B/2013;

(b) which, in view of the likely effect on a site included on the national list of sites, a site of community interest, a special area of conservation or a special protection area, have been determined to require an assessment pursuant to Article 10 of Decree-Law no. 140/99 (Natura 2000 network);

(c) other than those referred to in subparagraphs (a) and (b) which set the framework for future development consent of projects, which are likely to have significant environmental effects.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as described above in questions 1.4, 1) and 3) and 1.7.1. Article 68 of the CPA states that citizens, civil organisations that defend environmental rights and local authorities have legal standing for protecting diffuse interests regarding acts or omissions of the Public Administration that cause relevant damage to fundamental assets such as the environment. NGOs may be involved in administrative proceedings (Article 68 par. 2 of the CPA).
Anyone who claims to be the holder of a direct and personal interest, in particular those who have been harmed in their rights or legally protected interests by the challenged act, has standing in judicial administrative reviews, as well as any public or private person regarding their statutory rights and interests (Article 55 and 68 of the CPTA). In administrative courts, as well as in civil courts, actio popularis extends the legal standing to any person, association or foundation for protection of the interests at stake, regardless of personal interest in the demand. Legal standing is granted on the grounds of their qualification as an environmental NGO; they do not need to claim ‘sufficient interest’ or any ‘rights capable of being impaired’.

There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedure that court procedures should be timely. There is no general or specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered.

According to Article 2 of the CPTA, the principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, within a reasonable time, a judicial decision that is considered res judicata deciding on the claims presented before the court, as well as the possibility to obtain interim measures, be it anticipatory or protective, to ensure the effectiveness of the decision.

The level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law is not very effective. The main indicators summarised by Prof. Aragão are:

- the low numbers of environmental cases (low litigation rates) brought before the courts, demonstrating lack of citizen trust in the courts;
- the time required to obtain a final court decision;
- the number of “development projects/plans/programmes/activities” challenged in court and the number effectively prevented.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative review and the judicial review is provided in general administrative rules of the CPA and the CPTA, as replied above to Question 2.1. 2). It covers both procedural and substantive legality.

Under DL 232/2007, the following examples of acts can be challenged: if the authority responsible for developing the plan or programme fails to request the opinion from the authorities that can have an interest in the environmental effects of the plans or programmes (Article 5 of DL 232/2007). Also, if the competent authority fails to issue the environmental report on plans or programmes that are subject to environmental assessment (Article 6 par. 1 of DL 232 /2007).

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filling a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. See question 2.1. 3) above.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Concerning the transposition of SEA, there are no special rules on this. General administrative rules apply. See question 1.7.2 above.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas are the same as replied above to Question 1.7.3., as general rules apply. Also see question 2.1. 9) above.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[31]

The following plans and programmes are examples of opportunities provided for public participation in the preparation of policies relating to the environment, pursuant to Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention[32]. These include procedures with reasonable timeframes for the different phases, allowing sufficient time for informing the public and for the public to participate and prepare effectively during the environmental decision-making (Article 6 par. 3), or provide for early public participation where all options are open and effective public participation can take place (Article 6 par. 4), or ensure that due account is taken of the outcome of the public participation in the decision (Article 6 par. 8):

Climate change: The Action Program for Adaptation to Climate Change[33], the Strategic Framework for Climate Policy, the National Program for Climate Change 2020-2030 and the National Strategy for Adaptation to Climate Change 2020[34].

Waste: PERSU 2020+ adjusting the Strategic Plan for Urban Waste (PERSU 2020)[35], the National Plan on Waste Management (PNGR) 2014-2020[36];

Other plans/strategies: The National Strategy for Environmental Education for 2017-2020 (ENEA 2020)[37]; the National Air Strategy 2020[38]; the National Action Plan for Energy Efficiency 2013-2016 and the National Action Plan for Renewable Energy[39]. Other examples of plans and programmes subject to public consultation concerning requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention can be found and are extensively described in the 5th National Report on Implementation of the Aarhus Convention – 2017 from the APA[40].

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as described above in questions 1.4. 1) and 3) and 1.7.1. Article 68 of the CPA states that citizens, civil organisations that defend environmental rights and local authorities have legal standing for protecting diffuse interests regarding acts or omissions of the Public Administration that cause relevant damage to fundamental assets such as the environment. NGOs may be involved in administrative proceedings (Article 68 par. 2 of the CPA).

Anyone who claims to be the holder of a direct and personal interest, in particular those who have been harmed in their rights or legally protected interests by the challenged act, have standing in judicial administrative reviews, as well as any public or private person regarding their statutory rights and interests (Article 55 and 68 of the CPTA). In administrative courts, as well as in civil courts, actio popularis extends the legal standing to any person, association or foundation for protection of the interests at stake, regardless of personal interest in the demand. Legal standing is granted on the grounds of their qualification as an environmental NGO; they do not need to claim ‘sufficient interest’ or any ‘rights capable of being impaired’.
There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedure that court procedures should be timely. There is no general or specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered[41]. According to Article 2 of the CPTA, the principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, within a reasonable time, a judicial decision that is considered res judicata deciding on the claims presented before the court, as well as the possibility to obtain interim measures, be it anticipatory or protective, to ensure the effectiveness of the decision.

The level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law is not very effective. The main indicators summarised by Prof. Aragão are:
- the low numbers of environmental cases (low litigation rates) brought before the courts, demonstrating lack of citizen trust in the courts;
- the time required to obtain a final court decision;
- the number of “development projects/plans/programmes/activities” challenged in court and the number effectively prevented.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The scope of the administrative review and the judicial review is provided in general administrative rules of the CPA and the CPTA, as replied above to Question 2.1.2. It covers both procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. See question 2.1.2 above.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation process in order to have legal standing before the courts. None of the plans/programmes referred to above establish such requirement, nor the general applicable administrative rules. There is no administrative procedure before the adoption of a plan or programme, but, as referred to at the beginning of this section 2.3, there is a procedure where participation opportunities are given:

The Action Program for Adaptation to Climate Change was subject to public consultation up to 28 November 2018 that was taken into consideration in the final document.

The Strategic Framework for Climate Policy, the National Program for Climate Change 2020-2030 and the National Strategy for Adaptation to Climate Change 2020 were subject to public consultation from 22 May to 5 June 2015, resulting in 60 contributions which were all thoroughly taken into consideration in the final documents of the climate policy. The report on the public consultation is available online on the APA portal.

The PERSU 2020+ adjusting the Strategic Plan for Urban Waste (PERSU 2020) takes into account the report on the public consultation, including the summary of 33 contributions collected through the available channels, the Portal Participa and the APA; The National Plan on Waste Management (PNGR) 2014-2020: pursuing the objective of Directive 2008/98/EC, this plan was accompanied by EIA proceedings. Both the plan itself and the environmental report resulting from the EIA proceedings were subject to public consultation for about one and a half months, with contributions from individuals, associations and public and private authorities, which were taken into consideration[42]; The National Strategy for Environmental Education for 2017-2020 (ENEA 2020) was subject to a process of participation aimed at promoting effective ownership of the civil society substantiated in a first stage of public participation with 49 contributions from private and public entities and a second stage of public consultation with 35 contributions; The National Air Strategy 2020: according to information from the APA, the public discussion took place from 20 April to 11 May 2015, and the collected comments and suggestions, which were included in the public consultation report, were taken into consideration for the corrections and improvements made in the final documents. [43][44]

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules on this, as general administrative rules apply. See question 1.7.2 above.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas are the same as replied above to Question 1.7.3., as general rules apply. Also see question 2.1.2 above.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

Since national SEA procedures and the adjacent administrative or judicial review procedures were referred to above in Question 2.2, the following plans and programmes are specifically required to be prepared by the EU legislation:

- The basic guidelines of waste management policy are laid down in the following plans: the waste management national plan, waste management specific plans and action plans at municipal level. Prior to the approval of such plans, there is a mandatory phase of hearing the Association of Portuguese Municipalities and the Minister of Environment’s local waste authorities (Articles 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 of DL 170/2006). The waste management plans and preventive waste programmes are subject to public consultation prior to the approval, which shall be conducted according to rules set out in DL 232/2007, which were addressed in question 2.2.
- Another set of rules implementing the legal regime of environmental evaluation of plans and programmes, together with DL 232/2007, is laid down within the context of the land management system by Decree-Law no. 80/2015 of 14 May 2015 (DL 80/2015) in order to take into account the environmental effects in the proceedings of development, monitoring, public participation and approval of the land management instruments. It is ensured that there is participation of the organisations representing private interests in the periods intended for public participation.
- Directive 2003/35/CE providing for public participation in respect of the drawing up of certain plans and programmes relating to the environment is transposed in various legal acts, namely in the national EIA legislation regarding EIA (DL 151-B/2013), IPPC (DL 127/2013), strategic environmental assessment (DL 232/2007) and water framework (Law 58/2005), and by the CPA itself[47], all addressed respectively in the above questions 1.8.1, 1.8.2, 2.2, 2.1 and 1.4 to 1.7.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as described above in questions 1.4, 1) and 3) and 1.7.1.
Article 68 of the CPA states that citizens, civil organisations that defend environmental rights and local authorities have legal standing for protection of diffuse interests regarding acts or omissions of the Public Administration that cause relevant damage to fundamental assets such as the environment. NGOs may be involved in administrative proceedings (Article 68 par. 2 of the CPA).

Anyone who claims to be the holder of a direct and personal interest, in particular those who have been harmed in their rights or legally protected interests by the challenged act, has standing in judicial administrative reviews, as well as any public or private person regarding their statutory rights and interests (Article 55 and 68 of the CPTA). In administrative courts, as well as in civil courts, actio popularis extends the standing to any person, association or foundation for protection of the interests at stake, regardless of personal interest in the demand. Legal standing is granted on the grounds of their qualification as an environmental NGO; they do not need to claim ‘sufficient interest’ or any ‘rights capable of being impaired’.

In the context of the land management system, the following rights are guaranteed in line with the general guarantees of the administered[48] established in the CPTA: popular action and complaint both to the Ombudsperson and the Public Prosecutor. Specifically, the municipal land management plans and special land management plans recognise the right to directly challenge such plans through administrative review (Article 7 of DL 80/2015).

There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedure that court procedures should be timely. There is no general or specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered[49].

According to Article 2 of the CPTA, the principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, within a reasonable time, a judicial decision that is considered res judicata deciding on the claims presented before the court, as well as the possibility to obtain interim measures, be it anticipatory or protective, to ensure the effectiveness of the decision.

The level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law is even less effective than stated in questions 2.2 and 2.3 above. In Prof. Aragão’s words, “the SEA directive was transposed late (after the deadline) and before the transposition occurred the municipalities started a review procedure of many territorial management plans throughout the country. The territorial plans were reviewed and approved without an SEA when they should already have been submitted to SEA”.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are no different locus standi conditions if the plan or programme is adopted by legislation, by an individual resolution of a legislative body, or by a single act of an administrative body, etc.

The only difference resides in the kind of judicial action that can be taken (Article 37 of the CPTA):

- A plan or programme adopted by an act of administrative bodies can be challenged through: condemnation to practise due administrative acts; condemnation to refrain from practising certain acts;
- A plan or programme adopted by legislation or a legislative body can be challenged through the rules issued under administrative law and condemnation to emit rules due under provisions of administrative law.

It should be highlighted that that rules on legal standing are uniform for every kind of process.

On the other hand, within the administrative proceedings the interested parties have two means at their disposal: to request that the competent bodies develop, amend or revoke regulations during the public hearing of the interested parties, provided this is justified by the high number of interested parties (Articles 97 to 101 of the CPA); to request that the competent body issues an administrative act, in which case there is a hearing of the interested party prior to the final decision (Articles 102 to 134 of the CPA).

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative review and the judicial review is provided in general administrative rules of the CPA and the CPTA, as replied above to Question 2.1, 2). It covers both procedural and substantive legality.

4) Before filling a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filling a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. See question 2.1, 3) above.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing before the national courts.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There is a case similar to preclusion: appeal to the Constitutional Court is only possible if, in the previous judicial procedures, the argument of unconstitutionality of a legal rule was raised (Article 70 par. 1 indents (b) and (f) of Law no. 28/82 of 15 November 1982, as last amended by Organic Law no. 4/2019 of 13 September 2019).

The following restrictions apply to the general rules applicable to judicial administrative reviews (Articles 37 et seq. of the CPTA):

- In the context of civil liability of the Public Administration for unlawful administrative acts, it is possible for the court to decide if a certain act is illegal, even if such act does not meet the challengeable requirements, i.e. if an unchallengeable act is at stake (see question 2.1, 5) above). Without prejudice to this possibility, the effect of annulment of the unchallengeable act cannot be obtained through judicial review (Article 36 of the CPTA);
- The condemnation to refrain from practising certain acts can only be requested when it is likely that the acts issued would harm the legally protected rights or interests and that the use of such means of challenge is indispensable (Article 39 of the CPTA).

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

The constitutional right is implemented through the principle of effective judicial protection, which includes the right to a fair trial (Article 2 of the CPTA). The principle of equality must also be observed in the relations of the Public Administration with individuals (Article 6 of the CPA).

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The constitutional principle of effective judicial protection, implemented by Article 2 of the CPTA, applies, including the right to obtain a judicial decision within a reasonable time (see questions 1.3, 1) and 1.7.1, 4) above).

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules on this, as general administrative rules apply. See question 1.7.2 above.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas are the same as replied above to Question 1.7.3., as general rules apply. Also see question 2.1, 9) above.
1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts

Regional Legislative Decree no. 19/2010/A of 25 May 2010 regulating the elaboration and dissemination of reports on the state of the environment and the support to the ENGO, as amended by Regional Legislative Decree no. 12/2019/A of 30 May 2019 (DLR 19/2010/A)[52], was adopted under the premises of the three Aarhus pillars.

Executive regulations and generally applicable instruments can be subject to administrative challenge in the same way as individual legal acts. The concept of administrative regulation[53] includes general and abstract legal rules which aim at producing legal external effects within the exercise of administrative legal powers (Articles 135 and 147 par. 3 of the CPA).

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as described above in questions 1.4, 1) and 3) and 1.7.1.

Article 68 of the CPA states that citizens, civil organisations that defend environmental rights and local authorities have legal standing for protection of diffuse interests regarding acts or omissions of the Public Administration that cause relevant damage to fundamental assets such as the environment. NGOs may be involved in administrative proceedings (Article 68 par. 2 of the CPA).

Anyone who claims to be the holder of a direct and personal interest, in particular those who have been harmed in their rights or legally protected interests by the challenged act, has standing in judicial administrative review, as well as any public or private person regarding their statutory rights and interests (Article 55 and 68 of the CPTA). In administrative courts, as well as in civil courts, actio popularis extends the standing to any person, association or foundation for protection of the interests at stake, regardless of personal interest in the demand. Legal standing is granted on the grounds of their qualification as an environmental NGO; they do not need to claim ‘sufficient interest’ or any ‘rights capable of being impaired’.

There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedure that court procedures should be timely. There is no general or specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered[54].

According to Article 2 of the CPTA, the principle of effective judicial protection includes the right to obtain, within a reasonable time, a judicial decision that is considered res judicata deciding on the claims presented before the court, as well as the possibility to obtain interim measures, be it anticipatory or protective, to ensure the effectiveness of the decision.

Insofar as concerns the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case-law and any related national case-law, the question of the direct effect of the SEA directive has not been raised before the courts[55].

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative review and the judicial review is provided in general administrative rules of the CPA and the CPTA, as replied above to Question 2.1, 2). It covers both procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, is there no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. See question 2.1, 3) above.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing before the national courts.

DL 127/2008 was approved within the framework of both Aarhus and the United Nations Protocol on Pollutant Release and Transfer Registers, aiming at facilitating access to environmental information and a higher level of public participation.

Regulation of DLR 19/2010/A on reports on the state of the environment aims at ensuring the right to public participation in environmental matters and also support for ENGOs that are dedicated to the same objective of promotion of public participation in environmental matters. The competent authority for issuing the reports and other documents required to ensure public participation in the Autonomous Region of Azores is the regional body of autonomous administration responsible for environment, which must issue every three years a report on the state of the environment in Azores. Such regional body shall maintain technical and financial support for ENGOs that are deemed to develop activities of relevant public interest. Such support aims at ensuring actions of public participation.

For the purposes of the above-mentioned regulation applicable to the Autonomous Region of Azores, public concerned means the affected public or the public likely to be affected by or interested in the decision-making process, including the ENGO (Article 3 subpar. e) of DLR 19/2010/A).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules on this, as general administrative rules apply. See question 1.7.2 above.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas are the same as replied above to Question 1.7.3., as general rules apply. Also see question 2.1, 9) above.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how[56]?

The request for preliminary ruling before the CJEU is voluntary for first instance courts, where an interpretation question is at stake. It is mandatory for: i) courts whose decisions cannot be appealed against if one of the parties requests it (that includes the defendant in a criminal procedure); ii) where a question of invalidity of an act is at stake; iii) where questions on validity and interpretation of framework decisions are at stake and of decisions on interpretation of conventions established under areas of police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters and on validity and interpretation of its implementing measures[57].

As mentioned above (see question 1.5, 3), the request for preliminary ruling is mandatory for the high courts, namely the STJ and the STA, when the interpretation of EU law is required to decide a question brought before the national courts[58]. However, these courts do not comply, as is clearly evident in the statistics (per capita, per number of courts/judges, per number of years in the EU) on European preliminary rulings[59]. The fact that there are low numbers of actual preliminary rulings under Article 267 TFEU brought by Portuguese courts indicates that there are upstream problems in regard to access to justice.

The OA makes available a short summary on the practical issues of Article 267 TFEU. Further information on the OA can be found in question 1.6, 1) above.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[3] Article 10 of DL 140/99 transposes Article 6 par. 3 of Directive 92/43, which is one of the provisions analysed in the cited CJEU case-law C-664/15.
[6] Decree-Law No 150/2015, of 5 August
[12] Law No 17/2014 of 10 April 2014 establishing the basis for national policy on maritime spatial planning and management.
[13] National rules on environmental access to justice are provided by Law no. 26/2016 transposing Directive 2003/4/EC, as stated above in question 1.7.4, 1).
[15] The exact wording of Article 3 subpar. q) of DL 150/2015 cross-references Article 8 and 10. However, it is understood that the cross-reference to Article 10 is a typo and should actually be a cross-reference to Article 11, which transposes Article 15(2) of Directive 2012/18/UE. Article 3 par.18 of the Directive refers to “matters covered by Article 15(1)”.
[16] No case-law was found in the national data base of IGFEJ concerning Directive 2008/98.
[22] Acórdão do STA n.º 0849/08 de 07/01/2009.
[23] Acórdão do STA n.º 01273/13 de 03/12/2014.
[25] For example, as addressed in the Study Effective access to justice of the DGIP.
[26] A comprehensive list of the rights with granted administrative protection includes: “the recognition of subjective legal situations arising directly from administrative or legal acts; the recognition of individual qualities or fulfilment of conditions; the recognition of the right to refrain from behaviours and, in particular, to refrain from adopting administrative acts in the case of threats or injuries; the annulment or declaration of nullity or inexistence of administrative acts; the condemnation of the administration to pay, to deliver things or perform facts; the condemnation of the administration to repair damages (in nature or by monetary compensation); the resolution of disputes concerning the interpretation, validity or enforceability of administrative contracts; the declaration of illegality of administrative norms; the condemnation of the administration to practise administrative acts, material acts or operations due according to the law or necessary to restore subjective legal situations; the injunction to provide information, allow access to documents or issue certificates; or the adoption of appropriate interim measures to ensure the effectiveness of the decision. Source: Aragão, 2012, page 15.
[27] Cristina Maria Pina Alves Moreira, A aceitação do ato administrativo [Acceptance of the administrative act], Master’s in Law (Specialisation in Legal and Administrative Sciences), Faculty of Law of the University of Porto, p. 17: ‘Administrative acts open to challenge are any legal acts consisting of unilateral decisions of a public authority which seek to bring about the consequence of creating, modifying or removing a right or duty or of determining the legal nature of a given thing.’
[28] Case-law from the Constitutional Court of 20 November 1996 in process 606/95
[29] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[31] See findings under ACC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[33] Approved by Resolution 130/2019 of 2 August 2019, Resolução do Conselho de Ministros n.º 130/2019, de 2 de Agosto, aprova o Programa Programa de Ação para a Adaptação às Alterações Climáticas – P-3AC.
There is a mechanism called extension of the effects of the court decision in administrative procedures.[3] The effects of a court decision that has annulled or declared null a certain unfavourable administrative act, or that has recognised the existence of a certain favourable legal situation, can be extended to other persons who were not involved as parties in the respective judicial administrative process, if such persons are addressees of an administrative act with similar content or are placed in the same legal situation. This extension is valid only when there are several perfectly similar cases and is subject to the two persons who were not involved as parties in the respective judicial administrative process, if such persons are addressees of an administrative act with null a certain unfavourable administrative act, or that has recognised the existence of a certain favourable legal situation, can be extended to other persons who were not involved as parties in the respective judicial administrative process, if such persons are addressees of an administrative act with similar content or are placed in the same legal situation. This extension is valid only when there are several perfectly similar cases and is subject to the two following conditions: at least five judicial decisions from superior courts with the same meaning and not more than five with opposite meanings. For the purposes of the extension, the interested party shall send a request, within 1 year from the time when the court decision became effective, to the public administrative body that was the defendant in the process at stake (Article 161 of the CPTA). For example, in a process where land with forest resources that was expropriated is at stake, the co-owners of the land invoke the right to extend the effects of the court decision that has decided on the expropriation process.[4]

The administrative executive process can take one of the following forms: execution for service provision or delivery of certain assets, if the Administration did not spontaneously execute the court decision within a procedural period of 90 days (Articles 162 to 169 of the CPTA); and execution of court decisions annulling administrative acts, in which case the Administration shall reconstruct the situation as if the annulled act had not been issued and shall fulfill the duties that were not fulfilled under that same act (Articles 173 to 179 of the CPTA).

The Government, the representative of the executive power, is the main authority in charge of national policy, which coordinates directly or indirectly through its subordinate institutions, national and local authorities. The main institutions subordinated to the Minister of Environment, Waters and Forests are:

1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law
The Parliament is the supreme representative institution and the sole legislative authority of Romania. The Parliament is bicameral, and the 2 chambers are the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. The Romanian Parliament adopts laws, motions, and decisions. Laws are constitutional laws (by which the Constitution is amended), organic laws, and ordinary laws.

The Government, the representative of the executive power, can issue in certain conditions ordinances (emergency or simple) and decisions for the implementation of primary legislation. The ministers can issue ministerial orders in their specialized area of competence.

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order
The main rules and regulations in the environmental field are usually set by laws, as well as government ordinances and decisions (primary legislation).

The Ministry of Environment, Waters and Forests is the main authority in charge of national policy, which coordinates directly or indirectly through its subordinate institutions, national and local authorities. The main institutions subordinated to the Minister of Environment, Waters and Forests are:
The National Environmental Protection Agency-NEPA (Administrația Națională pentru Protecția Mediului), which is mainly in charge of implementation, with 42 subordinated county agencies.

The National Forests Administration Romsilva (Administrația Națională a Pădurilor Romsilva) at the national level and a series of local Forest Districts.

The Forestry Guards (fomerly Territorial Inspectorates for Hunting and Forests) are in charge of implementation and enforcement of regulations.

The Commission’s 2017 Environmental Implementation Review report on Romania found that, ‘there is considerable room for improvement in terms of administrative capacity, as well as concerning the implementation of environmental legislation’, and that ‘there is a lack of trust among political and administrative layers, resulting in weak ownership of decisions and policies’.

There are various associations active in Romania as well as in the Black Sea area that interact with the government in representing the interests of civil society, including through advocacy efforts during public consultation periods for both legislative acts and national and local strategies, plans or permitting procedures for new developments. Romania has a set of administrative regulations for access to public information and transparency of public decision-making which have allowed NGOs to ensure citizens’ access to decision-making. Civil society has been mainly involved in the permitting process for projects, and EIA permitting procedures in particular, where local communities can exert pressure and on occasion have been successful in delaying the issuance of permits until all concerns have been properly addressed. These NGOs include Greenpeace CEE Romania, WWF Romania, Bankwatch Association Romania, Agent Green Association, Mare Nostrum, etc.

The Environmental Protection Law, Governmental Ordinance no 195/2005, Art. 5, stipulates that any person has the right to go to court or address the administrative authorities to protect the right to a healthy environment, without having to prove impairment of a right. The environmental NGOs also have standing in court in any environmental matter.

The treaties and international agreements are also very important in the protection of the environment. For acts of this type to have any effect on Romanian legislation, they need to be approved by the Romanian Parliament.

Overall, in Romania the environmental rights – access to information, public participation, and access to justice – are guaranteed through the Romanian Constitution and specific legislation.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The Constitution regulates the right to a healthy environment as well as other connected human rights:

Right to a healthy environment, Art. 35

This article states that the state must acknowledge the right to a healthy, well-preserved, and balanced environment to every person. In order to accomplish this, the state must provide the legislative framework. Also, there is an obligation for every person (natural or legal) to improve and protect the environment.

Right to life, to physical and mental integrity, Art. 22

This article guarantees the right to life as well as the right to physical and mental integrity of persons. Also, it prohibits torture, or any kind of inhumane or degrading punishment or treatment. In the last paragraph the death penalty is abolished.

Although this article does not directly refer to the protection of the environment, “The right to life, as well as the right to physical and mental integrity of person are guaranteed”, so it could not be respected without a healthy environment, as pollution can damage physical and mental health.

The right to protection of health, Art. 34

This article guarantees the protection of health. The state is bound to take measures to ensure public hygiene and health. Also, the organization of the medical care and social security system in case of sickness, accidents, maternity and recovery, control over the exercise of medical professions and paramedical activities, as well as other measures to protect physical and mental health of a person are established according to the law.

Access to justice in the national constitution, Art. 21 states that

This article guarantees that every person is entitled to bring a case before the courts for the defence of his legitimate rights, liberties, and interests. It is forbidden to restrict this right by any kind of law. It also establishes that all parties are entitled to a fair trial and a resolution of their cases within a reasonable term. Administrative special jurisdiction is optional and free of charge.

The right of international treaties on human rights, Art. 20

This article refers to the priority of the pacts and treaties regarding fundamental rights. This means that when any inconsistencies exist between the pacts and treaties on fundamental human rights that Romania is a party to, and the national law, the international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or the national laws comprise more favourable provisions. Also, the constitutional provisions concerning the citizens’ rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights with the pacts and other treaties that Romania is a party to.

The right of petition, Art. 51

This article is about the right to petition. It states that citizens have the right to address the public authorities by petitions formulated only in the name of the signatories. It also provides the right to forward petitions for legally established organizations (exclusively on the behalf of the collective body it represents).

The right to petition is exempt from tax. The public authorities are obliged to answer petitions in the time limits and the conditions established by law.

The right of a person harmed by a public authority, Art. 52

This article recognizes the right of any person aggrieved in his/her legitimate rights or interests by a public authority, by means of an administrative act or by the failure of a public authority to resolve his/her application within the lawful time limit, to the acknowledgment of his/her claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and reparations for the damage. The exact conditions for this have to be regulated by an organic law. Also, the State shall bear the patrimonial liability for any prejudice caused as a result of judicial errors. The State’s liability is established by law and does not eliminate the liability of the magistrates if they exercised their mandate in ill will or gross negligence.

Under the Romanian legal system, the Constitution is the legal act at the top of the legal pyramid. All the other normative acts have to be consistent with the Constitution’s provisions.

The constitutional right to environment can be invoked directly in courts. However, there are laws which further develop the environmental rights. On the other hand, sometimes the courts and the administrative bodies will not apply the Constitution alone, stating that it is a general Act that cannot be applied alone.
According to Article 11, paragraph 2 of the Constitution, treaties ratified by the Parliament become part of the national law. That means that one can rely directly on international agreements that are ratified by the Romanian Parliament.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

The environmental framework law in Romania is the Emergency Governmental Ordinance (EGO) no 195/2005 regarding the protection of the environment, approved by the Parliament.

Sectoral legislation is passed through Acts issued by Parliament as well as Emergency Governmental Ordinances approved by Laws:

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 195/2005 approved by Law no 265/2006 regarding the protection of the environment is the framework law in environmental issues,

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 57/2007 on the regime of protected natural areas, habitat conservation natural, of wild flora and fauna, approved with modifications and additions by Law no 49/2011,

Law no 292/2018 on assessing the impact of certain public and private projects on the environment,

Governmental Decision no 1076/2004 on establishing the procedure for carrying out the environmental assessment for plans and programmes,

The Water Law no 107/1996,

Law no 104 of June 15, 2011 on ambient air quality,

Law no 211/2011 on the waste regime,

Law no 246/2020 on land use, conservation, and protection of soil,

The Forest Code – Law no 46/2008,

Law no 278/2013 on industrial emissions,

Law no 121/2019 on the assessment and management of ambient noise,

Law no 111/1996 (* republished *) FR2 on the safe conduct, regulation, authorization, and control of nuclear activities,

Order no 1798/2007 for the approval of the Procedure for issuing the environmental permit,

Law no 74/2019 on the management of potentially contaminated and contaminated sites,

Law no. 59/2016 on the control of major-accident hazards involving dangerous substances,

Law no 407/2006 hunting and protection of the hunting fund,

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 64/2011 regarding the ecological storage of carbon dioxide, approved with modifications by Law no 114 / 2013,

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007 approved by Law no 19/2008 regarding environmental liability with regard to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage,

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 43/2007 on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms, approved with modifications and additions by Law no 247/2009,

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 202/2002 on integrated coastal zone management approved by Law no 280/2003, etc,

According to EGO no 195/2005 Art. 5, “the state recognizes to any person the right to a healthy and ecologically balanced environment and guarantees: Access to environmental information respecting the confidentiality conditions provided by law;

The right of association in environmental organizations;

The right to be consulted in decision-making processes regarding the development of environmental policies and legislation, the regulatory acts, plans and programmes;

The right to appeal directly or through the environmental organizations to the administrative and judicial authorities regarding environmental issues, regardless of whether an injury or damage occurred;

The right to compensation for the damages suffered.

The principles guiding the implementation of EGO 195/2005, according to Art. 3, are:

The principle of integrating environmental policy into other sectoral policies;

The precautionary principle in decision-making;

The principle of preventive action;

The principle of retention of pollutants at source;

The ‘polluter pays’ principle;

The principle of conservation of biodiversity and natural ecosystems specific to the biographic natural framework;

Sustainable use of natural resources;

Information and public participation in decision-making and access to justice in environmental matters;

Development of international cooperation for environmental protection.

Access to information must be ensured in accordance with to the Aarhus Convention and the national legislation regarding access to information:

Law no 86/2000 - ratification of the Aarhus Convention

Law no 544/2001 - Freedom of Information Act

Access to information and public participation in decision-making process as well as the principles of access to justice are also stated in Art. 20 of EGO 195/2005:

The public is informed in the regulatory procedures of the plans, programs, and activities according to the national legislation provisions. The consultation of the public during the regulatory procedures is mandatory and it is carried out according to the national legislative provisions. The public’s access to justice is ensured according to the national legislative provisions. The environmental NGOs have standing in court in environmental cases.

Overall, in Romania the environmental rights – access to information, public participation, and access to justice – are guaranteed through the Romanian Constitution and specific legislation.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

As examples of national cases and the role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases we can mention:

Saligny Case - File no 2937/2012

At the first instance court, the plaintiffs requested the annulment of a partial authorization for the conduct of nuclear activities. In support of the action, the applicants claimed that the contested authorization was illegally issued for the partial location of the nuclear waste dump in Saligny, Constanta County, because it was done without public consultation, which is mandatory according to the provisions of the Aarhus Convention. The plaintiffs also claimed that the public in the neighbouring states should be consulted.

The Appeal Court dismissed the action as unfounded stating that at the date of issuing the authorization for conduct of nuclear activities, the requirement for public consultation did not have to be met, as the act had only the status of an authorization of principle and so the procedure of public consultation was necessary only for obtaining the final authorization. The court also rejected the ground of illegality in violation of the provisions of the Convention regarding access to information, noting that the defendant submitted in the authorization a file for the public communication programme.

The plaintiffs filed a recourse. In the first ground of recourse, the plaintiffs showed that the public information provided by the defendant was not in conformity with the Aarhus Convention as the entire public was not consulted, not all the documentation was available in order to obtain partial authorization, the public did not have precise deadlines to become aware of documentation, there was no public announcement at national level and in neighbouring states, and there was no deadline for the public to be able to express their point of view.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice, analysing all the arguments, admitted the declared recourse and cancelled the authorization for nuclear activities issued by the defendant. The decision is final.

The lignite mine case - File no 34493/3/2013

The Tribunal was invested with a complaint, requesting the annulment of an administrative act regarding the permanent removal of 130.8 ha of forest to continue the extraction of lignite. The arguments of the plaintiff showed that in essence the environmental procedure was only partially made, and only for a related activity (the deforestation), while the main activity (exploitation of lignite over an area of 130 ha) was not evaluated at all, even though the project for the extension of a lignite mine included the cutting of the forest and all the related activities, like mining coal deposits and other related or extension activities such as using fossil fuels. It was also shown that the project was incorrectly framed in Annex 2 to GD 445/2009, while it should have been framed in the Annex no 1, point 19 because the main purpose is clearly the extension of the lignite mines and not the forest cutting. Secondly it was shown that the defendants sliced the project in order to extend a coal mine, as the environmental assessment must be carried out for the main project as well as for all the related activities; otherwise the environmental agreement violates Community legislation and practices the European Court of Justice. Also, it was shown that the environmental agreement does not provide for measures to compensate for the clearing works, although this is compulsory according to national law.

The plaintiffs showed that the urban certificate for the land subject to deforestation was missing. Other factors invoked were: the lack of analysis of the climate factor; lack of analysis of the impact on the health of the population and on the protected sites in the vicinity; lack of any adequate assessment and violation of the provisions of the Aarhus Convention.

The court, after analysing all the circumstances of the case, admitted the action brought by the applicants and annulled the environmental agreement issued by the defendant, Gorj Environmental Protection Agency.

Deforestation to build lignite mine - File no 2094/3/2012

The initial complaint filed by the plaintiffs asked for a decision to be suspended. The object of this decision was the permanent removal from the forestry circuit of 0.9604 ha in order to extend the lignite mine. The court rejected the complaint as unfounded. The court considered that the document was issued in compliance with the legal conditions but that the plaintiffs had not provided any evidence of impending material damage which would be difficult or impossible to effectively rectify later, to justify the exceptional character of the suspension of the administrative act. The Tribunal ignored the fact that on the basis of the issuance of the contested document, not all the necessary documents provided by law were present. The court also ignored the fact that not all the documents were attached. Regarding the production of an imminent damage, the plaintiffs believe that the provisions of Law no 554/2004 should be interpreted according to the Aarhus Convention, and according to the provisions of the EU Treaty covering environment protection, a lignite mine was defined as having a major negative impact[1].

Analysing the records in the file, the Court of Appeal considered that the recourse was well-founded. Also, the court analysed the evidence submitted on the file and concluded that the announcement of the public consultation was posted at the mayor's office just 1 day before the decision was issued, making it impossible to effectively participate in the debate, thus not complying with the obligation imposed by national law and Aarhus Convention standards. The court also observed that, as the appellants correctly argued, the environmental declaration covered a much larger area than the one mentioned in Decision no 394/20/12/2011, respectively 50.89 ha compared to 0.9604 ha. Regarding the imminent damage, the court stated that the extension of the lignite mine had a negative impact on the environment. Therefore, the court found both that the condition of the case was well justified and the imminent damage was demonstrated. The court admitted the appeal and suspended the decision issued. The decision was final.

By way of example, we can name a few other important cases on the related matters:

- File no 34493/3/2013: Bucharest Tribunal, stage - fund, object - annulment of an administrative act, construction of Basarab upper-level passage, environment;
- File no 2092/3/2007: Bucharest Tribunal, stage - fund, object - annulment of an administrative act, construction of Basarab upper-level passage, environment;
- File no 32614/3/2014: Bucharest Tribunal, stage - fund, object - annulment of an administrative act, environment;
- Decision no 2937/2012: High Court of Cassation and Justice, stage - recourse, object - annulment of an authorization for the conduct of nuclear activities, environment;
- File no 2252/2019: Court of Appeal Bucharest, stage - fund, object - cancellation and suspension of administrative act, environment;
- File no 495/57/2018: Court of Appeal Alba Iulia, stage - appeal in cancellation, object - annulment of an administrative act, environment;
- File no 34493/3/2013: Bucharest Tribunal, stage - fund, object - annulment of an administrative act, environment; and the appeal from the Court of Appeal Bucharest, same file no.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice is the unique and supreme court in Romania, which has the role of ensuring the interpretation and uniform application of the law by other courts, according to its competence. The review in the interest of law is the main procedure for achieving this. Recently, the High Court of Cassation and Justice has issued a regulation concerning the standing in court of the NGOs acting in court against administrative decisions, stating that, their legitimate public interest is subsequent to the private legitimate interest stated in their constitutive acts and statutes as their general scope and specific objectives.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

According to Article 11, paragraph 2 of the Constitution, treaties ratified by the Parliament become part of national law. That means that one can rely directly on the international agreements.

Once it is ratified, the international law takes effect automatically in national law; it is part of the national law, thus giving the right for the interested parties to invoke it directly or in conjunction with other normative acts which may define the implementation framework, if that is the case, and imposing an obligation... on administrative bodies or courts to take into account its provisions. According to Art. 20 para 2 of the Romanian Constitution, if there are inconsistencies between the human rights treaties to which Romania is a party and the internal legislation, the provisions of the international legislation take precedence, except where the internal provisions provide for more favourable legal norms.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

In Romania, there are 4 levels of court and three levels of jurisdiction, both in civil and criminal cases:

- District Courts (188)
- Tribunals (42)
- Courts of Appeal (15)
- High Court of Cassation and Justice.

2) Rules of jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the Court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

In environmental litigation, sometimes the jurisdiction will be established according to civil law (for example when the litigation is about an obligation to do something[2], and when the defendant is not a public institution). The competence can also be established according to administrative law, for example when the litigation is about an administrative act.

Environmental cases are usually under the jurisdiction of the administrative courts. In this case, the competent first court is the County Tribunal if the public authority being called as defendant is at the local or county level (e.g. the County Environmental Protection Agency or the County Council) or the Court of Appeal if the public authority is at the central level (e.g. the National Environmental Protection Agency, the Ministry of Environment, etc.). The appeal in such cases will be heard by the Court of Appeal if the first Court is the Tribunal, or the High Court of Cassation and Justice if the first court is the Court of Appeal.

According to administrative procedure law, there are only two grades of jurisdiction: first court and cassation appeal.

1.2.1. The general competence applicable to the environmental litigation when the defendant is not a public institution.

The jurisdiction is established by the object of the cause and its value.

District courts

The district courts do not have legal personality and are established within national counties and in Bucharest.

In civil matters, the district courts hear any applications which can be expressed in terms of money, up to and including 200,000 lei, regardless of whether the parties have the status of professionals.

District courts also hear appeals against decisions of the local public administration authorities with local jurisdiction and other institutions with such jurisdiction, in the cases provided for by the law, and any other applications which are by law within their jurisdiction.

In criminal matters, the district courts hear mainly the following cases:

- Regarding environmental crimes, there are some special provisions in EGO 195/2005. According to Art.98 EGO 195/2005:
  - Paragraph 1 “The following acts constitute crimes and are punishable by imprisonment from 3 months to one year or by a fine if they were likely to endanger the life or health of humans, animals or vegetation: burning of stubble, reeds, shrubs, and grassy vegetation in protected areas and on lands subject to ecological restoration; accidental pollution due to non-supervision of new works, operation of installations, technological equipment and treatment and neutralization, mentioned in the provisions of the environmental agreement and/or the integrated environmental authorization.”
  - Paragraph 2 “The following acts constitute crimes and are punishable by imprisonment from 3 months to one year or by a fine if they were likely to endanger the life or health of humans, animals or vegetation: pollution by the discharge, in the atmosphere or on the ground, of some wastes or dangerous substances; the production of noise beyond the permitted limits if this seriously endangers human health; the continuation of the activity after the suspension of the environmental agreement or of the authorization, respectively of the integrated environmental authorization; the import and export of prohibited or restricted dangerous substances and preparations; failure to immediately report any major accident by persons in charge of this obligation; the production, delivery or use of chemical fertilizers, as well as any unauthorized plant protection products, for crops intended for sale; non-compliance with the prohibitions regarding the use on agricultural lands of plant protection products or chemical fertilizers.”
- Paragraph 3 “The following acts constitute crimes and are punishable by imprisonment from 6 months to 3 years if they were likely to endanger the life or health of humans, animals or vegetation: non-supervision and non-insurance of landfills and hazardous substances, as well as non-compliance with the obligation to store chemical fertilizers and plant protection products only packaged and in protected places; the production or import for the purpose of placing on the market, as well as the use of dangerous substances and preparations without observing the provisions of the normative acts in force and the introduction on the Romanian territory of waste of any nature for the purpose of their elimination; transport and transit of dangerous substances and preparations, in violation of the legal provisions in force; carrying out activities with genetically modified organisms or their products, without requesting and obtaining the import/export agreement or the authorizations provided by the specific regulations; cultivation of genetically modified higher plants for testing or commercial purposes, without the registration required by law”;
- Paragraph 4 “The following acts constitute crimes and are punishable by imprisonment from 1 year to 5 years if they were likely to endanger the life or health of humans, animals or vegetation: provocation, due to non-monitoring of ionizing radiation sources, environmental contamination and/or exposure of the population to ionizing radiation, failure to promptly report the increase over the permitted limits of environmental contamination, improper application, or failure to intervene in case of nuclear accident; unloading wastewater and waste from ships or floating platforms directly into natural waters or knowingly causing pollution by discharging or sinking into natural waters, directly or from floating ships or platforms of hazardous substances or waste.”
- Paragraph 5 “The following acts constitute crimes and are punishable by imprisonment from 2 to 7 years: continuation of the activity that caused the pollution after the order to cease this activity; failure to take measures to completely dispose of hazardous substances and preparations that have become waste; refusal to intervene in case of accidental pollution of waters and coastal areas; refusal to control the introduction and removal of dangerous substances and preparations or the introduction into the country of crops of microorganisms, plants and live animals of wild flora and fauna, without the consent of central public authority for environmental protection.

The attempt to commit one of these crimes is punishable under criminal law[3].

The finding and investigation of crimes are done ex-officio by the criminal investigation authorities according to their legal competence. Regarding the competence for these crimes, there is no special provision, so they will be judged by the district court (this is the common court in criminal matters). The investigation will be conducted by the prosecutor's office which has the competence to invest the district court.

Other normative acts that include special crimes regarding the environment:
The Forrest Code (Law no 46/2008)[4]. The forest code also includes a provision regarding the competent authorities. In addition to the criminal investigation bodies, the following are competent to ascertain the facts provided for in Arts. 106, 107-109 and 110: forestry staff within the central public authority responsible for forestry and territorial structures with forestry specifics, forestry staff within the National Forests Authority (Romsilva) and its territorial structures, forestry staff within the forestry regime schools, authorized officers and non-commissioned officers of the Romanian special police.

Tribunals
The 42 national tribunals have legal personality and are organized at the county level. The area of jurisdiction of each tribunal covers all district courts in the county in which the tribunal is situated.

In civil matters, the tribunals hear the following cases:
As courts of first instance, the tribunals hear all the applications which are not by law within the jurisdiction of other courts;
As courts of appeal, they hear appeals against judgments handed down by district courts at first instance;
As courts of cassation, they hear applications for review of judgments handed down by district courts, which, under the law, are not subject to appeal, and in any other cases expressly provided for by law.
The tribunals decide on conflicts of jurisdiction between district courts within their area of jurisdiction, and applications for review of judgments handed down by district courts in the cases provided for by law.

Courts of appeal
The Courts of appeal in Romania are headed by a President, who may be assisted by one or two Vice-Presidents.
The 15 courts of appeal have legal personality, each court covering the jurisdiction of several tribunals (around 3).

In civil matters, the courts of appeal hear the following cases:
as courts of first instance, they hear applications relating to administrative and tax disputes, in accordance with the special legal provisions;
as courts of appeal, they hear appeals against judgments handed down by tribunals at first instance;
as courts of cassation, they hear applications for review of judgments handed down by tribunals on appeal or against judgments handed down at first instance by tribunals which, under the law, are not subject to appeal, and in any other cases expressly provided for by law.
As courts of appeal, they hear appeals against criminal judgments handed down by district courts and tribunals at first instance.
The courts of appeal also decide on conflicts of jurisdiction between tribunals or between district courts and tribunals within their area of jurisdiction, or between district courts within the jurisdiction of different tribunals in a court of appeal's area of jurisdiction.
The courts of appeal also decide on requests for the extradition or transfer abroad of convicted persons.

High Court of Cassation and Justice
As the highest court in Romania, it is the only judicial institution with the power to ensure uniform interpretation and application of the law by the other courts. The review in the interest of law is the main procedure for achieving this.
The High Court of Cassation and Justice has four sections, each having its own jurisdiction:
Civil Section I (civil matters);
Civil Section II (commercial matters);
Criminal Section;
Administrative and Tax Litigation Section.
The four five-judge panels, the Joint Sections, the panel on reviews in the interest of law, and the panel on clarifying certain legal matters are other sections of the supreme court, which have their own jurisdictions.
Civil Section I, Civil Section II, and the Administrative and Tax Litigation Section of the High Court of Cassation and Justice hear applications for review of judgments handed down by courts of appeal and other court decisions, as provided for by law, and applications for review of non-final judgments or judicial acts of any nature which cannot be appealed by any other means, and where the legal proceedings before a court of appeal have been interrupted.
The High Court of Cassation and Justice meets in Joint Sections for the following:
To address referrals regarding changes to the case-law of the High Court of Cassation and Justice;
To refer to the Constitutional Court in order to verify the constitutionality of laws before their promulgation.
The jurisdiction is determined according to the value of the object of the court application.
The jurisdiction is established by the value of the object stated in the principal request. The accessory value is not taken into consideration (penalties, interests etc.).
If the plaintiff files multiple requests based on different acts or facts (at the same court), the jurisdiction will be established based on the value, nature, or the object of the case. If one of the requests should be in the jurisdiction of another court, the cause will be disjointed, and the court will decline its jurisdiction in favour of the competent court.

Rules regarding the territorial jurisdiction of courts. The general rule is that the request for summons will be addressed to the court in the jurisdiction where the defendant lives at the moment when the action has been submitted to the court. The court remains competent to judge the matter even if the defendant is moving to another place. If the address of the defendant is unknown the request for summon will be addressed to the court in the circumscription of the plaintiff.

There are some rules in certain fields regarding special competence: The request for legal action against an association, company, or other entity without legal personality (Art. 110 Civil Procedural Code).

Claims against the state, central or local authorities and institutions, as well as other legal persons under public law can be filed either at the court where the plaintiff lives or at the court at the defendant's headquarters. (Art. 111 Civil Procedural Code).
The parties of the litigation can file in writing or verbally (Art. 126 Civil Procedural Code)
Rules regarding the quality of the defendant/plaintiff (if he/she is a judge), Art. 127 Civil Procedural Code.
The lack of jurisdiction can be public or private. We can talk about the lack of public jurisdiction when:
The jurisdiction over the litigation is not subject to a court’s jurisdiction (this exception can be invoked by parties or by the judge in any stage of the case); There is a violation of material competence, when the trial is within the jurisdiction of another court (this exception can be invoked by parties or by the judge at the first court session, when the parties are legally summoned before the first court); If there is a violation regarding the jurisdiction of a court, for example when a request has to be filed at a specific court (according to territorial jurisdiction) and is filed at another court.

Jurisdiction checking

At the first hearing, which the parties are legally summoned before the court and can formulate conclusions, the judge is obliged to verify and to establish if the notified court is competent in all aspects (general, material, and territorial).

When such an exception is invoked, the court is obliged to establish the competent court or if that is the case to establish another competent institution. If the court considers itself competent it will continue to judge the case (this decision can be attacked when the court has given the final judgement, together with the other issues in question). But if the court considers itself not competent to try the case, its decision is final and cannot be attacked. The case will be sent to the competent court or institution, as appreciated by the first court.

Cases of conflict

We are in the presence of jurisdictional conflict when:

Two or more courts declare themselves equally competent to judge the same trial;

When two or more courts have mutually declined the jurisdiction to judge in the same process or, in the case of successive refusal, if the last invested court declines in favour of one of the courts that previously declared itself incompetent.

Also, if the court dismisses the application as inadmissible because the jurisdiction over the matter belongs to another institution without jurisdictional activity or because it is not within the jurisdiction of the Romanian courts, the decision can be attacked with recourse to the superior court.

The court before which the conflict of jurisdiction has arisen will suspend ex officio the trial of the case and will forward the file of the competent court to resolve the conflict.

Resolution of the conflict of competence

The conflict of jurisdiction arising between two courts is resolved by the court immediately superior and common to the courts in conflict.

There can be no conflict of jurisdiction with the High Court of Cassation and Justice. The decision to decline the jurisdiction or to establish the jurisdiction pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice is mandatory for the referring court.

The conflict of jurisdiction arising between a court and another body with jurisdictional activity is resolved by the court hierarchically superior to the court in conflict.

The court competent to judge the conflict will decide, in the council chamber, without summoning the parties, by a final decision.

1.2.2. The jurisdiction of the courts when the defendant is a public institution

According to Law no 554/2004 (this is relevant for environmental litigation), Art. 10 states some rules regarding the competent court. So the disputes regarding administrative acts issued or concluded by local and county public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, custom debts, as well as their accessories of up to 3,000,000 lei (€619,208.10) will be resolved by the tribunals, and those regarding the administrative acts issued or concluded by the central public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, customs debts, as well as their accessories higher than 3,000,000 lei (€619,208.10), will be resolved by the courts of appeal. The cassation of a decision will be retried by the higher court, so if a decision is given by the tribunal it will be retried by the court of appeal, and if the first decision is given by the court of appeal, it will be retried by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

According to Art. 10, paragraph (3), the plaintiff (natural or legal person) will address the matter exclusively to a court where he/she has a domicile or where he/she has headquarters. If the plaintiff is a public authority, public institution or assimilated to them, it must address the matter exclusively to a court from the domicile or headquarters of the defendant.

The provisions concerning the conflict of jurisdiction, jurisdiction checking, and other matters covered by the civil procedural code also apply to the administrative courts as common law, if the special law does not regulate special legal norms that would have priority (specialia generalibus derogant).

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no special courts for environmental matters. Generally, these cases (which have as their object administrative acts or actions or omissions of some public institution) start in the administrative section of the Tribunal and then move to the administrative section of the Court of Appeal on appeal. If the administrative act is issued by a central authority, then the first court will be the Court of Appeal and the second will be the High Court of Cassation and Justice (Law no 554/2004).

Environmental cases are to be resolved not only in administrative sections of the courts, but also in other sections, whenever the subject of the litigation is not an administrative act or action or inaction by public authorities.

There is no possibility for forum shopping. Competences of the court are binding and clearly stated.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

Article 18 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative court procedure shows that they also have both cassation competences and some reformatory rights.

The court can:

- Decide that an administrative act is annulled totally or partially;
- Oblige the authority to issue a new administrative act or document or to execute a certain administrative procedure;
- Decide whether the administrative procedures that were done to issue the administrative act on trial are legal or not;
- Decide on the damages, if requested by the plaintiff;
- Regarding an administrative contract, the court can:
  - Decide to annul, totally or partially;
  - Oblige the authority to sign the contract if the plaintiff has the right to that contract;
  - Impose some obligations on the parties;
  - Replace the consent of one party if the public interest so requires;
- Decide on moral and material damages.

According to Art. 20, Law no. 554/2004 regarding the administrative appeal, in the case of admitting the appeal, the court of appeal, in cancelling the sentence, will adjudicate over the first court in the dispute. When the judgement of the first court was rendered without judging the merits or if the judgement was made in the absence of the party who was illegally summoned both in the administration of evidence and in the debate on the case, the case will be... referred once to this court. If the judgement in the first instance was made in the absence of the party who was illegally summoned to administer the evidence but was legally summoned in the debate in the first court, the court of appeal, in cancelling the sentence, will re-judge the litigation in the first court.

The court could never act on its own motion in Romania. However, the courts can ask the European Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

The court can discuss with the parties the necessity for certain evidence to be presented in court, such as documents, interrogations, judicial expertise, on-site research, and/or witnesses, as well as material evidence (pictures, movies, recordings, etc.) and can order their administration even if the parties do not agree[7].

An interesting situation can be encountered when the court (against the will of the parties) establishes the need for judicial expertise. The cost for judicial expertise is usually borne by the party which requested it or by both parties, but if the court establishes the need for such an expertise when the parties disagree and the parties do not pay the cost it will not be administered.

The injunctive relief can only be granted if the plaintiff has formulated such a request.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure ministries and/or specific state authorities

The administrative appeal in Romania is regulated by Law no 554/2004 regarding the Procedure in the Administrative Courts. This regulation is available for all environmental cases. According to this article, before addressing the competent administrative litigation court, the person who is considered injured in his or her right or in a legitimate interest by an administrative act addressed to him must ask the issuing public authority or the hierarchically superior authority, if possible, within 30 days from the date of communication of the document, to revoke the prejudicial act in whole or in part, given the circumstances. However, for justified reasons (e.g. if the party was ill, in a coma or abroad, so the communication could not be received), the injured person (addressee of the act) can file a complaint in the case of unilateral administrative acts over the 30-day period but no later than 6 months from the date of the administrative act or from the moment when the plaintiff was aware of the cause of annulment, but no longer than 1 year after the date of the administrative act.

However, if the said act is a normative act, the complaint can be addressed any time. According to Art. 7¹ the administrative complaint concerning the normative acts (acts of the government) can be filed regardless of any deadline.

In Romania there is no independent body that would revise the legality of the administrative acts during the administrative appeal. In the case of actions introduced by the prefect, the People’s Advocate, the Public Ministry, the National Agency of Civil Servants, or regarding the request of the persons injured by ordinances or provisions of ordinances or of the actions directed against administrative acts, which are no longer in term to be revoked, as they entered the civil circuit and have started to produce legal effects, as well as the cases from Art. 2, alin 2[8] and Art. 4[9] the administrative complaint is not mandatory.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

The person whose right recognized by law or whose legitimate interest was impaired by an administrative act or who did not receive any response within the 30 days or received an unjustified refusal to their request for environmental information (Art 2 L 554/2004) may refer to the competent administrative litigation court, in order to request the cancellation in whole or in part of the act, repair the damage caused and, possibly, reparations for moral damages. Also, the person who considers himself/herself harmed in a right or legitimate interest can submit a request to the court if the authority did not resolve the addressed matter in the time specified by law or if the authority refused to carry out a certain administrative operation necessary for the exercise or protection of the person’s rights or legitimate interests. The reasons invoked in the application for annulment of the act are not limited to those invoked by the prior administrative complaint.

The competent court will be:

The Tribunal when the object is a litigation regarding administrative acts emitted or concluded by the local or county public authority as well as when the complaint refers to taxes, assessments, contributions, customs fees, and accessory, up to a total of 3,000,000 lei (619,336.43 euros).

The Court of Appeal, when the object is a litigation regarding administrative acts emitted by the central public authorities as well as when the complaint refers to taxes, assessments, contributions, customs fees, and accessory, superior to the sum of 3,000,000 lei (619,336.43 euros).

The plaintiff, a natural or legal person in private law, will apply exclusively to the court from his domicile or headquarters. When the plaintiff is a public authority, public institution or assimilated to these it will apply exclusively to the court where the defendant has his domicile or headquarters.

There is no reference in any law to the fact that environmental cases should be timely. Such reference exists for all administrative cases and it only applies in administrative courts. However, a case in such courts could last for more than 2 or 3 years.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special courts for environmental matters. Generally, these cases start in the administrative section of the Tribunal and then proceed to the administrative section of the Court of Appeal, on a cassation appeal. The third level of jurisdiction, the appeal, does not exist in this case. If the administrative act is issued by a central authority, then the first court will be the Court of Appeal and the second will be the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

Environmental cases are to be resolved not only in administrative sections of the courts, but also in other sections, whenever the object of the litigation is not an administrative act.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

If a person is not satisfied with the response of the administrative authority, the harmed person can file a complaint with the Tribunal or the Court of Appeal (based on the jurisdiction described above from Law 554/2004). The litigation will be judged in a hearing. The response to the complaint (submitted by the defendant) is mandatory and will be communicated to the plaintiff at least 15 days before the first date of trial. The decisions of the court are drafted and motivated within 30 days of the pronouncement. If the object of the complaint is a unilateral administrative act, the court solving the complaint can:

- cancel in whole or in part the administrative act;
- suspend the effects of the administrative act (this is possible only if, within 60 days, the plaintiff files an action for annulment of the administrative act);
- issue another document or perform a certain administrative operation.

In resolving the complaint, the court will also establish the material or moral damages. When the object of the action in administrative litigation is drawn up by an administrative contract the court can:

- Order its cancellation, in whole or in part;
- Oblige the public authority to conclude the contract to which the applicant is entitled;
- Request one of the parties to fulfill a certain obligation;
- Supplement the consent of a party when the public interest requires it;
- Oblige the payment of damages for the material and moral damages.

The judgment given in the first instance may be appealed within 15 days from communication of the written decision of the court. The appeal suspends enforcement and is judged in urgency. If the appeal was admitted, the court of appeal, cancelling the sentence, will re-judge the litigation. When the judgement of the first court was rendered without analysing the main arguments of the plaintiff or if the judgement was made in the absence of the party who was illegally summoned both in the administration of evidence and in the debate of the merits of the case, the case will be referred once again to the first court, to be retried. If the judgement in the first instance was made in the absence of the party who was illegally summoned to administer the evidence but was illegally summoned in the debate on the case, the court of appeal, cancelling the sentence, will re-judge the litigation merits.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

The extraordinary remedies are:
- “The Appeal for Annulment” not aiming to retry the case, but to correct some obvious mistakes, procedural or material; (Art. 503, Civil Procedure Code)
- “The Review” (Art. 509, Civil Procedure Code). – it aims to view the case again on 12 determined situations: if the court decided on things that were not asked for or did not decide on a requested thing or gave more than was asked; if the object of the case does not exist anymore;
if a judge, witness or expert who took part in the trial has been definitively convicted of an offence relating to the case or if the judgment was given on the basis of a document declared false during or after the trial, when these circumstances influenced the solution pronounced by the court. If the finding of the crime can no longer be made by a criminal judgment, the reviewing court will first rule, incidentally, on the existence or non-existence of the alleged crime. In the latter case, when the application is heard, the person accused of committing the crime will be cited;
a judge has been definitively disciplined for exercising his function in bad faith or gross negligence, if these circumstances have influenced the solution pronounced in question;

after the judgment was given, evidence was found to have been withheld by the opposing party or could not be presented due to circumstances beyond the control of the parties;
the decision of a court on which the review whose review is requested has been based has been quashed, annulled or changed;
the state or other legal persons under public law, minors and those placed under judicial interdiction or those placed under guardianship have not been defended at all or have been dishonestly defended by those in charge of defending them;
there are final adverse decisions, given by courts of the same or different degrees, which violate the res judicata authority of the first judgment;
the party was prevented from appearing in court and notifying the court of this, from a circumstance beyond his will;
The European Court of Human Rights has found a violation of fundamental rights or freedoms due to a court decision, and the serious consequences of this violation continue to occur;

after the judgment became final, the Constitutional Court ruled on the exception invoked in that case, declaring unconstitutional the provision which was the subject of that exception.
- There is also a special review provided by Art. 21, Law no 554/2004, for violating the principle of the priority of European Union law, regulated in Art. 148 paragraph (2) in conjunction with Art. 20 paragraph (2) of the Constitution of Romania, republished.

There are no other special provisions regarding environmental law. The judicial procedure is regulated by the Civil Procedure Code. The court could never act on its own motion in Romania. However, the courts can ask the European Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

Regarding the preliminary ruling, the legislation is not extensive. The High Court of Cassation and Justice has given some directions in this matter. The High Court of Cassation and Justice through Decision no 2167/2016 has ruled that an application to the CJEU can only be made when in an active litigation is raised the question of the validity of interpretation or the validity of community law. The national court will determine the relevance of Community law for the resolution of the dispute and whether a preliminary ruling is necessary. Also, the question of which may be referred by the national court concerns exclusively questions of interpretation, validity, or application of Community law, and not matters relating to national law or elements of the case before the court.

The answer of the Court of Justice does not take the form of a simple opinion, but of a reasoned decision or order. The receiving national court is bound by the interpretation given when resolving the dispute before it. The decision of the Court of Justice is equally binding on the other national courts invested with an identical issue (Arts 519, 520 of the Civil Procedural Code).

Concerning internal interpretation of the national legislation, the national courts, in the last jurisdiction grade, noting that a question of law, the clarification of which depends on the merits of the case, is new and the High Court of Cassation and Justice has not ruled on it and is not subject to appeal in the interest of the law being settled, can ask the High Court of Cassation and Justice to rule on this issue of law.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

There is no ADR (Alternative Dispute Resolution) in Romania accessible for the public in environmental matters.

Although this possibility is not expressly mentioned in the administrative law, the parties if interested, could resolve the litigation according to mediation law [10]. For example, a company that caused pollution could settle with a case with an individual person.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

According to Art. 1 para 3 of Law no 554/2004, the Ombudsman can challenge in court an administrative act if they received a petition from an individual or an organization. The petitioner will become the plaintiff in the case filed by the ombudsman. The petitioner rightfully acquires the status of plaintiff, to be cited as such. If the petitioner does not approve of the action filed by the Ombudsman at the first court session, the administrative litigation court cancels the request. According to the Regulation no 18/2019, Art. 31, the Ombudsman may approve the ex officio notification when they find, by any means, that the rights or freedoms of the natural persons have been violated. However, the procedure started ex officio by the Ombudsman stops at the request of the injured person in his rights and freedoms. Also, the Ombudsman is entitled to notify the Government of any illegal administrative act or fact of the central public administration and of the prefects (Art. 28, alin. 1, Law no 35/1997).

The Ombudsman can challenge individual administrative acts issued with excess power by the public authorities. The person whose rights are violated must give a previous agreement to the prosecutor to submit the case to the court. This person will become the plaintiff. If the prosecutor considers that a public legitimate interest is harmed through administrative acts, they can submit a case to the competent court of justice that has jurisdiction at the domicile of the public authority that issued the act. The prefects and the National Agency of the Public Clerks can also file cases in court. The latter can file cases only if the legislation regarding the public function is violated.

There is no other special administrative body that has competence related to environmental matters. As the right to a healthy environment is a fundamental right, the competent body to deal with such complaints could also be the Ombudsman.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

The environmental administrative decision can be challenged by environmental NGOs (Art. 20 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding environmental protection law) and any individual without having to prove a prejudice (Art. 5 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding environmental protection law). This means in Romania that for environmental issues actio popularis is regulated.

According to the procedure of the administrative courts, Art. 2 letters a, r, and s of Law no 554/2004, the NGOs are considered to be “social organisations” that can challenge the administrative acts (which include environmental administrative acts) based on “the public legitimate interest”, if the protection of the environment is an objective included in the NGO’s statutes.
The legitimate public interest is defined as the interest concerning "the law order and the constitutional democracy, guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of the citizens, satisfying the community needs, realizing the jurisdiction of the public authorities".

The individual, however, according to Art. 2 letters a and Art. 8 para 2, can invoke the legitimate public interest only subsequent to the private legitimate interest. However, as Emergency Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding environmental protection law is a special law, Art. 5 will be applied with priority according to the specialia generalibus derogant principle. Therefore, in the environmental cases the right to a healthy environment can be invoked as a substantive right of each individual, even if no prejudice was suffered.

The legitimate private interest is defined as "the possibility to claim a certain conduct, considering the realization of a future and predictable subjective right, foreshadowed".

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, waste management, water, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

There are no different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, waste management, water, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc. There are the same general rules applicable in the entire sectoral legislation.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.).

The standing rules are the same as described in question 1.4.1

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

The Civil Procedure Code, Arts. 225 and 150 para 4 regulate the rules for interpretation and translation:

Concerning written documents in a foreign language (the only official language is Romanian): they shall be submitted in certified copy (signed for conformity on each page), accompanied by an authenticated translation carried out by an authorized translator. If there is no authorized translator for the language in which the documents in question are written, the translations made by trusted persons who know the language can be used, under the conditions of the special law[11].

Concerning the proceedings in front of the court:

When one of the parties or of the persons to be heard does not know Romanian, the court will use an authorized translator. If the parties agree, the judge or the registrar may act as an authorized translator. If the presence of an authorized translator cannot be ensured, the provisions of Art. 150 paragraph (4), apply. If one of the persons mentioned in para. (1) is mute, deaf, or deaf-mute or, for any other reason, they are not able to express themselves, communication with them will be in writing, and if they cannot read or write, an interpreter will be used (the cost will be borne by the party who requested an interpreter/translator).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

There are no special rules in environmental matters. The means of evidence that can be used in any civil litigation are:

a. Documents[12]. There can be multiple types of documents such as:

Authentic documents[13] (the authentic document is drawn up or, as the case may be, authenticated by a public authority, notary or other person invested by the state with public authority). This document constitutes full proof until it is declared false.

Under private signature[14] (this type of document simply means that it carries the signature of the parties, it is not subject to any other formality other than the exceptions provided by law. This kind of document recognized by the one to whom they are opposed or, as the case may be, considered by law to be recognized, constitutes evidence between the parties until proven otherwise.

Documents on electronic media[15]. This type of document means that the data for a legal document is stored on an electronic device. Unless otherwise provided by law, the document that reproduces the data of an act, filed on electronic media, constitutes full proof between the parties until proven otherwise.

b. Witnesses[16]. Witness testimony can be used in all cases where the law does not provide otherwise. No legal document can be proved by witnesses if the value of its object is greater than 250 lei. However, evidence of any legal act, regardless of its value, can be made with witnesses, against a professional, if it was done by him in the exercise of his professional activity, unless the special law requires written evidence. If the law requires the written form for the validity of a legal act, it cannot be proved by witnesses. The testimony of witnesses is never admitted against or over what a document contains or what would be alleged to have been said before, during or after its preparation, even if the law does not require the written form to prove the act respectively, except in the cases provided in Art. 309, par. (4).

c. Presumptions[17]. Presumptions are the consequences that the law or the judge draws from a known fact to establish an unknown fact. There are two kinds of presumptions, legal and judicial.

d. Expertise[18]. When, in order to clarify some factual circumstances, the court considers it necessary to know the opinion of some specialists, it will appoint, at the request of the parties or ex officio, one or 3 experts. A broad analysis of expertise and experts is made in the following points.

e. Material means of proof[19]. These are material means of proving the things that by their characteristics, their appearance or the signs or traces they retain serve to establish a fact that can lead to the resolution of the process. Material means of proof also include photographs, photocopies, films, discs, sound recording tapes, as well as other such technical means, if they were not obtained by breaking the law or good practice.

f. On-site research[20]. The on-site investigation can be done, on request or ex officio, when the court considers that it is necessary to clarify the process.

g. Confession[21]. The confession or acknowledgment by one of the parties, on its own initiative or during the interrogation procedure, of a fact on which the opposing party bases its claim or, as the case may be, defence. The court may grant, upon request or ex officio, the call to the interrogation of any of the parties, regarding personal facts, which are likely to lead to the settlement of the trial.

According to Article 13, alin. (1) of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative court procedure, when the court receives the complaint it orders the parties to be summoned. The public authority that issued the document will communicate along with the response to the complaint the contested act along with the full documentation behind its issuance and any other documents necessary to resolving the case. According to the same article, paragraph 2, when the plaintiff is a third party (as defined in Art. 1, paragraph 2) or when the complaint was filed by the Ombudsman or by the Public Minister, the court has to order the administrative authority to submit all documents that were considered when they issued the act whose annulment is being asked for. The plaintiff can provide any evidence to prove the allegations: documents, interrogations, judicial expertise, on-site research, and/or witnesses, as well as other material evidence (pictures, movies, recordings, etc).

In civil and criminal proceedings, the court has no obligation to force the defendant to provide documents. However, there is a procedural regulation that would allow the court to consider that the party who refused to show certain documents recognized the allegation of the other party, but only in civil cases.

The evidence is proposed in the complaint filed by the plaintiff and in the response to the complaint by the defendant. It the parties fail to do so, the sanction that intervenes is the lapse of the right to propose evidence in court. However, according to Art. 254 of the Civil Law Procedure Code there are some exceptions (detailed below at point 1.5.2).

The court can order evidence on its own if it considers that the truth can be established, according to the active role of the court even if the parties do not agree[22]. However, this role, applicable only in civil cases, is limited by the right of the plaintiff to bring his/her own action in court. The evidence must be first allowed by the court and then actually taken to the court. There are no differences between civil procedure and administrative procedure.
However, the civil procedure has three jurisdictional steps: the first court, appeal, and cassation appeal. In the first court and in the first appeal any evidence can be proposed to the court, and the court will only allow the evidence that is useful for the case. In the cassation recourse, only documents can be provided as evidence. The appeal itself can only be admissible on limited motives specified in the civil procedural code.

In the administrative procedure there is only the first court and recourse. In the recourse only documents can be allowed as evidence, but the court can analyse the case on all aspects, to compensate the missing appeal in this procedure.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
 According to the common procedure from the Civil Procedure Code, all the evidence must be proposed by the plaintiff in the application, and by the defendant through the response of the application. However, there are some exceptions[23] such as:

The necessity for the evidence results from the modification of the application made by the plaintiff;

The necessity for the evidence results from the court research and the parties could not have foreseen its necessity;

One of the parties explains to the court that the evidence could not be presented based on some justified reasons;

The administration of the new evidence does not lead to postponement of the judgment;

There is express agreement from all parties;

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

When for the total understanding of some aspects, the court considers that an expert opinion is needed, 1 or 3 experts will be appointed by the judge, based on his own decision or at the request of the parties[24]. If necessary, the court will request the expert opinion to be produced by a laboratory or a specialized institute[25]. In those fields that are highly specialized, where there are no authorized experts, the court can request on its own initiative or at the request of the parties the opinion of a specialist in the relevant field. There is a centralized list of judicial experts on the web page of the Ministry of Justice where an interested person can search for a specific expert as well as searching through a list of multiple experts. The [website includes names, authorization numbers, the location including the county, city, street, and number of the building as well as a phone number.

1.5.3.1. There is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

Regarding the technical conclusions of the expert, the court must consider these conclusions. However, the court can disregard the expertise if it was produced in violation of the procedural norms regarding judicial expertise or if the conclusions contradict the object of the case. Art. 264 Civil Procedure Code states that in order to establish the existence or non-existence of the facts for which the evidence was administered, the judge freely considers the evidence according to his beliefs.

1.5.3.2. Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The rule is that the expert will be called upon by the judge when the court considers that an expert opinion is needed on its own instigation or at the request of the parties. When the expert was called upon by the judge, the expert must comply with the court disposition; if not, the expert can be subject to a peremptory writ, judicial fine or payment of compensation, exception to these dispositions is made according to the Civil Law Code Art. 330 alin. (4) when the expert is a laboratory or a specialized institute.

If the parties do not come to an agreement regarding the appointment of the expert, they will be appointed by the court, by drawing lots, from the list drawn up and communicated by the local office of expertise, comprising the persons registered in its list and authorized, according to the law, to provide judicial expertise.

1.5.3.3. Rules for experts called upon by the parties

According to Art. 330 alin 5, Civil Procedural Code, the parties can name their own experts, provided that the court will allow it, in the capacity of personal advisers, if the law does not say otherwise. The experts summoned by parties like this can formulate questions and observations and, if necessary, draw up a separate report on the objectives of the expertise.

1.5.3.4. Which are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

The decision of the court regarding the appointment of the expert will include the objectives of the expertise, the deadline for submitting the final report, the provisional fee and, if necessary, an advance for travel expenses. For this purpose, the court can establish a hearing in the council chamber, during which it will ask the expert what the estimate fee of the expertise is as well as the time needed. Based on the expert opinions and the parties’ opinion the court will establish the exact amount of the fee necessary for the expertise. The fee for the services of a judicial expert is paid by the party who requested the expertise done. The proof of payment of the fee is deposited at the court registry by the party who was obligated by the decision, within 5 days of the appointment or within the term established by the court.

Any attempt by the experts to request or receive a sum greater than the fee set by the court is punished[26] under criminal law. At the motived request[27] of the experts, revising the work done, the court will be able to increase the fees due to them, summoning the parties, but only after submitting the report, the answer to the possible objections or the additional report as the case may be.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialized lawyers in the environmental field

The lawyers represent the interests of a party in court. Legal counsel is not compulsory in environmental matters or in any matter except criminal cases, in accordance with the Criminal Procedure Code. In criminal cases, including environmental crimes, the accused must be assisted by a lawyer if they find themselves in one of the cases listed at Art. 90 Criminal Procedure Code[28]. There are some provisions at Art. 93, paragraph (4)[29] and (5), Criminal Procedure Code regarding the need in some situations for compulsory assistance by lawyers for the injured party, civil part, and the civilly responsible party. In Romania there are more and more lawyers interested in defending the environment, as it ensures a kind of popularity and public recognition of the lawyer. This is much-needed recognition because advertising by lawyers in Romania is very restricted. The only legal means of professional publicity are listed in the statutes of the profession of lawyer (Decision 64/2011, published in the Official Monitor of Romania), in Art. 244.

In Romania, in each county and in the municipality of Bucharest, there is according to Law no 51/1995 a single Bar with legal personality. The bar is composed of all the lawyers listed in the Table of Lawyers. All the bars in Romania, constituted according to the laws regarding the profession of lawyers, are members in the National Union of Bars of Romania (U.N.B.R). At present are 41 bars, 1 from each county of the country. The National Union of Bars in Romania, along with all the bars, ensures the qualified exercise of the right to defence, jurisdiction and discipline, protection of dignity and honour of all the lawyers[30].

Regarding the publicly accessible website of the bar, each bar from each county has a web page with a section dedicated to a list of lawyers that one can contact (e.g. the Bucharest Bar). This page however does not provide information on the specialized field in which the lawyers work.

1.6.1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance

Pro bono assistance is not expressly provided by law but in some cases the fee for the lawyer’s services can be borne by the state. Although pro bono assistance is not provided by the legislation directly, it is not forbidden either, so if a lawyer or a law firm chooses to offer pro bono assistance, it can.
Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 51/2008 regulates legal aid in civil cases. Such cases can also be environmental cases. Legal aid is provided according to this normative act, only for individuals who have an exceptionally low income.

1.6.1.2. If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

Pro bono assistance is not available. There is no legislation or any other public tools to make it available, except for the procedure provided by EGO 51/2008.

1.6.1.3. Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

Pro bono assistance is not available.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There is a centralized list of judicial experts on the web page of the Ministry of Justice from where an interested person can search for a specific expert as well as searching through a list of multiple experts. The website includes names, authorization numbers, the location including the county, city, street, and number of the building as well as a phone number.

As for the bar website, each bar has an internet page where one can search for a specific lawyer or explore the page with all the lawyers listed in each bar. The list has the contact details for each lawyer so an interested person can find one very easily. For example, if you are interested in a lawyer from Bucharest you can access and find what you are looking for.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

Listing all the NGOs active in environmental issues from Romania would be extremely hard as there are so many, so these are only examples which are relevant:

Combating and controlling pollution:

- AGENT GREEN
- Association ARIN
- Association Centrul Ecologic Green Area
- Federation Coalitia Natura2000 Romania
- Association Harta Verde România
- Association SALVATI FLORA SI FAUNA DELTEI DUNARI
- INSTITUTUL ROMAN PENTRU PROTECTIA MEDIULUI INCONJURATOR
- Bankwatch Romania Association
- Terra Mileniul III
- Eco Civica Foundation

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

A brief list of some International NGOs which are active in Romania:

- Habitat for Humanity
  In Romania, through the six subsidiaries, Habitat for Humanity managed to provide a decent living for 16.000 people, and another 20.000 Romanians benefited from the disaster prevention programmes.
- The ICRC is an independent, neutral organization providing humanitarian protection and assistance for victims of armed conflict and other situations of violence. It acts in response to emergencies and also promotes respect for international humanitarian law and its implementation in national law. - Red cross - local website
- UNICEF. This NGO works in over 190 countries and territories to save children’s lives, to defend their rights, and to help them fulfill their potential, from early childhood through adolescence.
- WWF - environmental NGO active especially in nature and waters area.
- Greenpeace CEE Romania - environmental NGO working specialty in the energy and air pollution area.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

The administrative complaint must be filed within 30 days after the content of the administrative environmental decision was known to the interested public. The complaint can also be submitted after more than 30 days for justified reasons, but no later than 6 months after the date when the public became aware of its content (Art. 7.3 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law).

There is no extraordinary appeal to an administrative body.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

The administrative organ must reply to the administrative complaint in 30 days.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

In the case of actions introduced by the Prefect, the People’s Advocate, the Public Ministry, the National Agency of Civil Servants, or regarding the request of the persons injured by ordinances or provisions of ordinances or of the actions directed against administrative acts that cannot be revoked as they entered the civil circuit and have started to produce legal effects (this means that the performance of a legal act/operation was made on the basis of the said administrative act and that it had some legal consequences), as well as the cases from Art. 2, alin 2[31] and Art. 4[32] the administrative complaint is not mandatory and the case will be submitted directly to the competent court.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

There is no exact deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment. The judges can establish at the first hearing how long the case will take and establish an approximate duration for the case trial.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The action in court must be filed within 6 months after:
- the reply to the administrative complaint was filed or after a reply should have been received;
- the date when an unjustified refusal of the request from the public submitted to the public authority concerning their rights was received;
- the date when the authority should have communicated an answer to a request of the public concerning their rights.

The action can be submitted in court after the time limit of 6 months for justified reasons but no later than 1 year after the public was informed about the content of the act, or the date when the request was submitted to the public authority.

All the evidence should be mentioned in the initial action filed to the court, or no later than the first hearing set by the court.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
The action in court against the administrative decision never has an automatic suspensive effect, according to Romanian legislation. The suspension of the effects of the administrative act must be granted by court, at the request of the plaintiff.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

An injunctive relief granted by the authority that issued the administrative act, is not regulated (it does not exist). The activity regulated by the administrative act can be suspended in certain conditions by the: The National Environmental Guard[33] (participates in establishing the causes of pollution in environmental matters and applies sanctions provided by law including the stoppage or suspension of activities for determined periods if the health of the population is endangered or if pollutants are found to exceed the concentrations allowed by law) or The Environmental Protection Agency[34] if the Guard has imposed certain measures and conditions through the regulatory environmental decisions [35] that were violated by the operator, even after granting a deadline (60 days) to comply with the provision of the regulatory act. The interested public can submit requests and evidence and request the two institutions to suspend the activity regulated by administrative environmental decisions. The two can also be pursued in court if they unlawfully refuse to suspend the environmental administrative regulatory acts.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

Immediately after submitting the administrative complaint against the administrative act or against the unlawful refusal of the administrative competent institution, before the complaint was answered, and before the deadline for the answer to the complaint has expired, the plaintiff can ask the court to grant an injunctive relief, proving a justified case and an imminent prejudice[36]. An injunctive relief can only be granted by the court of justice. The request for injunctive relief can also be filed together with the action in court against the administrative act[37].

The injunctive relief cannot be requested at a later stage. The court will grant injunctive relief if the case is justified and there is an imminent prejudice (Law no 554/2004 does not provide a list or examples for such cases; the judge will establish this). The suspension granted by the court will operate until the litigation is resolved by the first court if it was granted for a request made after the administrative complaint was filed. If the suspension is granted for a request made together with the main action, the suspension of the effects will last until the decision of the court is final (also during the cassation appeal).

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

The effects of administrative decisions are not suspended by submitting an administrative complaint or by introducing an annulment request to the court. The only possibility to suspend the effects of the administrative decision is to be granted an injunctive relief.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

The administrative decision will produce its effects even if it was challenged before the court. However, if the injunctive relief is granted, the decision of the court is enforceable immediately and the effects of the administrative act are suspended.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

The judicial bail is the amount of money that must be deposited by one of the parties to the lawsuit, as security, to cover any damages that would result from taking action, at his request, against the other party, but they do not usually apply in environmental cases.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can it be calculated what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filling a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.

The court fees are regulated by Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 80/2013 regarding the stamp court fees. For the administrative procedure, Art. 14 stipulates the following:

In the matter of administrative litigation, the applications filed by those injured in their rights by an administrative act or by the unjustified refusal of an administrative authority to resolve their request regarding a right recognized by the law are charged as follows: the requests for the annulment of the act or, as the case may be, the recognition of the claimed right, as well as for the issuance of a certificate, a certificate, or any other document - 50 lei (10.39 euros; 1 euro = 4.81 lei); The fees will be applied for each request. For example, if we ask for the annulment of three administrative acts, the fee is 50 lei x 3 = 150 lei = 31.18 euros.

The requests with patrimonial character, by which the damages suffered by an administrative act are requested - 10% of the claimed value, but not more than 300 lei (= 62.37 euros).

Experts fees and lawyer’s fees are not regulated. The expert's fees are established by the judge. The expert can request an increase in the fee based on evidence regarding the necessary efforts for providing the scientific analysis of the case. The lawyer's fees are established between the client and the lawyer according to the complexity of the case. The minimum fee as recommended by the National Union of Bars from Romania for an annulment of an administrative act with administrative complaint and injunction relief is 5,500 lei (1,136.36 euros).

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

The injunctive relief fee is provided by Art. 27 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 80/2013 regarding stamp court fees: Any other actions or requests that cannot be assessed in money, except for those exempted from the payment of the stamp duty according to the law, are charged at 20 lei (4.12 euros).

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 51/2008 regulates legal aid in civil cases. Such cases can also be environmental cases. Legal aid is provided according to this normative act, only for individuals who have an exceptionally low income.

In order provide access to justice to every person addressing a matter to a court of justice, even to those who do not have the financial resources to pay the judicial fee, Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 51/2008 provides access for those who need it to public judicial aid, which is basically a form of assistance provided by the government with the purpose of ensuring the right to a fair trial and a guarantee of equal access to justice. This assistance can be obtained in litigation regarding civil, commercial, administrative, work a public insurance cases as well as any other cases, except criminal ones. Public judicial aid may be requested, under the conditions of this emergency ordinance, by any natural person who cannot meet the costs of a trial or those involved in obtaining legal consultations in order to defend a legitimate right or interest in justice without endangering his or his family’s maintenance. Public judicial aid can be granted.

The total value of the judicial aid, in any form, cannot exceed during a period of one year, the equivalent of 10 minimum salaries. Beneficiaries of public judicial aid according to Art 8. of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 51/2008 are persons whose net monthly average income per family member, in the last two months prior to the application formulation, is below 300 lei (62.06 euros). In this case, the amounts that constitute judicial public aid are fully advanced by the state. If the average monthly net income per family member, in the last two months prior to the application formulation, is Special law no 178/1997 establishes a list of interpreters and translators to be used in the judicial system. Only authorized persons included to be certified by the Ministry of Culture as a translator for the specialty of legal sciences, from Romanian into the foreign language for which he requests in this list can be appointed. To become an authorized translator or interpreter, one must fulfill the conditions prescribed by Art 3 of the above-mentioned law:

1) Concerning written documents in a foreign language (the only official language is Romanian)

2) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

3) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

4) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

5) What are the sectoral rules concerning access to justice regarding plans and programmes, etc.?

6) Does the loser pays principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

The court cannot grant any exceptions form the payment by the law. However, EGO 80/2013 regarding the legal stamp duty, provides for certain exceptions to the obligation to pay the legal stamp duty for: actions and applications, including those for the exercise of ordinary and extraordinary remedies, relating to pensions and other social allowances, etc. but the only one that might apply in environmental cases is the one provided by Art. 29 letter j, concerning the granting civil damages for alleged violations of the rights provided in Arts. 2 and 3 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, ratified by Romania through Law no 30/1994, if the violation may be related to environmental issues in the meaning of ECtHR practice.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

The national rules on environmental access to justice are not available in a special section on a web page. The information can only be found in the legislation.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

Information on access to justice can be obtained from lawyers or specialized NGOs. In Romania in the justice system there are no procedures defined for environmental issues. Therefore, other than the fact that the competent court and the legal deadline for submitting the complaint is mentioned at the end of the administrative acts, there is no other information that can be obtained from any websites or public administration.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

There is no active dissemination concerning access to justice regarding plans and programmes, etc. In the final part of the environmental regulatory acts, there is no other information that can be obtained from any websites or public administration.

4) Is it compulsory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

All administrative decisions and judgments provide information on the necessary rules that must be followed to exercise the right of access to justice in that specific case: the competent court of justice, the applicable law, and the deadline.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Translation and interpretation are provided according to Art. 150 paragraph 4 and Art. 225 of the Civil Procedure Code:

Concerning written documents in a foreign language (the only official language is Romanian): they shall be submitted in certified copy (signed for conformity on each page), accompanied by an authenticated translation carried out by an authorized translator. If there is no authorized translator for the language in which the documents in question are written, the translations made by trusted persons who know the language can be used, under the conditions of the special law[38]. Special law no 178/1997 establishes a list of interpreters and translators to be used in the judicial system. Only authorized persons included in this list can be appointed. To become an authorized translator or interpreter, one must fulfill the conditions prescribed by Art 3 of the above-mentioned law: to be a Romanian citizen, or a citizen of the EU, the EEA or Switzerland, to be certified by the Ministry of Culture as a translator for the specialty of legal sciences, from Romanian into the foreign language for which he requests the authorization and from the foreign language into Romanian is medically fit;
Concerning the proceedings in front of the court:

When one of the parties or of the persons to be heard does not know Romanian, the court will use an authorized translator. If the parties agree, the judge or the registrar may act as translator. If the presence of an authorized translator cannot be ensured, the provisions of Art. 150 paragraph (4) apply. In case one of the persons mentioned in par. (1) is mute, deaf, or deaf-mute or, for any other reason, they are not able to express themselves, communication with them will be in writing, and if they cannot read or write, an interpreter will be used. The interpreter will be paid for by the party who requested the interpreter, and the amount can be provided by the other party according to the ‘loser pays’ principle.

1.8. Special procedural rules

The environmental impact assessment for private or public projects is regulated by Law no 292/2018.

Regarding access to justice, this Law (no 292/2018, Art. 21, para (1)) refers to the provisions of the administrative law (Law no 554/2004).

The development consent is a separate administrative act from the EIA permit, issued by the local/county public administration depending on the location and type of the decision: building permit, agreement on the use of land for intensive agricultural purposes, agreement of the head of the specialized territorial structure of the central public authority responsible for forestry, for projects on afforestation of lands on which there was no previous forest vegetation, the act issued by the competent authority in the field of forestry according to the provisions of Art. 40 of Law no. 46/2008 (the Forestry Code, republished), with subsequent amendments and additions, to achieve the objectives of deforestation in order to change the purpose of the land.

Disputes regarding administrative acts:

issued or concluded by local and county public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, custom debts, as well as their accessories of up to 500,000 lei (102,939 euros) will be resolved by the tribunals.

issued or concluded by the central public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, customs debts, as well as their accessories higher than 500,000 lei (102,939 euros), will be resolved by the courts of appeal.

The cassation of a decision will be retried by the higher court, so if a decision is given by the tribunal it will be retried by the court of appeal, and if the first decision is given by the court of appeal, it will be retried by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

The legitimate private interest is defined as "the law order and the constitutional democracy, guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of the citizens, satisfying the community needs, realizing the jurisdiction of the public authorities";

The individual, however, according to Art. 2 letters a and Art. 8 para 2, can invoke the legitimate public interest only subsequent to the private legitimate interest.

This is the general provision; however, Art 5 of EGO 195/2005 derogates from the general provision, establishing for any person the right to address, directly or through environmental protection organizations, the administrative and/or judicial authorities, in the matter of environmental issues whether or not the damage has occurred.

The legitimate private interest is defined as "the possibility to claim a certain conduct, considering the realization of a future and predictable subjective right, foreshadowed".

2) Rules on standing relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The screening decision is not an administrative act that can be challenged in court.

In Romania actio popularis ensures standing in court for any person.

NGOs (Art. 20 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection law) and any individual without having to prove a prejudice (Art. 5 of EMERGENCY Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection law).

According to the procedure of the administrative courts, Art. 2 letters a, r, and s of Law no 554/2004, the NGOs are considered to be "social organisations" that can challenge the administrative acts, (which include environmental administrative acts) based on "the public legitimate interest", if the protection of the environment is an objective included in the NGO’s statutes.

The legitimate public interest is defined as the interest concerning "the law and the constitutional democracy, guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of the citizens, satisfying the community needs, realizing the jurisdiction of the public authorities";

The individual, however, according to Art. 2 letters a and Art. 8 para 2, can invoke the legitimate public interest only subsequent to the private legitimate interest.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

The screening decision cannot be challenged at all. There is no access to justice against the screening decision.

The development consent is a separate administrative act from the EIA permit, issued by the local/county public administration depending on the location and type of the decision: building permit, agreement on the use of land for intensive agricultural purposes, agreement of the head of the specialized territorial structure of the central public authority responsible for forestry, for projects on afforestation of lands on which there was no previous forest vegetation, the act issued by the competent authority in the field of forestry according to the provisions of Art. 40 of Law no. 46/2008 (the Forestry Code, republished), with subsequent amendments and additions, to achieve the objectives of deforestation in order to change the purpose of the land.

The screening decision as well as the EIA permit can be challenged in court according to the general procedure regulated for all administrative acts.

The administrative complaint must be filed within 30 days after the content of the administrative environmental decision was known to the interested public.

The complaint can also be submitted after more than 30 days for justified reasons, but no later than 6 months after the date when the public became aware of its content (Art. 7.3 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law).

According to Law no 554/2004, Art 10 contains some rules regarding the competent court.

Disputes regarding administrative acts:

issued or concluded by local and county public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, custom debts, as well as their accessories of up to 500,000 lei (102,939 euros) will be solved by the tribunals.

issued or concluded by the central public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, customs debts, as well as their accessories higher than 500,000 lei (102,939 euros), will be solved by the courts of appeal.

The cassation of a decision will be retried by the higher court, so if a decision is given by the tribunal it will be retried by the court of appeal, and if the first decision is given by the court of appeal, it will be retried by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.
The action in court must be filed within 6 months after:
the reply to the administrative complaint was received or after a reply should have been received;
the date when an unjustified refusal of the request from the public submitted to the public authority concerning their rights was received;
the date when the authority should have communicated an answer to a request of the public concerning their rights.
The action can be submitted in court after the time limit of 6 months for justified reasons but no later than 1 year after the public was informed about the content of the act, or the date when the request was submitted to the public authority.
All the evidence should be mentioned in the initial action filed to the court, or no later than the first hearing set by the court.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?
The final authorization can be challenged under the same conditions provided by Law no 554/2004, stipulated for any administrative act.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?
The courts can verify the procedural aspects of the EIA decision as well as the substantive legality and the scientific accuracy of the environmental statement, appointing experts to analyse the scientific data provided by the beneficiary of the project during the EIA procedure.
The courts cannot initiate a review of any administrative decision on their own motion.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable? There are no specific rules provided in the EIA Law no 292/2018. The general rules for challenging an administrative act will apply also for the screening decision and the EIA permit.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? According to Art. 7 of Law no 554/2004, the administrative complaint must be submitted to the competent administrative authority before acting in court against an administrative act, with the exceptions provided by Art. 7 para 5 (the refusal to grant a right of the plaintiff, or for administrative acts that entered the civil circuit and produced legal effects (i.e. the performance of a legal act/operation was produced on the basis of the said administrative act).

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? Standing is not conditional upon participation in the public consultation phase.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? Measures specifically for fair and equitable trial are not provided by the EIA Law. The general measures in civil and administrative matters apply:
According to Art. 8 Civil Procedure Code, in a civil matter the parties are guaranteed the exercise of their procedural rights equally and without discrimination.
The right of equality in civil procedure is a fundamental right, being an application of a fundamental right from the Constitution (Art. 16, alin. (1), the principle of equality in face of the law and public authorities, and Art. 124, alin. (2) which states that the justice is unique, impartial, and equal for everyone, and a guarantee to an equitable process.

According to Art. 7, alin (1) of Law no 304/2004 regarding judicial organization, all people are equal in the face of the law, without privileges and without discrimination, and according to the same article, alin (2), justice is available equally for everyone, without discrimination on the basis of race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, sexual orientation, opinion, political affiliation, wealth, origin, or social condition or any other discriminatory criteria. Also, under Art. 2 of the same Law (304/2004) justice dispensed by judges in the name of the law is unique, impartial, and equal for all.
The equality of parties in a civil matter means that the parties have the right to be judged by the same organs of judicial power according to the same procedural rules, benefiting from the same procedural rights in the specific litigation that is subject to judging, which basically means that in an identical situation, parties cannot be treated differently.
The existence of specialized instances or specific different procedural rights in some matters is not contrary to this principle, because those specific courts resolve all the litigation that falls under the courts’ specialization, without any discrimination, and the special procedural rules will be applied to any party that is part of a litigation subject to the respective derogatory rules. The difference in the treatment of parties could become discriminatory only if a distinction was introduced in analogous or comparable situations, without these being based on a reasonable and objective justification.
The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights enshrines the principle of equality of arms, which means equal treatment of the parties throughout the proceedings before a court, without one of them being favoured over the other.
Thus, the procedural documents for which the law imposes the obligation of communication are communicated to all parties. It would violate the principle of equality of arms, for example, when the court only communicated to one of the defendants the request for a trial. The same principle would be violated if, in evidence or in opposing the same allegations, the court approved the evidence of witnesses for one of the parties, but rejected it for the opposing party, although it proposed the trial in compliance with the terms and other requirements established by the law.
Law no 554/2004, Art. 13 para 2, stipulates that if the plaintiff is a third party (meaning the affected and interested public), the court must request the authority that issued the administrative act to urgently submit to the court the administrative act that was challenged in court as well as the documentation prepared for issuing the administrative act and any other papers (reports, studies, etc) needed for solving the cause.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation? The EIA law provides no special regulations for the time limits on the judicial procedures.
There are provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, but they are recommendations and are not binding for the courts:
an injunctive relief in a civil court must be tried urgently. The decision should be delivered in 24 hours and the written decision should be given within 48 hours after the decision was pronounced.
in the administrative court, the injunctive relief must be tried urgently. Art 14 of Law no 554/2004 establishes an urgent procedure for injunction, derogating from the general procedural regulations in the civil procedure that require longer for the case to receive a hearing in court.
The Civil Procedure Code provides further regulations that are also applicable for the administrative courts: after the judicial research is over (there is no deadline stipulated but at the first hearing the court and the parties will estimate the deadline for reaching a decision), the delivering of the decision can be delayed for up to 15 days, several times[39]. There is no regulation regarding how many times the court can postpone delivery of the decision. The written decision should be communicated to the parties within 30 days. In duly justified cases, this deadline can be extended twice by 30 days each time[40]. Judges can be sanctioned in a disciplinary manner for exceeding this term. However, in practice communicating the written decision usually takes more than 30 days and sometimes more than 90 days.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
The EIA Law has no specific provision concerning injunctive relief. The same procedure as described at point 1.7.2., applies.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC
1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice.
The IED Directive was transposed in Romania by Law 278/2013 regarding industrial emissions.
2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
The same regulation prescribed by Law no 554/2004 is also applicable for the IED permit (see chapter 1.4.3).

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned).
The IED procedure has no screening decision, therefore there are no regulations relating to this procedure.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
The IED procedure has no scoping decision, therefore there are no regulations relating to this procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
The decision that can be challenged according to Law no 278/2013 is the IED permit, called the integrated environmental authorization. The screening and the scoping phases are not regulated. The provisions of the law concerning the administrative appeal and the judicial review described at point 1.7.1. apply also for the integrated environmental authorization.

According to Art. 24 and 25 of Law no 278/2013, the issuance, update and review of the integrated of environmental authorization are subject to the public participation procedure and also of the access to justice procedure.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
According to Art. 25 of Law no 278/2013, the environmental integrated permit can be challenged in court according to the rules stipulated by Law no 554 /2004 regarding the administrative procedural law.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
According to Art. 25 of Law no 278/2013 and also according to Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law, the court will review the substance as well as the procedural steps in the decisions, acts or the omissions that are object of the public consultation procedure. The courts cannot act on their own motion.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
The integrated environmental authorization can be challenged after it was issued, according to the provisions of Law no 554/2004 described at point 1.7.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
The provisions of Art. 7 of Law no 554/2004, described above, also apply to the integrated environmental permit. The administrative complaint is mandatory in the same procedure and with the same exceptions already described.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
There is no condition in the legislation so in order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There are no special provisions in this regard in Law no 278/2013.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no special provisions in this regard in Law no 278/2013.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
The same provisions concerning injunctive relief, regulated by Art. 14 and 15 of Law no 554/2004, are applicable.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
According to Art. 25 para 3 of Law no 278/2013, the integrated environmental authorization must mention the administrative and judicial remedies provided by law.

1.8.3. Environmental liability
Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

In Romania, the ELD Directive is transposed by Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007 approved by Law no 19/2008, and subsequently amended several times: Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 15/2009; Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 64/2011; Law no 249/2013; Law no 187/2012; Law no 165/2016.

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007 does not provide for any special rules or procedures concerning access to justice. The same procedures as provided by Law no 554/2004 are applicable. Standing in all environmental cases is governed by Art. 5 and 20 of EGO 195/2005.

According to the procedure of the administrative courts, Art. 2 letters a, r, and s of Law no 554/2004, the NGOs are considered to be "social organisations" that can challenge the administrative acts, (which include environmental administrative acts) based on “the public legitimate interest”, if, the protection of the environment is an objective included into the NGO’s statutes.

The legitimate public interest is defined as the interest concerning “the law order and the constitutional democracy, guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of the citizens, satisfying the community needs, realizing the jurisdiction of the public authorities”.

The individual, however, according to Art. 2 letter a and Art. 8 para 2a, can invoke the legitimate public interest only subsequent to the private legitimate interest.

This is the general provision, however, Art. 5 of EGO 195/2005 derogates from the general provision, establishing for any person the right to address, directly or through environmental protection organizations, the administrative and/or judicial authorities, in the matter of environmental issues whether or not the damage has occurred. Art. 20 of EGO 195/2005 regulates the standig of the environmental NGOs in environmental matters.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
Emergency Governmental Ordinance 68/2007 does not establish any special deadlines for appeal is such matters. All the deadlines provided by Law no 554 /2004 are applicable (15 days from the communication date[41]).

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
According to Art. 21 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007, the request for action is accompanied by the relevant information and data supporting the observations submitted.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
According to Art. 22 para 1 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007, in order to be analysed, the request for action must show, in a plausible way, that there is environmental damage. There are no further clarifications on this issue.
5) is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

Within 5 days after the request for action was received, the competent authority, if the request for action is provides plausible information that there is environmental damage, will ask the operator in writing for an opinion concerning the allegations of the public. The operator must answer within 5 days.

Art. 23 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007 provides a 15-day deadline for the competent authority to deliver an answer to the action request sent by the public, including the NGOs. The 15 days are counted from the day when the competent authority submitted the request to the operator.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

In case of an imminent threat to the environment, according to Art 11 and 12 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 68/2007, the competent authority may ask the operator to provide all necessary information, take preventive measure, and give instructions in this regard. The competent authority may take the necessary preventive measures if the operator has failed to fulfill his obligations under 10 (to inform and take the necessary preventive measures) if the operator could not be identified or if the operator is not obliged to bear the costs according to the emergency ordinance.

The public or NGOs who submitted requests for action or observations regarding imminent damage to the environment will be answered only after the necessary measures according to the ordinance have been taken.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The competent authorities for identifying the environmental damage or an imminent threat or such damage, as well as for identifying the responsible operator, is the National Environmental Guard, through the county police stations.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

Art. 25 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 68/2007 does not provide any special regulation in this regard, referring this matter to Law 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law. Therefore, Art. 7 of this law applies:

Against a refusal of the authority to take measures, or, if no answer is received in 30 days, the administrative complaint is not mandatory.

Against a decision issued by the authority, the administrative complaint is compulsory if the decision has not entered the civil circuit and has not produced its effects (entering the civil circuit means that the performance of a legal act/operation was made on the basis of the said administrative act; i.e. that it had some legal consequences).

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

The rules regarding access to justice are provided for any individual or NGOs, regardless of their residence or citizenship.

2) Notion of public concerned?

The public concerned is any individual or NGOs. The right to a healthy and balanced environment is a fundamental right according to the Romanian Constitution Art. 35. Therefore, any person or environmental NGO is entitled to use the right of access to justice for the protection of the environment. The definition of the “public” is provided by Art 2 point 56 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 195/2005 regarding the protection of the environment: one or more natural or legal persons and, in accordance with national law or practice, their associations, organizations or groups.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

The same regulations as described in chapter 1.7. for national NGOs are also valid for NGOs from other countries.

The NGOs from other countries have standing in the same conditions as national NGOs. The court is the same as if the NGO were national (the jurisdiction of courts was largely detailed in chapter 1.2.2, 1.2.3).

An important decision in this matter was given by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Decision no 8/2020. This court established that in the unitary interpretation and application of the provisions of Art. 1 para. (1), Art. 2 para. (1) lit. a), r) and s) and Art. 8 para. (11) and (12) of the Law on administrative litigation no 554/2004 that, in order to carry out a legality check on administrative acts at the request of associations, as interested social bodies, the invocation of the legitimate public interest must be subsidiary to the invocation of a legitimate private interest, the latter arising from the direct link between the administrative act subject to legality directly and the objectives of the association, according to its statutes.

This decision gives the possibility for every NGO that has an objective (established in its statutes) in the same field as the said administrative act to contest the administrative act. (in our case, the protection of the environment).

The environmental administrative decision can be challenged by environmental NGOs (Art. 20 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection law).

According to the procedure of the administrative courts, Art 2 letters a, r, and s of Law no 554/2004, the NGOs are considered to be “social organisations” that can challenge the administrative acts, (these include environmental administrative acts) based on “the public legitimate interest”, if the protection of the environment is an objective included in the NGO’s statutes.

The administrative complaint must be filed within 30 days after the decision of the administrative environmental decision was known to the interested public. The complaint can also be submitted after more than 30 days for justified reasons, but no later than 6 months after the date when the public became aware of its content (Art. 7.3 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law).

As stated above, pro bono assistance is not expressly regulated by law but can be obtained if a lawyer or law firm agrees to it. Also, legal aid is offered in the same conditions as for national NGOs.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

The same regulations as described in chapter 1.7 for individuals are applicable. In environmental matters any individual has standing without having to prove a prejudice (Art. 5 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection law). The rules are the same as the one described previously. Legal aid may be granted if the person has a low income[42], and pro bono assistance can be obtained.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The public concerned from other countries are notified according to the Espoo Convention, which has been ratified by Romania through Law no 22/2001 and also according to the national legislation. Art. 26 of Law no 278/2013[43] provides that the public from the neighbouring countries must be informed at the same time as the national public. The same rule is also established by Art. 17 para 1 of Law 292/2018[44]. However, the procedure for communicating the information goes through the competent authorities from the neighbouring state and not directly to the affected public.
Art. 35 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 68/2007[45] provides that the national competent authority will inform the corresponding environmental competent authority. If the prejudice has already been produced, the national competent environmental authority will inform the competent authority from the neighbouring country within 24 hours. There are no provisions concerning the obligation to directly inform the public from the neighbouring countries that might be affected.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
The timeframes are similar to the ones established for the national public.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
The information concerning access to justice is mentioned at the end of the administrative act, where information regarding the time frame, the applicable provision of law and the competent court is given.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
There are no special rules in this regard. The same general provision described at points 1.4.4 and 1.7.4.5 are applicable.

9) Any other relevant rules?
No other relevant rules were identified.

[2]For a better understanding of this situation we can give the example where a phone carrier, after the expiration of the contract, refused to remove the equipment installed on the roof of a building. This was clearly an environmental problem, because of the radiation emitted by the antennas. In this case the competence was taken from civil law.
[3]If the execution of the crime has been stopped or because the execution was poorly conceived and the result of the crime did not happen, the author of the crime is still responsible and will be subject to an investigation. The punishment in this case will be cut in half, so if for a crime the imprisonment is 2 years to 4 years, in case of an attempted crime the punishment will be imprisonment from 1 year to 2 years.
[5]Art. 52
[6]Art. 2-8
[7]Civil Procedure Code, Art. 254, para (5)
[9]“in the case of unjustified refusal to resolve a claim regarding a legitimate right or interest or, as the case may be, the failure to respond to the applicant within the legal term”
[10]“when the legality of an administrative individual act, disregarding the emission date is invoked as an exception ex officio or by request of a party in a trial before the court”
[11]Law no 178/1997 regarding the licensing and payment of interpreters, Governmental Ordinance 51/2008 regarding legal aid in civil matters
[22]Civil Procedure Code, Art. 254, paragraph 5
[23]Civil Procedure Code, Art. 254, paragraph 2
[28]Art. 90 of the Criminal Procedure Code: “The legal aid is compulsory: when the suspect or defendant is a minor, hospitalized in a detention centre or in an educational centre, when they are detained or arrested, even in another case, when the security measure of medical hospitalization has been ordered against him, even in another case, as well as in other cases provided by law; if the judicial body considers that the suspect or defendant could not defend himself; during the trial in cases where the law provides for the crime of life imprisonment or imprisonment for more than 5 years”.
[29]Art. 93 para 4 and 5 of the Criminal Procedure Code: “(4) Legal assistance is mandatory when the injured person or the civil party is a person lacking capacity or with limited capacity; (5) When the judicial body considers that for some reason the injured party, civil party or civilly responsible party could not make one defence, has taken steps to appoint a lawyer”.
[30]Law no 51/1995, Art.10, paragraph 1,
[31]“in the case of unjustified refusal to resolve a claim regarding a legitimate right or interest or, as the case may be, the failure to respond to the applicant within the legal term”
[32]“when the legality of an administrative individual act, disregarding the emission date is invoked as an exception ex officio or by request of a party in a trial before the court”
[33]Governmental Decision no 1005/2013, Art 13 alin 2-point A letter d, regarding the organization and functioning of the National Environmental Guard.
[34]Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 195/2005, Art. 17 para-3 regarding the protection of the environment.
[35]Such as EIA permit, integrated environmental authorisation, SEA permit.
[37]Law no 554/2004 regarding the trial procedure in the administrative courts, Art. 15.
[38]Law no 178/1997 regarding the licensing and payment of interpreters, Governmental Ordinance 51/2008 regarding legal aid in civil matters
[40]Art. 426 para 5 of the Civil Procedural Code
[41]Art. 20, Law no 554/2004
Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

At the national level, other specific activities that are not regulated by the EIA and IED directive, are regulated:

- EGO 57, from 20 June 2007, regulates the regime of protected natural areas, the conservation of natural habitats and of flora and fauna, transposing Directive 79/409/CEE (the Birds Directive) and the Directive 92/43/CEE (the Habitats Directive);
- Water Protection Act no 107/1996, amended several times;
- EGO 195/2005 regarding the environmental protection;
- EGO 43/2007, regarding the placement of genetically modified organisms on the market;
- EGO 202/2002, regarding integrated management of the coastal zone;
- Law no 104/2011, regarding the quality of the ambient air;
- Law no 211/2011, republished, regarding the waste regime;
- The Forest Code, Law no 46/2008, republished in Official Monitor no 611, August 2015;
- Law no 121/2019, regarding the evaluation and management of ambient noise;
- Law no 59/2016 regarding the control over the major accident hazards in which are involved dangerous substances transposing the Seveso Directive.

1) Which are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain: a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same rules from administrative Law no 554/2005 as described above under questions 1.4.1 etc. Access to national courts is effective in Romania. The case law of the European Court of Justice will always have priority and will enjoy a presumption of genuine interpretation of EU law.

2) Which is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter so the general rules will apply. They are described at point 1.3.1 and 1.3.2. The person whose right recognized by law or whose legitimate interest is impaired through a unilateral administrative act, who is dissatisfied with the response received to the previous complaint or who did not receive any response within the time limit[1] (30 days) may refer to the competent administrative litigation court, in order to request the cancellation in whole or in part of the act, repair the damage caused and, possibly, claim reparations for moral damages. Also, persons who consider themselves harmed in a right or a legitimate interest if the authority did not resolve the addressed matter in the time specified by law or if the authority refused to carry out a certain administrative operation necessary for the exercise or protection of the person's rights or legitimate interests can submit a request to the court. The reasons invoked in the application for annulment of the act are not limited to those invoked by the prior administrative complaint.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The administrative review regulated by Art. 7 of Law no 554/2004 is mandatory. It must be done prior to recourse to a judicial review. Before addressing the competent administrative litigation court, the person who is considered injured in his or her right or in a legitimate interest in an individual administrative act addressed to him must ask the issuing public authority or the hierarchically superior authority, if it exists. However, exceptions can be made in the case of actions introduced by the prefect, the People's Advocate, the Public Ministry, the National Agency of Civil Servants, or regarding the request of the persons injured by ordinances or provisions of ordinances or of the actions directed against administrative acts that cannot be revoked as they entered the civil circuit, have produced legal effects, as well as the cases from Art. 2, alin 2 of Law 554/2004 (in the case of unjustified refusal to resolve a claim regarding a legitimate right or interest or, as the case may be, the failure to respond to the applicant within the legal term) and Art. 4 (when the legality of an individual administrative act (disregarding the emission date) is invoked as an exception ex officio or by request of a party in a trial before the court) the administrative complaint is not mandatory. A more detailed analysis can be seen at points 1.3.1 and 1.7.1.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In Romania participation in the public consultation phase is not a condition to have standing before the courts.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

If a person is not satisfied with the response of the administrative authority, or the authority did not give a response to the complaint in the time periods provided by law as well as in the case of a refusal (detailed in Art. 7 of Law no 554/2004, the harmed person can file a complaint at the Tribunal or the Court of Appeal (based on the jurisdiction described in Art. 10 of Law no 554/2004). The litigation will be judged in public hearing. The response to the complaint (submitted by the defendant) is mandatory and will be communicated to the plaintiff at least 15 days before the first date of trial. The decisions of the court are drafted and motivated within 30 days of the pronouncement. If the object of the complaint is a unilateral administrative act, the court solving the complaint can:
- cancel in whole or in part the administrative act
- oblige the public authority to issue an administrative act
- issue another document or perform a certain administrative operation
In resolving the complaint, the court will also establish the material or moral damages.
When the object of the action in administrative litigation is drawn up by an administrative contract the court can:
- order its cancellation, in whole or in part;
- oblige the public authority to conclude the contract to which the applicant is entitled;
Injunctive relief is possible both in administrative procedure and the Civil Procedure Code. Other administrative acts also produce effects regardless of an annulment action in court. The only suspensive effect is provided by the injunctive relief.

through a unilateral administrative act immediately after the money offered by the expropriator has been deposited into a bank account (the private owner

In expropriation procedures the administrative decision is immediately executed. The right of property is transferred from the private owner to the state court to grant the injunctive relief will not suspend the execution of this decision.

There are no special rules regarding injunctive relief. The main rule is that there is no suspensive effect in any circumstances. In all cases the court must be sector apart from the general national provisions?

30 days and even more than 90 days.

The Civil Procedure Code provides further regulations that are also applicable for the administrative courts: after the judicial research is over, the delivery of the decision can be delayed for up to 15 days, several times. There is no regulation regarding how many times the court can postpone the delivery of the decision.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no special rules in this matter, so the general rules will apply.

According to Art. 8 Civil Procedure Code, in a civil matter the parties are guaranteed the exercise of their procedural rights equally and without discrimination.
The right of equality in civil procedure is a fundamental right, being an application of a fundamental right from the Constitution (Art. 16, alin. (1), the principle of equality before the law and public authorities, and Art. 124, alin. (2) which states that the justice is unique, impartial, and equal for everyone, and a guarantee of an equitable process.

According to Art. 7, alin (1) of Law no 304/2004 regarding judicial organization, all people are equal in the face of the law, without privileges and without discrimination, and according to the same article, alin (2), justice is being available equally for everyone, without discrimination on the basis of race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, sexual orientation, opinion, political affiliation, wealth, origin, or social condition or any other discriminatory criteria. Also, Art. 2 of the same Law (304/2004) states that justice dispensed by judges in the name of the law is unique, impartial, and equal for all. The equality of parties in a civil matter means that the parties have the right to be judged by the same organs of judicial power according to the same procedural rules, benefiting from the same procedural rights that are subject to judging, which basically means that in an identical situation, parties cannot be treated differently.

The existence of specialized instances or specific different procedural rights in some matters is not contrary to this principle, because those specific courts resolve all the litigation that falls under the courts’ specialization, without any discrimination, and the special procedural rules will be applied to any party that is part of a litigation subject to the respective derogatory rules. The difference in the treatment of parties could become discriminatory only if a distinction was introduced in analogous or comparable situations, without those being based on a reasonable and objective justification.

The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights enshrines the principle of equality of arms, which means equal treatment of the parties throughout the proceedings before a court, without one of them being favoured over the other. Also, Art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights guarantees the right to a fair trial; according to paragraph 1 “In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice”. Paragraph 2 of the same article states that everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law. In paragraph 3 of Art. 6 ECHR, there are some minimum rights that must be respected regarding a person charged with a criminal offence.

Thus, the procedural documents for which the law imposes the obligation of communication are communicated to all parties. It would have violated the principle of equality of arms, for example, when the court would only communicate to one of the defendants the request for a trial. The same principle would be disregarded if, in evidence or, as the case may be, in combating the same thesis, the court would approve the evidence with witnesses only to one of the parties but rejecting it for the opposing party.

Of course, even if not expressly stipulated, the principle of equality of arms is an implicit principle of criminal law. In the criminal case, irrespective of the parties to the case, they address the same judicial organs explicitly established in accordance with the same procedural rules provided by the Criminal Procedure Code or by special laws. The establishment of a personal jurisdiction or of abbreviated procedures in case of acknowledgment of guilt is not incompatible with the principle of equality.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter. The general rules that will apply are from the Civil Procedure Code, but they are recommendations and not binding on the courts:
an injunctive relief in a civil court must be tried urgently. The decision should be delivered in 24 hours and the written decision should be given within 48 hours after the decision was pronounced.
in the administrative court, the injunctive relief must be tried urgently. Art 14 of Law no 554/2004 establishes an urgent procedure for injunction, derogating from the general procedural regulations in the civil procedure that require longer for the case to receive a hearing in court.
The Civil Procedure Code provides further regulations that are also applicable for the administrative courts: after the judicial research is over, the delivery of the decision can be delayed for up to 15 days, several times. There is no regulation regarding how many times the court can postpone the delivery of the decision. The written decision should be communicated to the parties within 30 days. In duly justified cases, this deadline can be extended twice by 30 days each time. Several judges have been sanctioned for exceeding this term. However, in practice, communicating the written decision usually takes more than 30 days and even more than 90 days.

8) Is there injunctive relief available? If yes, which are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules regarding injunctive relief. The main rule is that there is no suspensive effect in any circumstances. In all cases the court must be asked for injunctive relief. The effects of the act will be suspended only if the injunctive relief is admitted by the court. The appeal against the decision of the court to grant the injunctive relief will not suspend the execution of this decision. In expropriation procedures the administrative decision is immediately executed. The right of property is transferred from the private owner to the state through a unilateral administrative act immediately after the money offered by the expropriator has been deposited into a bank account (the private owner can receive the money only if he/she is not taking legal action against the expropriator asking for more money). An injunctive relief with the object of suspending this transfer is inadmissible according to the Expropriation Law no 255/2010.

Other administrative acts also produce effects regardless of an annulment action in court. The only suspensive effect is provided by the injunctive relief. Injunctive relief is possible both in administrative procedure and the Civil Procedure Code.
In administrative procedures the injunctive relief concerns only suspension of the effects of an administrative unilateral act. In civil proceedings the court can grant an injunctive relief to ensure the protection of a right, to prevent an imminent damage, and to remove the obstacles to execution of a court order. The injunction is given only in urgent matters and only for a limited period.

According to Article 14 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative court procedure, you can ask for injunctive relief immediately after submitting the administrative complaint to the public authority that issued the act, before submitting to the court the request for the annulment of the act.

According to Article 15 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative court procedure, injunctive relief can be also introduced together with the annulment request or through a separate request that can be filed until the first instance court has reached a decision regarding the annulment of the act.

To be granted, you must prove that the case is well justified and that without the injunctive relief an imminent damage would be suffered. In civil procedure the injunctive relief is granted in urgent cases and for a limited period, as described above.

9) Which are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no special rules in this matter. The general rules will apply.

The cost categories are:
- The fee of the court
- The fee of the lawyer
- The fee of the judicial expert

The courts’ fees are regulated by Emergency Governmental Ordinance no 80/2013.

- The fee for administrative court varies between approximately 10.35 euros (50 lei) and 62 euros (300 lei). At this moment in Romania 1 euro equals 4.84 lei.
- The fees for civil court are established according to the value of the case. There are several criteria given by certain values established by law.
  - if the value of the case is under 103 euros (500 lei), the court fee is 8% but no less than 4 euros (20 lei)
  - if the value of the case is between 103.72 euros (501 lei) and 1035 euros (5,000 lei), the fee of the court is 8.28 euros (40 lei) plus 7% for the amount above 103 euros (500 lei);
  - if it falls between 1,035 euros (5,000 lei) and 5,175.05 euros (25,000 lei), the fee of the court is 73.49 euros (355 lei) plus 5% for the amount above 1,035 euros (5,000 lei);
  - if it falls between 5,175.45 euros (25,001 lei) and 10,350.48 euros (50,000 lei), the fee of the court is 280 euros (1,355 lei) plus 3% for the amount above 5,174.94 euros (25,000 lei)
  - if it falls between 10,350.08 euros (50,001 lei) and 51,757.57 euros (250,000 lei) the fee of the court is 435.80 euros (2,105 lei) plus 2% for the amount higher than 10,348.68 euros (50,000 lei)
  - higher than 5,174.34 euros (250,000 lei) – 1,263.66 euros (6,105 lei) plus 1% for the amount higher than 51,746.94 euros (250,000 lei)

There are no special rules in this matter. The general rules will apply.

- The fee for appeal as second grade of jurisdiction is half of the fee at the first court but not less than 4.14 euros (20 lei);
- The fee for the recourse as third grade of jurisdiction is the fee of the court is 20.70 euros (100 lei) for the cassation motives regulated in Art. 488 para 1 points 1 – 7 of the new Civil Procedure Code. If the motives relating to the application of the substantive law in cases that can be valued in money, the fee of the court is 50% of the amount paid in the first court but no less than 20.70 euros (100 lei). For the cases that cannot be valued in money the fee of the court is 20.70 euros (100 lei).

If the appeal is filed against a decision of the court concerning:
- suspension of the trial proceedings, the fee is 4.14 euros (20 lei)
- annulment of the trial because the fee of the court was not paid, or other cases when the case was not trialled, the fee of the court is 10.35 euros (50 lei).

There is no criterion for estimating a fee of the expert or lawyer. A fee for an expert was about 2,000 euros (9,673.61 lei) and a fee for a lawyer not working for an environmental NGO was at least 1,000 euros (4,836.81 lei).

Very few lawyers work in NGOs, so access to lawyers is very difficult.

The fee to apply for injunctive relief in civil court is 4.14 euros (20 lei), if has no monetary value. If it does, the fee is 11 euros if the value is established at under 413.97 euros (2,000 lei) and 41.40 euros (200 lei) if the value established is higher than 413.97 euros (2,000 lei). There is no deposit needed.

The injunctive relief in administrative court is not mentioned, therefore it should apply Art. 27 which refers to any other cases that cannot be valued in monetary terms. For such cases, the fee of the court is 4.14 euros (20 lei).

The ‘loser pays’ principle applies every time the other party asks for the costs that they had to bear during the trial. If the other party does not ask for such costs then the principle will not apply. The court could also compensate the expenses if only a part of your request was admitted, and the rest rejected. In this case, the court could reimburse the expenses, so that either party will pay the remaining part, or nothing if the entire sum would compensate. There is no special regulation concerning the way the judge should allocate the costs. The judge could determine according to his own individual understanding whether the costs as requested by the party are equitable or not. However, the judge is not able to allow the costs to be higher than the amounts that are proved with fiscal receipts.

There are some exceptions from the judicial fee according to Art. 29 of Emergency Governmental Ordinance number 80/2013, but none of them refers to environmental cases

Also, Art. 30 states that the actions and applications are excepted from the judicial fee, including the legal remedies formulated, according to the law, by the Senate, the Chamber of Deputies, the Presidency of Romania, the Government of Romania, the Constitutional Court, the Court of Accounts, the Legislative Council, the People’s Advocate, the Public Ministry and the Ministry of Public Finance, regardless of their object, as well as those formulated by other public institutions, regardless of their procedural quality, when they have as their object public revenues.

In order to provide access to justice to every person addressing a matter to a court of justice, even to those who do not have the financial resources to pay the judicial fee. EGO nr. 51/2008 provides access for those who need it to a public judicial aid, which is basically a form of assistance provided by the government, with the purpose of ensuring the right to a fair trial and a guarantee of equal access to justice. This assistance can be obtained in litigation regarding civil, commercial, administrative, work a public insurance cases as well as any other cases, except the criminal ones. Public judicial aid may be requested, under the conditions of this emergency ordinance, by any individual who cannot meet the costs of a trial or those involved in obtaining legal consultations in order to defend a legitimate right or interest in justice without endangering his or his family’s maintenance.

The public judicial help was broadly described in sections 1.6.1.1 and 1.7.3.3, so in order not to overload this section, we will simply indicate the chapter where it was largely analysed.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]
The SEA Directive 2001/42/EC was transposed into national law by Government Decision (GD) no 1076/2004. This decision establishes the procedure for carrying out the environmental assessment, applied for the purpose of issuing the environmental opinion necessary for the adoption of plans and programmes that could have significant effects on the environment. The decision also defines the role of the competent authority for environmental protection, the requirements of the stakeholders and the public participation procedure.

The screening decision as well as the SEA permit can be challenged in court according to the general procedure regulated for all administrative acts.

The administrative complaint must be filed within 30 days after the content of the administrative environmental decision was known to the interested public. The complaint can also be submitted after more than 30 days for justified reasons, but no later than 6 months after the date when the public became aware of its content (Art. 7 of Law no 554/2004 regarding the administrative procedural law).

According to Law no. 554/2004, Art. 10 contains the rules regarding the competent court.

So disputes regarding administrative acts:

issued or concluded by local and county public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, custom debts, as well as their accessories of up to 500,000 lei (102,939 euros) will be resolved by the tribunals.

issued or concluded by the central public authorities, as well as those regarding taxes and duties, contributions, customs debts, as well as their accessories higher than 500,000 lei will be resolved by the courts of appeal.

The cassation of a decision will be retried by the higher court, so if a decision is given by the tribunal it will be retried by the court of appeal, and if the first decision is given by the court of appeal, it will be retried by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

According to the provisions of GD 1076/2004, the potential significant effects on the environment that may occur through the implementation of the plan or programme must be identified, described and evaluated.

The environmental assessment is carried out during the preparation of the plan or programme and is completed before its adoption or its submission in the legislative procedure. This procedure has 3 stages (2) [3].

1) Which are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act, or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as described above under questions 1.4.1 etc.

According to the procedure of the administrative courts, Art. 2 letters a, r, and s of Law no. 554/2004, the NGOs are considered to be “social organisations” which can challenge the administrative acts, (these include administrative administrative acts) based on “the public legitimate interest”, if the protection of the environment is an objective included into the NGO’s statutes.

The legitimate public interest is defined as the interest concerning “the law order and the constitutional democracy, guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of the citizens, satisfying the community needs, realizing the jurisdiction of the public authorities”.

The individual, however, according to Art. 2 letter a and Art. 8 para 2, can invoke the legitimate public interest only subsequent to the private legitimate interest.

This is the general provision; however, Art. 5 of EGO 195/2005 derogates from the general provision, establishing for any person the right to address, directly or through environmental protection organizations, the administrative and/or judicial authorities, in the matter of environmental issues whether or not the damage has occurred.

An important decision in this matter was given by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, decision no. 8/2020. This court established that in the uniform interpretation and application of the provisions of Art. 1 para. (1), Art. 2 para. (1) lit. a), r) and s) and Art. 8 para. (11) and (12) of the Law on administrative litigation no 554/2004 that in order to carry out a legality check on administrative acts at the request of associations, as interested social bodies, the invocation of the legitimate public interest must be subsidiary to the invocation of a legitimate private interest, the latter arising from the direct link between the administrative act subject to legality directly and the objectives of the association, according to its statutes.

This decision gives the possibility for every NGO that has an objective (established in its statutes) in the field of the litigation to act against the said administrative act that has an impact in the field where the NGO acts.

The screening decision as well as the SEA permit can be challenged in court according to the general procedure (law no. 554/2004) as they are considered administrative acts.

Through the judgment given in Case 314/85, Photo Frost, the Court of Justice reiterated the principle according to which it is solely competent to rule on validity of the acts of the EU institutions, according to the necessity of uniform application of the European law, a requirement that is particularly strong when questioned the validity of an EU act. Therefore, the case law of the European Court of Justice will always have priority and will enjoy a presumption of genuine interpretation of EU law[4].

2) Which is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter so the general rules will apply. They are described at points 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

3) Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review. General administrative rules from Law no. 554 /2004 apply, as described above at points 2.1.3, 1.3.1 and 1.8.3.6.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In Romania participation in the public consultation phase is not a condition to have standing before the courts.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Concerning the transposition of SEA there are no special rules on this. General administrative rules apply. See above answers to questions 1.7.2 and 2.1.8.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? The costs that can arise from bringing such a challenge on access to justice in this area are described in EGO no 80/2013. These were detailed at points 1.7.3 and 2.1.9.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act, or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same rules from the administrative Law no 554/2005 as described above under questions 1.4.1 etc.

In Romania, there is no exhaustive list containing all the plans and programmes that can be challenged or not. This can be established based on the specific content of the plan. If the plan or programme does not fall under SEA, it will fall under Law no 52/2003 on decision-making transparency in public administration regarding the public consultation procedure, and other sectoral legislation. Such administrative acts can be challenged according to the general dispositions from Law no 554/2004.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter so the general rules will apply. They are described at point 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review. General administrative rules from Law no. 554/2004 apply, as described above at points 2.1.3, 1.3.1 and 1.8.3.8.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In Romania participation in the public consultation phase is not a condition to have standing before the courts.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special provisions. General administrative rules apply. See above answers to questions 1.7.2 and 2.1.8.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

The costs that can arise from bringing such a challenge on access to justice in this area are described in EGO no 80/2013. These were detailed at points 1.7.3 and 2.1.9.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[6]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The SEA Directive 2001/42/EC was transposed into national law by Government Decision no 1076/2004. The plans and programmes that are specifically required by EU law to be prepared are adopted through Laws issued by the Parliament, or normative administrative acts such as Governmental Decisions or Ministerial Orders, depending on the importance of the plans/programmes. The Laws issued by the Parliament cannot be contested in court, however, they can be attacked on constitutionality issues by the parties to a judicial case based on the law, by the Ombudsman, or by the political parties from the Parliament after adoption or by the President of the Republic pending promulgation.

The Governmental Ordinance can be contested in court according to Law no 554/2004 Art. 9 only together with a claim of unconstitutionality. The other normative administrative acts can be contested in court according to the dispositions of Law no 554/2004.

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same from the administrative Law no 554/2005 as described above under questions 1.4.1 etc.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are no different locus standi conditions if the plan or programme is adopted by legislation, by an individual resolution of a legislative body, or by a single act of an administrative body etc. The general rules from Law no 554/2004 apply.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter so the general rules will apply. They are described at points 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review. General administrative rules from Law no. 554/2004 apply, as described above at points 2.1.3, 1.3.1 and 1.8.3.8.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In Romania participation in the public consultation phase is not a condition to have standing before the courts.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter. The answer is the same as at point 2.1.5.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no special rules in this matter, so the general rules will apply. They are described at point 2.1.6.

8) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter. The general rules that will apply are from the procedural civil code. They are described at point 2.1.7.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special provisions. General administrative rules apply. See above answers to questions 1.7.2 and 2.1.8.
10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The costs that can arise from bringing such a challenge on access to justice in this area are described in EGO no 80/2013. These were detailed at points 1.7.3 and 2.1.9.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts

The European legislation can be transposed into national law through different normative acts:

- Ministerial Orders (they can be contested according to the dispositions of Law no 554/2004 described in points 1.4, 1.8.1)
- Government Decisions (they can be contested according to the dispositions of Law no 554/2004 described in points 1.4, 1.8.1)
- Emergency Government Ordinances (they can be contested according to Art. 9 of Law no. 554/2004). The person injured in a right or in a legitimate interest by ordinances or provisions of ordinances may bring an action in the administrative court, accompanied by the exception of unconstitutionality, if the main object is not the finding of unconstitutionality of the ordinance or provision of ordinance.

Laws (they can be contested for an exception of unconstitutionality only by the court or commercial arbitration tribunal before which the exception of unconstitutionality was invoked (by the parties) or directly by the People's Advocate). The parties cannot directly address the matter of unconstitutionality to the Romanian Court of Constitutionality. The Constitutional Court also decides on the constitutionality of the laws, before their promulgation, at the notification of the President of Romania, of one of the presidents of the two Chambers, of the Government, of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, of the People's Advocate, of at least 50 deputies or of at least 25 senators, as well as, ex officio, on initiatives to revise the Constitution.

For example, the adoption of the Natura 2000 sites is made for SCIs through Orders of the Environment Minister and the SPAs through Governmental Decision. Any administrative decision or act implementing EU environmental legislation would be an administrative act, challengeable in court, except for Laws issued by the Parliament.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act, or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs are the same as in the administrative Law no 554/2005 as described above under question 1.4.1 etc.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no special provisions regarding this matter so the general rules will apply. They are described at points 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review. General administrative rules from Law n. 554/2004 apply, as described above at points 2.1.3, 1.3.1 and 1.8.3.8.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In Romania participation in the public consultation phase is not a condition to have standing before the courts.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special provisions. General administrative rules apply. See above answers to questions 1.7.2 and 2.1.8.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The cost that can arise from bringing such a challenge on access to justice in this area are described in EGO no 80/2013. These were detailed at points 1.7.3 and 2.1.9.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how [8]?

The national courts can ask the European Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

Regarding the preliminary ruling, our legislation is not very extensive. The High Court of Cassation and Justice has given some directions in this matter. For example, the High Court of Cassation and Justice through Decision no 2167/2016 has ruled that an application to the CJEU can only be made when an active litigation the question of the validity of interpretation or the validity of community law is raised. The national court will determine the relevance of Community law for the resolution of the dispute and whether a preliminary ruling is necessary. Also, the question of what may be referred by the national court concerns exclusively questions of interpretation, validity or application of Community law, and not matters relating to national law or particular elements of the case before the court. The answer of the Court of Justice does not take the form of a simple opinion, but of a reasoned decision or order. The receiving national court is bound by the interpretation given when resolving the dispute before it. The decision of the Court of Justice is equally binding on the other national courts invested with an identical issue.

---

[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[4] Priority of the EU legal order over national law, Razvan Horatui Radu.
[5] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[6] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[7] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekscheaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
The protection of a healthy environment is a constitutional right, although not in the chapter of human rights, but nevertheless recognised as such. The legislative body is the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, which consists of the elected deputies. The National Council of the Republic of Slovenia (as the lower chamber of the Slovenian Parliament) consists of members who represent local and functional interests. The executive power is exercised through the Government – the president and ministers are elected by the National Assembly. There are 16 ministries. For the environment, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and its bodies are competent (bodies under the ministry: the Slovenian Environment Agency, the Inspectorate for the Environment and Spatial Planning, the Surveying and Mapping Authority, the Slovenian Nuclear Safety Administration, the Slovenian Environment Agency (according to the provisions provided by Law no 554/2004), the creditor must make a new request to the first court that tried the case (the execution court) and ask for enforcement of the court decision. The court can impose on the head of the public authority or to the obliged person (debtor) a fine of 20% of the gross minimum wage per household for each day of the delay. This sum will be paid into the state budget, and the plaintiff will be entitled to receive penalties. If the guilty are public servants or officials, the special regulations apply.

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

1. Access to justice at Member State level
Slovenian Water Agency). For nature conservation, there is the Institute of the Republic of Slovenia for Nature Conservation. The Government can adopt decrees and ordinances; the ministers can adopt rulings as binding general legal acts. On the local level, there are 212 local communities (main bodies are the mayor and the community council). There is no regional level organised in Slovenia. Legislation is presented in a legal information system [2].

As a party to the Aarhus convention, Slovenia granted the right to protect the right to a healthy environment to the ombudsman, to affected natural and legal persons, and to NGOs working in the public interest in certain areas (environmental protection, nature conservation, spatial planning). The conditions under which these individuals or organisations have legal standing are defined in environmental legislation. Apart from the subjects mentioned above, anyone can pursue their rights at the Constitutional Court, provided they can demonstrate legal interest.

2) Constitution – presenting main provisions on the environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights (content of + including references)

The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia [3] declares that everyone has the right to a healthy living environment in accordance with the law and that the state shall promote a healthy living environment (Article 72). Also, everyone has the right to safe drinking water (Article 70a). The manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed shall be established by law so as to ensure its economic, social, and environmental function (Article 67). Ratified and published treaties shall be applied directly (Article 8) and Slovenia is a party to the Aarhus convention.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Environmental legislation is extensive and frequently changing. Through strategic environmental assessments (SEAs) and environmental impact assessments (EIAs), it is connected with spatial planning and construction permission regulation. All legislation is presented in the legal informational system of the Republic of Slovenia. There is also some legislation translated into English, but mostly it is not fully accurate. Access to justice is defined in the Environmental Protection Act, the Nature Conservation act, the Spatial Planning Act and the Building Act.

The Environmental Protection Act [4] is a basic act for the overall protection of the environment in Slovenia. It regulates horizontal common instruments and principles such as: the basic principles of environmental protection, environmental protection measures, strategic documents for environmental protection, strategic environmental assessment (according to the SEA Directive), environmental impact assessment and environmental consent (according to the EIA Directive), environmental permits (according to the IED), environmental monitoring and environmental information collection, emission trading, liability for environmental damage (according to the ELD), competent bodies in the areas of environmental protection, NGOs and their role in procedures and inspection. Access to justice is defined as a general right to exercise the constitutional right to a healthy environment (Article 14 – right to act against polluters) and as a right for a defined circle of affected persons and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” (complaint against negative EIA screening decision, party in EIA procedure, IED procedure and environmental liability procedure).

The Government of the Republic of Slovenia determines the thresholds for emissions and most of the executive regulation for administering the areas listed above with decrees.

According to the Environmental Protection Act, the National Programme for Environmental Protection is the national programme constituting the framework for environmental protection in Slovenia and is adopted by the National Assembly [8] for a certain period (it also includes the Nature Conservation Plan as per the Nature Conservation Act and the National Water Plan as per the Waters Act).

The Nature Conservation Act [6] transposed the Convention on Biological Diversity into Slovenian legislation. It establishes biodiversity conservation measures (protection of wild plant and animal species, including their genetic material, their habitats and ecosystems) and the system for the protection of valuable natural features in order to contribute to nature conservation. It regulates:
- different types of protected areas: a habitat type, an ecologically important area, an area of special protection (the Natura 2000 areas are determined and regulated by the Decree on special protection areas (Natura 2000 areas) [7], landscape;
- measures for the protection of species and their habitats; the executive regulation is adopted by the government (in the form of decrees, according to the Habitats and Birds Directive);
- instruments for assessment of the environmental acceptability of plans and programmes (appropriate assessment for plans is carried out within the strategic environmental impact assessment and appropriate assessment of activities affecting nature is carried out within the environmental impact assessment, if this is carried out, otherwise separately);
- nature conservation permit;
- competent bodies for nature conservation;
- conditions for NGOs to obtain the status of “public interest – nature conservation” and their rights (the right to represent interests of nature conservation in all administrative procedures and disputes);
- inspection.

The Waters Act [8] lays down basic water regulations (it also transposes the Water Framework Directive). It emphasises that water is a public good. The Act introduces the institute of “right on water” (obtaining permission for special use of water, for example, fish farms, irrigation and hydroelectric power plants) and water consent (as a permit for intervention in the area of a certain water by influencing the water regime). In order to protect drinking water, protected water areas are defined, in which the disposal of waste, the use of fertilisers and other actions are prohibited. Water management is defined in more detail by the specific water management plans. The Water Act also defines the basic principles of water management. The highest strategic national water management plan is a national programme (adopted by the National Assembly for a maximum of 12 years). The water management plans include the implementing action plans. There are no special provisions for legal standing for NGOs or individuals in the administrative procedures related to water, therefore the general rules for legal standing in administrative procedure apply.

There are other important acts related to environmental protection, among them: the Act on Forests [9]; the Game and Hunting Act [10], the Animal Protection Act [11], the Underground Cave Protection Act [12], the Mining Act [13], the Ionising Radiation Protection and Nuclear Safety Act [14], the Triglav National Park Act [15], the Management of Genetically Modified Organisms Act [16], the Chemicals Act [17], and others which fall under the competence of different ministries.

Where spatial planning and construction permission has an impact on the environment, the strategic environmental assessment and environmental impact assessment are carried out within the procedure of spatial planning or construction permission. The Spatial Planning Act [18] provides access to justice regarding spatial plans, and the Building Act [19] does so in the part where the environmental impact assessment is integrated into the building permits procedure.

4) Examples of national case-law and the role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The Supreme Court has no special or particular role in environmental matters. It acts as a second-instance court of the Administrative Court, if the complaint is allowed, and for revision in cases of extraordinary appeal. It also decides on jurisdiction matters between the Administrative Court and the courts of general jurisdiction.

The core of case law (on the initiative of the NGOs) is generated by environmental impact assessments (the EIA Directive), appropriate assessments (the Habitats Directive), environmental permits (the IED), environmental liability (the ELD), water permits, nature conservation permits and spatial planning at the Administrative Court. Several cases were initiated not only because of opposition to the content of the administrative decision, but also because of recognition of standing in the administrative procedure for NGOs that was not recognised or rejected. At regular court there are civil claims for compensation and for termination of harmful practices or emissions. There are also many cases concerning review of the constitutionality and legality of regulations and general acts, constitutional complaints for violation of human rights with individual acts.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

According to Article 8 of the Constitution, ratified agreements shall be applied directly, therefore you can also directly rely on international environmental agreements, especially in matters where they are not correctly transposed or transposed at all into national law (besides the national end EU transposing regulation). It is also important that you rely on international agreements in the administrative procedure in order to build up the case for a potential procedure before the Administrative Court, and later the Constitutional Court in the potential case of human rights violation.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Generally, there are three levels in the Slovenian court system: 44 local and 11 district courts on the first level, 4 higher courts on the second, and the Supreme Court as the third instance. There are also specialised courts: the Labour and Social Court and the Administrative Court. The vast majority of environmental cases are dealt with by the Administrative Court, which has status equal to the second level courts. The rest of the cases are dealt with by the courts of general jurisdiction (on the first level by local or district courts). In the event that appeal against the Administrative Court’s decision is allowed, the second instance is the Supreme Court.

The Constitutional Court is the highest judicial authority for the protection of constitutionality, legality, human rights and fundamental freedoms. Also, there is a State Prosecutor General as part of the general justice system and as an independent state authority.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Courts Act defines the jurisdiction of local, district, high courts and the Supreme Court. The Administrative Dispute Act defines jurisdiction of the Administrative Courts, and the Labour and Social Courts Act defines jurisdiction of the Labour and Social Courts. The Administrative Court is competent for judicial protection of the rights and legal interests of individuals and organisations in decisions and actions of state authorities, local community authorities and bearers of public authority - administrative decisions and (legality) of individual acts and actions with which authorities have encroached on the human rights and fundamental freedoms of an individual, unless a different form of judicial protection has been guaranteed (Articles 1 and 4). The core procedural act is the Civil Procedures Act. It sets out the rules for resolving conflicts or uncertainties regarding jurisdiction. The addressed court assesses its jurisdiction according to the statements in the suit and its own findings. If it establishes that another body (like arbitration) is competent for the case, or that the case is not of Slovenian court jurisdiction, it dismisses the suit. If it establishes that the case falls within another court’s jurisdiction, it stops the procedure and sends the case to the other court. The high court has jurisdiction for resolving disputes about jurisdiction among (regular) courts, and the Supreme Court resolves disputes about jurisdiction among lower courts.

There is also the Arbitration Act which defines sets out rules on arbitration in Slovenia. The district court in Ljubljana has jurisdiction in relation to some concerns regarding the arbitration agreement: admissibility of the arbitral proceedings, the appointment or exclusion of an arbitrator, the award for the arbiter, the declaration of enforceability of domestic and recognition of foreign arbitral awards. The appeal against the court decision can be lodged with the Supreme Court. But the subject of arbitration agreement can only be pecuniary claims, and other claims only if the parties can agree on them.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no specialised courts for environmental disputes. Most environmental cases are processed by the Administrative Court, since there are a lot disputes regarding decisions of state institutions in administrative procedures. There are some specialised judges for environmental and spatial planning cases, but not as a separate organisational unit. There are no laypersons contributing; the process is led by the senate of three judges or one judge.

A minority of environmental disputes are processed before regular (local or district) courts – these are civil suits against polluters. There are no specialised judges for the legal area of the environment.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

The Administrative Court is not bound by the legal grounds of the request of the plaintiff, but to the factual claims set out in the lawsuit. Each party proposes evidence for their requests, but the court decides which evidence will be used. The Administrative Court is not bound by the proposals of the parties and may hear any evidence which could contribute to resolution of the case.

If the court grants the claim of the plaintiff, it can decide to:
- abolish the administrative decision and return the case to the administrative level (this is the most commonly the case);
- abolish the administrative decision and decide about the matter; this occurs if the case has a solid base in facts, and especially if a new administrative procedure would cause irreparable damage to the plaintiff (this is never the case in environmental matters).

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Administrative bodies, defined by the State Administration Act, are: ministries, bodies/institutions within the ministry and administration units. For environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, the following institutions are relevant:

- Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning;
- bodies within the ministry: the Slovenian Environment Agency, the Inspectorate for the Environment and Spatial Planning, the Surveying and Mapping Authority, the Slovenian Nuclear Safety Administration, the Slovenian Water Agency;
- the Institute of the Republic of Slovenia for Nature Conservation;
- administrative units, which are the basic building blocks of the administrative system covering geographical areas.

The first level of administrative decision-making can be undertaken by all the institutions above, depending on the type of permit/consent. Usually or most commonly, the first level is covered by administrative units or bodies within the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning, and the second level (appeal instance) is the ministry itself.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Against the final decision at administrative level, a suit can be filed with the Administrative Court in accordance with the Administrative Dispute Act. The suit can be filed by the plaintiff, and representation by attorney is not a necessary condition. The court fee should be paid (148 EUR), and is returned to the plaintiff if they are successful. There is a possibility for the court to decide without a hearing. The average time for a decision is approximately one year.

The administrative body (a state institution) as a defendant is represented by the State Attorney’s Office.

The procedural rules are set out in the Administrative Dispute Act and in the Contentious Civil Procedures Act.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence
There is no special environmental court.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

In administrative procedures, except where the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning decides as first-instance body, complaint is possible (within 15 days) unless it is specifically excluded (for example, in environmental liability proceedings). The Ministry carries out the second-instance administrative procedure regarding the complaint and issue the decision. The administrative procedure is regulated by the General Administrative Procedure Act[31]. Where complaint is not possible, administrative dispute at the Administrative Court is allowed.

Against the final decision (judgment) of the Administrative Court, appeal to the Supreme Court is possible. According to the Administrative Dispute Act, this is the case only where the court establishes different facts than the administrative body (defendant) and changes the administrative decision on this ground on its own motion, or finds out that the decision or action of the administrative body is illegal. In the judgment, the Administrative Court defines if appeal is allowed. Against a decision about temporary injunction, appeal against the decision to the Supreme Court is possible.

Revision, as extraordinary appeal to the Supreme Court, is possible if the Supreme Court allows it. The Supreme Court decides about the proposal of the interested party; the proposal should be filed within 15 days after receiving the judgment. The Supreme Court allows the revision if the decision about important legal question is expected. If the revision is allowed, it can be filed only because of violation of the procedural rules, or if the application of law is wrong. The revision appeal is allowed only with the representation of an attorney.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

Mediation between parties is always possible on a voluntary basis[32], but it is not used often for environmental cases. In civil disputes, the regular courts offer mediation as part of the court procedure (Act on Alternative Dispute Resolution in Judicial Matters[33]). The parties could also agree on an arbitration agreement, if the matter concerns a pecuniary or other claim on which the parties can settle. This can be the case only in civil suits regarding compensation claims against polluters. It is not used in practice.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsman has a strong role to play in protecting the constitutional right to a healthy environment.[34] According to the Human Rights Ombudsman Act[35], the Ombudsman acts on the basis of individual initiatives if the state or a local body violates human rights. If the administrative or court procedure is already addressing the matter, the Ombudsman does not intervene unless there is a substantial delay in proceedings or there are signs of obvious abuse of power. The Ombudsman can accept or reject the initiative. If it accepts it, then it begins the inquiry. After receiving the explanation of the competent body, it prepares a report where it expresses an opinion about the violation of human rights and proposes what action should be taken to stop the violation.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

There is no general rule for all cases. There is a status of working in the public interest for NGOs, regulated by the Non-Governmental Organisations Act[36] - this means that the state acknowledges that some NGOs are operating not only in their own interest or in the interest of their members but for common welfare. This is recognised in different areas if NGOs fulfill certain conditions and can present accomplishments defined by the rules of different sectors (culture, sports, environment, etc). The NGO has to apply for the status at the competent ministry and the ministry issues an administrative decision. The NGO has to fulfill the conditions for the status at all times and has to report to the ministry every two years. Sectoral rules/conditions for environmental NGOs are set out in:

- the Environmental Protection Act and rules on detailed conditions and criteria for acquiring the status of a non-governmental organisation operating in the public interest in the field of environmental protection[37] for NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection". According to the Environmental Protection Act, they can be a party in certain administrative procedures (file a complaint against the negative EIA[38] decision, be a party in the EIA[39] and IED procedure and the environmental liability procedure);
- the Nature Conservation Act and rules on the criteria determining the significant achievements of an NGO in order to be granted the status of an NGO operating in the public interest in nature conservation[40] for NGOs with the status of "public interest – nature protection"; they have to fulfill some additional criteria (if the NGO is an association, it must have 50 members; if the NGO is an institute, it must have two employees with a certain level of education; if the NGO is a foundation, it must have 10,000 EUR of property); NGOs with this status can participate in administrative procedures or in administrative disputes if they advocate nature protection interests in the way determined by the law;
- the Spatial Planning Act and rules on the criteria determining significant achievements of NGOs in order to be granted the status of an NGO operating in the public interest in spatial planning[41] for NGOs with the status of "public interest – spatial planning". They have the right to file a suit with the Administrative Court against some aspects of spatial plans (like land use).

Natural and legal persons have:

- the right to participate (and therefore to use the legal remedies) in certain procedures (environmental impact assessment (EIA), environmental permits (IED)) applicable for those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area (Environmental Protection Act);
- the right to be a party in administrative procedures, provided they demonstrate legal interest. Legal interest shall be demonstrated by a person who claims to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits – these shall be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation (General Administrative Procedure Act[42], Article 43);

Civil initiatives can be a party in the integral building permission procedure (integral means that the building permission procedure is combined with the environmental impact assessment (environmental consent) procedure). There should be 200 signatures of residents (natural persons of age) who live in the local community where the installation will be sited or in a neighbouring community (Building Act[43], Article 54).

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

There is a general rule in the General Administrative Procedure Act concerning who has the right to be a party in an administrative procedure – those who demonstrate their legal interest (the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits; these shall be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation). In addition to that general rule, there are some specific rules in lex specialis:

- The Nature Conservation Act – defines the conditions for NGOs to hold the status of "public interest – nature conservation", and the right of such NGOs to represent nature conservation interests (be a party and use legal remedies) in all administrative procedures and in all administrative disputes in the way determined by the law. Legal remedies involve the administration appeal to a second-instance authority and/or filing a suit with the Administrative Court (administrative dispute).

The Environmental Protection Act defines the conditions for NGOs to hold the status of "public interest – environmental protection" and their right to participate (be a party and use legal remedies) in certain procedures: to appeal against a negative EIA screening decision, to be party in the EIA procedure, the EID procedure and the environmental liability procedure. The defined circle of affected individuals has the right to participate in EIA and IED procedure (be a party and use legal remedies). Legal remedies involve administrative appeal to a second-instance authority and/or filing a suit with the Administrative Court (administrative dispute). There is also a more general right to exercise the constitutional right to a healthy environment: individuals, their societies, associations and organisations can file a request with the court against the polluter to stop harmful activities. The competent courts for such cases are regular first-instance courts (district).

- The Building Act regulates integral building permission procedure (joint building permission and environmental impact assessment – environmental consent) and defines the parties in this procedure. Civil initiatives (groups of 200 inhabitants of the affected local community) are also included in the defined circle of affected persons and NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation / environmental protection”. All have the right to participate in the administrative procedure (be a party and use legal remedies – filing a suit with the Administrative Court).

- The Spatial Planning Act: against the spatial plan, legal remedy is possible (a suit with the Administrative Court) for a defined circle of persons and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation / spatial planning / cultural heritage conservation”. They can use the legal remedy provided they actively participated in the public discussions in previous stages of the procedure. The State Attorney’s Office has the same right for protection of the public interest. There are limited aspects of the plan that can be challenged.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The Constitutional Court has the general rule[44] that anyone who demonstrates legal interest may lodge a petition that the procedure for the review of the constitutionality or legality of regulations or general acts issued for the exercise of public authority be initiated. Legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a regulation or general act is issued for the exercise of public authority and its review has been requested by the petitioner for reasons of its direct interference with their rights, legal interests or legal position. Constitutional complaint against the violation of human rights by an individual act can be filed after all other legal remedies have been exhausted.

Administrative procedure:

The general rule for all administrative procedures applies for all persons – whether individual or NGOs. This rule is applicable unless a particular Act (e.g. the Nature Conservation Act or the Building Permit Act) defines other specific rules. The right to be a party in an administrative procedure is available to those who demonstrate their legal interest (the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits; these benefits shall be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation). The procedure usually goes further at the level of judicial review (administrative dispute at the Administrative Court) at the initiative of the party in the administrative procedure. Specific rules are defined in:

- The Nature Conservation Act – NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” have the right to represent nature conservation interests (be a party and use the legal remedy) in any administrative procedure and in administrative disputes in the way determined by the law.

- The Environmental Protection Act defines different rights for individuals and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection”:

  - strategic impact assessments: there are no provisions for NGOs to participate in SEA procedures, but (according to the Nature Conservation Act) an association with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” did succeed at the Administrative Court in getting a position in an SEA procedure ([LII case II U 145/2016]); on the basis of this case, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning allowed 9 NGOs with the status of “public interest – environment protection / nature conservation” to be parties in the SEA procedure for the National Energy and Climate Plan[45]; the legal remedy here is complaint to the Government (semi-administrative procedure) if the authority that prepares a plan is at state level or suit with the Administrative Court if the authority that prepares the plan is at local community level;

  - environmental impact assessment screening procedure (Article 51a): NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” can appeal against negative screening decisions (within 15 days after publishing of the decision on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency);

  - environmental impact assessment (Article 64): the law presumes the existence of legal interest for persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area, and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” shall have a legal interest to enter the procedure for issuing an environmental consent in order to protect their rights, provided they apply for the procedure within 35 days after publishing of the public consultation documents (but it is recommended that the party in this application also presents all the comments and arguments in the case); a recent decision by the Administrative Court states that this legal assumption of legal interest does not exclude the existence of legal interest according to general rules of administrative procedure, widening the circle of possible parties[46];

  - environmental permit – IED (Article 73): persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area of the installation and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” have a legal interest in participating in the procedure for issuing an environmental permit, provided they apply for the procedure within 35 days after publishing of the public consultation documents (but it is recommended that the party in this application also presents all the comments and arguments in the case);

  - other environmental permits, but not SEVESO (Article 84a): the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning will publish the documentation for the procedure if it gets five applications for party status in the procedure. If so, anyone can apply for party status in the procedure within 30 days of public announcement of the procedure;

  - environmental liability procedure (110g and 110e): legal or natural person who are harmed or could be harmed by environmental damage and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” have the right to inform the Slovenian Environment Agency about the environmental damage and demand that the agency acts. They can also be a party in the procedure for determining the remedy measures.

There is also the right to the protection of a healthy environment, which is “open” to all individuals and NGOs (not only those with the status of public interest) – Article 14. According to this, citizens may, as individuals or through societies, associations or organisations, file a request at a court that the person responsible for an activity affecting the environment terminates the activity if it causes, or would cause, an excessive environmental burden or presents, or would present, an imminent threat to human life or health, or that the person responsible for the activity affecting the environment be prohibited from starting the activity if there is a high probability that it will cause such consequences. For these cases, the first-instance regular courts are competent.

- The Building Act regulates integral building permission procedure[47] (combined building permit and environmental impact assessment – environmental consent). Parties in the procedure can be (Article 36, 38, 50, 54) persons who are a party in the regular building permission procedure, persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area, other persons claiming that building and its environmental burdens would have an impact on their rights and benefits, NGOs with the status of “public interest - environmental protection / nature conservation”, civil initiative (200 signatures of residents in the local community or a neighbouring community). They can be party if they apply after they are invited by the administrative body (namely the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning) or in the procedure according to the Environmental Protection Act if they apply (with their reasons for objection) in the procedure within 35 days after publishing of public consultation documents. NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation” also have the right to legal remedy (suit with the Administrative court) if they were not a party to the procedure within 30 days after publishing on the online platform e-administration (Article 58);

- Spatial Planning Act (Article 58): against the spatial plan, legal remedy is possible (a suit with the Administrative Court within 3 months after enforcement) for persons if the plan determines ground for his rights and in this part significant consequences; NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental
4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?
The general rules are set out in the Civil Procedure Act; the procedure at the court takes place in Slovene or a language that is used at the court (for Italian and Hungarian minorities). Parties or other participants can use their own language according to the Act – they can ask for a translator for the hearings and for a translation of the documents used at the hearings. The translators are official translators as per the Court Experts, Certified Appraisers and Court Interpreters Act[48]. All other documents should be in Slovene or another official language of the court. The costs for the translator are part of the costs of the procedure (the burden of the party who caused the cost).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

In administrative procedures, according to the principal of substantive rule the administrative authority is obliged to determine the true facts and all relevant facts so that a lawful and correct decision can be established. It can order the presentation (ex officio) of any evidence if it concludes that this is necessary to clarify the case. Each party proposes the evidence for their requests, but the court decides which evidence will be used. The Administrative Court is not bound by the proposals of the parties and may hear any evidence which could contribute to resolution of the case.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
The parties can propose evidence up to the end of the first hearing, except where the party can reasonably justify not presenting it sooner.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

In the procedure, experts can be nominated by the court at the proposal of the party. The court shall take evidence from an expert if it is necessary to establish or clarify a fact with expertise (knowledge) which the court does not have at its disposal – the proposal of certain experts is consulted on with the parties. Before the expert begins work, the costs shall be covered in advance – otherwise the court stops the procedure. Usually the expert opinion should be presented as evidence with the filing of a suit or in response to it. In such cases, the expert represents a cost for the party presenting the expert opinion (you can find an expert on the free market) and hiring an expert does not mean that another expert will not be nominated later in the procedure. The court decides which evidence should be used. It can call upon another expert if the parties present substantiated arguments for doing so, and the cost burden lies with the party who proposes or insists on this. Actually, if expertise is presented by a party, it is evaluated according to the principle of free evaluation of the evidence: it can be accepted by the court, but the court may also consider it to be a mere claim by the party and nominate another expert. The main rule is that experts are to be nominated by the sitting court. The court experts are regulated by the Court Experts, Certified Appraisers and Court Interpreters Act. They are listed in a special register for court experts (area of ecology – there are 8 experts). The court is not bound only to court experts; it can also nominate expert institutions or other experts.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

In evaluating expertise, the judge assesses which facts are considered to be proven on the basis of evaluation of each piece of evidence individually and combined. Since the basic reason for nominating the expert is that the court does not have the knowledge necessary for establishing all relevant facts in the matter, the discretion is actually limited, as the court will not have the knowledge necessary to differ from it. However, if the court is not persuaded by the expertise (and is capable of explaining this), there is no obligation to follow it. The parties in the dispute comment on the expertise, and if the arguments are relevant they can also propose another expert. The other expert can be approved by the judge, but the rules are restrictive – it is possible only if the expertise is unclear, incomplete, internally contradictory or in contradiction of other facts and this cannot be eliminated by an additional hearing of the expert.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The court can nominate an expert if the parties in the dispute propose it, or to establish or clarify a fact with expertise (knowledge) which the court does not have at its disposal – but if the costs are not covered in advance by the plaintiff or the party that proposed this evidence, it stops the procedure. If expertise is presented by a party, it is evaluated according to the principle of free evaluation of the evidence: it can be accepted by the court, but the court may also consider it to be a mere claim by the party and nominate another expert.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

The nominated court expert is obliged to respond to the invitation of the court, but they can be excused of duty if there are circumstances: concerning what the client (party) has entrusted to them as their attorney or confesses to them as a religious confessor, or concerning the facts that they have learned as their lawyer or doctor or in the exercise of any other profession or activity where there is a duty to maintain secrecy or on the grounds of other excusable arguments. They can also be excluded for the same reasons as are valid for exclusion of the judge from the case. The expert is nominated by court order. The judge decides whether the expert is only invited to the hearing or if he must prepare a written expert opinion (in practice, the judges decide for both). The procedure does not provide for separate complaint against the decision about the expert. If the expert declines to perform the work or does not come to the court without a substantial excuse, the judge can impose on them a penalty of 1,300.00 EUR and costs for delaying the procedure.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

The estimated expert’s fee should be paid in advance by the party which proposed the evidence of the expert, or by the plaintiff if it is proposed by the court. The payment is ordered by court order. If the fee is not paid, the expert evidence is not included. There are no standard expert fees. They are determined by the rules on court experts, certified appraisers and court interpreters[49] - the work is divided into different phases and each phase of the work is then divided up in accordance with the level of complexity. The amounts are then determined using different categories for each phase: pages or hours. For instance, taking into consideration all phases of the procedure, the cost for the simplest expertise would be around 550 EUR and for the most complex around 2,000 EUR. But the upper limit is not fixed, and there are also fees for additional pages and hours.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible Internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Lawyers are regulated by the Attorneys Act[50] and are part of the general justice system’s independent service. They are organised by the Bar Association, which also holds the register of all attorneys (they can be selected by areas of “specialisation”, but “environment protection” is not included – civil or administrative areas should be selected). In the environmental area, the attorney is compulsory only in extraordinary legal remedies in court procedures. Otherwise, the parties can represent themselves in court procedures (at the regular courts and the Administrative Court). If they do not represent themselves but choose another person to represent them, this latter person should be an attorney or a person who has passed the bar exam. Revision as extraordinary legal remedy at the Supreme Court can only be filed for by an attorney.

The representative of the public interest in an administrative dispute is the State Attorney General.

1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is the possibility of free legal aid assistance under the Legal Aid Act[51] for NGOs with public-interest status in disputes regarding the pursuit of activities in the public interest for which they were established. For individuals, the condition for free legal aid is low incomes of the member of the family. Another condition is that the case is not clearly unreasonable and/or that the applicant in the case is likely to succeed, such that it is reasonable to initiate the proceedings. The free legal aid can cover the costs of the attorney for legal counselling and representation in court procedures, as well as other costs of procedure (Art. 26/5). The attorney can also provide pro bono legal aid: every year the Bar Chamber organises a pro bono day in December. The attorney decides voluntarily to participate on this day or to provide pro bono aid otherwise. The Code of Professional Ethics for Lawyers of the Bar Association of Slovenia imposes a (moral) duty on a lawyer to provide legal assistance to clients. The client's inability to adequately pay for a lawyer's work is not a reason to refuse legal aid in an emergency. Representing and defending the socially disadvantaged is an honourable task of lawyers in the practice of the legal profession. This task should be performed by a lawyer with special understanding. We should say that some pro bono work has been done for NGOs in environmental matters, but it is not usual. Since 2018, free legal advice has also been available to all from the Green Counsel, provided by an NGO[52].

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

The free legal aid can be approved on the basis of application in administrative procedures. Against the decision, the applicant can file a suit with the Administrative Court. All information about free legal aid, the procedure and application is available on the general webpages of the courts[53]. Other pro bono assistance has no formality; it is a personal decision of the individual attorney.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

The free legal aid is approved by the district court which has jurisdiction for the dispute. It considers the seat of the NGO and the place of residence of individuals. The administrative dispute is decided by the Administrative Court. The court has a special service for free legal aid. Pro bono assistance is a matter for arrangement with the attorney.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There is a Bar Association, which has a register of attorneys, but there is no list with specialisation for environmental law listed. Regarding experts, there is no list of such experts, but we can use:

- the list of court experts,
- the list of accredited emission measurement providers listed in the registry of ARSO,
- experts for environmental impact assessments for projects – those who have participated in already finished environmental impact assessment procedures are listed on the webpage of ARSO.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

There is no list of NGOs active in the field, only a register of NGOs with public-interest status in the state business register AJPES (Legal Entity Identifier)[54]. Regarding participants for procedures in the areas of environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, there are relevant NGOs with public-interest status in the areas of environmental protection, nature conservation, spatial planning and cultural heritage protection. The tables below present the NGOs with public-interest status in areas of environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, presented by name. NGOs with public-interest status in the area of cultural heritage protection are less relevant for environmental protection, though they can have limited access to court procedures against a final spatial planning decision (advocating only cultural heritage interests).[55]

Table 1 List of NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" (on 12.3.2020)

| Inštitut za mladinsko participacijo, zdravje in trajnostni razvoj |
| Lutra, Inštitut za ohranjanje naravne dediščine |
| Društvo za ohranitev Udinboršta |
| Ribiška zveza Slovenije |
| Društvo krajinskih arhitekov Slovenije |
| Društvo Planet Zemlja |
| Društvo Ekologi brez meja |
| Društvo previvalcev "Ronket" |
| Inštitut za uporabno ekologijo Maribor |
| Slovenska potapljaška zveza |
| Društvo Proteus, gibanje za naravo in okolje Bela krajina |
| Focus, društvo za sonaraven razvoj |
| Umanotera, Slovenska fundacija za trajnostni razvoj |
| Okoljsko raziskovalni zavod |
| Sobivanje - Društvo za trajnostni razvoj |
| Lovska zveza Slovenije |
| Regionalno okoljsko združenje okoljevarstvenikov, Združenje ROVO |
| Društvo za ohranjanje naravne dediščine |
| Inštitut za politike prostora |
| Slovensko združenje za trajnostno razvoj |
| Društvo za okoljsko vzgojo Evrope v Sloveniji (DOVES - FEE Slovenia) |
| Društvo Bober - Okoljsko gibanje Dolnjeslovenska |
| Pravno-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij - PIC |
| Eko krog - društvo za naravovarstvo in okoljevarstvo |
| Alpe Adria Green, Mednarodno društvo za zaščito okolja in narave |
| Društvo Gibanje za trajnostni razvoj Slovenije - TRS |
| Zveza ekoloških gibanj Slovenije - ZEG |
1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

Justice and Environment.

Some NGOs are also members of other international networks such as the European Environmental Bureau, Climate Action Europe, Friends of the Earth, Justice and Environment.

Table 2 List of NGOs with the status of "public interest – nature conservation" (as of 12.3.2020)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of NGO</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za raziskovanje jam Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jamarska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovensko društvo za zaščito voda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jamarski klub Kamnik</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lutra, Inštitut za ohranjanje naravne dediščine</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo JASA</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ribliška zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Planinska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koroško Šaleški jamarski klub Speleos-Siga Velenje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za raziskovanje jam Simon Robič Domžale</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Planet zemlja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo krajinskih arhitektov Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovensko odonatološko društvo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Forum za Pohorje, združenje za trajnostni razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično okoljsko društvo Slovenj Gradec</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zavod SYMBIOSIS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Proteus, gibanje za naravo in okolje Bela krajina</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko mikološko društvo Ig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za biološko dinamično kmetovanje Podravje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTERSO Integracija ekonomije, razvoja, sociale in okolja, Inštitut za individualno in družbeno odgovornost</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično društvo Barje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIVAMAR – Društvo društvo za trajnostni razvoj morja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko društvo Lisička Maribor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lovska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za preučevanje rib Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično društvo Cer Cerovo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za opazovanje in proučevanje ptic Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prihodnost, društvo za varovanje in ohranjanje naravnega okolja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo ljubiteljev Križne jame</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za okoljsko vzgojo Evrope v Sloveniji (DOVES - FEE Slovenia)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Bober - Okoljsko gibanje Dolenska</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herpetološko društvo - Societas herpetologica slovenica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dondes, Društvo za ohranjanje naravne dediščine Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alpe Adria Green, Mednarodno društvo za zaščito okolja in narave</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko mikološko društvo slovenske Istre</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cipra Slovenija, Društvo za varstvo Alp</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Druščina polharjev &quot;Polh&quot; na Dolenskem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za proučevanje in ohranjanje meduljev Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za raziskovanje jam Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mikološka zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Morigenos - slovensko društvo za morske sesalce</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zveza društev za obvarovanje reke in sonaravni razvoj ob Muri - Moja Mura</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovenska zveza za sokolarstvo in zaščito ptic ujed</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo gobarjev Štorovke-Šentrumar-Hočevidje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jamarski klub Novo mesto</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko mikološko društvo Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za ohranjanje, raziskovanje in trajnostni razvoj Dinardov Dinaricum</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 3 List of NGOs with the status of "public interest – spatial planning" (as of 12.3.2020)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name of NGO</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>DUPPS – Društvo urbanistov in prostorskih planerjev Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kulturno društvo Prostorož</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Estetika - Društvo za vzpodobanje etike v prostoru</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inštitut za politike prostora</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo PazilPark</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo krajinskih arhitektov Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo arhitektov Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Združenje FIABCI</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Center arhitekture Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DESSA Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kulturno društvo MOTA</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

Greenpeace – office in Slovenia (Društvo Prihodnost)

WWF Adria – office in Zagreb also covers Slovenia

CIPRA – CIPRA Slovenia

BirdLife - BirdLife Slovenia (Društvo za opazovanje in proučevanje ptic)

Friends of the Earth (via the office of Focus Association for Sustainable Development).

Some NGOs are also members of other international networks such as the European Environmental Bureau, Climate Action Europe, Friends of the Earth, Justice and Environment.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures
1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

- 15 days, according to the General Administrative Procedure Act.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

According to the General Administrative Procedure Act, the organ must generally decide within 30 days or at least within 60 days. There are some special provisions for certain environmental procedures in other acts (e.g. the Environmental protection Act), but in those cases the decision period is even longer.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

It is possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court when the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning is the first-level administrative organ and in environmental liability procedures.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

Generally, no. The court should decide without unnecessary delay, according to court order. But for certain procedures (environmental consent and environment permission), the Environmental Protection Act demands the court decisions in three months.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

In the administrative procedure, the evidence should be submitted at the same time as an application is submitted. It can be submitted later if there are certain reasons for it, or other if parties claim something different and there is a need for further evidence. In the court procedure, evidence should be submitted by filing the suit or until the end of the first hearing (civil procedures). Since there is usually no hearing at the Administrative Court, the last opportunity for submitting evidence is by answering the official response of the opposing party. The party can submit the evidence later if it can reasonably justify not presenting it sooner.

All written documentation is sent to other parties in the procedure and usually there is not less than 15 days to answer in administrative procedures and 30 days in court procedures.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Generally, the appeal against an administrative decision by the second-instance authority always has suspensive effect, except when a specific Act stipulates otherwise. An appeal against a final administrative decision (the suit with the Administrative Court) does not have this effect, unless provided for by a (special) law. Only when the specific Act defines that certain decision can be effective only after the final court decision (or after the period for filing the suit and nobody does this).

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

Injunctive relief is possible in first-instance administrative procedures. This is implemented in the form of a temporary decision and primarily relates to the time “during” the procedure. There are no specific provisions about injunctive relief in environmental procedures.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

In the administrative procedure, a proposal for a temporary injunction is possible during the first-instance procedure. The law does not stipulate specific conditions.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Immediate execution irrespective of the appeal is possible if a specific Act defines this in regard to a certain decision. The general rule under the General Administrative Procedure Act also allows a verbal decision in the case of measures necessary in the public interest, and the authority can decide that the appeal does not have suspensive effect.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Generally, challenging the administrative decision before the court does not suspend the decision, but for certain decisions the Act can determine suspensive effect (e.g. environmental consent, environment permission).

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

In the administrative procedure, a temporary injunction is not conditional on the financial deposit. The local courts are competent to provide injunctive relief according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act. Initially the interested party has to pay the costs of the procedure in advance. Appeal against the order on injunction relief is allowed.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.?

When we calculate costs, there is a distinction between whether a person or an NGO is a party in the administrative procedure (and then challenges the administrative decision at the Administrative Court or, in civil procedure, at the regular court (against polluters)).

Free legal aid (described in section 1.6.) is available only for court procedures. It is available for natural persons with low income and for NGOs with public-interest status. If the case is lost, the costs of the opposing party are not covered.

The general framework for calculating costs is as follows:

In administrative procedures (as a party in the procedure) natural persons with low income and NGOs with public-interest status (in matters concerning their area of public interest) are excused of taxes.

In the case of challenging an administrative decision at the Administrative Court, there is a court tax (148 EUR), which is returned if the plaintiff is successful (Court Fees Act[56]). There is no significant risk for the costs of the opposing party, because the procedure at the Administrative Court is mostly without hearing, not long and the State Attorney’s Office is entitled to reimbursement of costs in accordance with the Attorney tariff.

In the case of filing a suit with the regular court, there is an obligation to pay the court tax according to the Court Fees Act[57] and in consideration of the value of each case (rules for determining the value are regulated in the Contentious Civil Procedure Act);

The costs of attorneys are regulated in the Attorney Tariff[58] and calculated case by case, depending also on the timeframe of the procedure (a longer procedure can be expected than in standard civil cases), the number of legal remedies, hearings, filed papers. The different tasks are evaluated with points, each point being 0.6 EUR, and the number of points depends also on the value of the case;

The costs for experts cannot be estimated in advance but only on a case-by-case basis. We can expect that an expert institution should be engaged in a particular case. There are different sums in relation to the complexity or volume of materials to study.

We have to be aware that there is no average environmental case as a basis for calculating the average costs. There is a considerable difference between an administrative dispute (the opposing party is a state body) and an environmental request at the regular (local or district) courts (the opposing party is a poluter). It depends also on the length of the whole procedure up to the final solution. It may be that the same case proceeds two or three times at the Administrative Court in the same administrative procedure. And similarly for cases at the regular courts (one case against polluters lasted 20 years from filing. of the suit up to the final decision). We can conclude that middle-income individuals or NGOs can afford the administrative procedure and administrative disputes, but taking an environmental lawsuit to the regular courts would be very risky for the same plaintiffs.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?
The court fee should be paid for the procedure (74 EUR); for other deposits, the court decides from case to case. It depends on measures which need to be executed during the process.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
Free legal aid is available for natural persons with low income.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?
Free legal aid is available only to NGOs with public-interest status in matters concerning their area of public interest and to legal persons under certain (limited) circumstances. Free legal aid is explained under 1.6.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
There are no other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance.

6) Does the 'loser party pays' principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?
The "loser party pays" principle applies. There are no rules about exceptions in environmental cases. But there are some additional rules for administrative disputes:
Parties shall always be billed for costs incurred through their own fault, as well as costs incurred by any chance occurrence affecting the party. If the court granted the action and annulled the administrative act contested in the administrative dispute, or established the illegality of the contested administrative act, the lump sum of costs shall be reimbursed to the plaintiff with respect to the performed procedural actions and the method by which the administrative dispute was processed, in compliance with the rules on the reimbursement of expenses to plaintiffs in administrative disputes.[59] The determined amount shall be paid by the defendant. If shared costs arise in the case the court shall decide what proportion of the costs each party shall bear.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?
Yes, explained under the previous question.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?
There is no official website with rules on environmental access to justice. There is only information about conditions and the process for NGOs with public-interest status. However, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning encourages NGOs to generate such information. Currently all relevant information is available on the [Environmental Defenders website][60].

1.7.5. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC
There is a general rule of free access to all environmental information, and each authority is also obliged to publish basic information about the environment and relevant procedures. The obligation is based on the Public Information Access Act[61] and the Environmental Protection Act. The [Information Commissioner][62] ensures free access to information.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?
There is no system for providing procedural information. Anyone can address the competent authority with a request for access to information.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?
There is information on the websites of the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and the Slovenian Environment Agency, but mostly focused on providing investors with useful information and less on informing members of the public concerned about access to justice. However, the ministry supports NGOs in spreading this information (call for tenders for NGOs). There is no other active dissemination of information on access to justice.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?
Every administrative or court decision has instructions about possible legal remedies against it.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
There are no specific rules about translation for any foreign participants in environmental procedures. There are only general rules for the court procedure (described in section 1.4., 4th question). In administrative procedures, all written documentation and hearings are in Slovene (except in the case of Italian and Hungarian minorities), but if participants do not know the language, they have the right to participate in the procedure with the help of a translator. The authority is obliged to inform them of this, but the costs of the translator must be borne by the party who needs translation.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
All applications for screening decisions and the subsequent decisions are published on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency. There is no public consultation, and there are no provisions that would enable natural or legal persons or NGOs to be party to the procedure. Only NGOs with the status "public interest – environmental protection" can file a complaint against a negative screening decision, within 15 days after the decision is published. However, persons who can demonstrate legal interest are not expressly excluded and it is possible that the court would support their claim for standing (on the basis of CJEU decision C 570-13). The Administrative Court also decided that the NGO can be a party in the screening decision.[82]

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no provisions for participation in the scoping phase. After the screening decision, the application for environmental consent, the impact assessment report and the draft administrative decision have been published, there is an open public consultation period of 30 days.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?
NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" and those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can become a party in the procedure if they announce it within 35 days from the beginning of the public consultation (the authority invites them through a public announcement). This means the interested party should send an application for joining the procedure and present its arguments in the matter at the same time. The competent authority decides about the standing of the party – the decision can be challenged. If the decision is positive, then the interested person or NGO has a right to challenge the final EIA decision at the Administrative Court (if EIA is carried out as an integral procedure together with building permission, otherwise there is first a complaint to the second-instance administrative authority and then a challenge at the Administrative Court).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?
Legal or natural persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area and NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" have the right to be a party in the procedure and can therefore then challenge the EIA decision (assuming the decision of the authority to accept someone as a party is positive).

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?
There are no specific rules for EIA judicial review. General rules are applicable (see under 1.3., 4th question), and substantive and procedural legality can be reviewed.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?
When the competent authority adopts the final decision.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in the EIA procedure.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness of court procedures.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question). The deadline for appealing against a negative EIA screening decision is 15 days from the day the decision is published on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency. In the EIA procedure, if the Slovenian Environment Agency is the deciding authority, there are also 15 days to appeal against a final EIA decision. If the deciding authority is the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning (integral procedure), there are 30 days after the decision is published on the website to begin the administrative dispute. There is also provision for the Administrative Court to decide within 3 months in EIA cases.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief in an EIA procedure. There are only general rules (see under 1.7.2.).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice?
The Slovenian Environment Agency, as the competent authority for environmental permits, publishes the application for an environmental permit, BAT reference documents and drafts of the administrative decision for public consultation of 30 days. Within 35 days of public announcement, the parties that have standing can file a request to be a party in the procedure (Article 73 of the Environmental Protection Act).

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
In accordance with the Environmental Protection Act, legal or natural persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area and NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" have the right to be a party in the procedure and can therefore then challenge the environmental permit decision if they do so within 35 days from the beginning of public consultation. Legal standing may be recognised by the Administrative Court if the person demonstrates legal interest according to the general rules of administrative procedure (Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act on protecting personal benefits based on the Act or other regulations).

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no special provisions other than those explained under the previous question.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no special provisions other than those explained under question 2.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" and those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can become a party in the procedure if they announce it within 35 days from the beginning of the public consultation (the authority invites them through the public announcement). This means the interested party should send an application for joining the procedure and present its arguments in the matter at the same time. The competent authority decides whether to allow standing as a party – the decision can be challenged. If the decision is positive, then the interested person or NGO has the right to appeal the final decision about the environmental permit to the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and to challenge the ministry’s decision at the Administrative Court.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
Only those referred to under the 2nd question above have standing.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
There are no specific rules for the environmental permit judicial review. General rules are applicable (see under 1.3., 4th question), but both substantive and procedural legality can be challenged.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
It is challengeable at the final stage of the environmental permit decision.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in the environmental permit procedure.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness in the court procedure.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question), but there is a provision in the Environmental Protection Act that the Administrative Court should decide within 3 months.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief in the IED procedure. There are only general rules (see under 1.7.2.).

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
It is provided by publishing the documents relating to a particular permit on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency for public consultation. In the announcement of the public consultation, there are also details of who can apply to join the procedure, and the timeframe for such.
1.8.3. Environmental liability

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

Legal or natural persons who are or could be affected by the environmental damage and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” can be a party in the environmental remediation procedure. In such cases, they can challenge administrative decisions at the Administrative Court.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

30 days after receiving the decision of the Slovenian Environment Agency.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

Information about the existence of environmental damage should be presented. The Slovenian Environment Agency initiates the procedure if the probability of environmental damage is proven.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific requirements.

5) Is there a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

If legal or natural persons or NGOs with public-interest status are a party in the procedure, the environment agency receives the decision as a party in the procedure. Otherwise, there is no notification obligation.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

The MS applies an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The Slovenian Environment Agency.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

The administrative decision about the environmental remediation can be directly challenged at the Administrative Court.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

Other countries can be involved in the procedure of the strategic environmental assessment and the environmental impact assessment. If the plan or project could significantly impact on other countries, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning or the Slovenian Environment Agency informs them, as a minimum in the phase of strategic environmental assessment, of the draft plan or project and the environmental report or environmental impact assessment report, and gives them time to answer whether they are interested in participating. The competent authority of the other country can decide if it wants to participate in the procedure within time limits determined by the national ministry. If it decides to participate, the authorities of both countries agree on the period for opinions and comments, or on other forms of consultation. The Ministry then defines the period for domestic public participation in a timeframe agreed with the other country (if it is longer than 30 days). The Ministry sends the opinions of the other country to the authority that is preparing the plan. In EIA procedure, the Ministry is obliged to explain how it has taken into consideration the opinions of the other country.

The same rules are valid for environmental permits (under the Industrial Emissions Directive) if the facility could have cross-border impacts.

2) Notion of public concerned?

There are no provisions about the concerned public. It is assumed that the other country informs their public.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

There are no provisions about NGOs of the affected country.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

There are no specific provisions about individuals. Generally, persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can be a party in the procedure for the environmental permitting.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The information is provided together with the decision of the affected country if it has an interest in participating in the strategic environmental assessment and the environmental impact assessment.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

There are no provisions.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

There are no provisions.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

There are no provisions in the Environmental Protection Act. Since these are administrative procedures, the rules on administrative procedures can be applied (see under 1.4., q.4).

9) Any other relevant rules?

There are no other relevant rules.

[1] https://www.gov.si/drzavni-organji/organji-v-sestavi/agencija-za-okolje/ (there is ongoing transfer of the official websites to a new platform and the process is not complete yet); the old page is here.

[2] http://www.pisrs.si/Pis.web/ - in the right menu there are also some acts translated into English; in the upper right corner there is an option for translation of the page into different languages.

Determining the Intervention Measures to Mitigate and Remedy the Consequences of the COVID-19 Epidemic (Official Gazette RS, 80/20), which are being challenged at the Constitutional Courts with regard to the new conditions for NGOs with the status of public interest to have the right to participate in integral procedure.

[52] Legal-informational center for NGOs. Slovenia (Pravno-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij – PIC) offers this service on the webpage Environmental defenders as project activity financed by the Ministry for the environment and spatial planning and Eko fund.

[53] This is a project activity financed by the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and the Eco Fund.

[55] There are 114 such NGOs in the register of APJES as of 12.3.2020.

[60] Only in Slovene language for now; the page is managed by the Legal-Informational Centre for NGOs (Pravno-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij – PIC).

[63] See also case G-529/15.

Last update: 22/07/2021
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is a general rule – an article which protects the constitutional right to a healthy environment – Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act: “In order to exercise the right to a healthy living environment, citizens may, as individuals or through societies, associations and organisations, file a request with a court that the person responsible for an activity affecting the environment should terminate the activity if it causes, or would cause, an excessive environmental burden or presents, or would present, an imminent threat to human life or health, or that the person responsible for the activity affecting the environment should be prohibited from starting the activity if there is a high probability that the activity will cause such consequences.”

This Article, individuals and NGOs of any kind can initiate a court procedure (regular court) against anyone (private company, state or local authorities) for acts or omissions that cause harm. There are no other provisions that would set timeframes or other conditions. There have been a few court cases based on this article. One such case, which was won, concerned the Zasavje valley farmers (mentioned in footnote 28). Usually the legal grounds for such a suit would be Article 133 and/or 134 of the Civil Code together with the above-mentioned Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act. The judges of the courts of general jurisdiction are as well informed about environment protection as their colleagues at the Administrative Court. Other options outside EIA, IED and ELD lie in nature protection: NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” can defend nature interests in all administrative and administrative disputes in the way determined by the law. Such an NGO has to be a party in an administrative procedure in which a permit is given to be able to appeal and/or file a court claim.

NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation / spatial planning / culture heritage protection” can file an action against some spatial plans with the Administrative Court: any person enjoys the same such right if the spatial plan affects any of this person’s other rights.

There are also some protective instruments in civil law connected with the environment:

Law of Property Code[2] (Articles 75 and 99): Any disturbances from neighbours’ property that exceed the normal level (nuisance) are prohibited. The owner of the disturbed property may bring the action against the owner of property that causes the nuisance. Compensation can be claimed.

Obligations Code[3] (Articles 133): Any person may request that another person removes a source of danger that might cause major damage to them or other persons, and the court shall order appropriate measures to prevent the occurrence of damage or disturbance. This is also the case if the damage arises from activities that are in the public interest and have all permits (though compensation for such damage can be claimed only for the proportion exceeding the customary thresholds). This Article is “connected” with Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act. In environmental matters, it can sometimes be useful to use Article 134 of the Obligations Code: in the case of violation of individuality, personal or family life or any other personal right, anyone can request that the court orders such action to be prevented or the consequences to be eliminated.

The Administrative Court can also be the court competent for protecting constitutional human rights in the case of violation by acts of state or local authorities where there is no other court competent for such protection (Administrative Dispute Act, Article 4).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative procedure and of the administrative dispute covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
This condition has to be fulfilled only in the case of challenging a spatial plan at the Administrative Court.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
In the case of challenging a spatial plan, there are limited aspects of the spatial plan that can be challenged (e.g. provisions related to land use).

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to 'equality of arms in the national jurisdiction'?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness of court proceedings.

7) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question).

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.).

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
There are no specific cost rules besides those described under 1.7.3. The 'losing party pays' principle applies together with additional rules explained under point 6 of section 1.7.3. There are no provisions against costs being prohibitive. A party should refer directly to Article 9(4) of the Aarhus Convention and the grounds of Article 8 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (ratified and published treaties are to be applied directly) to potentially obtain a better position regarding costs in the given procedure.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC [4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
There are no provisions that would enable NGOs or individuals to have standing for administrative review or challenge in the SEA procedure. But as the Nature Conservation Act enables NGOs with the status of "public interest – nature conservation" to represent nature conservation interests in all administrative and court procedures, one NGO with this status succeeded in becoming a party in an SEA procedure ([5] Administrative Court case II U 145/2016) after being rejected by the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning. After that case, NGOs with the status of "public interest – nature conservation / environmental protection" are allowed to be a party in SEA procedures. There is no procedural timeframe for applying to be a party in the procedure, but after the ministry’s decision that an SEA will be performed, it would be appropriate to participate from the earliest phases of the procedure. For individuals, it could be used as a general rule for being a party according to the General Administrative Procedure Act (Article 43 – explained under the section 1.4., 1st question), since the SEA procedure is an administrative procedure. Against negative SEA screening decisions or omission of decisions in a screening procedure, we do not yet have any practice or court decisions, but some rules could be used:
the rules about standing described above in relation to negative SEA screening decisions;
the rules about standing described above in relation to challenging omissions at the Administrative Court (Article 4 of the Administrative Dispute Act).
If the case comes before the Administrative Court, the court consistently follows the judgments of the CJEU.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The scope of the administrative procedure and of the administrative dispute covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
There is no need to participate in the public consultation procedure. However, a person/NGO has to be a party in the SEA procedure to have standing before the Administrative Court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described in section 1.7.2.). But temporary relief would be in place as a result of challenging the final SEA decision.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
In the case of challenging SEA decisions at the Administrative Court, the court fee has to be paid (148 EUR). The amount is returned in the case of success. There is a general rule that the procedure should be carried out at the lowest costs possible (Article 11 of the Contentious Civil Procedure Act). There are no other safeguarding rules against costs being prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC [5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
There are provisions for public participation (environmental plans/programmes, spatial plans, nature conservation plans/programmes, water management programmes and others), but no provisions for protecting this right. This is a weakness of the Slovenian legal system with respect to the Aarhus Convention. There is no “direct” way of obtaining an administrative review or challenging the final decision about a plan/programme before a court. There are two possible options:
if the plan or programme is adopted as a general legal act, it could be challenged at the Constitutional Court (conformity with the Constitution);
if not, it could be challenged at the Administrative Court as an act or omission of the state or local authority (Administrative Dispute Act, Article 4, see under 2.1., 1st question). Legal standing can be granted to NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” and to environmental protection NGOs or individuals on the basis of Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act if legal interest can be demonstrated; the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits. The legal benefits should be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The scope would be only if public consultation was enabled or not, thus if the requests of the Aarhus Convention were met.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? If there is an administrative procedure for the plan, the administrative review procedures should be exhausted.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is obligation to participate in the prior participation process when using a legal remedy in the spatial planning process (filing a suit with the Administrative Court against a spatial plan) – this is the only provision of such kind in the Spatial Planning Act (Article 58).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.). But temporary relief would be in place as a result of challenging the plan or programme.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? There is no court fee for going to the Constitutional Court. For the Administrative Court, there is a court fee (148 EUR), which is returned in the case of success.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[6]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? It depends on who adopts the decision and in what legal form:

if it is a law (act) or an executive regulation (decree, ordinance, ruling), see explanation in section 2.5., 1st question;
if it is an administrative decision, there are legal remedies in the administrative procedure and then the administrative dispute at the Administrative Court. Legal standing can be granted to NGOs with the status of "public interest – nature conservation" for representing nature conservation interests. For other NGOs and individuals, legal standing can be granted on the basis of Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act if legal interest can be demonstrated (the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits, which should be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation).

CJEU case law contributes much to effective access to national courts and definitely expands the right to access to justice in practice. There can be a situation where a particular plan is adopted by governmental decision (but not as a general legal act) but the plan/programme is not legally binding. There are two options:

- to initiate the court procedure at the regular court to defend the constitutional right to a healthy environment (on the basis of Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act – see explanation in section 2.1., 1st question);
- less probably, to challenge the decision at the Administrative Court as an act of a national or local authority.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)? As explained under the 1st question above and under section 2.5.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? There are no provisions and cases yet.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? There are no provisions.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There are no provisions except in the case of spatial plans. To initiate the administrative dispute, the NGO with the status of "public interest – spatial planning / environmental protection / nature conservation / cultural heritage protection" must have previously participated in the procedure with comments.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There are no provisions. In the case of Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act, there are no grounds/arguments precluded.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? There is only a general rule about fairness of court procedures.

8) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation? There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question).

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.).

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? There are general rules, described in section 1.7.3., 1st question.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[7]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? There are three options for challenging executive regulations:

Laws and their executive regulations are a general legal act. As such they can be challenged only at the Constitutional Court. According to Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act (explanation in section 1.4., 3rd question), legal standing is granted to anyone who demonstrates a legal interest in the review of the constitutonality or legality of regulations. There is no difference in the standing of NGOs, NGOs with public-interest status or other legal or natural persons – all must justify the reasons for direct intervention in executive regulations with their rights, legal interests or legal position. There are other limitations only for executive regulations: a) generally they can be challenged within 1 year after their enforcement or after the day the petitioner learns of the occurrence of harmful consequences; b) all legal remedies should be exhausted (usually meaning challenging the individual act issued on the basis of the executive regulation) – this is a general opinion of the Constitutional Court adopted in many of its decisions.

The general legal act can be challenged also at the Administrative Court if it regulates individual relationships[8]. The 30 day limit for filing the suit to the court should be respected. If there is an individual administrative decision issued on the basis of the executive regulation, the administrative procedure has to be exhausted before going to the Administrative Court.

There is a third, indirect option: if a decision is based on an executive regulation which the claimant considers to be illegal, they can challenge the decision and, if the court agrees, it will refuse to use the illegal regulation as is bound only by the Constitution and the law (excepto illegalis). The decision about illegality is binding only in the actual case, but it sends a strong signal to the administration and more often than not the administrative decision is altered as a result of the decision. The Administrative Court makes use of this relatively often.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The review of the Constitutional Court is focused on violation of the provisions of the Constitution. Also, the Administrative Court is focused on the legality of the challenged act. This can cover both procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Yes, as explained above under the 1st question.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

A temporary injunction is only possible at the Constitutional Court. At the Administrative Court, a temporary injunction is usually proposed regarding execution regulations. Other injunctive relief is possible (general rules described under 1.7.2.)

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

At the Constitutional Court, there are no costs (court fees). At the Administrative Court, there is the court fee (148 EUR), which is returned in the case of success.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge against a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[9]

There are no provisions in national legislation regarding such situations and article 267 TFEU. Courts are obliged to take CJEU decisions into consideration and plaintiffs often refer to certain cases. The Supreme Court and the Administrative Court practise preliminary ruling procedures. All courts follow the recommendations for national courts on the use of preliminary ruling procedures. Plaintiffs are free to propose that the court initiate a preliminary ruling procedure.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters
[4] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[5] See findings under ACC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[6] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to in Commission Notice C/2017 /2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[7] Such acts fall within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoeksewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774
[8] This was the case of challenging the governmental ordinance that ordered the shooting of a certain number of bears and wolves. NGOs with the status of 'public interest – nature conservation / environment protection' challenged the ordinance with regard to wolves at the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court rejected the review with the explanation that the disputable annex of the ordinance is so individualised that the court was not competent for such a decision. The ordinance was then annulled at the Administrative Court.
[9] For an example of such a preliminary reference, see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoeksewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774

Last update: 22/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

National rules on silence of the administration:

According to the Administrative Procedure Act (Article 222), in the event that the competent authority against whose decision an appeal is allowed fails to issue a decision and present it to the party in due time, the party shall have the right of appeal as if their claim had been refused. If the second-instance administrative authority fails to issue a decision, according to the Administrative Dispute Act (Article 28), the administrative dispute can be initiated within 30 days after the administrative authority has failed to issue a decision within 7 days after the future plaintiffs’ special request.

There are no penalties for exceeding time limits of administrative decisions or to provide effective access to justice. Complying with a judgement – there can be two situations:
If the court decision specifies that the defendant should make a payment or perform an action, the execution procedure according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act applies;

If the court finds that there has been a violation of certain rights or annuls certain individual acts or general acts and orders the competent body to issue the decision within a certain time, there are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it fails to comply with the court decision. A new suit should be filed with the court to challenge this omission/failure.

Last update: 22/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Slovenia
To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 05/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of the environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

The protection of a healthy environment is a constitutional right, although not in the chapter of human rights, but nevertheless recognised as such. The legislative body is the National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, which consists of the elected deputies. The National Council of the Republic of Slovenia (as the lower chamber of the Slovenian Parliament) consists of members who represent local and functional interests. The executive power is exercised through the Government – the president and ministers are elected by the National Assembly. There are 16 ministries. For the environment, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and its bodies are competent (bodies under the ministry: the Slovenian Environment Agency[1], the Inspectorate for the Environment and Spatial Planning, the Surveying and Mapping Authority, the Slovenian Nuclear Safety Administration, the Slovenian Water Agency). For nature conservation, there is the Institute of the Republic of Slovenia for Nature Conservation. The Government can adopt decrees and ordinances; the ministers can adopt rulings as binding general legal acts. On the local level, there are 212 local communities (main bodies are the mayor and the community council). There is no regional level in this organisation in Slovenia. Legislation is presented in a legal information system[2].

As a party to the Aarhus convention, Slovenia granted the right to the ombudsman, to affected natural and legal persons, and to NGOs working in the public interest in certain areas (environmental protection, nature conservation, spatial planning). The conditions under which these individuals or organisations have legal standing are defined in environmental legislation. Apart from the subjects mentioned above, anyone can pursue their rights at the Constitutional Court, provided they can demonstrate legal interest.

2) Constitution – presenting main provisions on the environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights (content of + including references)

The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia[3] declares that everyone has the right to a healthy living environment in accordance with the law and that the state shall promote a healthy living environment (Article 72). Also, everyone has the right to safe drinking water (Article 70a). The manner in which property is acquired and enjoyed shall be established by law so as to ensure its economic, social, and environmental function (Article 67). Ratified and published treaties shall be applied directly (Article 8) and Slovenia is a party to the Aarhus convention.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Environmental legislation is extensive and frequently changing. Through strategic environmental assessments (SEAs) and environmental impact assessments (EIAs), it is connected with spatial planning and construction permission regulation. All legislation is presented in the legal informational system of the Republic of Slovenia. There is also some legislation translated into English, but mostly it is not fully accurate. Access to justice is defined in the Environmental Protection Act, the Nature Conservation act, the Spatial Planning Act and the Building Act.

The Environmental Protection Act[4] is a basic act for the overall protection of the environment in Slovenia. It regulates horizontal common instruments and principles such as: the basic principles of environmental protection, environmental protection measures, strategic documents for environmental protection, strategic environmental assessment (according to the SEA Directive), environmental impact assessment and environmental consent (according to the EIA Directive), environmental permits (according to the IED), environmental monitoring and environmental information collection, emission trading, liability for environmental damage (according to the ELD), competent bodies in the areas of environmental protection, NGOs and their role in procedures and inspection. Access to justice is defined as a general right to exercise the constitutional right to a healthy environment (Article 14 – right to act against polluters) and as a right for a defined circle of affected persons and NGOs with the status of ‘public interest – environmental protection’ (complaint against negative EIA screening decision, party in EIA procedure, IED procedure and environmental liability procedure). The Government of the Republic of Slovenia determines the thresholds for emissions and most of the executive regulation for administering the areas listed above with decrees.

According to the Environmental Protection Act, the National Programme for Environmental Protection is the national programme constituting the framework for environmental protection in Slovenia and is adopted by the National Assembly[5] for a certain period (it also includes the Nature Conservation Plan as per the Nature Conservation Act and the National Water Plan as per the Waters Act).

The Nature Conservation Act[6] transposed the Convention on Biological Diversity into Slovenian legislation. It establishes biodiversity conservation measures (protection of wild plant and animal species, including their genetic material, their habitats and ecosystems) and the system for the protection of valuable natural features in order to contribute to nature conservation. It regulates:

different types of protected areas: a habitat type, an ecologically important area, an area of special protection (the Natura 2000 areas are determined and regulated by the Decree on special protection areas (Natura 2000 areas)[7]), landscape;

measures for the protection of species and their habitats; the executive regulation is adopted by the government (in the form of decrees, according to the Habitats and Birds Directive);
instruments for assessment of the environmental acceptability of plans and programmes (appropriate assessment for plans is carried out within the strategic environmental impact assessment and appropriate assessment of activities affecting nature is carried out within the environmental impact assessment, if this is carried out, otherwise separately);

nature conservation permit;

competent bodies for nature conservation;

conditions for NGOs to obtain the status of “public interest – nature conservation” and their rights (the right to represent interests of nature conservation in all administrative procedures and disputes);

inspection.

The Waters Act[8] lays down basic water regulations (it also transposes the Water Framework Directive). It emphasises that water is a public good. The Act introduces the institute of ‘right on water’ (obtaining permission for special use of water, for example, fish farms, irrigation and hydroelectric power plants) and water consent (as a permit for intervention in the area of a certain water by influencing the water regime). In order to protect drinking water, protected water areas are defined, in which the disposal of waste, the use of fertilisers and other actions are prohibited. Water management is defined in more detail by the specific water management plans. The Water Act also defines the basic principles of water management. The highest strategic national water management plan is a national programme (adopted by the National Assembly for a maximum of 12 years). The water management plans include the implementing action plans. There are no special provisions for legal standing for NGOs or individuals in the administrative procedures related to water, therefore the general rules for legal standing in administrative procedure apply.

There are other important acts related to environmental protection, among them: the Act on Forests[9]; the Game and Hunting Act[10], the Animal Protection Act[11], the Underground Cave Protection Act[12], the Mining Act[13], the Ionising Radiation Protection and Nuclear Safety Act[14], the Triglav National Park Act[15], the Management of Genetically Modified Organisms Act[16], the Chemicals Act[17]; and others which fall under the competence of different ministries.

Where spatial planning and construction permission has an impact on the environment, the strategic environmental assessment and environmental impact assessment are carried out within the procedure of spatial planning or construction permission. The Spatial Planning Act[18] provides access to justice regarding spatial plans, and the Building Act[19] does so in the part where the environmental impact assessment is integrated into the building permits procedure.

4) Examples of national case-law and the role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The Supreme Court has no special or particular role in environmental matters. It acts as a second-instance court of the Administrative Court, if the complaint is allowed, and for revision in cases of extraordinary appeal. It also decides on jurisdiction matters between the Administrative Court and the courts of general jurisprudence.

The core of case law (on the initiative of the NGOs) is generated by environmental impact assessments (the EIA Directive), appropriate assessments (the Habitats Directive), environmental permits (the IED), environmental liability (the ELD), water permits, nature conservation permits and spatial planning at the Administrative Court.[20] Several cases were initiated not only because of opposition to the content of the administrative decision, but also because of recognition of standing in the administrative procedure for NGOs that was not recognised or rejected. At regular court there are civil claims for compensation and for termination of harmful practices or emissions.[21] There are also many cases concerning review of the constitutionality and legality of regulations and general acts, constitutional complaints for violation of human rights and with individual acts.[22]

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

According to Article 8 of the Constitution, ratified agreements shall be applied directly, therefore you can also directly rely on international environmental agreements, especially in matters where they are not correctly transposed or transposed at all into national law (besides the national end EU transposing regulation). It is also important that you rely on international agreements in the administrative procedure in order to build up the case for a potential procedure before the Administrative Court, and later the Constitutional Court in the potential case of human rights violation.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Generally, there are three levels in the Slovenian court system: 44 local and 11 district courts on the first level, 4 higher courts on the second, and the Supreme Court as the third instance. There are also specialised courts: the Labour and Social Court and the Administrative Court. The vast majority of environmental cases are dealt with by the Administrative Court, which has status equal to the second level courts. The rest of the cases are dealt with by the courts of general jurisdiction (on the first level by local or district courts). In the event that appeal against the Administrative Court’s decision is allowed, the second instance is the Supreme Court.

The Constitutional Court is the highest judicial authority for the protection of constitutionality, legality, human rights and fundamental freedoms. Also, there is a State Prosecutor General as part of the general justice system and as an independent state authority.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Courts Act[23] defines the jurisdiction of local, district, high courts and the Supreme Court. The Administrative Dispute Act[24] defines jurisdiction of the Administrative Courts, and the Labour and Social Courts Act[25] defines jurisdiction of the Labour and Social Courts. The Administrative Court is competent for judicial protection of the rights and legal interests of individuals and organisations in decisions and actions of state authorities, local community authorities and bearers of public authority - administrative decisions and (legality) of individual acts and actions with which authorities have encroached on the human rights and fundamental freedoms of an individual, unless a different form of judicial protection has been guaranteed (Articles 1 and 4). The core procedural act is the Civil Procedures Act[26] It sets out the rules for resolving conflicts or uncertainties regarding jurisdiction. The addressed court assesses its jurisdiction according to the statements in the suit and its own findings. If it establishes that another body (like arbitration) is competent for the case, or that the case is not of Slovenian court jurisdiction, it dismisses the suit. If it establishes that the case falls within another court’s jurisdiction, it stops the procedure and sends the case to the other court. The high court has jurisdiction for resolving disputes about jurisdiction among (regular) courts, and the Supreme Court resolves disputes about jurisdiction among lower courts.

There is also the Arbitration Act[27] which defines sets out rules on arbitration in Slovenia. The district court in Ljubljana has jurisdiction in relation to some concerns regarding the arbitration agreement: admissibility of the arbitral proceedings, the appointment or exclusion of an arbitrator, the award for the arbiter, the declaration of enforceability of domestic and recognition of foreign arbitral awards. The appeal against the court decision can be lodged with the Supreme Court. But the subject of arbitration agreement can only be pecuniary claims, and other claims only if the parties can agree on them.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges
There are no specialised courts for environmental disputes. Most environmental cases are processed by the Administrative Court, since there are a lot of disputes regarding decisions of state institutions in administrative procedures. There are some specialised judges for environmental and spatial planning cases, but not as a separate organisational unit. There are no laypersons contributing; the process is led by the senate of three judges or one judge. A minority of environmental disputes are processed before regular (local or district) courts – these are civil suits against polluters. There are no specialised judges for the legal area of the environment.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

The Administrative Court is not bound by the legal grounds of the request of the plaintiff, but to the factual claims set out in the lawsuit. Each party proposes evidence for their requests, but the court decides which evidence will be used. The Administrative Court is not bound by the proposals of the parties and may hear any evidence which could contribute to resolution of the case.

If the court grants the claim of the plaintiff, it can decide to:
abolish the administrative decision and return the case to the administrative level (this is the most commonly the case);
abolish the administrative decision and decide about the matter; this occurs if the case has a solid base in facts, and especially if a new administrative procedure would cause irreparable damage to the plaintiff (this is never the case in environmental matters).

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Administrative bodies, defined by the State Administration Act[28], are: ministries, bodies/institutions within the ministry and administration units. For environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, the following institutions are relevant:
- the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning;
- bodies within the ministry: the Slovenian Environment Agency[29], the Inspectorate for the Environment and Spatial Planning, the Surveying and Mapping Authority, the Slovenian Nuclear Safety Administration, the Slovenian Water Agency;
- the Institute of the Republic of Slovenia for Nature Conservation;
- administrative units, which are the basic building blocks of the administrative system covering geographical areas.

The first level of administrative decision-making can be undertaken by all the institutions above, depending on the type of permit/consent. Usually or most commonly, the first level is covered by administrative units or bodies within the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning, and the second level (appeal instance) is the ministry itself.

2) How can one appeal an administrative decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Against the final decision at administrative level, a suit can be filed with the Administrative Court in accordance with the Administrative Dispute Act[30]. The court can be filed by the plaintiff, and representation by attorney is not a necessary condition. The court fee should be paid (148 EUR), and is returned to the plaintiff if they are successful. There is a possibility for the court to decide without a hearing. The average time for a decision is approximately one year.

The administrative body (a state institution) as a defendant is represented by the State Attorney’s Office.

The procedural rules are set out in the Administrative Dispute Act and in the Contentious Civil Procedures Act.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There is no special environmental court.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

In administrative procedures, except where the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning decides as first-instance body, complaint is possible (within 15 days) unless it is specifically excluded (for example, in environmental liability proceedings). The Ministry carries out the second-instance administrative procedure regarding the complaint and issue the decision. The administrative procedure is regulated by the General Administrative Procedure Act[31].

Where complaint is not possible, administrative dispute at the Administrative Court is allowed.

Against the final decision (judgment) of the Administrative Court, appeal to the Supreme Court is possible. According to the Administrative Dispute Act, this is the case only where the court determines different facts than the administrative body (defendant) and changes the administrative decision on this ground on its own motion, or finds out that the decision or action of the administrative body is illegal. In the judgment, the Administrative Court defines if appeal is allowed.

Against a decision about temporary injunction, appeal against the decision to the Supreme Court is possible.

Revision, as extraordinary appeal to the Supreme Court, is possible if the Supreme Court allows it. The Supreme Court decides about the proposal of the interested party; the proposal should be filed within 15 days after receiving the judgment. The Supreme Court allows the revision if the decision about important legal question is expected. If the revision is allowed, it can be filed only because of violation of the procedural rules, or if the application of law is wrong. The revision appeal is allowed with the representation of an attorney.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

Mediation between parties is always possible on a voluntary basis[32], but it is not used often for environmental cases. In civil disputes, the regular courts offer mediation as part of the court procedure (Act on Alternative Dispute Resolution in Judicial Matters[33]).

The parties could also agree on an arbitration agreement, if the matter concerns a pecuniary or other claim on which the parties can settle. This can be the case only in civil suits regarding compensation claims against polluters. It is not used in practice.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsman (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsman has a strong role to play in protecting the constitutional right to a healthy environment.[34] According to the Human Rights Ombudsman Act[35], the Ombudsman acts on the basis of individual initiatives if the state or a local body violates human rights. If the administrative or court procedure is already addressing the matter, the Ombudsman does not intervene unless there is a substantial delay in proceedings or there are signs of obvious abuse of power. The Ombudsman can accept or reject the initiative. If it accepts it, then it begins the inquiry. After receiving the explanation of the competent body, it prepares a report where it expresses an opinion about the violation of human rights and proposes what action should be taken to stop the violation.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

There is no general rule for all cases. There is a status of working in the public interest for NGOs, regulated by the Non-Governmental Organisations Act[36] - this means that the state acknowledges that some NGOs are operating not only in their own interest or in the interest of their members but for common welfare. This is recognised in different areas if NGOs fulfil certain conditions and can present accomplishments defined by the rules of different sectors (culture, sports, environment, etc). The NGO has to apply for the status at the competent ministry and the ministry issues an administrative decision. The NGO has to fulfil the conditions for the status at all times and has to report to the ministry every two years. Sectoral rules/conditions for environmental NGOs are set out in: the Environmental Protection Act and rules on detailed conditions and criteria for acquiring the status of a non-governmental organisation operating in the public interest in the field of environmental protection[37] for NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection”. According to the Environmental Protection Act, they can be a party in certain administrative procedures (file a complaint against the negative EIA[38] decision, be a party in the EIA[39] and IED procedure and the environmental liability procedure);

the Nature Conservation Act and rules on the criteria determining the significant achievements of an NGO in order to be granted the status of an NGO operating in the public interest in nature conservation[40] for NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature protection”; they have to fulfil some additional criteria (if the NGO is an association, it must have 50 members; if the NGO is an institute, it must have two employees with a certain level of education; if the NGO is a foundation, it must have 10,000 EUR of property); NGOs with this status can participate in administrative procedures or in administrative disputes if they advocate nature protection interests in the way determined by the law;

the Spatial Planning Act and rules on the criteria determining significant achievements of NGOs in order to be granted the status of an NGO operating in the public interest in spatial planning[41] for NGOs with the status of “public interest – spatial planning”. They have the right to file a suit with the Administrative Court against some aspects of spatial plans (like land use).

Natural and legal persons have:

the right to participate (and therefore to use the legal remedies) in certain procedures (environmental impact assessment (EIA), environmental permits (IED)) applicable for those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area (Environmental Protection Act);

the right to be a party in administrative procedures, provided they demonstrate legal interest. Legal interest shall be demonstrated by a person who claims to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits – these shall be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation. In addition to that general rule, there are some specific rules in lex specialis:

- The Nature Conservation Act – defines the conditions for NGOs to hold the status of “public interest – nature conservation”, and the right of such NGOs to represent nature conservation interests (be a party and use legal remedies) in all administrative procedures and in all administrative disputes in the way determined by the law. Legal remedies involve the administration appeal to a second-instance authority and/or filing a suit with the Administrative Court (administrative dispute).

The Environmental Protection Act defines the conditions for NGOs to hold the status of “public interest – environmental protection” and their right to participate (be a party and use legal remedies) in certain procedures: to appeal against a negative EIA screening decision, to be party in the EIA procedure, the EID procedure and the environmental liability procedure. The defined circle of affected individuals has the right to participate in EIA and IED procedure (be a party and use legal remedies). Legal remedies involve administrative appeal to a second-instance authority and/or filing a suit with the Administrative Court (administrative dispute). There is also a more general right to exercise the constitutional right to a healthy environment: individuals, their societies, associations and organisations can file a request with the court against the polluter to stop harmful activities. The competent courts for such cases are regular first-instance courts (district).

- The Building Act regulates integral building permission procedure (joint building permission and environmental impact assessment – environmental consent) and defines the parties in this procedure. Civil initiatives (groups of 200 inhabitants of the affected local community) are also included in the defined circle of affected persons and NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation / environmental protection”. All have the right to participate in the administrative procedure (be a party and use legal remedies – filing a suit with the Administrative Court).

- The Spatial Planning Act: against the spatial plan, legal remedy is possible (a suit with the Administrative Court) for a defined circle of persons and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation / spatial planning / cultural heritage conservation”. They can use the legal remedy provided they actively participated in the public discussions in previous stages of the procedure. The State Attorney’s Office has the same right for protection of the public interest. There are limited aspects of the plan that can be challenged.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The Constitutional Court has the general rule[44] that anyone who demonstrates legal interest may lodge a petition that the procedure for the review of the constitutionality or legality of regulations or general acts issued for the exercise of public authority be initiated. Legal interest is deemed to be demonstrated if a regulation or general act is issued for the exercise of public authority and its review has been requested by the petitioner for reasons of its direct interference with their rights, legal interests or legal position. Constitutional complaint against the violation of human rights by an individual act can be filed after all other legal remedies have been exhausted.

Administrative procedure:

The general rule for all administrative procedures applies for all persons – whether individual or NGOs. This rule is applicable unless a particular Act (e.g. the Nature Conservation Act or the Environmental Protection Act) defines other specific rules. The right to be a party in an administrative procedure is available to those who demonstrate their legal interest (the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits; these shall be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation).

- The Nature Conservation Act – NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” have the right to represent nature conservation interests (be a party and use the legal remedy) in any administrative procedure and in administrative disputes in the way determined by the law.

- The Environmental Protection Act defines different rights for individuals and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection”:

 strategic impact assessments: there are no provisions for NGOs to participate in SEA procedures, but (according to the Nature Conservation Act) an association with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” did succeed at the Administrative Court in getting a position in an SEA procedure ([EC case II U 145/2016]; on the basis of this case, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning allowed 9 NGOs with the status of “public interest – environment protection / nature conservation” to be parties in the SEA procedure for the National Energy and Climate Plan[45]; the legal remedy here is complaint to the Government (semi-administrative procedure) if the authority that prepares the plan is at state level or suit with the Administrative Court if the authority that prepares the plan is at local community level;

 environmental impact assessment screening procedure (Article 51a): NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” can appeal against negative screening decisions (within 15 days after publishing of the decision on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency);

 environmental impact assessment (Article 64): the law presumes the existence of legal interest for persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area, and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” shall have a legal interest to enter the procedure for issuing an environmental consent in order to protect their rights, provided they apply for the procedure within 35 days after publishing of the public consultation documents (but it is recommended that the party in this application also presents all the comments and arguments in the case); a recent decision by the Administrative Court states that this legal assumption of legal interest does not exclude the existence of legal interest according to general rules of administrative procedure, widening the circle of possible parties[46];

environmental permit – IED (Article 73): persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area of the installation and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” have a legal interest in participating in the procedure for issuing an environmental permit, provided they apply for the procedure within 35 days after publishing of the public consultation documents (but it is recommended that the party in this application also presents all the comments and arguments in the case);

other environmental permits, but not SEVESO (Article 84a): the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning will publish the documentation for the procedure if it gets five applications for party status in the procedure. If so, anyone can apply for party status in the procedure within 30 days of public announcement of the procedure;

environmental liability procedure (110g and 110e): legal or natural person who are harmed or could be harmed by environmental damage and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” have the right to inform the Slovenian Environment Agency about the environmental damage and demand that the agency acts. They can also be a party in the procedure for determining the remedy measures. There is also the right to the protection of a healthy environment, which is “open” to all individuals and NGOs (not only those with the status of public interest) – Article 14. According to this, citizens may, as individuals or through societies, associations or organisations, file a request at a court that the person responsible for an activity affecting the environment terminates the activity if it causes, or would cause, an excessive environmental burden or presents, or would present, an imminent threat to human life or health, or that the person responsible for the activity affecting the environment be prohibited from starting the activity if there is a high probability that it will cause such consequences. For these cases, the first-instance regular courts are competent.

- The Building Act regulates integral building permission procedure[47] (combined building permit and environmental impact assessment – environmental consent). Parties in the procedure can be (Article 36, 38, 50, 54) persons who can be a party in the regular building permission procedure, persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area, other persons claiming that building and its environmental burdens would have an impact on their rights and benefits, NGOs with the status of “public interest - environmental protection / nature conservation”, civil initiative (200 signatures of residents in the local community or a neighbouring community). They can be party if they apply after they are invited by the administrative body (namely the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning) or in the procedure according to the Environmental Protection Act if they apply (with their reasons for objection) in the procedure within 35 days after publishing of public consultation documents. NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation” also have the right to legal remedy (suit with the Administrative court) if they were not a party to the procedure within 30 days after publishing on the online platform e-administration (Article 58);

- Spatial Planning Act (Article 58): against the spatial plan, legal remedy is possible (a suit with the Administrative Court within 3 months after enforcement) for persons if the plan determines ground for his rights and in this part significant consequences; NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation / spatial planning / cultural heritage conservation” can participate if they actively participated in the public discussion in the previous stages of the procedure and the State Attorney’s Office has the same right for protection of the public interest. There are limited aspects of the plan that can be challenged: land use, conditions for spatial interventions and choice of the best option.

There are no rules for foreign NGOs.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

The general rules are set out in the Civil Procedure Act; the procedure at the court takes place in Slovene or a language that is used at the court (for Italian and Hungarian minorities). Parties or other participants can use their own language according to the Act – they can ask for a translator for the hearings and for a translation of the documents used at the hearings. The translators are official translators as per the Court Experts, Certified Appraisers and Court Interpreters Act[48]. All other documents should be in Slovene or another official language of the court. The costs for the translator are part of the costs of the procedure (the burden of the party who caused the cost).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

In administrative procedures, according to the principal of substantive rule the administrative authority is obliged to determine the true facts and all relevant facts so that a lawful and correct decision can be established. It can order the presentation (ex officio) of any evidence if it concludes that this is necessary to clarify the case.

Each party proposes the evidence for their requests, but the court decides which evidence will be used. The Administrative Court is not bound by the proposals of the parties and may hear any evidence which could contribute to resolution of the case.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

The parties can propose evidence up to the end of the first hearing, except where the party can reasonably justify not presenting it sooner.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

In the procedure, experts can be nominated by the court at the proposal of the party. The court shall take evidence from an expert if it is necessary to establish or clarify a fact with expertise (knowledge) which the court does not have at its disposal – the proposal of certain experts is consulted on with the parties. Before the expert begins work, the costs shall be covered in advance – otherwise the court stops the procedure. Usually the expert opinion should be presented as evidence with the filing of a suit or in response to it. In such cases, the expert represents a cost for the party presenting the expert opinion (you can find an expert on the free market) and hiring an expert does not mean that another expert will not be nominated later in the procedure. The court decides which evidence should be used. It can call upon another expert if the parties present substantiated arguments for doing so, and the cost burden lies with the party who proposes or insists on this. Actually, if expertise is presented by a party, it is evaluated according to the principle of free evaluation of the evidence: it can be accepted by the court, but the court may also consider it to be a mere claim by the party and nominate another expert. The main rule is that experts are to be nominated by the sitting court. The court experts are regulated by the Court Experts, Certified Appraisers and Court Interpreters Act. They are listed in a special register for court experts (area of ecology – there are 8 experts). The court is not bound only to court experts; it can also nominate expert institutions or other experts.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, Is there a level of discretion?

In evaluating expertise, the judge assesses which facts are considered to be proven on the basis of evaluation of each piece of evidence individually and combined. Since the basic reason for nominating the court expert is that the court does not have the knowledge necessary for establishing all relevant facts in the matter, the discretion is actually limited, as the court will not have the knowledge necessary to differ from it. However, if the court is not persuaded by the work is divided into different phases and each phase of the work is then divided register of attorneys Bar
for NGOs with public-interest status in disputes regarding the pursuit of areas of environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, presented by name. NGOs with public-interest status in the areas of environmental protection, nature conservation, spatial planning and cultural heritage protection. The tables below are listed on the list of accredited emission measurement providers listed in the list of court experts, there is no list of such experts, but we can use:
2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

Administrative Court. All information about free legal aid, the procedure and application is available on the
the free legal aid can be approved on the basis of application in administrative procedures. Against the decision, the applicant can file a suit with the the expertise (and is capable of explaining this), there is no obligation to follow it. The parties in the dispute comment on the expertise, and if the arguments are relevant they can also propose another expert. The other expert can be approved by the judge, but the rules are restrictive – it is possible only if the expertise is unclear, incomplete, internally contradictory or in contradiction of other facts and this cannot be eliminated by an additional hearing of the expert.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The court can nominate an expert if the parties in the dispute propose it, or to establish or clarify a fact with expertise (knowledge) which the court does not have at its disposal – but if the costs are not covered in advance by the plaintiff or the party that proposed this evidence, it stops the procedure. If expertise is presented by a party, it is evaluated according to the principle of free evaluation of the evidence: it can be accepted by the court, but the court may also consider it to be a mere claim by the party and nominate another expert.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

The nominated court expert is obliged to respond to the invitation of the court, but they can be excused of duty if there are circumstances: concerning what the client (party) has entrusted to them as their attorney or confesses to them as a religious confessor, or concerning the facts that they have learned as their lawyer or doctor or in the exercise of any other profession or activity where there is a duty to maintain secrecy or on the grounds of other excusable arguments. They can also be excluded for the same reasons as are valid for exclusion of the judge from the case. The expert is nominated by court order. The judge decides whether the expert is only invited to the hearing or if he must prepare a written expert opinion (in practice, the judges decide for both). The procedure does not provide for separate complaint against the decision about the expert. If the expert declines to perform the work or does not come to the court without a substantial excuse, the judge can impose on them a penalty of 1,300.00 EUR and costs for delaying the procedure.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
The estimated expert’s fee should be paid in advance by the party which proposed the evidence of the expert, or by the plaintiff if it is proposed by the court. The payment is ordered by court order. If the fee is not paid, the expert evidence is not included. There are no standard expert fees. They are determined by the rules on court experts, certified appraisers and court interpreters[49] - the work is divided into different phases and each phase of the work is then divided up in accordance with the level of complexity. The amounts are then determined using different categories for each phase: pages or hours. For instance, taking into consideration all phases of the procedure, the cost for the simplest expertise would be around 550 EUR and for the most complex around 2,000 EUR. But the upper limit is not fixed, and there are also fees for additional pages and hours.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Lawyers are regulated by the Attorneys Act[50] and are part of the general justice system’s independent service. They are organised by the Bar Association, which also holds the register of all attorneys (they can be selected by areas of “specialisation”, but “environment protection” is not included – civil or administrative areas should be selected). In the environmental area, the attorney is compulsory only in extraordinary legal remedies in court procedures. Otherwise, the parties can represent themselves in court procedures (at the regular courts and the Administrative Court). If they do not represent themselves but choose another person to represent them, this latter person should be an attorney or a person who has passed the bar exam. Revision as extraordinary legal remedy at the Supreme Court can only be filed for by an attorney. The representative of the public interest in an administrative dispute is the State Attorney General.

1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is the possibility of free legal aid assistance under the Legal Aid Act[51] for NGOs with public-interest status in disputes regarding the pursuit of activities in the public interest for which they were established. For individuals, the condition for free legal aid is low incomes of the member of the family. Another condition is that the case is not clearly unreasonable and/or that the applicant in the case is likely to succeed, such that it is reasonable to initiate the proceedings. The free legal aid can cover the costs of the attorney for legal counselling and representation in court procedures, as well as other costs of procedure (Art. 26/5). The attorney can also provide pro bono legal aid: every year the Bar Chamber organises a pro bono day in December. The attorney decides voluntarily to participate on this day or to provide pro bono aid otherwise. The Code of Professional Ethics for Lawyers of the Bar Association of Slovenia imposes a (moral) duty on a lawyer to provide legal assistance to clients. The client's inability to adequately pay for a lawyer's work is not a reason to refuse legal aid in an emergency. Representing and defending the socially disadvantaged is an honourable task of lawyers in the practice of the legal profession. This task should be performed by a lawyer with special understanding. We should say that some pro bono work has been done for NGOs in environmental matters, but it is not usual. Since 2018, free legal advice has also been available to all from the Green Counsel, provided by an NGO[52].

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?
The free legal aid can be approved on the basis of application in administrative procedures. Against the decision, the applicant can file a suit with the Administrative Court. All information about free legal aid, the procedure and application is available on the general webpages of the courts[53]. Other pro bono assistance has no format; it is a personal decision of the individual attorney.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?
The free legal aid is approved by the district court which has jurisdiction for the dispute. It considers the seat of the NGO and the place of residence of individuals. The administrative dispute is decided by the Administrative Court. The court has a special service for free legal aid. Pro bono assistance is a matter for arrangement with the attorney.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There is a Bar Association, which has a register of attorneys, but there is no list with specialisation for environmental law listed. Regarding experts, there is no list of such experts, but we can use: the list of court experts, the list of accredited emission measurement providers listed in the registry of ARSO, experts for environmental impact assessments for projects – those who have participated in already finished environmental impact assessment procedures are listed on the webpage of ARSO.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

There is no list of NGOs active in the field, only a register of NGOs with public-interest status in the state business register AJIPES (Legal Entity Identifier)[54]. Regarding participants for procedures in the areas of environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, there are relevant NGOs with public-interest status in the areas of environmental protection, nature conservation, spatial planning and cultural heritage protection. The tables below present the NGOs with public-interest status in areas of environmental protection, nature conservation and spatial planning, presented by name. NGOs with public-interest status in the area of cultural heritage protection are less relevant for environmental protection, though they can have limited access to court procedures against a final spatial planning decision (advocating only cultural heritage interests).[55]
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Table 1 List of NGOs with the status of &quot;public interest – environmental protection&quot; (on 12.3.2020)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Inštitut za mladinsko participacijo, zdravje in trajnostni razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lutra, Inštitut za ohranjanje naravne dediščine</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za ohranitev Udinboršta</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ribliška zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo krajinskih arhitekov Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Planet Zemlja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Ekologi brez meja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo prebivalcev &quot;Ronket&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inštitut za uporabno ekologijo Maribor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovenska potapljaška zveza</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Proteus, gibanje za naravo in okolje Bela krajina</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Focus, društvo za sonaraven razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Umanotera, Slovenska fundacija za trajnostni razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Okoljsko raziskovalni zavod</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sobivanje - Društvo za trajnostni razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lovska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Regionalno okoliško združenje okoljevarstvenikov, Združenje ROVO</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za opazovanje in preučevanje ptic Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prihodnost, društvo za varovanje in ohranjanje naravnega okolja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inštitut za politike prostora</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovensko združenje za trajnostno gradnjo, Green building council Slovenia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vtra, Center za uravnotežen razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za okoliško vzgojo Evrope v Sloveniji (DOVES - FEE Slovenia)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Bober - Okoliško gibanje Dolenjska</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inštitut - info-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij - PIC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Eko krog - društvo za naravovarstvo in okoljevarstvo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alpe Adria Green, Mednarodno društvo za zaščito okolja in narave</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Gibanje za trajnostni razvoj Slovenije - TRS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zveza ekošolskih gibanj Slovenije - ZEG</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Table 2 List of NGOs with the status of &quot;public interest – nature conservation&quot; (as of 12.3.2020)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za raziskovanje jam Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jamarska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovensko društvo za zaščito voda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jamarski klub Kamnik</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lutra, Inštitut za ohranjanje naravne dediščine</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo JASA</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ribliška zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Planinska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koroško Šaleški jamarski klub Speleos-Siga Velenje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za raziskovanje jam Simon Robič Domžale</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Planet zemlja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo krajinskih arhitektov Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Slovensko odonatološko društvo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Forum za Pohorje, združenje za trajnostni razvoj</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično okoliško družstvo Slovenj Gradec</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zavod SYMBIOSIS</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Proteus, gibanje za naravo in okolje Bela krajina</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko miološko društvo Ig</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za biološko dinamično kmetovanje Podravje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTERSO Integracija ekonomije, razvoja, socijalne in okolja, Inštitut za individualno in družbeno odgovornost</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično društvo Barje</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIVAMAR – Društvo društvo za trajnostni razvoj morja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko društvo Lisička Maribor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lovska zveza Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za preučevanje rib Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turistično društvo Cer Cerovo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za opazovanje in preučevanje ptic Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prihodnost, društvo za varovanje in ohranjanje naravnega okolja</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo ljubiteljev Krščne jame</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo za okoliško vzgojo Evrope v Sloveniji (DOVES - FEE Slovenia)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo Bober - Okoliško gibanje Dolenjska</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herpetološko društvo - Societas herpetologica Slovenica</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dondes, Društvo za ohranjanje naravne dediščine Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alpe Adria Green, Mednarodno društvo za zaščito okolja in narave</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gobarsko miološko društvo slovenske Istre</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cipra Slovenija, Društvo za varstvo Alp</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Društvo Društva polharjev "Polh" na Dolenskem
1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
Generally, the appeal against an administrative decision by the second-instance authority always has suspensive effect, except when a specific Act stipulates otherwise. An appeal against a final administrative decision (the suit with the Administrative Court) does not have this effect, unless provided for by a (special) law. Only when the specific Act defines that certain decision can be effective only after the final court decision (or after the period for filing the suit stipulates otherwise). An appeal against a final administrative decision (the suit with the Administrative Court) does not have this effect, unless provided for by a (special) law. Only when the specific Act defines that certain decision can be effective only after the final court decision (or after the period for filing the suit and nobody does this).

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?
Injunctive relief is possible in first-instance administrative procedures. This is implemented in the form of a temporary decision and primarily relates to the time “during” the procedure. There are no specific provisions about injunctive relief in environmental procedures.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
In the administrative procedure, a proposal for a temporary injunction is possible during the first-instance procedure. The law does not stipulate specific conditions.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
Immediate execution irrespective of the appeal is possible if a specific Act defines this in regard to a certain decision. The general rule under the General Administrative Procedure Act also allows a verbal decision in the case of measures necessary in the public interest, and the authority can decide that the appeal does not have suspensive effect.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Table 3 List of NGOs with the status of “public interest – spatial planning” (as of 12.3.2020)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>NGOs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Friends of the Earth (via the office of Focus Association for Sustainable Development).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CIPRA – CIPRA Slovenia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WWF Adria – office in Zagreb also covers Slovenia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Estetika - Društvo za vzpodobujanje etike v prostoru</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo PaziPark</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo krajinskih arhitektov Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Društvo arhitektov Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zdušenje FIABCI</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Center arhitekture Slovenije</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DESSA Ljubljana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kulturno društvo MOTA</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>subdued to other parties in the procedure and usually there is no less than 15 days to answer in administrative procedures and 30 days in court procedures.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Generally, challenging the administrative decision before the court does not suspend the decision, but for certain decisions the Act can determine suspensive effect (e.g., environmental consent, environmental permission).

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

In the administrative procedure, a temporary injunction is not conditional on the financial deposit. The local courts are competent to provide injunctive relief according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act. Initially the interested party has to pay the costs of the procedure in advance. Appeal against the order on injunction relief is allowed.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

When we calculate costs, there is a distinction between whether a person or an NGO is a party in the administrative procedure (and then challenges the administrative decision at the Administrative Court or, in civil procedure, at the regular court (against polluters)).

Free legal aid (described in section 1.6.) is available only for court procedures. It is available for natural persons with low income and for NGOs with public-interest status. If the case is lost, the costs of the opposing party are not covered.

The general framework for calculating costs is as follows:

In administrative procedures (as a party in the procedure) natural persons with low income and NGOs with public-interest status (in matters concerning their area of public interest) are excused of taxes;

In the case of challenging an administrative decision at the Administrative Court, there is a court tax (148 EUR), which is returned if the plaintiff is successful (Court Fees Act[56]). There is no significant risk for the costs of the opposing party, because the procedure at the Administrative Court is mostly without hearing, not long and the State Attorney’s Office is entitled to reimbursement of costs in accordance with the Attorney tariff.

In the case of filing a suit with the regular court, there is an obligation to pay a court tax according to the Court Fees Act[57] and in consideration of the value of each case (rules for determining the value are regulated in the Contentious Civil Procedure Act);

The costs of attorneys are regulated in the Attorney Tariff[58] and calculated case by case, depending also on the timeframe of the procedure (a longer procedure can be expected than in standard civil cases), the number of legal remedies, hearings, filed papers. The different tasks are evaluated with points, each point being 0.6 EUR, and the number of points depends also on the value of the case;

The costs for experts cannot be estimated in advance but only on a case-by-case basis. We can expect that an expert institution should be engaged in a particular case. There are different sums in relation to the complexity or volume of materials to study.

We have to be aware that there is no average environmental case as a basis for calculating the average costs. There is a considerable difference between an administrative dispute (the opposing party is a state body) and an environmental request at the regular (local or district) courts (the opposing party is a polluter). It depends also on the length of the whole procedure up to the final solution. It may be that the same case proceeds two or three times at the Administrative Court in the same administrative procedure. And similarly for cases at the regular courts (one case against polluters lasted 20 years from filing of the suit up to the final decision). We can conclude that middle-income individuals or NGOs can afford the administrative procedure and administrative disputes, but taking an environmental lawsuit to the regular courts would be very risky for the same plaintiffs.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

The court fee should be paid for the procedure (74 EUR); for other deposits, the court decides from case to case. It depends on measures which need to be executed during the process.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Free legal aid is available for natural persons with low income.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Free legal aid is available only to NGOs with public-interest status in matters concerning their area of public interest and to legal persons under certain (limited) circumstances. Free legal aid is explained under 1.6.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

There are no other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The “loser party pays” principle applies. There are no rules about exceptions in environmental cases. But there are some additional rules for administrative disputes:

Parties shall be billed for costs incurred through their own fault, as well as costs incurred by any chance occurrence affecting the party. If the court granted the action and annulled the administrative act contested in the administrative dispute, or established the illegality of the contested administrative act, the lump sum of costs shall be reimbursed to the plaintiff with respect to the performed procedural actions and the method by which the administrative dispute was processed, in compliance with the rules on the reimbursement of expenses to plaintiffs in administrative disputes.[59] The determined amount shall be paid by the defendant. If shared costs arise in the case the court shall decide what proportion of the costs each party shall bear.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

Yes, as explained under the previous question.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

There is no official website with rules on environmental access to justice. There is only information about conditions and the process for NGOs with public-interest status. However, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning encourages NGOs to generate such information. Currently all relevant information is available on the Environmental Defenders website[60].

There is a general rule of free access to all environmental information, and each authority is also obliged to publish basic information about the environment and relevant procedures. The obligation is based on the Public Information Access Act[61] and the Environmental Protection Act. The Information Commissioner ensures free access to information.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

There is no system for providing procedural information. Anyone can address the competent authority with a request for access to information.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

There is information on the websites of the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and the Slovenian Environment Agency, but mostly focused on providing investors with useful information and less on informing members of the public concerned about access to justice. However, the ministry supports NGOs in spreading this information (call for tenders for NGOs). There is no other active dissemination of information on access to justice.
4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? Every administrative or court decision has instructions about possible legal remedies against it.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? There are no specific rules about translation for any foreign participants in environmental procedures. There are only general rules for the court procedure (described in section 1.4., 4th question). In administrative procedures, all written documentation and hearings are in Slovene (except in the case of Italian and Hungarian minorities), but if participants do not know the language, they have the right to participate in the procedure with the help of a translator. The authority is obliged to inform them of this, but the costs of the translator must be borne by the party who needs translation.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

All applications for screening decisions and the subsequent decisions are published on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency. There is no public consultation, and there are no provisions that would enable natural or legal persons or NGOs to be party to the procedure. Only NGOs with the status "public interest – environmental protection" can file a complaint against a negative screening decision, within 15 days after the decision is published. However, persons who can demonstrate legal interest are not expressly excluded and it is possible that the court would support their claim for standing (on the basis of CJEU decision C 570-13). The Administrative Court also decided that the NGO can be a party in the screening decision.[62]

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no provisions for participation in the scoping phase. After the screening decision, the application for environmental consent, the impact assessment report and the draft administrative decision have been published, there is an open public consultation period of 30 days.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" and those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can become a party in the procedure if they announce it within 35 days from the beginning of the public consultation (the authority invites them through a public announcement). This means the interested party should send an application for joining the procedure and present its arguments in the matter at the same time. The competent authority decides about the standing of the party – the decision can be challenged. If the decision is positive, then the interested person or NGO has a right to challenge the final EIA decision at the Administrative Court (if EIA is carried out as an integral procedure together with building permission, otherwise there is first a complaint to the second-instance administrative authority and then a challenge at the Administrative Court).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

Legal or natural persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area and NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" have the right to be a party in the procedure and can therefore then challenge the EIA decision (assuming the decision of the authority to accept someone as a party is positive).

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

There are no specific rules for EIA judicial review. General rules are applicable (see under 1.3., 4th question), and substantive and procedural legality can be reviewed.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

When the competent authority adopts the final decision.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in the EIA procedure.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness of court procedures.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question). The deadline for appealing against a negative EIA screening decision is 15 days from the day the decision is published on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency. In the EIA procedure, if the Slovenian Environment Agency is the deciding authority, there are also 15 days to appeal against a final EIA decision. If the deciding authority is the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning (integral procedure), there are 30 days after the decision is published on the website to begin the administrative dispute. There is also provision for the Administrative Court to decide within 3 months in EIA cases.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief in an EIA procedure. There are only general rules (see under 1.7.2.).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

The Slovenian Environment Agency, as the competent authority for environmental permits, publishes the application for an environmental permit, BAT reference documents and drafts of the administrative decision for public consultation of 30 days. Within 35 days of public announcement, the parties that have standing can file a request to be a party in the procedure (Article 73 of the Environmental Protection Act).

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

In accordance with the Environmental Protection Act, legal or natural persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area and NGOs with the status of "public interest – environmental protection" have the right to be a party in the procedure and can therefore then challenge the environmental permit decision if they do so within 35 days from the beginning of public consultation. Legal standing may be recognised by the Administrative Court if the person demonstrates legal interest according to the general rules of administrative procedure (Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act on protecting personal benefits based on the Act or other regulations).

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no special provisions other than those explained under the previous question.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no special provisions other than those explained under question 2.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” and those who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can become a party in the procedure if they announce it within 35 days from the beginning of the public consultation (the authority invites them through the public announcement). This means the interested party should send an application for joining the procedure and present its arguments in the matter at the same time. The competent authority decides whether to allow standing as a party – the decision can be challenged. If the decision is positive, then the interested person or NGO has the right to appeal the final decision about the environmental permit to the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and to challenge the ministry’s decision at the Administrative Court.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
Only those referred to under the 2nd question above have standing.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
There are no specific rules for the environmental permit judicial review. General rules are applicable (see under 1.3., 4th question), but both substantive and procedural legality can be challenged.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
It is challengeable at the final stage of the environmental permit decision.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in the environmental permit procedure.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness in the court procedure.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question), but there is a provision in the Environmental Protection Act that the Administrative Court should decide within 3 months.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief in the IED procedure. There are only general rules (see under 1.7.2.).

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
It is provided by publishing the documents relating to a particular permit on the website of the Slovenian Environment Agency for public consultation. In the announcement of the public consultation, there are also details of who can apply to join the procedure, and the timeframe for such.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[33]
County-specific legal rules relating to application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
Legal or natural persons who are or could be affected by the environmental damage and NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection” can be a party in the environmental remediation procedure. In such cases, they can challenge administrative decisions at the Administrative Court.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
30 days after receiving the decision of the Slovenian Environment Agency.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
Information about the existence of environmental damage should be presented. The Slovenian Environment Agency initiates the procedure if the probability of environmental damage is proven.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
There are no specific requirements.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
If legal or natural persons or NGOs with public-interest status are a party in the procedure of environmental remediation, they receive the decision as a party in the procedure. Otherwise, there is no notification obligation.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
The MS applies an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The Slovenian Environment Agency.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
The administrative decision about the environmental remediation can be directly challenged at the Administrative Court.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Other countries can be involved in the procedure of the strategic environmental assessment and the environmental impact assessment. If the plan or project could significantly impact on other countries, the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning or the Slovenian Environment Agency informs them, as a minimum in the phase of public announcement, of the draft plan or project and the environmental report or environmental impact assessment report, and gives them time to answer whether they are interested in participating. The competent authority of the other country can decide if it wants to participate in the procedure within time limits determined by the national ministry. If it decides to participate, the authorities of both countries agree on the period for opinions and comments, or on other forms of consultation. The Ministry then defines the period for domestic public participation in a timeframe agreed with the other country (if it is longer then 30 days). The Ministry sends the opinions of the other country to the authority that is preparing the plan. In EIA procedure, the Ministry is obliged to explain how it has taken into consideration the opinions of the other country.

2) Notion of public concerned?
There are no provisions about the concerned public. It is assumed that the other country informs their public.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

There are no provisions about NGOs of the affected country.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

There are no specific provisions about individuals. Generally, persons who permanently reside, or are owners or other possessors of real estate, in the impact area can be a party in the procedure for the environmental consent.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The information is provided together with the decision of the affected country if it has an interest in participating in the strategic environmental assessment and the environmental impact assessment.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

There are no provisions.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

There are no provisions.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

There are no provisions in the Environmental Protection Act. Since these are administrative procedures, the rules on administrative procedures can be applied (see under 1.4., q.4).

9) Any other relevant rules?

There are no other relevant rules.

[1] https://www.gov.si/drzavni-organji/organji-v-sestavlj-agencija-za-okolje/ (there is ongoing transfer of the official websites to a new platform and the process is not complete yet); the old page is [here] here.

[2] http://www.pisrs.si/Pis.web - in the right menu there are also some acts translated into English; in the upper right corner there is an option for translation of the page into different languages.

[26] Official Gazette of RS, 26/09, 96/02, 2/04, 2/04 – ZDSS-1, 52/07, 45/08 – ZAriB, 45/08, 10/17, 16/19 – ZNP-1; http://pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO1212.

[27] Official Gazette of RS, 45/08; http://www.pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO5288.

[28] Official Gazette od RS, 52/02, 56/03, 11/04, 123/04, 93/05, 126/07 – ZUP-E, 48/09, 8/10 – ZUP-G, 8/12 – ZVRS-F, 21/12, 47/13, 12/14, 90/14, 51/16; http://www.pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO3225.

[29] https://www.gov.si/dzavni-organi/organi-v-sestavi/agencija-za-okolje-delovna/ (there is moving the official websites on new platform and the process is not complete yet); the old page is on https://www.arso.gov.si/en/.

[31] Official Gazette RS, 80/99, 70/00, 52/02, 73/04, 119/05, 105/06 – ZUS-1, in English here.

[33] Official Gazette of RS, št. 97/09, 40/12 – ZUJF; http://www.pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO5648.

[34] Defined in Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act.

[38] For example, the case of the extension of operation of nuclear power plants I U 2135/2018-17.

[39] For example, the case of environmental consent for hydro power plants I U 2589/2018-25.

[42] Official Gazette of RS, 80/99, 70/00, 52/02, 73/04, 119/05, 105/06 – ZUS-1, 126/07, 65/08, 8/10, 82/13; http://pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO1603.

[45] Info also here.

[46] I U 1417/2019-10

[47] Some rules for integral procedure were modified up to the end of 2021 as interventional measures by the Act Determining the Intervention Measures to Contain the COVID-19 Epidemic and Mitigate its Consequences for Citizens and the Economy (Official Gazette RS, 49/20 and 61/20) and the Act Determining the Intervention Measures to Mitigate and Remedy the Consequences of the COVID-19 Epidemic (Official Gazette RS, 80/20), which are being challenged at the Constitutional Court with regard to the new conditions for NGOs with the status of public interest to have the right to participate in integral procedure.

[52] Legal-informational center for NGOs, Slovenia (Pravno-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij – PIC) offers this service on webpage Environmental defenders as project activity financed by the Ministry for the environment and spatial planning and Eko fund.

[53] This is a project activity financed by the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning and the Eco Fund.

[55] There are 114 such NGOs in the register of AJPES as of 12.3.2020.

[56] Official Gazette of RS, 37/08, 97/10, 10/04, 30/16, 40/17 – ZPP-E, 11/18 – ZIZL; http://pisrs.si/Pis.web/pregledPredpisa?id=ZAKO4729.

[60] Only in Slovene language for now; the page is managed by the Legal-Informational Centre for NGOs (Pravno-informacijski center nevladnih organizacij – PIC).

[63] See also case G-529/15.

Last update: 05/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EU Directives

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is a general rule – an article which protects the constitutional right to a healthy environment – Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act:
In order to exercise the right to a healthy living environment, citizens may, as individuals or through societies, associations and organisations, file a request with a court that the person responsible for an activity affecting the environment should terminate the activity if it causes, or would cause, an excessive environmental burden or presents, or would present, an imminent threat to human life or health, or that the person responsible for the activity affecting the environment should be prohibited from starting the activity if there is a high probability that the activity will cause such consequences.”

According to this Article, individuals and NGOs of any kind can initiate a court procedure (regular court) against anyone (private company, state or local authorities) for acts or omissions that cause harm. There are no other provisions that would set timeframes or other conditions. There have been a few court cases based on this article. One such case, which was won, concerned the Zasavje valley farmers (mentioned in footnote 28). Usually the legal grounds for such a suit would be Article 133 and/or 134 of the Civil Code together with the above-mentioned Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act. The judges of the courts of general jurisdiction are as well informed about environment protection as their colleagues at the Administrative Court.

Other options outside EIA, IED and ELD lie in nature protection: NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” can defend nature conservation interests in all administrative and substantive disputes in the way determined by the law. Such an NGO has to be a party in an administrative procedure in which a permit is given to be able to appeal and/or file a court claim. NGOs with the status of “public interest – environmental protection / nature conservation / spatial planning / culture heritage protection” can file an action against some spatial plans with the Administrative Court; any person enjoys the same such right if the spatial plan affects any of this person’s other rights. There are also some protective instruments in civil law connected with the environment:

Law of Property Code[2] (Articles 75 and 99): Any disturbances from neighbours’ property that exceed the normal level (nuisance) are prohibited. The owner of the disturbed property may bring the action against the owner of property that causes the nuisance. Compensation can be claimed.

Obligations Code[3] (Articles 133): Any person may request that another person removes a source of danger that might cause major damage to them or other persons, and the court shall order appropriate measures to prevent the occurrence of damage or disturbance. This is also the case if the damage arises from activities that are in the public interest and have all permits (though compensation for such damage can be claimed only for the proportion exceeding the customary thresholds). This Article is “connected” with Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act. In environmental matters, it can sometimes be useful to use Article 134 of the Obligations Code: in the case of violation of individuality, personal or family life or any other personal right, anyone can request that the court orders such action to be prevented or the consequences to be eliminated.

The Administrative Court can also be the court competent for protecting constitutional human rights in the case of violation by acts of state or local authorities where there is no other court competent for such protection (Administrative Dispute Act, Article 4).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The scope of the administrative procedure and of the administrative dispute covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

This condition has to be fulfilled only in the case of challenging a spatial plan at the Administrative Court.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

In the case of challenging a spatial plan, there are limited aspects of the spatial plan that can be challenged (e.g. provisions related to land use).

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no specific provisions for environmental cases. There is a general rule about fairness of court proceedings.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question).

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.).

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no specific cost rules besides those described under 1.7.3. The ‘losing party pays’ principle applies together with additional rules explained under point 6 of section 1.7.3. There are no provisions against costs being prohibitive. A party should refer directly to Article 9(4) of the Aarhus Convention and the grounds of Article 8 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (ratified and published treaties are to be applied directly) to potentially obtain a better position regarding costs in the given procedure.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There are no provisions that would enable NGOs or individuals to have standing for administrative review or challenge in the SEA procedure. But as the Nature Conservation Act enables NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” to represent nature conservation interests in all administrative and court procedures, one NGO with this status succeeded in becoming a party in an SEA procedure. After being rejected by the Ministry of the Environment and Spatial Planning. After that case, NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation / environmental protection” are allowed to be a party in SEA procedures. There is no procedural timeframe for applying to be a party in the procedure, but after the ministry’s decision that an SEA will be performed, it would be appropriate to participate from the earliest phases of the procedure. For individuals, it could be used as a general rule for being a party according to the General Administrative Procedure Act (Article 43 – explained under the section 1.4., 1st question), since the SEA procedure is an administrative procedure.

Against negative SEA screening decisions or omission of decisions in a screening procedure, we do not yet have any practice or court decisions, but some rules could be used:

the rules about standing described above in relation to negative SEA screening decisions;
the rules about standing described above in relation to challenging omissions at the Administrative Court (Article 4 of the Administrative Dispute Act).

If the case comes before the Administrative Court, the court consistently follows the judgments of the CJEU.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The scope of the administrative procedure and of the administrative dispute covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Before filing a court action, there is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is no need to participate in the public consultation procedure. However, a person/NGO has to be a party in the SEA procedure to have standing before the Administrative Court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described in section 1.7.2.). But temporary relief would be in place as a result of challenging the final SEA decision.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? In the case of challenging SEA decisions at the Administrative Court, the court fee has to be paid (148 EUR). The amount is returned in the case of success. There is a general rule that the procedure should be carried out at the lowest costs possible (Article 11 of the Contentious Civil Procedure Act). There are no other safeguarding rules against costs being prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[6]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? There are provisions for public participation (environmental plans/programmes, spatial plans, nature conservation plans/programmes, water management programmes and others), but no provisions for protecting this right. This is a weakness of the Slovenian legal system with respect to the Aarhus Convention. So there is no “direct” way of obtaining an administrative review or challenging the final decision about a plan/programme before a court. There are two possible options:

- if the plan or programme is adopted as a general legal act, it could be challenged at the Constitutional Court (conformity with the Constitution);
- if not, it could be challenged at the Administrative Court as an act or omission of the state or local authority (Administrative Dispute Act, Article 4, see under 2.1., 1st question). Legal standing can be granted to NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” and to environmental protection NGOs or individuals on the basis of Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act if legal interest can be demonstrated; the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits. The legal benefits should be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The scope would be only if public consultation was enabled or not, thus if the requests of the Aarhus Convention were met.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? If there is an administrative procedure for the plan, the administrative review procedures should be exhausted.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is obligation to participate in the prior participation process when using a legal remedy in the spatial planning process (filing a suit with the Administrative Court against a spatial plan) – this is the only provision of such kind in the Spatial Planning Act (Article 58).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.). But temporary relief would be in place as a result of challenging the plan or programme.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? There is no court fee for going to the Constitutional Court. For the Administrative Court, there is a court fee (148 EUR), which is returned in the case of success.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[8]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? It depends on who adopts the decision and in what legal form:

- if it is a law (act) or an executive regulation (decree, ordinance, ruling), see explanation in section 2.5., 1st question;
- if it is an administrative decision, there are legal remedies in the administrative procedure and then the administrative dispute at the Administrative Court.

Legal standing can be granted to NGOs with the status of “public interest – nature conservation” for representing nature conservation interests. For other NGOs and individuals, legal standing can be granted on the basis of Article 43 of the General Administrative Procedure Act if legal interest can be demonstrated (the person should claim to be joining the procedure in order to protect their legal benefits, which should be direct personal benefits based on an Act or other regulation). CJEU case law contributes much to effective access to national courts and definitely expands the right to access to justice in practice. There can be a situation where a particular plan is adopted by governmental decision (but not as a general legal act) but the plan/programme is not legally binding. There are two options:

- to initiate the court procedure at the regular court to defend the constitutional right to a healthy environment (on the basis of Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act – see explanation in section 2.1., 1st question);
- less probably, to challenge the decision at the Administrative Court as an act of a national or local authority.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?
3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no provisions and cases yet.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There are no provisions.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure -- to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There are no provisions except in the case of spatial plans. To initiate the administrative dispute, the NGO with the status of "public interest -- spatial planning / environmental protection / nature conservation / cultural heritage protection" must have previously participated in the procedure with comments.

6) Are there any grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no provisions. In the case of Article 14 of the Environmental Protection Act, there are no grounds/arguments precluded.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There is only a general rule about fairness of court procedures.

8) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions for environmental cases (see explanation under 1.7.1., 4th question).

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no specific provisions for injunctive relief, only general rules (described under 1.7.2.).

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are general rules, described in section 1.7.3., 1st question.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[7]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There are three options for challenging executive regulations:

Laws and their executive regulations are a general legal act. As such they can be challenged only at the Constitutional Court. According to Article 24 of the Constitutional Court Act (explanation in section 1.4., 3rd question), legal standing is granted to anyone who demonstrates a legal interest in the review of the constitutionality or legality of regulations. There is no difference in the standing of NGOs, NGOs with public-interest status or other legal or natural persons – all must justify the reasons for direct intervention in executive regulations with their rights, legal interests or legal position. There are other limitations only for executive regulations: a) generally they can be challenged within 1 year after their enforcement or after the day the petitioner learns of the occurrence of harmful consequences; b) all legal remedies should be exhausted (usually meaning challenging the individual act issued on the basis of the executive regulation) – this is a general opinion of the Constitutional Court adopted in many of its decisions.

The general legal act can be challenged also at the Administrative Court if it regulates individual relationships[8]. The 30 day limit for filing the suit to the court should be respected. If there is an individual administrative decision issued on the basis of the executive regulation, the administrative procedure has to be exhausted before going to the Administrative Court.

There is a third, indirect option: if a decision is based on an executive regulation which the claimant considers to be illegal, they can challenge the decision and, if the court agrees, it will refuse to use the illegal regulation as is bound only by the Constitution and the law (exceptio illegalis). The decision about illegality is binding only in the actual case, but it sends a strong signal to the administration and more often than not the administrative decision is altered as a result of the decision. The Administrative Court makes use of this relatively often.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The review of the Constitutional Court is focused on violation of the provisions of the Constitution. Also, the Administrative Court is focused on the legality of the challenged act. This can cover both procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Yes, as explained above under the 1st question.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure -- to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

A temporary injunction is only possible at the Constitutional Court. At the Administrative Court, a temporary injunction is usually proposed regarding execution regulations. Other injunctive relief is possible (general rules described under 1.7.2.)

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

At the Constitutional Court, there are no costs (court fees). At the Administrative Court, there is the court fee (148 EUR), which is returned in the case of success.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[9]

There are no provisions in national legislation regarding such situations and article 267 TFEU. Courts are obliged to take CJEU decisions into consideration and plaintiffs often refer to certain cases. The Supreme Court and the Administrative Court practise preliminary ruling procedures. All courts follow the recommendations for national courts on the use of preliminary ruling procedures. Plaintiffs are free to propose that the court initiate a preliminary ruling procedure.
Some competencies in the field of environmental protection are entrusted to municipalities.

The executive power in the field of environment is performed by the Ministry of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture.

Sources of Slovak codified law are divided according to their legal force into three levels, namely constitutional laws, ordinary laws and by-laws. The norm of national codified law is to find its source at the level of ordinary laws. These norms are applicable in case of conflict with constitutional laws. If constitutional laws are breached, they may be brought before the Supreme Court or the Constitutional Court, they tend to respect the legal views of these highest courts in similar cases.

National rules on the silence of the administration:

According to the Administrative Procedure Act (Article 222), in the event that the competent authority against whose decision an appeal is allowed fails to issue a decision and present it to the party in due time, the party shall have the right of appeal as if their claim had been refused. If the second-instance administrative authority fails to issue a decision, according to the Administrative Dispute Act (Article 28), the administrative dispute can be initiated within 30 days after the administrative authority has failed to issue a decision within 7 days after the future plaintiffs’ special request.

Complying with a judgement – there can be two situations:

If the court decides that the defendant should make a payment or perform an action, the execution procedure according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act applies;

If the court finds that there has been a violation of certain rights or annuls certain individual acts or general acts and orders the competent body to issue the decision within a certain time, there are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it fails to comply with the court decision. A new suit should be filed with the court to challenge this omission/failure.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

National rules on silence of the administration:

According to the Administrative Procedure Act (Article 222), in the event that the competent authority against whose decision an appeal is allowed fails to issue a decision and present it to the party in due time, the party shall have the right of appeal as if their claim had been refused. If the second-instance administrative authority fails to issue a decision, according to the Administrative Dispute Act (Article 28), the administrative dispute can be initiated within 30 days after the administrative authority has failed to issue a decision within 7 days after the future plaintiffs’ special request.

Complying with a judgement – there can be two situations:

If the court decides that the defendant should make a payment or perform an action, the execution procedure according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act applies;

If the court finds that there has been a violation of certain rights or annuls certain individual acts or general acts and orders the competent body to issue the decision within a certain time, there are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it fails to comply with the court decision. A new suit should be filed with the court to challenge this omission/failure.

Last update: 05/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the national legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

National rules on silence of the administration:

According to the Administrative Procedure Act (Article 222), in the event that the competent authority against whose decision an appeal is allowed fails to issue a decision and present it to the party in due time, the party shall have the right of appeal as if their claim had been refused. If the second-instance administrative authority fails to issue a decision, according to the Administrative Dispute Act (Article 28), the administrative dispute can be initiated within 30 days after the administrative authority has failed to issue a decision within 7 days after the future plaintiffs’ special request.

Complying with a judgement – there can be two situations:

If the court decides that the defendant should make a payment or perform an action, the execution procedure according to the Claim Enforcement and Security Act applies;

If the court finds that there has been a violation of certain rights or annuls certain individual acts or general acts and orders the competent body to issue the decision within a certain time, there are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it fails to comply with the court decision. A new suit should be filed with the court to challenge this omission/failure.

Last update: 05/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the national legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Slovakia:

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level

3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 03/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the national legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Legal order – sources of environmental law

1. General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

The Slovak legal system belongs to the continental (civil law) legal system, which is based on codified laws adopted by the Parliament. Parliament is the highest legislative body. Courts are obliged to decide according to the constitution, laws and generally binding legal regulations, international treaties, and they are also obliged to apply EU legislation. Judicial decisions of the highest courts (the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court) are of great importance in the interpretation of law, although they are not formally binding precedents as in common law legal system. Lower courts anticipate that a case may be brought before the Supreme Court or the Constitutional Court, they tend to respect the legal views of these highest courts in similar cases. Sources of Slovak codified law are divided according to their legal force into three levels, namely constitutional laws, ordinary laws and by-laws. The norm of lower legal force must not contradict the norm of higher legal force. The executive power in the field of environment is performed by the Ministry of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture.

Other environmental administration bodies (district offices) and special environmental agencies, which perform specific tasks in the field of the environmental protection, are subordinate to the government and ministries. It is, for example, Slovak Environmental Inspectorate (StZP) – a specialized supervisory authority providing for state supervision and imposing fines on matters concerning environment protection, and carrying out public administration and decision making in the field of integrated pollution prevention and control.

Some competencies in the field of environmental protection are entrusted to municipalities.
Natural and legal persons and NGOs can participate in the environmental protection through several types of legal action. They can protect their personal rights including health and privacy and their ownership rights relating to the environment through civil proceedings under the Civil Code. They can participate in administrative proceedings relating to the environment conducted by public authorities and can subsequently bring actions against acts (e.g. decisions) of public authorities within the system of administrative justice in accordance with the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure. They can initiate criminal proceedings in the case of an environmental crime or other proceedings (carried out by special environmental supervisory authorities) in the case of an infringement of environmental regulations. They can protect their environmental constitutional rights and rights guaranteed by international conventions by filing constitutional complaints with the Constitutional Court.

The basic principle is that in administrative proceedings and in judicial procedures, the legal standing is provided for anyone (natural or legal persons) directly affected by the case (e.g. by proposed project). Judicial protection of the environment was originally based on the view that everyone can only protect their individual right in court and that the right to a favourable environment belongs only to natural persons and not to legal persons or NGOs, and therefore NGOs can only protect their procedural rights in court, and they cannot challenge a violation of a substantive provision of the law. However, as a result of the adoption of the Aarhus Convention and the effect of EU law, the interpretation has finally prevailed that in cases subject to the Aarhus Convention, NGOs can also challenge violations of substantive law (substantive legal provisions) and violations of the right to a favourable environment.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The Constitution of the Slovak Republic explicitly enshrines the rights of everyone to a favourable environment, the right to information about the environment and the right of access to a court, which also applies to cases in environmental matters. According to Article 44 paragraph 1 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to a favourable environment. According to Article 44 paragraph 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the Constitution, everyone is obliged to protect and enhance the environment and no one may endanger or damage the environment and natural resources beyond the extent laid down by law; the state looks after a cautious use of natural resources, protection of agricultural and forest land, ecological balance, and effective environmental care, and provides for the protection of specified species of wild plants and animals, and agricultural and forest land are non-renewable natural resources and enjoy special protection by the state and society. According to Article 44 paragraph 6 of the Constitution, the details on the rights and duties set out in Article 44 must be laid down by a law.

The Constitution also enshrines the “general” right of access to information and, consequently, the special right of access to environmental information. According to Article 26 paragraph 5 of the Constitution, public authority bodies are obliged to provide information on their activities in an appropriate manner and in the state language. This paragraph also stipulates, that conditions and manner of execution of this obligation shall be laid down by law. According to Article 45 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to timely and complete information about the state of the environment and about the causes and consequences of its condition.

However, according to Article 51 par. 1 of the Constitution, the direct application of environmental constitutional provisions is problematic. This provision stipulates that the right to environmental protection as well as the access to justice may be claimed only within the scope of the laws implementing these provisions.

Constitutional right of access to court (access to justice) is guaranteed in Article 46 of the Constitution. This right covers access to justice in environmental matters as well. According to Article 46 paragraph 1 of the Constitution, everyone may claim his or her right by procedures laid down by a law at an independent and impartial court.

The right to judicial review of administrative decisions is explicitly guaranteed in the next paragraph. According to Article 46 paragraph 2 of the Constitution, anyone who claims to have been deprived of his rights by a decision of a public administration body may turn to the court to have the lawfulness of such decision reviewed. The Constitution explicitly stipulates that the review of decisions concerning basic rights and freedoms may not be excluded from the jurisdiction of courts.

Citizens can, in principle, invoke the constitutional right to a favourable environment in administrative proceedings and in proceedings within the administrative judiciary. However, as individual implementing laws specify this constitutional right, the citizens in administrative or judicial procedures must also invoke specific rights set forth in the implementing laws or applicable provisions of international law.

Slovak courts recognize that the Aarhus Convention is an international convention which takes precedence over national laws. The Constitutional Court has explicitly stated that it is also reviewing the compliance of national laws with the Aarhus Convention. The Aarhus Convention is therefore explicitly recognized as a binding human rights law concerning access to justice in environmental matters.

The amendment to the Act concerning the acceleration of the construction of motorways (Act No. 669/2007 Coll.), adopted in 2017, excluded the power of the administrative court to grant the suspensive effect of administrative actions against a zoning decision for construction of motorways and building permits for the construction of motorways. The Constitutional Court, by its decision of PL. US 18 / 2017-152 of 4 November 2020, decided that this law is in conflict with Art. 9 par. 4 of the Aarhus Convention, which enshrines the right of the public for an administrative court to order an “injunctive relief” following an administrative action against a project authorization decision. The Constitutional Court stated in the decision: “Part of the right to judicial protection in environmental matters is (also) the possibility of the administrative court to effectively verify the compliance of the zoning decision for highway construction or building permit for highway construction with the conclusions of the environmental impact assessment process. Here, too, the Constitutional Court notes that the possible suspensive effect of an administrative action does not occur ex lege, but only by a decision of the administrative court based on a judicious assessment. ... The Constitutional Court has therefore ruled that the provision of ... the law ... in relation to a zoning decision for the construction of a motorway and a building permit for the construction of a motorway is not in accordance with Article 9 § 4 of the Aarhus Convention.”

Following the ruling of the Court of Justice of the EU in the Slovak brown bear case (C-240/09, Lesoschobranske zoskupenie VLK), the Slovak administrative courts recognize that the Aarhus Convention must be taken into account when applying national law and that they are obliged to interpret provisions of national law in accordance with the Aarhus Convention. Reference is often made to Article 9 para. 3 of the Aarhus Convention. The Supreme Court has stated in several judgments that relevant procedural legislation must be interpreted in order to guarantee environmental organisation access to justice in environmental administrative cases (see the judgments below).

According to the ruling of the Court of Justice of the EU in Krüll case (C-416/10) national courts must interpret the procedural rules concerning the integrated permitting of operations with a significant impact on the environment under the Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Act (IPPC) in accordance with the Aarhus Convention and EU law. According to the CJEU ruling, a national court is obliged, of its own motion, to make a request for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice of the European Union even though it is ruling on a referral back to it after its first decision was set aside by the Constitutional court and even though a national rule obliges it to resolve the dispute by following the legal opinion of that latter court. According to the CJEU ruling, national authorities are obliged to interpret procedural law in such a way that the public concerned have access to an urban planning decision procedure from the beginning of the authorization procedure for the installation. According to the CJEU ruling, the competent national authorities are not entitled to refuse the public concerned access to such a decision by relying on the protection of the confidentiality of commercial or industrial information.
According to the CJEU ruling, procedural law must be interpreted as meaning that members of the public concerned must be able to ask the court to order interim measures such as temporarily to suspend the application of a permit, pending the final decision of the administrative court.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts
Act No. 71/1967 Coll. on administrative procedure (Administrative Procedure Code)
Act No. 40/1964 Coll. Civil Code
Act No. 71/1992 Coll. on court fees
Act No. 211/2000 Coll. on free access to information (Freedom of Information Act)
Act No. 24/2006 Coll. on environmental impact assessment (EIA Act)
Act No. 39/2013 Coll. on integrated environmental pollution prevention and control (IPPC Act)
Act No. 359/2007 Coll. on prevention and remedy of environmental damages (Environmental Liability Act)
Act No. 569/2007 Coll on geological works (Geological Act)
Act No. 543/2002 Coll. on nature and landscape protection (Nature Conservation Act)
Act No. 50/1976 Coll. on land-use planning and building rules (Building Act)
Act No. 44/1988 Coll. on the protection and use of mineral resources (Mining Act)
Act No. 541/2004 Coll. on peaceful use of nuclear energy (Atomic Act)
Act No. 326/2005 Coll. on forests
Act No. 137/2010 Coll. on air
Act No. 364/2004 Coll. on water
Act No. 79/2015 Coll. on waste

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases
The Supreme Court reviews the decisions of lower courts in administrative, civil and criminal cases. In administrative cases the Supreme Court acts on the basis of a cassation complaint and has cassation power. There are however exemptions from this rule. When reviewing the decisions imposing administrative penalties (fines), the courts may, in addition to cancelling the decision, also moderate the penalty. If the court annuls the administrative decision on refusing the information, it can also order the administrative authority to disclose the information. In the case of different legal opinions and disagreement between the panels (chambers) of the Supreme Court, the Grand Panel (Chamber) of the Supreme Court must issue a unifying decision for sake of uniform judicial decision-making. This also applies to administrative cases and environmental cases. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the legal opinion expressed in the decision of the Grand Chamber is binding on the chambers of the Supreme Court. If the chamber of the Supreme Court wishes to deviate from the legal opinion expressed in the decision of the Grand Chamber, it must refer the case to the Grand Chamber for consideration and decision. Decisions of the Supreme Court in cases similar to those dealt with by lower courts are not formally binding on those lower courts. However, as lower courts anticipate that a case may be brought before the Supreme Court, they tend to respect the Supreme Court's legal views in similar cases. Examples of application of the Aarhus Convention by the Supreme Court with regard to standing of environmental non-governmental organizations: Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 5 Szp 41/2009, of 12 April 2011: In the opinion of the Supreme Court, international legal obligations (i.e. the Aarhus Convention) “ultimately have the effect of undermining the classical concept of standing of individuals in proceedings before administrative authorities by granting the status of party to proceedings to the public or in some cases to the public concerned with environmental protection.” The Supreme Court then stated as follows: “...only such an interpretation of procedural law (...) that enables an environmental organization such as the applicant to challenge a decision taken in an administrative procedure, which may be contrary to Community law in the field of the environment, in the court (...) will take account of the objectives of Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention, as well as the objective of effective judicial protection of the rights conferred by Community law.”
Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 3 Szp 30/2009, of 2 June 2011: “In the light of the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union C-240/09 of 08.03.2011, the panel of the appellate court [the Supreme Court], by an extensive euro-conform interpretation (...) assumed that the applicant (...) had the same scope of rights as he would have had in a position of a party to the proceedings. The party to the proceedings pursuant to § 14 par. 1 of the Administrative Procedure Code is the person who is the bearer of a legal right, legally protected interest or obligation (which results from a substantive law) and such a right, legally protected interest or obligation is a matter for the administrative authority to decide. The national authority must always strive for a euro-conform interpretation of national law (interpretation in conformity with Community law). The national court may, by means of a euro-conform interpretation, fill in the gaps in national law. However, the Court of Justice of the European Union stated that Article 9 para. 3 of the Aarhus Convention has no direct effect in European Union law. It was necessary to broaden the above definition of a party to the proceeding by a broad interpretation, and the same range of rights as a party to the proceeding is required to be granted to other persons (in particular the right to bring an action designed to ensure the protection of rights) in order to ensure effective protection of the environment.”
Example of application of the Aarhus Convention by the Supreme Court with regard to access to information: Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 3 Sël 22/2014, of 9 June 2015: “The Supreme Court of the Slovak Republic points out that in the case under review the applicability of the provisions of the Aarhus Convention to the present case cannot be ruled out, as the Slovak Republic has recognized its precedence over laws (the Aarhus Convention was published in the Collection of Laws under No. 43/2006 and in the “priority clause” was referred to as an international agreement, which in accordance with Article 7 par. 5 of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic takes precedence over laws). The Aarhus Convention enshrines in Art. 4 par. 3 and 4, the possibility of refusing access to information when, after the evaluation of individual points, the required information cannot be excluded according to any of the above. At the end of Art. 4 of the Aarhus Convention it is stipulated that the grounds for refusal must be interpreted in a restrictive way, taking into account the public interest served by disclosure and taking into account whether the information requested relates to emissions into the environment. According to Art. 2 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention, the content of information (publication of a document from the preliminary safety report) is precisely information on the impact of Mochovce nuclear power plant activities on individual components of the environment, i.e. water, soil, landscape, landscape, energy, emissions. According to Art. 4 par. 4 letter D second sentence of the Aarhus Convention, information on emissions that is important from the point of view of environmental protection must be made available. The defendant refused to provide all the requested information and also confirmed the non-disclosure of information regarding emissions. In the contested administrative decisions, the defendant did not state the reason why the requested information was not provided in its entirety and did not state the reason why there was not the possibility of its partial disclosure, which is also envisaged by the Aarhus Convention in Art 4 par. 6. The principle of confidentiality of this specific information, the disclosure of which could indeed jeopardize established interests, is enshrined here, but the remaining information is to be disclosed. The analysis of the Aarhus Convention shows no reason, on the one hand, to reject the application of the Aarhus Convention itself and, on the other hand, to refuse to disclose environmental information relating to the interim safety report.”
5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Parties to the administrative procedure can directly rely on international environmental agreements.

According to Article 7 paragraph 2 of the Constitution the legally binding acts of the European Union shall have priority over the laws of the Slovak Republic.

According to Article 7 paragraph 5 of the Constitution the international treaties on human rights and international treaties for whose exercise a law is not necessary, and international treaties which directly confer rights or impose duties on natural persons or legal persons and which are ratified and promulgated in the way laid down by a law shall have precedence over laws.

The Parliament of the Slovak Republic agreed to the Aarhus Convention and the convention became valid for the Slovak Republic on 5 March 2006. The Aarhus Convention became part of the national legal system as an international treaty on human rights which has precedence over laws by being published in the Collection of Acts of the Slovak Republic under No. 43/2006 Coll.

According to the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union the Aarhus Convention is an integral part of the legal order of the European Union. National courts must also take into account the provisions of the Aarhus Convention, which do not have "direct effect" and are not sufficiently specific and precise. National courts are required to interpret the national law "to the fullest extent possible" in accordance with "the objective of effective judicial protection of the rights conferred by EU law" (Case C-240/09, Lesoochranárske zoskupenie VLK).

There are several decisions of the Supreme Court (see above) and lower courts in which courts interpreted provisions of national law in accordance with the Aarhus Convention in order to achieve the objectives of the Aarhus Convention – e.g. access to environmental information or access to justice of the members of public (e.g. non-governmental organizations). Based on these court decisions, the public authorities subsequently applied the Aarhus Convention in administrative proceedings, interpreted the national law in conformity with the Aarhus Convention and EU law and granted the rights arising from the Aarhus Convention to non-governmental organizations.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

The Slovak court system consists of:

- 54 district courts (okresné súdy),
- 8 regional courts (krajské súdy),
- Specialised Criminal Court (Špecializovaný trestný súd),
- Supreme Court (Najvyšší súd),
- Constitutional Court (Ústavný súd).

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The court agenda can be divided into civil and commercial matters, criminal matters and administrative matters.

The courts rule on civil and criminal matters and review the legality of decisions made by administrative bodies. Judges sit on panels (chambers) unless the law prescribes that the matter is to be decided by a single judge.

In civil matters courts decide on rights and disputes arising from Civil Code, Commercial Code and other legal regulations in the sphere of private law – e.g. cases concerning personality rights, privacy or ownership rights and cases when someone infringes these rights (these typically concerns emissions of noise, chemical substances etc.).

In criminal matters courts decide on guilt and punishment for criminal offences defined in the Criminal Code.

In administrative cases, courts review the legality of decisions or measures of public authorities or they can order the public authority to issue a decision when the public authority remains inactive.

The Constitutional Court has the power to review the constitutionality of any legislation. In addition, the Constitutional Court can hear individual complaints against violations of constitutional rights by any other public authorities (including other courts), subject to exhaustion of other remedies. When the Constitutional Court finds that a particular piece of legislation was adopted in violation of the constitution, it has the power to annul such legislation. After the exhaustion of all legal remedies, the Constitutional Court can review the lower court’s decision – a party has to file a constitutional complaint invoking infringement of a specific constitutional right by the court decision. If the Constitutional Court finds that the constitutional right was violated by decision of other court (or a public authority), it has the power to annul such a decision.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no special courts, tribunals or expert judges to decide environmental cases in Slovakia. Administrative cases related to environmental matters are decided by administrative panels (chambers) of regional courts and panels (chambers) of the administrative division of the Supreme Court.

In environmental cases, specific expert knowledge from the environmental field is often needed. In civil cases, for example cases concerning infringement of property rights by emissions (imisie), expert opinions are used, which are often decisive for the case.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

Administrative courts have cassation powers. They can annul a decision of public authority and send the case back for a new proceeding.

However, there are two exceptions. In access to information cases, in addition to annulling the decision, the courts have a discretionary power to order disclosure of the information requested. When reviewing the decisions imposing administrative sanctions (e.g. penalties), the courts may, in addition to cancelling the decision, also moderate the sanction. The courts may change the type or amount of the sanction (e.g. amount of penalty), if this sanction is disproportionate to the nature of the act or would be of a liquidating nature for the plaintiff, or refrain from imposing a sanction if the purpose of administrative punishment can also be achieved by the hearing of the case itself.

In environmental matters the court may act only on the basis of a motion - a petition (complaint). The court may not initiate court proceedings in environmental matters on its own motion.

However, courts have discretion in assessing evidence. According to the procedural codes, the court evaluates the evidence at its discretion, each piece of evidence individually and all pieces of evidence in their mutual connection. The expert opinion is not binding on the judge. It is considered as part of the evidence. The court evaluates all the evidence including the expert opinion at its discretion.

The courts also have a certain discretion in awarding costs. For example, the administrative court may decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are “grounds for special consideration”. The administrative court must grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be “reasonably demanded”.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)
The system of administrative procedure in Slovakia is generally regulated by the Administrative Procedure Code (Act No. 71/1967 Coll.) and specific acts in various areas of public administration, including environmental protection and its specific branches (nature and landscape protection, water protection, air protection, waste management, forest protection, EIA and IPPC procedures etc).

The Act No. 525/2003 Coll. on the state administration of environmental care sets out the structure and competences of environmental authorities. According to this act the state administration bodies for the protection of the environment are:

- Ministry of the Environment,
- District Offices in the seat of the region,
- Slovak Environmental Inspectorate,
- municipalities (perform state administration to the extent stipulated by special laws).

The Ministry of the Environment manages and controls the performance of the state administration, which is performed by the district offices in the seat of the region and the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate, performs public administration to the extent provided by special regulations (e.g. in EIA cases subject to mandatory assessment), decides on an appeal against the decision of the district office in the seat of the region etc.

The district office acts as territorial environmental authorities in most environmental administrative cases.

The district office in the seat of the region is the appellate body in matters on which the district office or municipality decides in the first instance.

The Slovak Environmental Inspectorate is generally a specialized supervisory body performing state supervision in matters of environmental protection, but it also performs public administration and decision-making in the field of integrated pollution prevention and control.

Municipalities perform certain powers in the field of air protection, waste management, tree protection, etc.

According to the Forest Act, state administration in the field of forestry is performed by the Ministry of Agriculture, the district office in the seat of the region, the district office and the Slovak Forestry and Wood Inspectorate.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Administrative environmental decisions can be taken to court after the administrative appeal has been exhausted and a decision on the appeal has been taken. As a general principle of Slovak administrative law, it is possible to file an appeal against administrative decisions to a superior administrative body. The administrative appeal to a superior administrative body must be exhausted before the administrative decision can be further appealed before the court. But there is an exception. The plaintiff is not obliged to exhaust the administrative appeal in a situation where there is no possibility of administrative appeal, because of an explicit regulation by law. According to § 7a of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the obligation to exhaust the administrative appeal does not also apply to the “interested public”, if it was not entitled to file an administrative appeal. This applies to cases where the “interested public” does not have the status of a “party to the proceedings”, but another status in the proceedings that does not include the right to file an administrative appeal (e.g. “participating person”).

Similarly, the administrative remedies have to be exhausted before taking a case to administrative court, also in case of omissions (illegal inaction) of the administrative authorities. The plaintiff must exhaust a “complaint of inaction” pursuant to a special law or a complaint to the prosecutor’s office.

The final ruling of the administrative court is usually issued 1 – 2 years after the case was taken to court. The ruling of the first instance (regional) administrative court can be further reviewed on the basis of a cassation complaint by the Supreme Court. The procedure before the Supreme Court usually lasts about 1 year.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special environmental courts. The regional courts (administrative division) review all administrative decisions, including administrative decisions related to the environment. There is a possibility to file a cassation complaint against their decision to the Supreme Court.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

It is generally possible to file an appeal against administrative decisions, including the environmental ones, to a superior administrative body (§ 53 of the Administrative Procedure Code).

The district office in the seat of the region decides on the appeal against the decisions of the district office. The Ministry of the Environment decides on appeals against decisions of the district office in the seat of the region.

Administrative decisions can be taken to court only after the appeal has been decided (with above mentioned exceptions).

Courts review both the procedural and the substantive legality of administrative decisions.

The judgments of regional courts can be reviewed, on the basis of cassation complaint, by the Supreme Court. The cassation complaint is considered to be an extraordinary remedy, as it does not postpone the legal force of the first instance decision.

The Supreme Court may, on the motion of the complainant, grant a cassation complaint the suspensive effect, if the legal consequences of the decision of the regional court would pose a threat of serious harm and the granting of a suspensive effect is not contrary to the public interest (§ 447 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

In addition to the administrative appeal against the administrative decision, there are some extraordinary remedies under administrative law.

If the decision of the administrative body is illegal, anyone (including the party to the proceedings) may initiate extra-appellate proceedings (mimo-odvolacie konanie) by applying for the extra-appellate review of an administrative decision after the expiry of the time limit for a proper appeal. Upon this application, the superior administrative body may annul the illegal decision of the subordinate administrative body.

Administrative proceedings terminated by a decision which is valid can be renewed (obnova) at the request of a party to the proceedings if new facts or evidence have emerged which could have had a significant effect on the decision; the decision depended on the assessment of a preliminary question decided otherwise by the competent authority;

due to maladministration by an administrative authority, a party was deprived of the opportunity to participate in the proceedings, if this could have had a material effect on the decision; the decision was issued by the excluded (e.g. biased) authority the decision is based on evidence which has been shown to be false or the decision has been obtained through a criminal offence.

The administrative authority must order the renewal of the proceedings for the reasons set out above if there is a general interest in doing so.

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure a party to the administrative court proceedings may bring an action for renewal of the proceedings (záloha na obnovu konania) against a valid decision of the administrative court if a decision has been rendered against a party to the proceedings as a result of a criminal offence by a judge, another party to the proceedings or a person participating in the proceedings.

The European Court of Human Rights ruled that the decision of the Administrative Court had violated the fundamental human rights of the party to the proceedings and that the serious consequences of this violation had not been remedied by satisfaction, the decision of the administrative court is contrary to the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union, the Council of the European Union or the Commission, which is binding on the parties.

Slovak national courts have the possibility, and in some cases obligation, to ask the Court of Justice of the European Union under Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union questions on the interpretation or validity of European law (introduce a preliminary reference). The article states that if such a question arises in proceedings before a court of a Member State whose decision cannot be challenged under national law, that court must refer the matter to the Court of Justice of the European Union. The only exceptions are situations where the interpretation of European Union law does not create problems in its context (acte clair) or where the uncertainty of interpretation has already been overcome by the case-law of the Court (acte éclairé).

According to § 100/1/a of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the administrative court must suspend the proceedings the preliminary reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union has been made. If a party to the court proceedings requests that the court suspend the proceedings and refer the matter to the European Court of Justice, the court must state why the application has been rejected if the application is rejected.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

Mediation is a voluntary, confidential process in which a neutral mediator helps the disputing parties to negotiate a settlement. The mediation process is regulated by Act No. 420/2004 Coll. on mediation. Mediation is suitable for resolving disputes and is mostly used in civil matters. No one can force the other party to take part in the mediation, but in some cases the mediation can be initiated by a court - the court can inform the parties about the mediation, call on the parties to try mediation, or even order the first meeting with the mediator. Once the parties have agreed in the mediation, they conclude an agreement. The agreement which arose as a result of mediation is in writing and is binding on the persons involved in mediation. On the basis of the agreement, the creditor may file a motion for judicial enforcement, if this agreement is written in the form of a notarial record or approved as a settlement before a court or an arbitration tribunal. However, mediation is practically never used in environmental matters.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson if applicable, public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

A person may file a motion for the administrative section of the public prosecutor's office, in which he/she asks the public prosecutor to file the “objection” (protest) against an illegal administrative decision. On the basis of this motion the public prosecutor can file a protest against the illegal administrative decision and propose to the authority which issued the decision to annul it. If neither this body nor the superior body accepts the protest, the prosecutor may file a lawsuit against the illegal administrative decision. It is however fully in the discretion of the prosecutor whether he/she will do so.

The prosecutor is also entitled to file an action against the illegal inaction (omission) if the public administration body has remained inactive even after the prosecutor has informed the public administration body of its illegal inaction.

The Ombudsperson deals with all cases where administrative bodies act or omit to act in breach of the law, principles of the democratic state of law, or principles of good government. This also covers environmental cases. The Ombudsperson examines citizens' petitions alleging that their rights have been violated. If the petition concerns a valid administrative decision of a public authority that is considered illegal by the Ombudsperson, he/she may refer the case to the Public Prosecutor's Office, which may lodge a protest against the illegal decision.

The Ombudsperson may initiate its inquiry ex officio. In 2016, the Ombudsperson conducted an inquiry and published a report on compliance with environmental protection in the permitting of small hydropower plants in Slovakia. The report indicates errors in the permission processes for the construction of small hydropower plants in Slovakia.

However, even if the Ombudsperson concludes that the administrative authority has violated the law, he/she may only recommend to the authority to take corrective measures, not impose them. These bodies are obliged to inform the Ombudsperson on the measures undertaken. If not respected, the Ombudsperson may contact a superior authority or the government and inform the general public. The Ombudsperson cannot interfere with the decision-making activities of the courts.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

The general concept for standing in the administrative judiciary is generally based on the impairment of right theory.

According to § 178/1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the plaintiff who has a standing in the administrative judiciary is a natural person or legal entity who claims that, as a party to an administrative proceeding, he has been deprived of his rights or legally protected interests by a decision of a public administration body or a measure of a public administration body.

However, based on the effects of the Aarhus Convention and EU law, national law established a special standing for the "interested public".

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

The EIA process is not finalized by a development consent (permit) in the Slovak legal system, but by an "EIA statement", which represents a binding basis for subsequent development consent. However, decisions issued in the EIA procedure can be challenged and reviewed separately in the administrative court.

Act No. 24/2006 Coll. on Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA Act) regulates the procedure of environmental impact assessment. The projects listed in Annex no. 8 of the EIA Act are subject to EIA procedure and are divided into those that are subject to obligatory EIA assessment and those that are subject to the screening procedure. The outcome of the screening procedure is a decision as to whether the proposed project will be subject to obligatory EIA assessment or not.

The EIA procedure is an administrative proceeding regulated by the Administrative Procedure Code.

In the EIA procedure, the parties to the administrative proceedings are those whose rights, obligations or legally protected interests may be affected in the proceedings.

The status of a party to the proceedings also belongs to the “public concerned”, if it meets the legal conditions (set out in § 24 par. 2 to 5 of the EIA Act).

The public concerned has the status of a party to the obligatory EIA assessment procedure and to the screening procedure (and subsequently the status of a participant in the permitting procedure for the proposed project) if it submits a reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure (project proposal, scoping phase, evaluation report) and attaches document formalities (statute in the case of NGOs).

The public concerned can also become a party to the proceedings by lodging an appeal against an administrative decision in the EIA procedure.

Anyone (including natural persons or NGOs) can become the "public concerned" and party to the proceedings if they meet the above mentioned conditions.

The party to the proceedings may file an administrative appeal against the decision from the EIA procedure, which is decided by the superior administrative body. An administrative appeal may be lodged against the decision in the screening procedure as well as against the decision in obligatory EIA assessment procedure – so called "final EIA statement".

The public concerned, which has participated in the EIA procedure (in the screening procedure or in obligatory EIA assessment procedure) and has exhausted an administrative appeal against the administrative decision, may bring an administrative action within the administrative judiciary against the valid decision in the screening procedure as well as against the decision in obligatory EIA assessment procedure (final EIA statement).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and Individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)
Legal standing in administrative proceedings:

Legal standing (right to be a party to the proceedings) in the administrative proceedings is generally regulated by the Administrative Procedure Code. However, some special environmental laws regulate the standing in administrative proceedings (and define the status of a party to the administrative proceedings) in a different way from the general regulation in the Administrative Procedure Code. These laws include, for example, the Building Act, the Nature Conservation Act, the IPPC Act or the EIA Act.

In administrative proceedings, the basic principle of "standing" is that the rights or obligations of a party to the proceedings may be possibly directly affected by an administrative decision.

According to § 14 par. 1 of the Administrative Procedure Code the party to the proceedings is the person whose rights, legally protected interests or obligations are to be decided on, who claims that he/she may be directly affected by the decision in his/her rights, legally protected interests or obligations, until the contrary is proved.

This general rule is modified by some sectoral acts, e.g.:

Act no. 50/1976 Coll. Building Act, which regulates the issuing of permits for many projects with significant impact on the environment, includes autonomous definitions of parties to the administrative proceedings for issuing the land use and building permits. According to the Building Act, natural and legal persons whose ownership or other rights to land or buildings, as well as to neighbouring land and buildings, including flats, may be directly affected by the decision are also parties to the proceedings. The provision of § 140c par. 8 of the Building Act stipulates that the person who was not a party to the proceedings also has the right to appeal against a permit on the location of a building, a permit on the use of land, a building permit and a permit on the use of a building, which was preceded by a screening procedure or an obligatory EIA assessment procedure under the EIA Act. By filing an appeal, the person becomes a party to the proceedings (and subsequently may bring an action against the permit in court). But this person can only object in the appeal that the permit is inconsistent with the content of the screening decision or with the content of the final EIA statement.

Act no. 543/2002 Coll. on nature and landscape protection (Nature Conservation Act) regulates, inter alia, permitting interventions in protected parts of nature or in the conditions for the protection of protected species of animals and plants. In addition to the applicant for a permit, the party to the proceedings is also an association (NGO), whose subject of activity for at least one year is nature and landscape protection and which has submitted a preliminary and general application for participation in the proceedings is a party to the proceedings if it has confirmed its interest in being a party to the individual administrative proceedings initiated.

Act no. 39/2013 Coll. on integrated environmental pollution prevention and control regulates integrated permitting of projects with a significant impact on the environment. In addition to the parties to the proceedings pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Code (i.e. persons whose rights may be directly affected or who claim that their rights may be directly affected), the party to the proceedings is also the municipality in which the permitted operation is located or is to be located, and the public concerned. The public concerned is, inter alia, defined as a legal person (including NGO) supporting the protection of the environment that was established at least two years before applying as a party to the proceedings. The law explicitly stipulates that this organization is considered to be a person whose right to a favourable environment may be affected by the administrative decision on permit. The public concerned must become a party to the proceedings on the day of delivery of the written application to the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate submitted after the publication of the application for a project permit.

Act No. 24/2006 Coll. on environmental impact assessment (EIA Act) is very important for access to justice, because by participating in the EIA procedure the public becomes the "public concerned" and thus becomes a party to all subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization (i.e. permit proceeding under the Building Act, IPPC Act, Atomic Act, Mining Act, Act on Forests, Nature Conservation Act etc.).

In particular, by submitting a reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure (project proposal, scoping phase, evaluation report) or by lodging an appeal against a decision in a screening procedure or against final EIA statement, the public (which means "anyone" - any natural or legal person including NGO) expresses its interest in the project and thus becomes a "public concerned" that has the status of a party to the proceedings under the EIA Act (EIA procedures, i.e. screening procedure and obligatory EIA assessment procedure) and also the status of a party in the subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization regulated by sectoral laws (e.g. permit proceeding under the Building Act, IPPC Act, Atomic Act, Mining Act, Act on Forests, Nature Conservation Act etc.).

In particular, the term "public concerned" is defined by the EIA Act as the public (which means anyone - any natural or legal person including NGO) affected or likely to be affected by environmental proceedings, or having an interest in environmental proceedings.

According to § 24 par. 3 of the EIA Act, the public has an interest in the project and in the proceeding for authorization of the project if it submits reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure (project proposal, scoping phase, evaluation report). The EIA Act further expressly provides that a non-governmental organization promoting the protection of the environment and meeting the requirements laid down in the EIA Act (i.e. submitting a reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure and submitting of a statute of NGO) has an interest in such proceedings and thus is a public concerned.

Individuals can also join in a citizens' initiative and submit a joint opinion. According to § 24 par. 6 of the EIA Act, a citizens' initiative is at least three natural persons over the age of 18 who sign a joint opinion on project. The citizens' initiative must submit a list of its members, which must include the names and surnames, permanent residence, year of birth and signatures of the persons supporting the joint position and who is the representative of the citizens' initiative.

According to § 24 par. 2 of the EIA Act, the right of the public concerned to a favourable environment may be directly affected by the authorization of the proposed activity or its amendment or the subsequent implementation of the proposed activity or its change. This provision guarantees that the public concerned may, in administrative or judicial proceedings, also challenge a breach of substantive law, not just a breach of procedural law.

There is no special provision concerning the possibility of the foreign NGOs to participate in the environmental administrative proceedings. Foreign NGOs should be able take part in these administrative proceedings when they meet the same requirements as the Slovak ones.

Legal standing in court proceedings:

The Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure ensures the right of access to the court for "the interested public". The term "interested public" may have a different meaning than the term "public concerned" mentioned above.

According to § 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, if the "interested public" has the right under a special regulation to participate in administrative proceedings in environmental matters, it is entitled to bring an action before the court against administrative decision or administrative measure to bring an action before the court against illegal inactivity of the public authority, to bring an action before the court against a generally binding regulation (e.g. zoning plan regulating land use and building permissions).

This means that according to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the "interested public" is a person who has the "right to participate in administrative proceedings" concerning environmental matters under specific environmental laws.
The “interested public” may be a natural person, legal entity, local civic association, or environmental non-governmental organization. In practice, there are also cases where both the municipality and the foreign legal entity (foreign environmental NGO) have become “interested public”.

In this context, it is important how the “interested public” is defined in the sector-specific laws governing administrative proceedings in the field of the environment.

In order for a member of the public to be the “interested public” within the meaning of the Code of Judicial Administrative Procedure and to have the right to bring an action before the court, he/she must satisfy the conditions laid down. In particular, the fulfillment of the condition that a member of the public has a “right to participate in administrative proceedings pursuant to a special regulation” is essential. The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” is a broader concept than a status of a “party to the administrative proceedings”. It is a difference compared to the previous legislation, where legal standing in proceedings before the administrative court was limited exclusively to a “party to the administrative proceedings”.

The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” thus includes the right to be “a party to the proceedings” (e.g. § 82 of Act No. 543/2002 Coll. on nature and landscape protection, § 24 of Act No. 24/2006 Coll. on environmental impact assessment, § 9 of Act No. 39/2013 Coll. on integrated pollution prevention and control), the right to be a “participating person”, which has a narrower scope of rights than a “party to the proceedings” (Section 67 of Act No. 326/2005 Coll. on forests in conjunction with the provisions of Section 15a of the Administrative Procedure Code), the right of “other participation” (e.g. participation in approving of land use plans (zoning plans) according to § 12 to 18 of the Building Act, participation in approving of the air protection plan according to § 10 of Act No. 137/210 Coll. on air, participation in approving of the river basin management plan according to § 13 of Act No. 354/2004 Coll. on water).

According to § 7 letter (a) of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the party to the proceedings must exhaust ordinary remedies against the challenged administrative decision (i.e. administrative appeal) before bringing an action before the court. However, the law explicitly states that the obligation to exhaust all ordinary remedies will not apply to the “interested public” if the interested public has not been entitled to an ordinary remedy (appeal). In cases where the “interested public” does not have the status of a “party to the proceedings” according to a special regulation, but “another form” of participation in the proceedings (e.g. a “participating person”), it cannot fulfil the requirement to exhaust ordinary remedies (appeal). The requirement to exhaust the ordinary remedies (appeals) therefore does not apply to the “interested public” in this case.

According to § 178 par. 3 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the “interested public” is entitled to bring an administrative action before a court against a decision of a public authority or a measure of a public authority if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

According to the Constitution, everyone has the right to legal assistance in court proceedings, or proceedings before other state or public administration bodies from the start of the proceedings, under conditions laid down by law. Anyone who declares that he does not have a command of the language in which the proceedings are conducted has the right to an interpreter (Article 47 par. 2 and 4).

In the opinion of the Constitutional Court, the right to an interpreter does not guarantee the interpretation exclusively into the mother tongue. It is sufficient if the interpretation is in a language in which the person is able to communicate. A necessary condition for the right to an interpreter is a declaration by the person that he or she does not speak the language of the proceedings.

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the parties to the proceedings have the same rights and obligations in proceedings before the administrative court (§ 53). Everyone has the right to act before an administrative court in his or her mother tongue or in a language he or she understands. The administrative court is obliged to ensure that the parties to the proceedings have equal opportunities to exercise their rights. Taking into account the nature and circumstances of the case, the administrative court will provide an interpreter (§ 54 par. 1). The costs of the party acting in his mother tongue or in a language which he understands will be borne by the state (§ 54 par. 2).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview of specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of the judge, calling for an expert in the procedure.

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the parties are required to indicate the evidence in support of their allegations. The court must decide which proposed evidence to take.

The court does not have to accept unnecessary or irrelevant motions. In this case, however, the court is obliged to state the reasons for which evidence was not taken.

The court may also take evidence other than that proposed if it considers it necessary for a decision in the case.

The court is not bound by the facts established by the public authority and may itself take evidence it considers necessary for a decision on the case or to decide on administrative sanctions, on actions against inaction of a public authority or on actions against unlawful intervention of a public authority.

The court evaluates the evidence at its discretion, each piece of evidence individually and all pieces of evidence in their mutual connection.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

In administrative judicial procedure there is no limited period of time for introducing new evidence, until the end of the court proceedings. However, in the case of action against administrative decision all the claims must be formulated within the two-month period that is reserved for bringing an action.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registers of experts.

The parties and the court can ask an expert for expert opinions. The expert can be appointed by the court or hired by the party. Parties may submit expert opinions to the court. The rules for experts are set out in the Act No. 382/2004 Coll. on experts, interpreters and translators.

There is publicly available list of experts on the website of the Ministry of Justice.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

The expert opinion is not binding on the judge. It is considered as part of the evidence. The court evaluates all evidence including the expert opinion at its discretion.

The expert can only express an opinion on issues related to his area of expertise, not on legal issues. Legal issues are considered by the court.

According to the law, the expert must describe in the expert opinion how he came to the conclusions. The expert opinion must make it possible to examine its content and verify its validity.

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the credibility of any evidence taken may be questioned. If the court does not respect the expert opinion, it has to give due reasons for it in the court decision.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The court calls upon the experts on the proposal of the parties to the proceedings or on its own initiative. The parties may comment on the selection of the expert and on the questions to be answered in the expert's opinion. If the expert's report contains inconsistencies, the parties may request that another expert's report be drawn up to verify the conclusions of the original report. According to the law, the expert is excluded if, due to his relationship to the matter, to the party to the proceeding or to another person to whom the expert opinion relates, it is possible to have doubts about his impartiality. If there is a reason to exclude an expert, the expert opinion cannot be used as evidence.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
The expert opinion submitted by the parties is of the same relevance as the opinion requested by the court. Each party may select an expert from the official lists of experts and ask him to draw up an expert opinion.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
The expert is entitled to a fee for the provision of an expert opinion. If the expert has been appointed by a court, the rules for the fee and the amount of the fee are set by the Regulation of the Ministry of Justice No. 491/2004 Coll. on the remuneration, reimbursement of expenses and compensation for loss of time for experts, interpreters and translators. If the expert opinion was ordered by a party to the proceedings, the expert’s fee is determined by a contract between the expert and the party to the proceedings.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures
1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field
According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff must be represented by an attorney in court proceedings within the administrative judiciary, including cassation complaint proceedings (before regional courts and the Supreme Court).

But there are several exceptions to this general rule. The plaintiff does not have to be represented by an attorney if he/she, or his/her employee, or the member representing him/her in court, has a university degree in law. Additionally, the plaintiff does not have to be represented by a lawyer, for example, in proceedings concerning administrative sanctions (e.g. fines), actions against unlawful inaction by a public authority or in proceedings concerning access to information (§49 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

The plaintiff must not have to be represented by a lawyer in most of civil court proceedings, e.g. proceedings concerning the protection of property rights and rights of neighbours under the Civil Code.

According to the Code of the Civil Judicial Procedure in the civil court proceedings on the appeal on the points of law (dovolanie) the appellant must be represented by an attorney.

The applicant must be represented by an attorney in proceedings before the Constitutional Court.

A list of attorneys and their contact details is published on the website of the Slovak Bar Association. Here, anyone can search for an attorney according to his/her name, legal specialisation (including environmental law), his/her place of residence, language, registration number etc. When choosing an attorney, all the data needed is displayed, including phone contact, e-mail address, contact on law firm etc.

Anyone can contact an attorney on the list and ask him or her for legal assistance.

Lawyers specializing in environmental law often work with environmental NGOs. Thus, environmental NGOs can provide people with contacts of environmental lawyers.

There are only several lawyers in Slovakia dealing with environmental public interest law cases and their capacities are limited. There are one or two NGOs that also deal with environmental public interest law cases, but their capacities are also limited.

1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance
There are several non-governmental organizations in Slovakia that deal with environmental public interest law cases and can arrange and pay for legal assistance pro bono in these cases (e.g. VIA IURIS, Lesoochránske zoskupenie VLK).

There is a Pro Bono Lawyers programme run by the Pontis Foundation, that connects lawyers with NGOs that need legal assistance. Under this programme, it is also possible to provide free legal assistance in environmental cases.

In addition to the above-mentioned pro bono legal aid, free legal aid in civil, administrative and other matters (including environmental cases) is provided by the state Legal Aid Center – please see the chapter 1.7.3 below.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.?)
The above-mentioned organizations assess cases at their own discretion, on the basis of which they decide to provide pro bono legal aid.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?
As follows from the previous answers, the applicant for pro bono assistance can address the Legal Aid Center, some NGOs or the Pro Bono Programme.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts
As mentioned above, the list of experts is published on the website of the Ministry of Justice.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

VIA IURIS
Lesoochránske zoskupenie VLK
Združenie Slatinka
Pristelka Zeme – CEPA
Slovenská ornitologická spoločnosť/BirdLife Slovensko
Greenpeace Slovensko

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

Greenpeace
Friends of the Earth
ClientEarth
CEE Bankwatch Network
Justice and Environment

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures
1.7.1. Procedural time limits
1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
The Administrative Procedure Code provides a 15-day time limit to challenge administrative decisions by an administrative appeal, which can be filed by a party to the administrative proceeding (§ 54 par. 2).

According to the Administrative Procedure Code (§ 65), a decision which is legally valid may, on its own or other initiative, be reviewed by an administrative authority superior to the administrative authority which issued the decision. This is called an “extra-appellate” review procedure. Superior administrative authority may annul or amend the decision within 3 years of its validity.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
Generally, the administrative authority is obliged to deliver administrative decisions within 30 days from the beginning of the proceedings; in particularly complex cases within 60 days at the latest. If, in view of the nature of the case, it is not possible to deliver administrative decisions within that period either, the period may be extended by the appellate authority as appropriate (§ 49 par. 2 of the Administrative Procedure Code).

It is not possible to sanction the administrative authority for delivering a decision late. A person may, however, claim financial compensation for loss caused by delays of the administrative authority in administrative proceeding.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first-level administrative decision directly before court?
The appeal to a superior administrative body must be exhausted before the administrative decision can be challenged before the court. The only exception is a situation where there is no possibility of administrative appeal, because of an explicit regulation by law.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?
There are generally no specific deadlines for the courts to deliver their judgments. However, according to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure if the administrative court has granted a suspensive effect to the administrative action, it is obliged to decide on it within six months from the granting of the suspensive effect (§ 187).

A judgment must be drawn up and sent to the parties within 30 days of the date of its delivery, unless the president of the court decides otherwise for serious reasons. This period may be extended by the president of the court for serious reasons, but for a maximum of two months.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

Time limits in administrative proceedings:
The administrative appeal must be filed within 15 days of the date of notification of the administrative decision of the public authority.

The request for renewal of the administrative proceedings must be submitted within 3 months from the day when the participant learned of the reasons for the renewal, but no later than within 3 years from the validity of the administrative decision. Within the same period, the administrative authority may order a renewal of the administrative proceeding on its own motion.

Three years after the decision has become valid, a request for renewal of the proceedings may be filed or renewal may be ordered only if the decision has been obtained through a criminal offence.

Time limits in judicial proceedings:
According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, a natural or legal person must bring an administrative action against an administrative decision or measure within 2 months of the notification (delivery) of the decision of the public authority or the measure of the public authority. The “interested public” must bring an administrative action within two months of the validity of the decision of the public authority or the date a measure was issued by the public authority.

The cassation complaint against the first-instance decision of the regional administrative court must be filed within 1 month from the delivery of the decision of the regional court.

An action for renewal of administrative court proceedings must be brought within 3 months of the date on which the person bringing the action for renewal became aware of the reason for the renewal.

In civil court proceedings, an appeal on the points of law against the decision of an appellate court can be lodged within 2 months of the delivery of the decision of the appellate court.

In civil court proceedings, a person must file an action within the specified time limits from the origin of the legal claim, otherwise the action may be dismissed on the grounds of limitation.

According to the Civil Code, personality rights and right to privacy cannot be time-barred. Property rights cannot be time-barred and therefore an action can be brought at any time to protect them against unlawful denial or infringement. The right to compensation expires after two years from the day when the injured party became aware of the damage and of the person who is to be liable. The right to compensation is time-barred no later than 3 years (or 10 years if the damage was caused intentionally) after its occurrence. A constitutional complaint must be filed with the Constitutional Court within two months of the validity of the challenged decision.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
An appeal against an administrative decision has suspensive effect. However, the public authority may exclude the suspensive effect of the appeal.

According to the Administrative Procedure Code, if the public interest urgently requests or if irreparable damage may occur to one of the parties to the proceedings if the decision is not implemented immediately, the public authority may exclude the suspending effect of the appeal.

An application for review of a decision in an extra-appellate procedure has no suspensive effect.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?
In addition to the automatic suspensive effect of the administrative appeal, the administrative authority may, at the request of a party to the proceedings or ex officio, order preliminary injunctive relief (interim measure). According to § 43 Administrative Procedure Code, the administrative authority may, before the end of the proceedings, order the parties to the proceedings to do something, to refrain from something or to tolerate something in order to ensure the purpose of the proceeding.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
It is possible for a party to submit a request for preliminary injunctive relief during the proceedings - until the end of the proceedings. There is no deadline for such a request.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
As the appeal has suspensive effect, the administrative decision cannot be executed until the appeal body has decided on the appeal. It can only be executed if the suspensive effect of the appeal has been excluded.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
The filing of an action against a decision of an administrative authority has no suspensive effect. Once the decision has been approved by the superior (appellate) administrative authority, it can be executed regardless of the action brought against it. However, the court may grant suspensory effect to the action and then execution of the administrative decision is not possible.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
The court may, on the application of the plaintiff, grant the suspensive effect to the action – i.e. order suspension of validity of the challenged administrative decision (§ 185 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure). The court cannot order suspension of validity of the challenged administrative decision on its own motion. The court may grant the suspensive effect to the action under the following conditions:
if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest, if the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority is based on the legally binding act of the European Union, about the validity of which there are serious doubts, and there would otherwise be a threat of serious and irreparable harm to the plaintiff, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the interest of the European Union. The court must decide on the plaintiff's application to grant suspensive effect within 30 days of receiving the defendant's statement on this application. If the administrative court does not uphold the plaintiff's application to grant the suspensive effect, it must dismiss it by a resolution. A cassation complaint is not admissible against the court resolution concerning the suspensive effect of the action.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Generally, no fees are connected with the participation in administrative procedures in environmental matters. But there are fees for extraordinary remedies. There is a fee for an application for renewal of administrative proceedings or for a motion to review a decision in the “extra-appellate” proceedings (a natural person: EUR 16.50, a legal person or a natural person entitled to conduct business: EUR 165.50). This fee will be reimbursed if the renewal of proceedings is granted or if the initiative to review the decision in the “extra-appellate” proceedings has been fully successful.

Court fees are regulated by Act No. 71/1992 on court fees. The plaintiff’s action in court is linked to the following fees:

- the fee for initiating legal proceedings
- the fee for an appeal or cassation complaint
- the fee for an application for suspensory effect or for injunction relief

The court fees for administrative lawsuits are based on a flat rate regardless of the value of the case. The court fee for filing an administrative action against a decision or a measure of a public administration body is EUR 70. The court fee for submitting a cassation complaint is EUR 140. The court fee for filing an administrative action against a general binding regulation of a municipality (e.g. land use plan) is EUR 70. The court fee for submitting a cassation complaint is 100 EUR.

The court fee for filing a civil action to protect one’s property rights against emissions is EUR 99.50. The court fee for filing a civil action concerning claim to damages (connected to environmental pollution or devastation) is 6% from the sum that is being claimed, which is a minimum of EUR 16.5 and a maximum of EUR 16,596.50. The court fee for filing an appeal is the same.

The court fee for filing an “appeal on the points of law” is twice the fee of a legal action.

The court fee will be refunded if the court proceedings have been discontinued, if the administrative action, cassation complaint or action for renewal of the court proceedings has been dismissed or withdrawn before the case is heard.

Generally, there is no court fee for filing a constitutional complaint with the Constitutional Court. However, in legally and factually similar cases previously decided by the Constitutional Court in which the complainant, who had submitted the constitutional complaint, was not successful, the Constitutional Court orders the complainant to pay court fee of EUR 30 for the eleventh and each subsequent complaint filed by the same complainant in the same year.

If in, the proceedings before the administrative court, a party proposes the taking of evidence to which the costs relate, the administrative court may oblige him to pay a deposit. If the party to the proceedings does not pay a deposit within the time limit set by the administrative court, the administrative court will not execute the proposed evidence.

Attorneys' fees can vary significantly. There is usually an hourly fee agreed with the client, which can range from EUR 50 to 300. However, there are other options for setting a fee - a fee for full representation or a fee calculated on the basis of a lawyers' tariff (a fixed fee for each legal service provided).

Experts' fees may vary and the amount may be determined as a tariff fee (a fixed fee for each service, an hourly rate, or a percentage depending on the subject matter of the expert’s services) or a contract fee.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

The court fee for application for injunctive relief or interim measure in civil matters is EUR 33. There is no fee for an application for granting the suspensive effect of the administrative action and no deposit to cover any compensation is required.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Free legal aid to natural persons in civil, administrative and other matters (including environmental cases) is provided by the Legal Aid Center. The Legal Aid Center is an organization established by the Ministry of Justice. The Legal Aid Center provides free legal assistance to natural persons, subject to certain conditions, for example in civil and administrative matters (including environmental matters, administrative court proceedings and proceedings before the Constitutional Court). The Legal Aid Center does not provide legal assistance in criminal matters.

If a person meets the conditions for the provision of legal aid, the Legal Aid Center will issue a decision on the granting of legal aid and determine its form. Legal aid can take the form of:

- legal advice,
- representation before a court by an attorney or a lawyer of the Legal Aid Center.

Free legal aid is only available to natural persons in material need or to persons whose income does not exceed 1.4 times the subsistence level (i.e. a standard of living or wage that provides only the bare necessities of life) and therefore cannot afford legal aid.

If a person’s income is higher than 1.4 times the subsistence level but does not exceed 1.6 times the subsistence level, the person is obliged to pay only 20% of the costs of legal aid and legal aid will be provided by the Legal Aid Center. Environmental NGOs are not entitled to legal aid provided by the Legal Aid Center.

All information about the Legal Aid Center including contact information can be found here. The application for legal assistance is available here.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Associations, legal persons and NGOs are not entitled to legal aid provided by the Legal Aid Center.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
There are several non-governmental organizations in Slovakia that deal with environmental public interest law cases and can arrange and pay legal assistance pro bono in these cases (e.g. VIA IURIS, Pro Bono Lawyers programme run by the Pontis Foundation, that connects lawyers with NGOs that need legal assistance. Under this programme, it is also possible to free provide legal assistance in environmental cases.

As mentioned above, free legal aid to natural persons in civil, administrative and other matters (including environmental cases) is provided by the state Legal Center.

6) Does the “loser party pays” principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The general rule that the “loser party pays” applies. The losing party is therefore normally obliged to pay for the cost of the successful party as well as the cost of expert opinions and other costs of the procedure.

In the civil court proceedings, if a party succeeds on some and fails on other claims, the court will order that the costs be shared or that neither party is entitled to the costs. Exceptionally, the court in the civil court proceedings will not award costs to the successful (winning) party in the proceedings if there are “grounds for special consideration”. According to the finding of the Constitutional Court I. US 168/2018 the court should apply this rule only in exceptional cases. If the court chooses to do so, neither party (successful or unsuccessful) can be ordered to pay the costs. Why the court considered the case worthy of special consideration must be sufficiently substantiated.

In proceedings within the administrative judiciary, the administrative court will award the plaintiff the right to full or partial reimbursement of the costs if the plaintiff has been successful in whole or in part. But the administrative court may also decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are “grounds for special consideration”. The administrative court will grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be “reasonably demanded”. However, the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure explicitly stipulates that the reimbursement of legal representation costs may be granted to a public authority only “exceptionally” (as they should have their own employees – lawyers, who can represent them in the dispute).

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

The Act on Court Fees stipulates that certain court proceedings and certain persons in the position of plaintiffs are exempt from the court fee (the fee for bringing the action).

The court proceedings on an action against inaction of a public administration body are, inter alia, exempt from the court fee.

Foundations and charities, humanitarian organizations, environmental organizations and associations active in consumer protection, as well as municipalities and regions in proceedings in the public and social interest, are exempt from the court fee.

Municipalities in court proceedings in matters of public interest and socially beneficial interest are also exempt from the court fee.

The administrative court will, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

All laws and regulations are freely available here.

A summary about the rules and possibilities of access to justice in environmental matters can be found here and here.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

In many situations, the law requires the administrative authority to inform the public or the parties to the proceedings about facts relevant to access to justice – i.e. the initiation of the proceedings, taking of the evidence, the right to access to the files, the course or termination of the proceedings. Every administrative decision must contain instructions as to whether the decision is final or can be appealed and whether the decision can be reviewed by a court. The public may also request information relevant to access to justice from administrative authorities under the Access to Information Act (Act No. 211/2000 Coll.).

The administrative court will, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

Information about EIA procedures and all documents related to projects, plans and programmes are available online here.

Information about IPPC procedures are available online here.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

Each administrative decision must contain instructions as to whether the decision is final or whether it can be appealed, within what period, to which authority and where an appeal can be lodged. The instruction also contains an indication of whether the decision can be reviewed by a court.

The decision of the court must contain instructions on the admissibility of the cassation complaint, on the time limit for filing a cassation complaint, on the requisites of the cassation complaint, on the mandatory representation of lawyers in the cassation proceedings or on the inadmissibility of a remedy.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

According to the Constitution, anyone who declares that he does not have a command of the language in which the proceedings before public authorities are conducted has the right to an interpreter (Article 47 par. 2 and 4).

The general rule for the administrative procedure is that all documents and hearings are in Slovak. Documents in languages other than Slovak have to be submitted in the original and parties have to submit officially certified translation as well.

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, everyone has the right to act before an administrative court in his or her mother tongue or in a language he or she understands. Taking into account the nature and circumstances of the case, the administrative court will provide an interpreter (§ 54 par. 1). The costs of the party acting in his mother tongue or in a language which he understands will be borne by the state (§ 54 par. 2).
The party to the proceedings may file an administrative appeal against the screening decision (against both decisions to initiate obligatory EIA assessment as well as to not initiate it), which is decided by the superior administrative body.

The public concerned, which has participated in the screening procedure and has exhausted an administrative appeal against the screening decision, may bring an administrative action within the administrative judiciary against the valid decision in the screening procedure.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

According to the Administrative Procedure Code, the law does not apply to the scoping procedure and thus there is no administrative proceeding for the scoping. Therefore, the scoping decision cannot be appealed or reviewed by courts independently (directly). The scoping will be subject to administrative or judicial review only together with the EIA final statement. The EIA final statement can be appealed or reviewed by courts independently.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

As mentioned above, the public concerned may file an administrative appeal against the screening decision, which is decided by the superior administrative body. Subsequently, the public concerned may bring an action in administrative court against the valid decision in the screening procedure.

By participating in the EIA procedure (screening procedure or obligatory EIA assessment procedure), the public becomes the "public concerned" and thus becomes a party to all subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization (i.e. permit proceeding under the Building Act, IPPC Act, Atomic Act, Mining Act, Act on Forests, Nature Conservation Act etc.).

The administrative appeal must be filed within 15 days of the date of notification of the administrative decision of the public authority (screening decision, EIA final statement, project permit).

Parties to the administrative proceedings or the "interested public" (which includes the public concerned) must bring an administrative action in court within two months of the validity of the administrative decision of the public authority.

As mentioned above, the scoping decision cannot be appealed or reviewed by courts independently (directly). The scoping will be subject to administrative or judicial review only together with the EIA final statement.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

As mentioned above, the parties to the administrative proceedings or the "interested public" (which includes the public concerned) may bring an administrative action in court against the final project authorization (project permit, development consent) within two months of the validity of the administrative decision of the public authority.

Parties to the administrative proceedings or the "interested public" may include an individual, an NGO, or a foreign NGO.

There is no special provision concerning the possibility of the foreign NGOs to participate in the environmental administrative procedures. Foreign NGOs should be able to take part in these administrative procedures when meeting the same requirements as the Slovak ones.

Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 3 Sžp 18/2012, of 12 March 2013:

In judgment No. 3 Sžp 18/2012, the Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the Regional Court in Banská Bystrica No. 23 S/113/2011, by which the Regional Court upheld the legal action of the civic association, which challenged the administrative decision not to grant the status of a party to the proceedings on the determination of the mining area (pursuant to the Mining Act) to this association. The dispute concerned whether the administrative proceeding for determining the mining area was subject to Art. 6 and Art. 9 of the Aarhus Convention, whether the decision on determination of the mining area is "development consent" or "project permit" within the meaning of Art. 6 of the Aarhus Convention and whether the civic association should also be a party to the proceedings for the determination of the mining area, or only a party to the subsequent proceedings to permit mining activities. The civic association argued that the decision on determination of the mining area was also a decision to permit activities within the meaning of Art. 6 and Art. 9 of the Aarhus Convention and must therefore also be a party to this administrative proceeding.

The Supreme Court justified its decision with reference to Art. 6 par. 4 and Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention, stating: "It is necessary to allow public participation within the meaning of Art. 6 par. 4 of the Aarhus Convention, even at a stage in the proceedings where all possibilities are open and the final outcome of the proceedings can be influenced. The determination of the mining area represents the first phase in the permitting of mining activities ... access to the proceedings only in connection with the subsequent possible decision on the mining activity would be in conflict with Art. 6 par. 4 of the Aarhus Convention. In its judgment in Case C-240/09 of 08 March 2011, the Court of Justice of the European Union set out the procedure for interpreting procedural law relating to an appeal or an action before a court in order to comply with Article 9 par. 3 of the Convention in question. There is no reason to exclude the decision on the determination of the mining area from the scope of environmental proceedings. The decision on the determination of the mining area becomes a party to the administrative proceedings.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

The courts must review both the substantive and procedural legality of the EIA screening decision, EIA final statement or the development consent (project permit).

If, in the administrative procedure, a procedural rule was infringed to such an extent that it could affect the legality of the final decision, the court must annul such decision.

Examination and verification of scientific accuracy in court proceedings is limited. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the courts do not review decisions of public authorities, the issuance of which depends solely on an assessment of the state of health of persons or the technical state of affairs. In the case of a decision issued by a public authority on the basis of an administrative discretion permitted by law, the administrative court will only examine whether such a decision has deviated from the limits and aspects established by law. The administrative Court does not assess the effectiveness, economy and appropriateness of a decision of a public authority (with the exception of the review of administrative sanctions).

But the court can review expert and technical findings to the extent that there is no conflict between these findings and the conclusions and reasoning of the administrative authorities.

There are no judicial procedures concerning environmental matters which the courts could start on their own motion. The courts can act solely on the basis of a motion, never on their own initiative.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The public can challenge before the court the valid screening decision, valid final EIA statement as well as valid development consent (project permit), e.g. the land use permit, building permit, IPPC permit, mining permit etc.

A party to the proceedings or the "interested public" (see above) may bring an action before the court if a public authority is inactive in an administrative proceeding concerning environmental matters. An action may be filed if a complaint of inaction under a special regulation or a complaint to the public prosecutor's office has been unsuccessfully exhausted. The defendant is a public authority which is obliged to issue a decision or measure, to perform an act or to initiate administrative proceedings ex officio.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
An administrative appeal to a superior administrative authority must be exhausted before a decision can be challenged in court. The only exception is when an administrative appeal is not possible due to explicit regulation.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
Active participation in the EIA consultation phase of the procedure (comments, participation in the hearing) does not constitute a precondition for the right to appeal or a precondition for bringing an action in court - if a person may be directly affected by an administrative decision, he/she becomes a party to the administrative proceedings and the plaintiff without participating in the EIA consultation phase. However, by participating in the EIA consultation phase, any person (e.g. natural person, NGO) can become “public concerned” and thus also a party to the proceedings under the EIA Act or a party to subsequent permit proceedings and can subsequently bring an action against administrative decisions in court. This means that by participating in the consultation phase, persons who would not otherwise be parties to the proceedings and plaintiffs also become parties to the administrative proceedings and subsequently plaintiffs.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, all parties have the same procedural rights and obligations in the proceedings. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the parties have equal status in proceedings before the administrative court.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, the administrative authorities are obliged to deal with each case responsibly, to handle it in a timely manner and without undue delay, and to use the most appropriate means that lead to the correct handling of the case.

The Administrative Procedure Code sets deadlines for issuing an administrative decision (see above). The administrative court may grant suspensive effect to the action so that the execution of the challenged decision does not render the judicial review of the decision useless.

If the administrative court has granted the administrative action a suspensive effect (pursuant to § 185 letter a)), it is obliged to decide on the administrative action within six months from the date on which the resolution on granting suspensory effect was issued (§ 187 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
The general rules concerning the possibility for a court to grant the suspensive effect to an action against an administrative decision apply here (see above).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
The public (including NGOs) may, under certain conditions, have the status of a party to proceedings under the IPPC Act. First-instance permit decision issued pursuant to the IPPC Act may be appealed. The final valid IPPC permit decision can be challenged before the administrative court.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
As mentioned above, in addition to the parties to the proceedings pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Code (i.e. persons whose rights may be directly affected or who claim that their rights may be directly affected), the party to the IPPC permit proceedings is also the municipality in which the permitted operation is located or is to be located, and the public concerned.

The public concerned is a person or several persons, their associations or groups who are or may be affected by the procedure for issuing a permit for a new establishment or by the procedure for issuing a permit for a substantial change in the activity of the establishment or by acting in the process of reviewing and updating permit conditions, or which has or may have an interest in such proceedings.

The public concerned is also a legal person (including NGO) supporting the protection of the environment that was established at least two years before applying as a party to the proceedings.

The law explicitly stipulates that this organization is considered to be a person whose right to a favourable environment may be affected by the administrative decision on permit.

The public concerned will become a party to the proceedings on the day of delivery of the written application to the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate submitted after the publication of the application for a project permit.

As mentioned above, by submitting a reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure (project proposal, scoping phase, evaluation report) or by lodging an appeal against a decision in a screening procedure or against final EIA statement, the public (which means “anyone" - any natural or legal person including NGO) expresses its interest in the project and thus becomes a “public concerned" that has a status of a party in the subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization regulated by the IPPC Act (and by other laws as well – the Building Act, the Atomic Act, the Mining Act, the Act on Forests, the Nature Conservation Act etc.).

A final and valid IPPC permit decision can be challenged before the administrative court, as mentioned above.

There are no special rules for foreign NGOs.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
According to the IPPC Act any substantial change of the activity requires permission. If the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate, on the basis of the operator’s notification or on the basis of the performed inspection, finds that the change is substantial, the proceeding for issuing a permit for change of activity will begin.

As mentioned above, the party to the proceeding concerning the change of activity is also the public concerned.

The public concerned in the proceeding relating to a change of activity is a person, their associations or groups who are or may be affected by the proceeding for issuing a permit for a substantial change in the activity, or which has or may have an interest in such proceedings.

The public concerned is also a legal person (including NGO) supporting the protection of the environment that was established at least two years before applying as a party to the proceedings.

The public concerned will become a party to the proceedings on the day of delivery of the written application to the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate submitted after the publication of the application for a project permit.

Following an appeal against a decision of first instance and a decision of a superior authority on an appeal, the public concerned may bring an action against administrative decisions in court. This means that by participating in the consultation phase, persons who would not otherwise be parties to the proceedings and plaintiffs also become parties to the administrative proceedings and subsequently plaintiffs.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There is no “scoping stage" in the IPPC procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
The public can challenge a valid IPPC permit decision before a court after an administrative appeal has been filed and after the superior authority has decided on the appeal.
6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
The public can challenge the final and valid IPPC permit decision (see above).

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
The courts must review both the substantive and procedural legality of the IPPC permit decision. If, in the administrative procedure, a procedural rule was infringed to such an extent that it could affect the legality of the final decision, the court must annul a permit decision.

Examination and verification of scientific accuracy in court proceedings is limited. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the courts do not review decisions of public authorities, the issuance of which depends solely on an assessment of the state of health of persons or the technical state of affairs. In the case of a decision issued by a public authority on the basis of an administrative discretion permitted by law, the administrative court will only examine whether such a decision has deviated from the limits and aspects established by law. The administrative Court does not assess the effectiveness, economy and appropriateness of a decision of a public authority (with the exception of the review of administrative sanctions).

But the court can review expert and technical findings to the extent if there is not a conflict between these findings and the conclusions and reasoning of the administrative authorities. There are no judicial procedures concerning environmental matters which the courts could start on their own motion. The courts can act solely on the basis of motion, never on their own initiative.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
The public can challenge the final valid IPPC permit before the court. A party to the proceedings (or the “interested public” - see above) may bring an action before the court if a public authority is inactive in an administrative proceeding concerning environmental matters. An action may be filed if a complaint of inaction under a special regulation or a complaint to the public prosecutor's office has been unsuccessfully exhausted. The defendant is a public authority which is obliged to issue a decision or measure, to perform an act or to initiate administrative proceedings ex officio.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
An administrative appeal to a superior administrative authority must be exhausted before a decision can be challenged before in court. The only exception is when an administrative appeal is not possible due to explicit regulation.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
Active participation in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure (comments, participation in the hearing) does not constitute a precondition for the right to appeal or a precondition for bringing an action in court - if a person may be directly affected by an IPPC permit decision, he/she becomes a party to the administrative proceeding and may bring an action before the court without participating in the consultation phase.

However, as mentioned above, the public concerned (including environmental NGOs) will become a party to the proceedings on the day of delivery of the written application to the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate submitted after the publication of the application for a project permit.

Moreover, by submitting a reasoned written opinion during one of the stages of the EIA procedure (project proposal, scoping phase, evaluation report) or by lodging an appeal against a decision in a screening procedure or against final EIA statement, the public (which means “anyone” - any natural or legal person including NGO) expresses its interest in the project and thus becomes a “public concerned” that has a status of a party in the subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization regulated by the IPPC Act.

A final and valid IPPC permit decision can be challenged before the administrative court, as mentioned above.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, all parties have the same procedural rights and obligations in the proceedings. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the parties have equal status in proceedings before the administrative court.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, the administrative authorities are obliged to deal with each case responsibly, to handle it in a timely manner and without undue delay, and to use the most appropriate means that lead to the correct handling of the case.

The Administrative Procedure Code sets deadlines for issuing an administrative decision (see above).

The administrative court may grant suspensive effect to the action so that the execution of the challenged decision does not render the judicial review of the decision useless.

If the administrative court has granted the administrative action a suspensive effect (pursuant to § 185 letter a)), it is obliged to decide on the administrative action within six months from the date on which the resolution on granting suspensory effect was issued (§ 187 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
According to the IPPC Act, as a precautionary measure, the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate may, to the extent strictly necessary, require the operator to restrict or suspend the operation of the activity which has a significant negative impact on the environment or any of its components until the end of the proceedings.

The general rules concerning the possibility for a court to grant the suspensive effect to an action against an administrative decision apply here (see above). The Court of Justice of the EU stated in its judgment C416/10 (Križan) concerning the permit under the IPPC Act issued in Slovakia: ‘...exercise of the right to bring an action provided for by Article 15a of Directive 96/61 would not make possible effective prevention of that pollution if it were impossible to prevent an installation which may have benefited from a permit awarded in infringement of that directive from continuing to function pending a definitive decision on the lawfulness of that permit. It follows that the guarantee of effectiveness of the right to bring an action provided for in that Article 15a requires that the members of the public concerned should have the right to ask the court or competent independent and impartial body to order interim measures such as to prevent that pollution, including, where necessary, by the temporary suspension of the disputed permit. In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the fourth question is that Article 15a of Directive 96/61 must be interpreted as meaning that members of the public concerned must be able, in the context of the action provided for by that provision, to ask the court or competent independent and impartial body established by law to order interim measures such as temporarily to suspend the application of a permit, within the meaning of Article 4 of that directive, pending the final decision.’

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
All laws and regulations are freely available [here].

As mentioned above, a summary about the possibilities of access to justice in environmental matters can be found [here]. 1.8.3. Environmental liability[1]
1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

According to § 25 of the Environmental Liability Act, a party to the proceedings for the imposition of preventive measures or remedial measures is, in addition to the operator of the activity, also the owner, manager or lessee of a property which is affected by environmental damage or on which preventive or remedial measures will be taken and implemented, a natural person or legal person whose rights or obligations may be directly affected by the environmental damage, a non-governmental organization (civic association or other organization) whose goal according to the statutes valid for at least one year is environmental protection, which has notified that an environmental damage has occurred and subsequently notified in writing its interest in taking part in the proceedings (within 7 days of receipt of the notice of initiation of the proceedings).

The right to be a party to administrative proceedings guarantees the right to bring a case before a court.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

An administrative appeal may be filed within 15 days from delivery of the decision and an action in court within 2 months from the date of delivery of the decision on the appeal.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

According to § 26 of the Environmental Liability Act, the owner, manager or lessee of a property that is or may be affected by environmental damage, a legal person or a natural person whose rights or obligations may be directly affected by environmental damage, or an environmental non-governmental organization (whose goal according to the statutes valid for at least one year is environmental protection) is entitled to notify the competent authority of the facts indicating that environmental damage has occurred.

The notification must be made in writing and must include in particular:
- the name of the operator whose activity caused the environmental damage, if known to the notifier,
- the place where the environmental damage occurred,
- a description of the findings,
- evidence confirming the content of the notification.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific requirements regarding plausibility for showing that environmental damage occurred.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

The competent authority must examine the notification, request further information from the notifier, if necessary, request opinions from other authorities and request the operator to comment on the notification.

If, on examination of the notification, it is established that no environmental damage has occurred, the competent authority will “set aside” the notification and notify the notifier, accordingly, stating the reasons.

If, on examination of the notification, it is established that environmental damage has occurred, the competent authority will proceed with the procedure, notifying the notifier in writing of its reasons.

The decision must be delivered to the party to the proceedings (including the entitled environmental NGO) in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Code.

There is no time limit set directly regarding to the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs). The general deadlines for issuing the decision set out in the Administrative Procedure Code (30 days, with the option to extend it up to 60 days) apply.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

No extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority is applied in cases of imminent threat.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The competent authority is the district office (environmental department) or the Slovak Environmental Inspectorate.

The Slovak Environmental Inspectorate is the competent authority if the environmental damage or the imminent threat of environmental damage occurred in the operations subject to the IPPC Act.

The Slovak Environmental Inspectorate also imposes fines for breach of legal obligations.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

Before bringing an action in court, an administrative appeal against the decision must be exhausted.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

According to the EIA Act, the subject of transboundary impact assessments are strategic documents proposed on the territory of the Slovak Republic, which may have a significant impact on the environment beyond state borders, activities (projects) proposed in the territory of the Slovak Republic listed in Annex no. 13 and the proposed activities (projects) listed in Annex no. 8 of the EIA Act, including their changes, which may have a significant impact on the environment beyond national borders, strategic documents and proposed actions referred to in points (a) and (b), if requested by the Party concerned, strategic documents and proposed activities carried out on the territory of another state, which may have a significant impact on the environment of the Slovak Republic.

Another strategic documents and proposed action which may have a significant adverse transboundary impact if agreed between the Party of origin and the Party concerned.

The public of the affected foreign country (including foreign natural persons or foreign NGOs) can also become the “public concerned” under the EIA Act.

By participating in the EIA procedure by submitting a reasoned written opinion the public of the affected foreign country can become the “public concerned” and thus becomes a party to the EIA proceedings and a party to all subsequent administrative proceedings on project authorization (i.e. permit proceeding under the Building Act, IPPC Act, Atomic Act, Mining Act, Act on Forests, Nature Conservation Act etc.).

The party to the proceedings may file an administrative appeal against the decision within 15 days from the date of notification of the administrative decision (screening decision, EIA final statement, project permit).
Parties to the administrative proceedings may bring an administrative action in court against the valid administrative decision.

In addition, the "interested public" that participated in administrative proceedings in environmental matters (e.g. foreign environmental NGO that participated in transboundary impact assessment proceeding) is entitled to bring an administrative action in court also against a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality, if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

The "interested public" is a person (natural person, legal entity, local civic association, or environmental non-governmental organization including foreign environmental NGO) who has the "right to participate in administrative proceedings" concerning environmental matters under specific environmental laws (e.g. in transboundary impact assessment proceeding).

It follows that if strategic documents that are the subject of transboundary impact assessments take the form of a measure of a public administration body or a generally binding regulation of a municipality, they may be challenged in court by the public of the affected foreign country (including foreign natural persons or foreign NGOs).

2) Notion of public concerned?
There is no specific notion of the public concerned in the transboundary context.

But the term a "public of the affected country" is included in the EIA Act (see below).

The "public of the affected country" can become the "public concerned" under the EIA Act.

In the transboundary context, the concept of "affected country" also applies to transboundary EIA procedures.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There is no special and explicit provision regulating the possibility of the foreign NGOs to participate in the environmental administrative procedures.

But foreign NGOs can become the "public concerned" and "interested public" and may bring an administrative action in court against the valid administrative decision, against a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There are no special rules for individuals of the affected country. Individuals of the affected country must meet the same requirements as the Slovak ones to participate in administrative procedures. Individuals of the affected country can become the "public concerned" under the conditions laid down by the EIA Act and subsequently parties to the administrative proceedings (see above).

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
Most information on projects and procedural rights is provided when notifying the initiation of a procedure.

Information about EIA procedures and all documents related to projects, plans and programmes is available online here.

Information about IPPC procedures is available online here.

Transboundary impact assessment of proposed activities (projects):
According to the EIA Act, the Ministry of the Environment must notify the "affected country" without undue delay of information on a proposed activity that is subject to transboundary assessment or an activity that may have a significant transboundary environmental impact. The information on the proposed activity must include, in particular, basic information on the proposed activity, including available data on the expected transboundary environmental impact, information on the type of permit and the time limit for the response from the "affected country". The "affected country" must indicate whether it is interested in participating in the assessment.

If the "affected country" expresses an interest in participating in the assessment, the Ministry of the Environment must, without undue delay, send the "affected country" a project proposal and a project evaluation report.

According to the EIA Act, the Ministry of the Environment must send information on the assessment procedure, including the time limit for submitting comments, together with the name of the national authority and its address to which the public of the "affected country" and the competent authorities of the "affected country" may send comments.

According to the EIA Act, the comments of the "affected country" must be taken into account in determining the scope of the EIA assessment.

The Ministry of the Environment must send a project evaluation report to the "affected country" and ask it to express its interest in carrying out consultations.

The competent authorities must comply with the party concerned if they express an interest in the consultations.

According to the EIA Act, the final EIA statement must also include an evaluation of the comments of the "affected country", the comments of the public of the "affected country" and an evaluation of the results of the consultations.

Transboundary impact assessment of strategic documents (plans, programmes):
If the strategic document is likely to have a significant transboundary impact, or if the "affected country" so requests, the Ministry of Environment must inform the "affected country" of these effects before the strategic document is adopted.

The Ministry must inform the "affected country" of the approval process, set a reasonable time limit for the submission of comments, and ask whether the "affected country" will participate in the assessment.

If the "affected country" announces that it will take part in the assessment, the Ministry must request from the "affected country" information on the state of the environment in the territory concerned, and offer consultations to the "affected country".

The Ministry must notify the "affected country" of the place and date of the public hearing in the Slovak Republic and must allow its participation in the public hearing, including the public of the "affected country", if the "affected country" so requests.

The opinions and comments of the "affected country" and the public of the "affected country" and conclusions of the consultations will be taken into account by the Ministry in the preparation of the final statement from the assessment of the strategic document. The Ministry must send the final statement on the assessment of the strategic document to the "affected country" within 14 days of the date it was issued. The Ministry must send one copy of the approved strategic document to the "affected country".

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
As mentioned above, the Ministry of the Environment will set a reasonable time limit for submitting comments, and must inform the "affected country" about the time limit together with the name of the national authority to which the public of the "affected country" and the competent authorities of the "affected country" may send comments.

Individuals and NGOs of the affected country must meet the same requirements as the Slovak ones to participate in administrative proceedings (see above).

Individuals and NGOs of the affected country can become the "public concerned" under the conditions laid down by the EIA Act and subsequently can become parties to the administrative proceedings.

Individuals and NGOs of the "affected country" can challenge the decisions with transboundary effects as follows:
Individuals and NGOs of the affected country which are the parties to the administrative proceedings may appeal against the administrative decision. The administrative appeal must be filed within 15 days of the date of notification of the administrative decision of the public authority. The appeal to a superior administrative body must be exhausted before the administrative decision can be challenged before the court.

Individuals and NGOs of the affected country which are the parties to the administrative proceedings must bring an administrative action against an administrative decision or measure within 2 months from the notification (delivery) of the decision of the public authority or the measure of the public authority. Individuals and NGOs of the affected country that participated in transboundary impact assessment proceeding and thus became the “interested public” are entitled to bring an administrative action in court also against a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality, if they claim that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated. So if strategic documents that are the subject of transboundary impact assessments take the form of a measure of a public administration body or a generally binding regulation of a municipality, they may be challenged in court by individuals and NGOs of the affected country. The “interested public” must bring an administrative action within two months from the date a measure by the public authority was issued.

The cassation complaint against the first-instance decision of the regional administrative court must be filed within 1 month from the delivery of the decision of the first-instance administrative court (Regional Court).

A constitutional complaint must be filed with the Constitutional Court within two months of the validity of the challenged decision of the Supreme Court on the cassation complaint.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
As mentioned above, each administrative decision must contain instructions as to whether the decision is final or whether it can be appealed, within what period, to which authority and where an appeal can be lodged. The instruction also contains an indication of whether the decision can be reviewed by a court. The decision of the court must contain instructions on the admissibility of the cassation complaint, on the time limit for filing a cassation complaint, on the requisites of the cassation complaint, on the mandatory representation of lawyers in the cassation proceedings or on the inadmissibility of a remedy.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
According to the Constitution, anyone who declares that he does not have a command of the language in which the proceedings before public authorities are conducted has the right to an interpreter (Article 47 par. 2 and 4).

The general rule for the administrative procedure is that all documents and hearings are in Slovak. Documents in languages other than Slovak have to be submitted in the original and parties have to submit officially certified translation as well.

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure everyone has the right to act before an administrative court in his or her mother tongue or in a language he or she understands. Taking into account the nature and circumstances of the case, the administrative court will provide an interpreter (§ 54 par. 1). The costs of the party acting in his mother tongue or in a language which he understands will be borne by the state (§ 54 par. 2).

According to the agreement between the Government of the Slovak Republic and the Government of the Republic of Austria on the implementation of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, the Slovak Republic will provide the following information in German (translation of documents must be provided by the proposer of the activity):
- basic data on the proposed activity - name of the activity, name and registered office of the proposer, purpose, character, place of performance of the activity, brief description of the technical and technological solution, expected transboundary impacts, graphic annex
- information on the type of authorization of the proposed activity
- information on the impact assessment process in the Slovak Republic
- parts of the evaluation report that are necessary to identify environmental impacts
- parts of the evaluation report, applications for authorization, assessment, final environmental impact assessment and other expert opinions necessary to identify the environmental impacts in the affected country
- minutes of the public hearing
- conclusions, opinion, measures and, for the affected country, the essential parts of the reasoning of the final EIA statement, the decision authorizing the activity and the decision of the court on the matter.

9) Any other relevant rules?

[1] See also case C-529/15.

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Many decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities that fall within the scope of EU environmental law outside the scope of the EIA and IED directives may be challenged in administrative and judicial proceedings. The right to administrative review or access to judicial review is regulated by several sector-specific laws and by the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure.

Some laws grant the public (individuals or NGOs) the status of a “party to administrative proceedings”, some laws grant the public the status of a “participating person”, and other laws grant members of the public a different special status and other opportunities to participate in administrative proceedings.

The fundamental difference between these statuses is that the “party to the proceedings” has the right to file an administrative appeal against a decision which has the suspensive effect and, consequently, the right to bring the legal action against the administrative decision in court. Only the “party to the proceedings” has the right to initiate an administrative review. The party to the proceedings, having regard to the possibility of filing an administrative appeal, has the greatest possibility of influencing the administrative decision within the administrative proceeding.
Others (e.g. participating person) do not have the right to file an appeal against the administrative decision but can only challenge a valid administrative decision in court.

Legal standing in administrative proceedings:
The legal standing (right to be a party to the proceedings) in the administrative proceedings is generally regulated by the Administrative Procedure Code. The basic rule is that in administrative proceedings, the party to the proceedings is the person (natural or legal) whose rights or obligations of a party to the proceedings may be possibly directly affected by an administrative decision or who claims that he/she may be directly affected by the decision in his/her rights, legally protected interests or obligations, unless the contrary is proved (§ 14 par. 1 of the Administrative Procedure Code).

However, some sector-specific environmental laws regulate the standing in administrative proceedings (and define the status of a party to the administrative proceedings) in a different way from the general regulation in the Administrative Procedure Code. These laws include, for example, the Building Act, the Nature Conservation Act, Act on water, Mining Act, Atomic Act.

Act no. 50/1976 Coll. Building Act, which regulates the issuing of permits for many projects with significant impact on the environment, includes autonomous definitions of parties to the administrative proceedings for issuing the land use and building permits. According to the Building Act, natural and legal persons whose ownership or other rights to land or buildings, as well as to neighbouring land and buildings, including flats, may be directly affected by the decision are also parties to the proceedings.

Act no. 543/2002 Coll. on nature and landscape protection (Nature Conservation Act) regulates, inter alia, permitting interventions in protected parts of nature or in the conditions for the protection of protected species of animals and plants. In addition to the applicant for a permit, the party to the proceedings is also an association (NGO), whose subject of activity for at least one year is nature and landscape protection and which has submitted a preliminary and general application for participation in the proceedings, if it has confirmed its interest in being a party to the individual administrative proceedings initiated. Administrative decisions under the Nature Conservation Act are the most frequently challenged decisions in court by the public (e.g. decisions to grant an exemption for the killing of a protected animal).

Act No. 364/2004 Coll. on water: According to the Act on water, the public may have the status of a party to a special proceeding concerning interventions in surface water and groundwater if it submits a written opinion on the project documentation for the proposed activity or on the expert opinion of the state water administration body.

Act No. 541/2004 Coll. on peaceful use of nuclear energy (Atomic Act): According to the Atomic Act, a natural or legal person whose status of the party to the proceedings derives from a special law is also a party to the permit procedure - referring to the Aarhus Convention as that special law. (Members of the public can also become a party to the permit proceedings subject to the EIA procedure.)

Act No. 44/1988 Coll. on the protection and use of mineral resources (Mining Act): The party to the proceeding on determining the mining area is a natural or legal person whose ownership and other rights to land or buildings may be directly affected by the determination of the mining area, the municipality in whose territory the mining area is located (and a natural person or legal person whose status as a party to the proceedings follows from the EIA Act - members of the public can also become a party to the permit proceedings subject to the EIA procedure).

Following an appeal against a decision of a public authority of first instance and a decision of a superior body on appeal, the public mentioned above may bring an action against the decision on permit in court.

Legal standing in court proceedings:
As mentioned above, the general concept for standing in the administrative judiciary is generally based on the impairment of right theory. According to § 178/1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff who has standing in the administrative judiciary is a natural person or legal entity who claims that, as a party to an administrative proceeding, has been deprived of his rights or legally protected interests by a decision of a public administration body or a measure of a public administration body.

However, based on the effects of the Aarhus Convention and EU law, national law established a special standing for the “interested public”. The Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure ensures the right of access to the court for “the interested public”. The term “interested public” may have a different meaning than the term “public concerned” mentioned above.

According to § 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, if the “interested public” has the right under a special regulation to “participate” in administrative proceedings in environmental matters, it is entitled to bring an action before the court against administrative decision or administrative measure, to bring an action before the court against illegal inactivity of the public authority, to bring an action before the court against a generally binding regulation (e.g. zoning plan regulating land use and building permissions).

This means that according to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the “interested public” is a person who has the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” concerning environmental matters under specific environmental laws. The “interested public” may be a natural person, legal entity, local civic association, or environmental non-governmental organization. In practice, there are also cases where both the municipality and the foreign legal entity (foreign environmental NGO) have become “interested public”. In this context, it is important how the “interested public” is defined in the sector-specific laws governing administrative proceedings in the field of the environment.

In order for a member of the public to be the “interested public” within the meaning of the Code of Judicial Administrative Procedure and to have the right to bring an action before the court, he/she must satisfy the conditions laid down. In particular, the fulfllment of the condition that a member of the public has a “right to participate in administrative proceedings pursuant to a special regulation” is essential. The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” is a broader concept than a status of a “party to the administrative proceedings”. It is a difference compared to the previous legislation, where legal standing in proceedings before the administrative court was limited exclusively to a “party to the administrative proceedings”.

The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” thus includes:
the right to be “a party to the proceedings” (e.g. § 82 of Act No. 543/2002 Coll. on nature and landscape protection, § 24 of Act No. 24/2006 Coll. on environmental impact assessment, § 9 of Act No. 39/2013 Coll. on integrated pollution prevention and control), the right to be a “participating person”, which has a narrower scope of rights than a “party to the proceedings” and does not have a right to file an administrative appeal against the decision (Section 67 of Act No. 326/2005 Coll. on forests in conjunction with the provisions of Section 15a of the Administrative Procedure Code: the association, including non-governmental organizations, is a “participating person” in proceedings under the Act on forests, if its activities are related to the use and protection of forest property and if it announces its participation in the proceedings no later than 7 days after notification of proceedings), the right of “other participation” (e.g. participation in approving of land use plans (zoning plans) according to § 12 to 18 of the Building Act, participation in approving of the air protection plan according to § 10 of Act No. 137/210 Coll. on air, participation in approving of the river basin management plan according to § 13 of Act No. 354/2004 Coll. on water).
According to § 178 par. 3 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the “interested public” is entitled to bring an administrative action before a court against a decision of a public authority or a measure of a public authority if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

The level of access to national courts has increased significantly thanks to the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and the subsequent case law of the Supreme Court. Decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Union have had a very positive effect on the interpretation of the procedural rules concerning the status of a party to administrative and judicial proceedings (rules of standing).

The Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union of 8 March 2011 Lesoochranárske zoskupenie VLK v Ministerstvo životného prostredia Slovenskej republiky (Slovak brown bear case, C-240/09) is very significant, where the court ruled: “Article 9(3) of the Convention on access to information, public participation in decision-making and access to justice in environmental matters approved on behalf of the European Community by Council Decision 2005/370/EC of 17 February 2005 does not have direct effect in European Union law. It is, however, for the referring court to interpret, to the fullest extent possible, the procedural rules relating to the conditions to be met in order to bring administrative or judicial proceedings in accordance with the objectives of Article 9(3) of that convention and the objective of effective judicial protection of the rights conferred by European Union law, in order to enable an environmental protection organisation, such as the Lesoochranárske zoskupenie, to challenge before a court a decision taken following administrative proceedings liable to be contrary to European Union environmental law.”

Based on the judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU C-240/09, judgments of the Supreme Court were issued granting environmental NGOs the status of a party to the proceedings in order to have access to the court.

Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 5 Sžp 41/2009, of 12 April 2011:

In the opinion of the Supreme Court, international legal obligations (i.e. the Aarhus Convention) “ultimately have the effect of undermining the classical concept of standing of individuals in proceedings before administrative authorities by granting the status of party to proceedings to the public or in some cases to the public concerned with environmental protection.” The Supreme Court then stated as follows: “…only such an interpretation of procedural law (…) that enables an environmental organization such as the applicant to challenge a decision taken in an administrative procedure, which may be contrary to Community law in the field of the environment, in the court (…) will take the account of the objectives of Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention, as well as the objective of effective judicial protection of the rights conferred by Community law.”

Judgment of the Supreme Court No. 3Szp 30/2009, of 2 June 2011: “In the light of the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union C-240/09 of 08.03.2011, the panel of the appellate court [the Supreme Court], by an extensive euro-conform interpretation (…) assumed that the applicant (…) had the same scope of rights as he would have had in a position of a party to the proceedings. The party to the proceedings pursuant to § 14 par. 1 of the Administrative Procedure Code is the person who is the bearer of a legal right, legally protected interest or obligation (which results from a substantive law) and such a right, legally protected interest or obligation is a matter for the administrative authority to decide. The national authority must always strive for a euro-conform interpretation of national law (interpretation in conformity with Community law). The national court may, by means of a euro-conform interpretation, fill in the gaps in national law. However, the Court of Justice of the European Union stated that Article 9 para. 3 of the Aarhus Convention has no direct effect in European Union law. It was necessary to broaden the above definition of a party to the proceeding by a broad interpretation, and the same range of rights as a party to the proceeding is required to be granted to other persons (in particular the right to bring an action designed to ensure the protection of rights) in order to ensure effective protection of the environment.” However, in addition to these positive developments, shortcomings remain regarding the delays in court proceedings before administrative courts and the insufficient use of the power of administrative courts to grant suspensory effect to an action against an administrative decision.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Pursuant to Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the judgments of the Court of Justice of the EU, the courts are obliged to interpret procedural rules in such a way that the public can challenge both procedural and substantive legality of decisions, acts or omissions. This was confirmed, for example, by a judgment of the Supreme Court No. 5 Sžp 41/2009, of 12 April 2011: “…only such an interpretation of procedural law (…) that enables an environmental organization … to challenge a decision taken in an administrative procedure, which may be contrary to Community law in the field of the environment, in the court (…) will take account of the objectives of Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention, as well as the objective of effective judicial protection of the rights conferred by Community law.”

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to § 7 letter (a) of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the party to the proceedings must exhaust ordinary remedies against the challenged administrative decision (i.e. administrative appeal) before bringing an action before the court. However, the law explicitly states that the obligation to exhaust all ordinary remedies do not apply to the “interested public” if the interested public has not been entitled to an ordinary remedy (appeal).

In cases where the “interested public” does not have the status of a “party to the proceedings” according to a special regulation, but “another form” of participation in the proceedings (e.g. a “participating person”), it cannot fulfill the requirement to exhaust ordinary remedies (appeal). The requirement to exhaust the ordinary remedies (appeals) therefore does not apply to the “interested public” in this case.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

It is generally acknowledged that in order for members of the public to become “interested public” and have legal standing under the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, they must in some way participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative proceedings.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

As mentioned above, the examination and verification of scientific accuracy in court proceedings within administrative judiciary is limited. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the courts do not review decisions of public authorities, the issuance of which depends solely on an assessment of the state of health of persons or the technical state of affairs. In the case of a decision issued by a public authority on the basis of an administrative discretion permitted by law, the administrative court will only examine whether such a decision has deviated from the limits and aspects established by law. The administrative Court does not assess the effectiveness, economy and appropriateness of a decision of a public authority (with the exception of the review of administrative sanctions).

This means that the use of arguments relating to the assessment of a person’s state of health or technical condition, efficiency, economy and proportionality of a decision of a public authority is limited in court proceedings within the administrative judiciary. But the court can review expert and technical findings to the extent that there is no conflict between these findings and the conclusions and reasoning of the administrative authorities.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Administrative Procedure Code, all parties have the same procedural rights and obligations in the proceedings. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the parties have equal status in proceedings before the administrative court.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, the administrative authorities are obliged to deal with each case responsibly, to handle it in a timely manner and without undue delay, and to use the most appropriate means that lead to the correct handling of the case. The Administrative Procedure Code sets deadlines for issuing an administrative decision (see above). The administrative court may grant suspensive effect to the action so that the execution of the challenged decision does not render the judicial review of the decision useless. If the administrative court has granted the administrative action a suspensive effect (pursuant to § 185 letter a)), is obliged to decide on the administrative action it within six months from the date on which the resolution on granting suspensory effect was issued (§ 187 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The general rules concerning the possibility for a court to grant the suspensive effect to an action against an administrative decision apply here. The court may, on the application of the plaintiff, grant the suspensive effect to the action – i.e. to order suspension of validity of the challenged administrative decision (§ 185 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure). The court cannot order suspension of validity of the challenged administrative decision on its own motion. The court may grant the suspensive effect to the action under the following conditions:

- if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest,
- if the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority is based on the legally binding act of the European Union, about the validity of which there are serious doubts, and there would otherwise be a threat of serious and irreparable harm to the plaintiff, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the interest of the European Union.

The court must decide on the plaintiff's application to grant suspensive effect within 30 days of receiving the defendant's statement on this application. If the administrative court does not uphold the plaintiff's application to grant the suspensive effect, it must dismiss it by a resolution.

A cassation complaint is not admissible against the court resolution concerning the suspensive effect of the action.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive?

The court fees for individual kinds of actions within the administrative judiciary are based on a flat rate regardless of the value of the case (see the Act No. 71/1992 Coll. On court fees).

The court fee for filing an administrative action against a measure of a public administration body is EUR 70.

The court fee for filing an administrative action against a general binding regulation of a municipality is EUR 50.

Foundations and charities, humanitarian organizations, environmental organizations and associations active in consumer protection, as well as municipalities and regions in proceedings in the public and social interest, are exempt from the court fee.

The administrative court must, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.

The court fee will be refunded if the court proceedings have been discontinued; if the administrative action, cassation complaint or action for renewal of the court proceedings has been dismissed or withdrawn before the case is heard.

In proceedings within the administrative judiciary, the administrative court will award the plaintiff the right to full or partial reimbursement of the costs if the plaintiff has been successful in whole or in part. But the administrative court may also decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are "grounds for special consideration". The administrative court will grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be "reasonably demanded". However, the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure explicitly stipulates that the reimbursement of legal representation costs may be granted to a public authority only "exceptionally" (as they should have their own employees – lawyers, who can represent them in the dispute).

1.2: Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no provision in Slovak legislation that explicitly gives individuals or NGOs the access to justice with regard to "concepts, plans or programmes" covered by the SEA Directive or related to the environment.

However, the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure expressly allows the "interested public" to bring an action against a "measure taken by a public administration body" and against a "general binding regulation".

In order to be challenged in court, "concepts, plans or programmes" must either be a measure of a public administration body or be adopted in the form of a "general binding regulation of a municipality".

A person whose rights have been violated or an "interested public" may challenge in court not only a decision but also a measure of a public administration body.

According to § 178 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff who has a standing in the administrative judiciary is a natural person or legal entity who claims that, as a party to an administrative proceeding, he has been deprived of his rights or legally protected interests by a decision of a public administration body or a measure of a public administration body.

According to § 178 par. 3 and § 359 par. 2 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the "interested public" is entitled to bring an administrative action before a court against a decision of a public authority, a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality, if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

According to § 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, if the "interested public" has the right under a special regulation to "participate" in administrative proceedings in environmental matters, it is entitled to bring an action before the court against administrative decision or administrative measure, to bring an action before the court against illegal inactivity of the public authority, to bring an action before the court against a general binding regulation of a municipality (e.g. zoning plan regulating land use and building permissions are enacted by general binding regulation of a municipality).
The administrative court must, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.

Foundations and charities, humanitarian organizations, environmental organizations and associations active in consumer protection, as well as municipalities and cities, pay the court fee for filing an administrative action against a general binding regulation of a municipality.

The court fee for filing an administrative action is EUR 50.

The court fees for individual kinds of actions within the administrative judiciary are based on a flat rate regardless of the value of the case (see the Act No. 71/1992 Coll. on court fees).

As regards "concepts, plans or programmes", the "right to participate in administrative proceedings" includes, for example, the participation of members of public (i.e. the participation is open to anyone) in approving land use plans (zoning plans) according to § 12 to 18 of the Building Act (the plan is enacted by the general binding regulation of a municipality), approving the air protection plan according to § 10 of Act No. 137/210 Coll. on air, approving the river basin management plan according to § 13 of Act No. 354/2004 Coll. on water).

Thus, if a member of the public (individual or NGO) has participated, for example, in the preparation of a land use plan (zoning plan), air protection plan or river basin management plan, it becomes the "interested public" and has the right to bring an action against these acts in court.

The effectiveness of access to justice before national courts has increased significantly thanks to the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and the subsequent case law of the Supreme Court. Specifically, decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Union have had a very positive effect on the interpretation of the rules of standing in the administrative and court proceedings. First of all, the effectivity of the access to justice to national courts was significantly increased by the Judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU Lesoohranárske zoskupenie VLK v Ministerstvo životného prostredia Slovenskej republiky (Slovak brown bear case, C-240/09) which declared the indirect effect of Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the obligation of national courts to interpret national procedural law in accordance with the objective of Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention.

Based on a lawsuit by several non-governmental organizations and residents of the city of Bratislava and their arguments referring to the Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, the Regional Court in Bratislava recognized their standing before the administrative court and annulled the measure "Integrated air quality improvement programme for pollutants PM10, NO2, Benzopyrene and ozone in the field of air quality management".

There are no other similar cases known at present, but there is a chance that courts could also rule in this way in other cases concerning "concepts, plans or programmes" which are adopted in the form of a "measure of a public administration body" or in the form of a "general binding regulation of a municipality". However, in addition to these positive developments, shortcomings remain regarding the delays in court proceedings before administrative courts and the insufficient use of the power of administrative courts to grant suspensory effect to an action against the challenged administrative decision or measure of a public administration body.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Pursuant to Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the judgments of the Court of Justice of the EU, the courts are obliged to interpret procedural rules in such a way that the public can challenge both procedural and substantive legality of decisions, acts or omissions.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff must exhaust ordinary remedies against the challenged administrative decision or measure (i.e. administrative appeal) before bringing an action in the court.

As there is no administrative review procedure and no administrative appeal can be filed against the approval of the plan, programme or general binding regulation of a municipality, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

According to the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure, a person who has the "right to participate in administrative proceedings" ("interested public") may file an action in court. It follows from the principle of subsidiarity of the administrative judiciary that a person ("interested public") must exercise this right and participate in the administrative proceedings (make comments, participate at the hearing) to have standing before the court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

As mentioned above, the court may, on the application of the plaintiff, grant the suspensive effect to the action (§ 185 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure). The court may grant the suspensive effect to the action if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest.

The administrative court may, at the request of the plaintiff, temporarily suspend a generally binding regulation of the municipality or one of its provisions if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest.

The administrative court may, at the request of the plaintiff, temporarily suspend a generally binding regulation of the municipality or one of its provisions if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest.

Thus, it is theoretically possible to grant the suspensive effect to the action against a plan or programme subject to SEA, but it may be difficult for the applicant to show that there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence – for the absence of immediate direct effect of plan or programme.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

The administrative court must, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.
The court fee will be refunded if the court proceedings have been discontinued, if the administrative action, cassation complaint or action for renewal of the court proceedings has been dismissed or withdrawn before the case is heard.

In proceedings within the administrative judiciary, the administrative court will award the plaintiff the right to full or partial reimbursement of the costs if the plaintiff has been successful in whole or in part. But the administrative court may also decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are “grounds for special consideration”. The administrative court will grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be “reasonably demanded”. However, the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure explicitly stipulates that the reimbursement of legal representation costs may be granted to a public authority only “exceptionally” (as they should have their own employees – lawyers, who can represent them in the dispute).

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no provision in Slovak legislation that explicitly gives individuals or NGOs the access to justice with regard to “concepts, plans or programmes” related to the environment.

However, the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure expressly allows the “interested public” to bring an action against a “measure taken by a public administration body” and against a “general binding regulation of a municipality”. In order to be challenged in court, “concepts, plans or programmes” must either be a measure of a public authority or be adopted in the form of a general binding regulation of a municipality.

A person whose rights have been violated or an “interested public” may challenge in court not only a decision but also a measure of a public administration body.

According to § 178 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff who has standing in the administrative judiciary is a natural person or legal entity who claims that, as a party to an administrative proceeding, he has been deprived of his rights or legally protected interests by a decision of a public administration body or a measure of a public administration body.

According to § 178 par. 3 and § 359 par. 2 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the “interested public” is entitled to bring an administrative action before a court against a decision of a public authority. a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality, if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

According to § 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, if the “interested public” has the right under a special regulation to “participate” in administrative proceedings in environmental matters, it is entitled to bring an action before the court against administrative decision or administrative measure, or to bring an action before the court against illegal inactivity of the public authority, or to bring an action before the court against a general binding regulation of a municipality (e.g. zoning plan regulating land use and building permissions are enacted by general binding regulation of a municipality).

This means that according to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the “interested public” is a person who has the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” concerning environmental matters under specific environmental laws.

The “interested public” may be a natural person, legal entity, local civic association, or environmental non-governmental organization. In practice, there are also cases where both the municipality and the foreign legal entity (foreign environmental NGO) have become “interested public”.

In this context, it is important how the “interested public” is defined in the sector-specific laws governing administrative proceedings in the field of the environment.

In order for a member of the public to be the “interested public” within the meaning of the Code of Judicial Administrative Procedure and to have the right to bring an action before the court, he/she must satisfy the conditions laid down. In particular, the fulfilment of the condition that a member of the public has a “right to participate in administrative proceedings pursuant to a special regulation” is essential. The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” is a broader concept than a status of a “party to the administrative proceedings”.

As regards “concepts, plans or programmes”, the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” includes, for example, the participation of members of public in approving of land use plans (zoning plans) according to § 12 to 18 of the Building Act (the plan is enacted by the general binding regulation of a municipality), approving of the river basin management plan according to § 13 of Act No. 354/2004 Coll. on water).

Thus, if a member of the public (individual or NGO) has participated, for example, in the preparation of a land use plan (zoning plan), it becomes the “interested public” and has the right to bring an action against these acts in court.

The effectivity of access to justice before national courts has increased significantly thanks to the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union and the subsequent case law of the Supreme Court. Specifically, decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Union have had a very positive effect on the interpretation of the rules of standing in the administrative and court proceedings. First of all, the effectivity of the access to justice to national courts was significantly increased by the judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU Lesocchranárské zoskupenie VLK v Ministerstvo životného prostredia Slovenskej republiky (Slovak brown bear case, C-240/09) which declared the indirect effect of Article 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the obligation of national courts to interpret national procedural law in accordance with the objective of Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention.

Based on a lawsuit by several non-governmental organizations and residents of the city of Bratislava and their arguments referring to the Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the obligation of national courts to interpret national procedural law in accordance with the objective of Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and annulled the measure “Integrated air quality improvement programme for pollutants PM10, NO2, Benzopyrene and ozone in the field of air quality management”.

There are no other similar cases known at present, but there is a chance that courts could also rule in this way in other cases concerning “concepts, plans or programmes” which are adopted in the form of a “measure of a public administration body” or in the form of a “general binding regulation of a municipality”.

However, in addition to these positive developments, shortcomings remain regarding the delays in court proceedings before administrative courts and the insufficient use of the power of administrative courts to grant suspensory effect to an action against the administrative decision or measure of a public administration body.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
Pursuant to Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the judgments of the Court of Justice of the EU, the courts are obliged to interpret procedural rules in such a way that the public can challenge both procedural and substantive legality of decisions, acts or omissions.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure the plaintiff must exhaust ordinary remedies against the challenged administrative decision or measure (i.e. administrative appeal) before bringing an action in the court.

As there is no administrative review procedure and no administrative appeal can be filed against the approval of the plan, programme or general binding regulation of a municipality, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

According to the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure, a person who has the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” (“interested public”) may file an action in court. It follows from the principle of subsidiarity of the administrative judiciary that a person (“interested public”) must exercise this right and participate in the administrative proceedings (make comments, participate at the hearing) to have standing before the court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

As mentioned above, the court may, on the application of the plaintiff, grant the suspensive effect to the action (§ 185 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure). The court may grant the suspensive effect to the action if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest.

The administrative court may, at the request of the plaintiff, temporarily suspend a generally binding regulation of the municipality or one of its provisions if their application may jeopardize fundamental rights and freedoms, if there is a risk of significant economic damage or serious damage to the environment or any other serious irreparable consequence (§ 362 par. 1 of the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure).

Thus, it is theoretically possible to grant the suspensive effect to the action against a plan or programme, but it may be difficult for the applicant to show that there is a risk of serious harm, considerable economic or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence - for the absence of immediate direct effect of plan or programme.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The court fees for individual kinds of actions within the administrative judiciary are based on a flat rate regardless of the value of the case (see the Act No. 71/1992 Coll. On court fees).

The court fee for filing an administrative action against a measure of a public administration body is EUR 70.

The court fee for filing an administrative action against a general binding regulation of a municipality is EUR 50.

Foundations and charities, humanitarian organizations, environmental organizations and associations active in consumer protection, as well as municipalities and regions in proceedings in the public and social interest, are exempt from the court fee.

The administrative court must, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require.

The court fee will be refunded if the court proceedings have been discontinued; if the administrative action, cassation complaint or action for renewal of the court proceedings has been dismissed or withdrawn before the case is heard.

In proceedings within the administrative judiciary, the administrative court will award the plaintiff the right to full or partial reimbursement of the costs if the plaintiff has been successful in whole or in part. But the administrative court may also decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are “grounds for special consideration”. The administrative court will grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be “reasonably demanded”. However, the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure explicitly stipulates that the reimbursement of legal representation costs may be granted to a public authority only “exceptionally” (as they should have their own employees – lawyers, who can represent them in the dispute).

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

The plans covered by this section include:

Air Quality Improvement Programmes (required by Directive No. 2008/50/EC on Ambient Air Quality and Cleaner Air for Europe)

The Areas within the system of Natura 2000 (required by Directive 92/43/EEC on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora).

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no provision in Slovak legislation that explicitly gives individuals or NGOs the access to justice with regard to “concepts, plans or programmes” related to the environment.

However, the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure expressly allows the “interested public” to bring an action against a “measure taken by a public administration body” and against a “general binding regulation” of a municipality.

In order to be challenged in court, “concepts, plans or programmes” must either be a measure of a public authority or be adopted in the form of a general binding regulation of a municipality.

A person whose rights have been violated or an “interested public” may challenge in court not only a decision but also a measure of a public administration body.

According to the § 178 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff who has standing in the administrative judiciary is a natural person or legal entity who claims that, as a party to an administrative proceeding, he has been deprived of his rights or legally protected interests by a decision of a public administration body or a measure of a public administration body.

According to § 178 par. 3 and § 359 par. 2 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the “interested public” is entitled to bring an administrative action before a court against a decision of a public authority, a measure of a public administration body or general binding regulation of a municipality, if it claims that the public interest in the field of the environment has been violated.

According to § 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, if the “interested public” has the right under a special regulation to “participate” in administrative proceedings in environmental matters, it is entitled to bring an action before the court against administrative decision or administrative measure, to bring an action before the court against illegal inactivity of the public authority, to bring an action before the court against a general binding regulation of a municipality.

This means that according to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the “interested public” is a person who has the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” concerning environmental matters under specific environmental laws.

The “interested public” may be a natural person, legal entity, local civic association, or environmental non-governmental organization. In practice, there are also cases where both the municipality and the foreign legal entity (foreign environmental NGO) have become “interested public”.

In this context, it is important how the “interested public” is defined in the sector-specific laws governing administrative proceedings in the field of the environment.

In order for a member of the public to be the “interested public” within the meaning of the Code of Judicial Administrative Procedure and to have the right to bring an action before the court, he/she must satisfy the conditions laid down. In particular, the fulfillment of the condition that a member of the public has a “right to participate in administrative proceedings pursuant to a special regulation” is essential. The “right to participate in administrative proceedings” is a broader concept than a status of a “party to the administrative proceedings”.

As regards “concepts, plans or programmes”, the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” includes, for example, the participation of members of the public in the approval of the air protection plan according to § 10 of Act No. 137/210 Coll. on air.

Thus, if a member of the public (individual or NGO) has participated, for example, in the preparation of an air protection plan, they become the “interested public” and have the right to bring an action against this plan in court.

Based on a lawsuit by several non-governmental organizations and residents of the city of Bratislava, the Regional Court in Bratislava annulled the measure of the Bratislava District Office “Integrated air quality improvement programme for pollutants PM10, NO2, Benzopyrene and ozone in the field of air quality management in the territory of the Capital of the Slovak Republic, Bratislava”, by judgment 55/31/2017 of 13 November 2018.

The Regional Court annulled the Integrated Programme on the grounds that the procedural conditions were not observed when publishing the draft Integrated Programme, the notice of public hearing on the draft Integrated Programme was not published on the defendant's website, the Integrated Programme was published on the website without information on the reasons for adopting the programme and information on public participation in its preparation, non-compliance with the requirements laid down in the Act No 137/2010 Coll. on Climate and Article 13 of the Directive 2008/50/ES, the measures taken and included in the Integrated Programme were not measurable, controllable and time-bound (so that the period in which the amount of pollution is exceeded is shortened as much as possible).

The Regional court annulled the Integrated Programme because it did not meet legal requirements, in particular it did not contain the required particulars and the District Office had not complied with the procedural conditions for approval of the programme and prevented public participation in its creation.

The Regional Court referred to the judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU C-237/07 Janecek, in which the Court of Justice ruled on the obligation to draw up action plan to improve air quality.

The Regional Court also referred to the judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU C-404/13 ClientEarth, in which the Court of Justice stated that the national courts were required to examine the content of the programmes to improve air quality and assess whether the measures contained will lead to the achievement of the limits in the shortest possible time.

The case law of the Court of Justice of the EU has thus made it possible to successfully challenge such plans in court and has made a significant contribution to the effectiveness of judicial protection in this case.

However, in addition to these positive developments, shortcomings remain regarding the delays in court proceedings before administrative courts and the insufficient use of the power of administrative courts to grant suspensory effect to an action against the administrative decision or measure of a public administration body.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

If a plan or programme is adopted by decision or measure, it may be reviewed in accordance with the above mentioned provisions of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure.

If a plan or programme is adopted in the form of a legal regulation (legislation), it can be challenged only in the Constitutional Court. Only certain entities are entitled to file a motion to initiate proceedings before the Constitutional Court (at least one-fifth of the members of parliament - i.e. at least 30 members of parliament, the President of the Slovak Republic, the Government of the Slovak Republic, the court, the General Prosecutor, the Public Defender of Rights).

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Pursuant to Art. 9 par. 3 of the Aarhus Convention and the judgments of the Court of Justice of the EU, the courts are obliged to interpret procedural rules in such a way that the public can challenge both procedural and substantive legality of decisions, acts or omissions.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the plaintiff must exhaust ordinary remedies against the challenged administrative decision or measure (i.e. administrative appeal) before bringing an action in the court.

As there is no administrative review procedure and no administrative appeal can be filed against the approval of the plan, programme or general binding regulation of a municipality, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

According to the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure, a person who has the “right to participate in administrative proceedings” (“interested public”) may file an action in court. It follows from the principle of subsidiarity of the administrative judiciary that a person (“interested public”) must exercise this right and participate in the administrative proceedings (make comments, participate at the hearing) to have standing before the court.

However, the “interested public” may also bring an action if the public authority prevents the public from participating in drawing up the plan or programme (see above the judgment of Regional Court in Bratislava 55/31/2017 of 13 November 2018).

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

As mentioned above, the examination and verification of scientific accuracy in court proceedings within administrative judiciary is limited. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the courts do not review decisions or measures of public authorities, the issuance of which depends solely on an assessment of the state of health of persons or the technical state of affairs. In the case of a decision or a measure issued or taken by a public authority on the basis of an administrative discretion permitted by law, the administrative court will only examine whether such a decision or measure has deviated from the limits and aspects established by law. The administrative Court does not assess the effectiveness, economy and appropriateness of a decision or a measure of a public authority (with the exception of the review of administrative sanctions).
This means that the use of arguments relating to the assessment of a person's state of health or technical condition, efficiency, economy and proportionality of a decision or a measure of a public authority is limited in court proceedings within the administrative judiciary.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, all parties have the same procedural rights and obligations in the proceedings. According to the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure, the parties have equal status in proceedings before the administrative court.

8) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, the administrative authorities are obliged to deal with each case responsibly, to handle it in a timely manner and without undue delay, and to use the most appropriate means that lead to the correct handling of the case.

The Administrative Procedure Code sets deadlines for issuing an administrative decision (see above). The administrative court may grant suspensive effect to the action so that the execution of the challenged decision does not render the judicial review of the decision useless. If the administrative court has granted the administrative action a suspensive effect (pursuant to § 185 letter a)), it is obliged to decide on the administrative action within six months from the date on which the resolution on granting suspensory effect was issued (§ 187 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
As mentioned above, the court may, on the application of the plaintiff, grant the suspensive effect to the action (§ 185 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure). The court may grant the suspensive effect to the action if there is a threat of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence threatens due to immediate execution or other legal consequences of the challenged decision of the public authority or measure of the public authority, and granting the suspensive effect is not in conflict with the public interest. The administrative court may, at the request of the plaintiff, temporarily suspend a generally binding regulation of the municipality or one of its provisions if their application may jeopardize fundamental rights and freedoms, if there is a risk of significant economic damage or serious damage to the environment or any other serious irreparable consequence (§ 362 par. 1 of the Code of Administrative Judicial Procedure).

Thus, it is theoretically possible to grant the suspensive effect to the action against a plan or programme, but it may be difficult for the applicant to show that there is a risk of serious harm, considerable economic loss or financial loss, serious environmental damage or other serious irreparable consequence.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
The court fees for individual kinds of actions within the administrative judiciary are based on a flat rate regardless of the value of the case (see the Act No. 71 /1992 Coll. On court fees). The court fee for filing an administrative action against a measure of a public administration body is EUR 70. The court fee for filing an administrative action against a general binding regulation of a municipality is EUR 50.

Foundations and charities, humanitarian organizations, environmental organizations and associations active in consumer protection, as well as municipalities and regions in proceedings in the public and social interest, are exempt from the court fee. The administrative court must, on application, grant an exemption from the court fee if the circumstances of the party to the proceedings so require. The court fee will be refunded if the court proceedings have been discontinued, if the administrative action, cassation complaint or action for renewal of the court proceedings has been dismissed or withdrawn before the case is heard. In proceedings within the administrative judiciary, the court will award the plaintiff the right to full or partial reimbursement of the costs if the plaintiff has been successful in whole or in part. But the administrative court may also decide not to reimburse all or part of the costs if there are "grounds for special consideration". The administrative court will grant the defendant the right to reimbursement of the costs of the administrative court proceedings against the plaintiff according to the proportion of his success only if it can be "reasonably demanded". However, the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure explicitly stipulates that the reimbursement of legal representation costs may be granted to a public authority only "exceptionally" (as they should have their own employees - lawyers, who can represent them in the dispute).

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts [6]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
If the act is adopted in form of legal regulation (normative instrument), the only possibility of its direct judicial review is a review before the Constitutional Court.
According to the Article 125 par. 1 of the Constitution the Constitutional Court decides, for example, on the compatibility of laws with the Constitution and international treaties, government ordinances, generally binding legal regulations issued by ministries and other central bodies of the state administration with the Constitution and with laws, and generally binding legal regulations issued by local state administration bodies with the Constitution and with laws.

Only specific parties (e.g. at least one-fifth of Members of Parliament, the President of the Slovak Republic, the Government, the court, the general prosecutor, the public defender of rights) are entitled to initiate this review. If the district court, the regional court or the Supreme Court is of the opinion that generally binding legal regulation or a particular provision related to the subject-matter of the proceeding contravenes the Constitution, constitutional laws, international treaties or laws, it will interrupt the court proceeding and submit a motion to the Constitutional Court. The finding of the Constitutional Court is binding for all courts. (Article 144 par. 2 of the Constitution).
For the public (both individuals and NGOs), it is not possible to suggest annulment of a legal regulation together with a constitutional complaint against a specific decision in cases where the regulation was applied. However, in the proceedings before the district court, the regional court or the Supreme Court, the public (individuals or NGOs) may propose that the court interrupt the proceedings and submit a motion to the Constitutional Court on the grounds that a legal regulation contravenes the Constitution, international treaty or law.

However, as mentioned above, if the act is adopted in form of the “general binding regulation of a municipality”, the “interested public” is entitled to bring an action before the court against a “general binding regulation of a municipality” (§ 42 par. 1 of the Code of the Administrative Judicial Procedure).
The Constitutional Court has explicitly stated that it is reviewing the compliance of national laws with the Aarhus Convention. The Aarhus Convention is explicitly recognized as an international convention which takes precedence over national laws and as a binding human rights law concerning access to justice in environmental matters.

As mentioned above, the amendment to the Act concerning the acceleration of the construction of motorways (Act No. 669/2007 Coll.) adopted in 2017 excluded the power of the administrative court to grant the suspensive effect of administrative actions against a zoning decision for construction of motorways and building permits for the construction of motorways. The Constitutional Court by decision of PL. ÚS 18 / 2017-152 of 4 November 2020 decided that this law is in conflict with Art. 9 par. 4 of the Aarhus Convention, which enshrines the right of the public for an administrative court to order an “injunctive relief” following an administrative action against a project authorization decision.

The requirements of the effectiveness of access to national courts in environmental matters formulated in the case law of the CJEU were not directly applied by the Constitutional Court in review of normative acts. As mentioned above, the Constitutional Court referred directly to the Aarhus Convention and reviewed the compliance of the national legislative act with the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The Constitutional Court reviews both substantive and procedural legality of the legal regulation. The Constitutional Court examines whether the regulation was adopted within the limits of the competence of the respective authority and in a manner prescribed by law.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Specific entities authorized to initiate a review of legislation before the Constitutional Court (at least one-fifth of the Members of Parliament, the President of the Slovak Republic, government, the court, General Prosecutor, Public Defender of Rights) do not have to exhaust other remedies before submitting a motion to the Constitutional Court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
The entities which are entitled to initiate the judicial review of legal regulations (normative act) before the Constitutional Court do not have to participate in consultation procedures.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
If the Constitutional Court accepts a petition, it may suspend the effectiveness of the challenged legal regulations or some of their provisions, if their further application could jeopardize the basic rights and freedoms, if there is a threat of a substantial economic damage or other serious irreparable consequence.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
Proceedings before the Constitutional Court are generally not subject to court fees. However, in legally and factually similar cases previously decided by the Constitutional Court in which the complainant, who had submitted the constitutional complaint, was not successful, the Constitutional Court orders the complainant to pay court fee of EUR 30 for the eleventh and each subsequent complaint filed by the same complainant in the same year.

The requirement of mandatory (compulsory) representation by an attorney in proceedings before the Constitutional Court. The complaint must be supported by a power of attorney and this power of attorney must expressly state that it was issued for the purpose of representation before the Constitutional Court.

The requirement of mandatory representation by an attorney in proceedings before the Constitutional Court does not apply if reference to the Constitutional Court was made on the basis of a specific dispute by the lower court, where it was claimed that applicable law is unconstitutional, as this is not an individual constitutional complaint but the review of the legislation, where the complainant is not the party to the proceedings.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[6]
The obligation for courts to make a reference for a preliminary ruling of the Court of Justice of the EU applies in all cases where EU law is interpreted, and also applies to the interpretation of the validity of acts adopted by the EU institutions and bodies. Any party to the dispute may request the court to make a reference for a preliminary ruling, but it is only up to the court to decide whether to do so.

Under national law, there is no specific procedure for directly challenging an act adopted by an EU institution or body before a national court.

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the 3rd Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[3] See findings under 3rd ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters
Remedies against the silence of the administration (the administrative passivity)
According to the Administrative Procedure Code (§ 49), in simple cases, especially if it is possible to decide on the basis of documents submitted by the party to the proceedings, the administrative authority must decide without delay. In other cases, (unless a special law provides otherwise) the administrative authority is obliged to decide on the matter within 30 days from the commencement of the proceedings, and in particularly complex cases it must decide within 60 days at the latest. If, in view of the nature of the case, it is not possible to decide within that period, the appeal body may extend it accordingly. If the administrative authority cannot decide within 30 or 60 days, it is obliged to notify the party to the proceedings, stating the reasons.

As stated above, the administrative authorities must proceed without undue delay and comply with the statutory deadlines. If the administrative authority does not act within the statutory time limit or within a reasonable time limit (if the statutory time limit is not specified), the members of public or parties to the proceedings may use the provisions of several laws to protect themselves against the inaction of the administrative authorities.

Action by the appellate body against administrative inaction:
According to the Administrative Procedure Code (§ 50), if the nature of the case allows it and redress cannot be achieved otherwise, the administrative authority, which would otherwise be entitled to decide on the appeal, will decide the case itself if the administrative authority of first instance competent to decide did not initiate proceedings, even though it was obliged to do so, or did not decide within the statutory time limit. Thus, if the administrative authority of first instance is inactive, the party to the proceedings may inform the appellate authority and ask it to act and decide.

Administrative action against the inaction of an administrative authority:
According to the Administrative Procedure Code, a party to the administrative proceedings may file an administrative action in court against the inactivity of the administrative authority.

Inaction of the administrative authority may relate to the obligation to issue a decision or measure, or to perform an act, or may relate to the obligation of the administrative authority to initiate administrative proceedings ex officio.

However, the condition for filing an administrative action in court is the prior filing of a complaint for inaction of an administrative authority pursuant to Act no. 9/2010 Coll. on complaints, or the prior filing of a complaint for inaction of an administrative authority pursuant to Act no. 153/2001 Coll. on the prosecutor’s office. The party is required to file at least one of these remedies (complaints) before filing an administrative action in court. It is not necessary to file a repeated complaint.

An administrative action may also be brought by the “interested public” if a public authority is inactive in an administrative proceeding concerning environmental matters and at the same time the “interested public” has unsuccessfully filed the above-mentioned remedies (complaint, complaint to the prosecutor’s office).

The law does not set any time limit for filing a lawsuit - a lawsuit can be filed for the entire duration of the inactivity of the administrative authority.

If the administrative court, after review, finds that the administrative authority has been unlawfully inactive, it will impose in the decision an obligation for the administrative authority to act and decide, issue a measure or perform an act, or initiate administrative proceedings ex officio within a period specified by the court. The issuance of this court decision does not end the court proceedings and the inactive administrative authority is obliged to deliver to the administrative court within the specified time limit the issued administrative decision, measure or notification of the performed act, or of the commencement of administrative proceedings.

If the administrative authority does not terminate its inaction within the time limit specified by the court, the administrative court may impose a fine on it.

Penalties for the de facto contempt of the court, e.g. when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected
If, after issuing a decision of the administrative court by which the court imposes an obligation on the administrative authority to act and decide (in the case of unlawful inaction of an administrative authority), the administrative authority does not terminate its inaction within the period specified by the court, the administrative court may impose a fine on it.

In case of damage caused by an unlawful decision of the public authority or another unlawful maladministration (including unlawful inaction) of the public authority, the victim can ask for redress before the civil court according to Act no. 514/2003 Coll. on liability for damage caused in the exercise of official authority.

Pursuant to Section 326 of the Criminal Code (Act No. 300/2005 Coll.), a public official may be punished for the criminal offence of abuse of power of a public official. This criminal offence is committed by a public official if he fails to fulfil an obligation arising from his jurisdiction or from a court decision (intending to cause harm to another or to obtain an unjustified advantage for himself or another). For committing this crime, a public official is punishable by imprisonment of two to five years. A public official will be punished by imprisonment of seven to twelve years if he fails to fulfil an obligation arising from his jurisdiction or from a court decision in order to prevent or impede another's exercise of his fundamental rights and freedoms.

Last update: 03/08/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Finland
To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 19/05/2024

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.
In the environmental legislation it is common to have authorisations for the Government or a Ministry to issue Decrees on more technical issues. There are several Governmental Decrees that are important for understanding the environmental legislation and also some Ministerial Decrees such as Decrees of the Ministry of Environment. In addition, state agencies can give guidance or even decisions on technical issues related to the environmental legislation. In addition to the above, the autonomous Åland Islands must also be mentioned. This self-governing region is competent to pass its own legislation in many areas of law, including environmental matters, as provided by the Act on the Autonomy of Åland (1144/1991, currently undergoing a general reform). Other areas, such as the court system and proceedings, remain governed primarily by state law, which means the state acts are applied to judicial proceedings. According to the Constitution the exercise of public powers must be based on an Act. In all public activity, the law must be strictly observed. The law providing competence for the decision-making also defines the procedural rights of persons and which type of appeal the decision of the authority is subject to. Procedure in administrative matters is generally governed by the Administrative Procedure Act (APA, 434/2003), which contains provisions on the fundamental principles of good administration and on the procedure applicable in administrative matters. Generally, authority decisions can be challenged by lodging an administrative appeal with the regional administrative court, as prescribed by the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA, 808/2019). As an exception to this, decisions taken by municipal authorities under the competence provided by their self-government are challenged instead by means of municipal appeal, which constitutes the second basic category of appeals in the regional administrative courts. The municipal appeal is generally regulated in the Local Government Act (410/2015). While environmental decisions are typically subject to administrative appeal, there are some notable exceptions (e.g. municipal land use plans, building ordinances and local environmental regulations as well as decisions on the organisation of waste transport), which are reviewed based on municipal appeal. The main difference between the two appeal procedures is that municipal appeal is available to all members of a municipality, while the right to administrative appeal is typically restricted to parties who are more directly affected by the decision. On the other hand, the administrative court’s powers of review are wider on administrative appeal than municipal appeal. The administrative court’s decision can be further appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court. In the Supreme Administrative Court a leave to appeal is required after the decision of a regional administrative court, but in some other cases a leave to appeal is not needed. Decisions of the Government (expropriation permits, for example) are generally challenged by appeal directly with the Supreme Administrative Court. General court proceedings follow different and to some extent more detailed procedural regulations, principally the Code of Judicial Procedure (CJP, 4/1734, with numerous amendments) and the Criminal Procedure Act (CPA, 689/1997). Environmental tort and criminal cases are dealt with by the general courts. Environmental tort cases include cases under the Act on Compensation for Environmental Damage (737/1994) and other cases of private environmental liabilities. In real property and easement cases appeals are lodged with specialised land courts that operate as an adjunct to a number of the district courts. The decision of a district court can be appealed to a court of appeal, but full consideration of the appeal requires a qualified interest or, alternatively, grant of a separate leave for continued proceedings. Challenging the decision of a land court or a court of appeal requires leave to appeal from the Supreme Court, which is primarily an instance for judicial precedents. The autonomous Åland Islands have a general district court as well as an administrative court, which operate within the respective national hierarchies. However, decisions taken by the regional government are appealed directly to the Supreme Administrative Court. 2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights The Constitution of Finland (731/1999) includes a basic right to the environment under its Section 20. It provides the following:

Nature and its biodiversity, the environment and the national heritage are the responsibility of everyone.

The public authorities must endeavour to guarantee everyone the right to a healthy environment and the ability to influence decisions that concern their own living environment.

Access to justice is regulated under Section 21, entitled “Protection under the law”. The section guarantees everyone the right to have his or her case dealt with appropriately and without delay by a legally competent court of law or other authority, as well as to have a decision pertaining to his or her rights or obligations reviewed by a court of law or other independent organ for the administration of justice.

The aforementioned rights to the environment and to access to justice as well as other basic rights guaranteed in the Constitution can seldom be relied on directly. The observance of the rights stipulated in the Constitution has to be guaranteed by the public authorities (Section 22 of the Constitution). There is no constitutional court in Finland. While constitutional supervision is practised primarily in advance through assessment of legislative proposals by the Constitutional Law Committee of the Parliament, constitutional rights can also be invoked before the courts. If, in a matter being tried by a court, the application of an Act would in evident conflict with the Constitution, the court must give primary to the provision in the Constitution (Section 106 of the Constitution). And if a provision in a Decree or another statute at a lower level than an Act is in conflict with the Constitution or another Act, it may not be applied by a court of law or by any other public authority (Section 107).

The obligation of the public authorities to guarantee the possibility to influence decisions that concern their own living environment stipulated in Section 20 of the Constitution has been mentioned several times in the case law of the Supreme Administrative Court, and has influenced the widening of access to justice in environmental matters.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees etc.

All the Finnish legislative instruments can be found in Finnish and in Swedish in the FINLEX database, which also contains English translations of most of the central environmental statutes. The English translations are unofficial and may not include the latest amendments.

As mentioned before, procedure in administrative matters is generally governed by the Administrative Procedure Act (APA, 434/2003), which contains provisions on the fundamental principles of good administration and on the procedure applicable in administrative matters. The APA also contains in its Chapter 7a provisions on the procedure for requesting an administrative review.

The Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA, 808/2019), which prescribes the administrative appeal, is a central statute with regard to access to justice in general and also in environmental matters. The other type of appeal, the municipal appeal, is regulated in general in the Local Government Act (410/2015). Most of the environmental statutes contain a reference to the AJPA and the administrative appeal, but many of them have also include special provisions on judicial appeal, and in some cases, there is a reference to both the administrative and municipal appeal. The most central national environmental statutes are listed here beginning with some generally applicable statutes followed by several sectoral acts that are applied only to certain activities:

The Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure (252/2017) has in its Section 37 a general reference to both the AJPA and the sectoral statutes concerning the different permit procedures that can be relevant in connection to the project. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal concerning the environmental impact assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project in question.
The Act on the Remediation of Certain Environmental Damages (383/2009) contains in its Section 17 a reference to several sectoral statutes concerning rules on administrative enforcement procedures that have to be followed in case of a significant environmental damage. These acts are also listed in Section 2 of the Environmental Protection Act (EPA, 527/2014) has in its Chapter 19 provisions on administrative appeal and enforcement of a decision. The provisions cover e.g. right of appeal of individuals, NGOs and state and municipal authorities defending environmental interests, request for an administrative review of certain decisions, hearing of views on an appeal concerning an environmental permit decision and the procedure in the appellate court. The Water Act (587/2011) contains in its Chapter 15 provisions on administrative appeal and enforcement of a decision that are very similar to the abovementioned provisions of the EPA.

The Land Use and Building Act (132/1999) has in its Chapter 25 provisions on judicial appeal and rectification issued by an authority. These provisions cover e.g. request for rectification, administrative and municipal appeal as well as the right to appeal depending on the type of appeal and the decision in question.

The Nature Conservation Act (1096/1996) contains in its Chapter 9 provisions on administrative appeal and the right to appeal depending on the type and scope (national, regional or local) of the decision in question.

The Climate Change Act (609/2015) lays down the general framework for the planning of climate change policy in Finland and the monitoring of its implementation.

The Mining Act (621/2011) has in its Chapter 17 provisions on administrative appeal and right to appeal concerning decisions by the mining authorities. There are also special provisions on appeal against decisions made in the proceedings establishing a mining area, which are lodged in the land courts that operate in annex to certain district courts.

The Waste Act (646/2011) contains in its Chapter 14 provisions on judicial appeal covering both the administrative and municipal appeal and right to appeal depending on the type of the appeal and decision in question.

Also e.g. the Land Extraction Act, the Transport System and Highways Act, the Railways Act, the Gene Technology Act, the Hunting Act and the Act on the Organisation of River Basin Management and Marine Strategy include provisions on the right of appeal of environmental NGOs against certain decisions, which can be considered relevant in this context.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The right to environment as guaranteed in Section 20 of the Constitution has been applied several times in the case law of the Supreme Administrative Court, often in the interpretation of provisions on rights to appeal. Since the addition of Section 20 to the Finnish Constitution in 1995 the decisions of the Supreme Administrative Court have gradually moved towards emphasising the enhancement of participatory rights in environmental matters in cases where the national legislation has left room for interpretation (see KHO 2003:99, KHO 2004:76 and KHO 2011:49).

Since the year 2004 and the ratification of the Aarhus Convention in the Finnish legislation the connection to the European Union environmental legislation have also been referred to several times in the jurisprudence of the Supreme Administrative Court. As an example, some of the cases in the Supreme Administrative Court concerning the national legislation transposing Habitats and Birds Directives lead to amendments in the provisions on right to appeal in the Hunting Act (see KHO 2004:76 and KHO 2007:74).

Summaries of selected precedents of the Supreme Administrative Court can be found in English on the website of the court. One of the latest decisions concerning right of appeal in an environmental matter to be found on the website is case KHO 2019:97 on the right of appeal of a Polish foundation against a decision granting a water permit for gas pipes on the bottom of the Baltic Sea.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

As a general rule, the applicability of international agreements is reliant on their implementation in national law. Approval of the Finnish Parliament is needed for the ratification of international agreements containing stipulations falling within the scope of national law. The international agreement must also be implemented into national law after it has entered into force. In the ratification process the competence of the European Union has also to be taken into consideration.

In published case law, the Aarhus Convention has been applied a few times, in order to redress an inconsistency in the right of appeal for non-governmental organisations (NGOs) through a broader interpretation of the applicable national law (see KHO 2011:49 and KHO 2018:1). The legislation of the European Union and especially the case-law of the European Union Court of Justice concerning the union-wide transposition of the Aarhus Convention has also played an important role in Finnish jurisprudence on access to justice in environmental matters.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

The Finnish court system is divided into two independent lines of courts: general courts and administrative courts.

The general court line has three levels:

- district courts
- courts of appeal
- the Supreme Court

The administrative court line has two levels:

- regional administrative courts
- the Supreme Administrative Court

The general courts handle civil and criminal cases, while the administrative courts deal primarily with appeals against authority decisions. In addition, there are a number of specialised courts (e.g. the market court, the insurance court and the labour court) as well as boards of appeal operating under one (or both) lines.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

As environmental matters are generally decided in first instance by public authorities, environmental disputes typically end up with the administrative courts.

The law providing competence for the decision-making prescribes which type of appeal the decision is subject to, the two main categories being administrative and municipal appeal. There are some notable exceptions, namely real property and easement cases, in which appeals are lodged with specialised land courts that operate as an adjunct to a number of the district courts. In addition, environmental tort and criminal cases are dealt with by the general courts.

The Åland Islands have a general district court as well as an administrative court, which operate within the respective national hierarchies. However, decisions taken by the regional government are appealed directly to the Supreme Administrative Court. Moreover, the centralisation of judicial review of environmental matters does not apply to environmental matters on Åland, i.e. the Administrative Court of Åland deals with such matters on the Islands.
Within the administrative court system, a major part of all environmental cases on the Finnish mainland (not covering the Åland Islands) has been centralised to one of the regional administrative courts, i.e. the Vaasa administrative court. This court deals with all cases under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA, 527/2014) and the Water Act (587/2011), which make up for roughly one fourth of environmental cases in administrative courts nationwide. The remaining environmental cases are handled by the regionally competent administrative court, which is usually the court for the judicial district that includes the geographical area of operations of the authority that issued the administrative decision. An appeal against the decision of an authority operating throughout the country must be addressed to the administrative court to whose jurisdiction the decision has the closest link by virtue of that jurisdiction containing most of the territory or property affected by the decision. The geographical jurisdiction of the regional administrative courts is described in detail in Section 10 of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act. Overall, the abovementioned geographical and substantial jurisdictions of the competent courts in environmental matters are quite clearly defined by law, and although borderline cases may turn up, the possibility of forum shopping is non-existent.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

Within the administrative court system, a major part of all environmental cases on the Finnish mainland (not covering the Åland Islands) has been centralised to one of the regional administrative courts, i.e. the Vaasa administrative court. This court deals with all cases under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and the Water Act, which make up for roughly one fourth of environmental cases in administrative courts nationwide. The remaining environmental cases, such as ones dealing with nature protection, soil extraction and quarrying as well as land use planning and building, are handled by the regionally competent administrative court.

Expert judges in Vaasa administrative court and in the Supreme Administrative Court (SAC) participate in the consideration of cases on the basis of the Water Act and the Environmental Protection Act. In Vaasa administrative court the expert judges work full-time, and in the SAC there are part-time environmental expert judges. In Vaasa administrative court there can be one or two expert judges in the composition with two legally trained judges, depending on the expertise needed in the case. In SAC there can be one expert judge in the composition with three legally trained judges when a leave to appeal is decided on, and there are always two expert judges in the composition with five legally trained judges when the final decision is made. The expert judges as well as other members of the court assess the materials in the case file on the basis of their own expertise. An expert judge must have an appropriate Master’s degree in technology or in the natural sciences. In addition, he or she must be familiar with the duties falling within the scope of the applicable legislation.

4) Level of control in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

The administrative appeal is a reformatory remedy, which means the court is competent to amend the challenged decision. In principle, the powers of the court to reconsider the matter at hand are quite extensive, but self-restraint is exercised in this regard. Amendments are usually left for situations where the challenged decision would be found unlawful as such, but overturning and renewal of the administrative procedure can be avoided by a restricted amendment, which thus serves general process economic considerations. In environmental matters, revision of disputed permit conditions comprises a typical use of this reformatory power.

The municipal appeal, on the other hand, is cassatory, meaning the court can only uphold or overturn the authority decision. However, the law typically provides for exceptions to this rule in environmental matters, allowing the administrative court to make limited amendments also in such cases.

The AJPA requires that the appellant states the reasoning for the claims in the appeal, but it is for the administrative court to discern the law according to which legality of the decision is reviewed. When considering administrative appeals, the administrative court’s responsibilities are quite broad, and the review is not restricted explicitly to what has been alleged in the appeal. In dealing with municipal appeals, on the other hand, the court is strictly bound to the grounds of illegality invoked by the appellant. In the municipal appeal process, these grounds of appeal must also be stated within the appeal period, while the administrative appeal procedure provides more leeway for complementing one’s appeal during the proceedings.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The environmental administration in Finland consists of the Ministry of Environment and the Finnish Institute for Environment at the national level, four Regional State Administrative Agencies and 13 Centres for Economic Development, Transport and Environment (so called ELY or ETE Centres) at the regional level and the municipal environmental administration at the local level. In addition to these authorities there are several authorities e.g. under the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry, Ministry of Transport and the Ministry of Economic Affairs and Employment making decisions on the use of natural resources or transport infrastructure where this is relevant for the environment.

Environmental permits are needed in Finland for all activities that pose a risk of environmental pollution covering widely different types and sources of emissions to into air, water or onto land. No permits can be granted to activities causing contamination of the soil or pollution of groundwater since these are strictly prohibited in the legislation. Water permits are needed for other activities affecting constructions in waters or the water supply. Permits may be granted to individuals or companies. Depending on the activity and its scale the most central permit authorities are the four Regional State Administrative Agencies and local environmental authorities in the municipalities. Finland’s 13 Centres for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment act as supervisory authorities concerning the permit procedure and are also responsible for areas like nature conservation and water management planning.

Procedure in administrative matters is generally governed by the Administrative Procedure Act (APA, 434/2003), which contains provisions on the fundamental principles of good administration and on the procedure applicable in administrative matters. The procedure under the APA is observed in environmental matters unless provided for otherwise in the applicable substantive law. Even then, the provisions as well as principles of the APA are complementary. In other words, the APA lays down a universal procedure, which is then tailored on specific points by various other laws. Many types of environmental matters adhere to such tailored procedures. Environmental permit granting under the EPA and land use planning under the Land Use and Building Act (LUBA, 132/1999) are examples of procedures that have been extensively regulated in addition to the APA. In addition to its own regional substantive legislation on the environment, the administration of the Åland Islands abides by a regional act regulating administrative procedure (Forvaltningslag for landskapet Åland, 2008:9). General administrative procedure under the regional law closely corresponds with procedure under the state legislation.

Typically, the substantive law prescribes who is to be specifically notified or heard during the administrative procedure as well as whether or not a wider public consultation of some sort is to be arranged prior to decision-making. If the procedure is not specifically regulated, the general provisions of the APA are applied. The APA grants standing, as party to an administrative matter, to anyone who has rights, interests or obligations affected by the matter, and requires that such a party be heard before the matter is decided. In addition, the APA requires that the authority should also give others an opportunity to participate in matters that may have a significant effect on the living or working conditions of other than the parties. In most cases, environmental substantive law provides for wider standing and consultation. In environmental permit matters, for example, the EPA grants standing (right to be specifically heard) to anyone whose rights, interests of obligations may be affected by the matter, and provides others the opportunity to voice their opinion during a general public consultation (in writing). NGOs are not ordinarily granted standing during administrative procedures, which means they are generally able to participate during public consultations, when these are provided for as part of the procedure.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?
Administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. As an example, the Land Use and Building Act stipulates that court proceedings are preceded by a request for rectification with the municipal supervision authority in cases where a matter has been decided by a subordinate official under delegated competence. The time limit for lodging a request for administrative review is typically shorter than the appeal procedure, and the authority may be required to give priority to processing the request as well. Ordinarily only those who have submitted a request for administrative review are entitled to challenge the review decision through appeal, unless the original decision is changed as result of the request.

According to the Administrative Procedure Act, appeal instructions must be enclosed with a decision qualifying for appeal (APA, Section 47). The appeal instructions must indicate the appellate authority, the authority with which the appeal document is to be lodged and the appeal period and the date when the said period begins to run. In most of the environmental decisions the appeal period is thirty days and the appellate authority is the regionally competent administrative court or in case of environmental and water permits according to Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and Water Act the Vaasa administrative court. Administrative court proceedings are predominantly carried out in writing, through written statements from the authorities, appellants and other parties to the proceedings. Legal counsel is not mandatory, and the law does not set many formal requirements for the appeal or other stages of the proceedings. The pending times for appeal proceedings in the regional administrative courts have in recent years (situation in January 2020 according to the common website of the administrative courts) averaged around 10 months in the category of land use and building matters and slightly above 12 months in other environmental matters. In the Supreme Administrative Court the corresponding pending times were approximately 11 and 10 months, respectively.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence
Within the administrative court system, a major part of all environmental cases on the Finnish mainland (not covering the Åland Islands) has been centralised to one of the regional administrative courts, i.e. the Vaasa administrative court. This court deals with all cases under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA, 527/2014) and the Water Act (587/2011), which make up for roughly one fourth of environmental cases in administrative courts nationwide. The remaining environmental cases, such as ones dealing with nature protection, soil extraction and quarrying as well as land use planning and building, are handled by the regionally competent administrative court. Overall, the geographical and substantial jurisdictions of the competent courts in environmental matters are quite clearly defined by law, and although borderline cases may turn up, the possibility of forum shopping is non-existent.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)
As mentioned above the administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. The substantive law providing competence for the decision-making also prescribes which type of appeal the decision is subject to, the two main categories being administrative and municipal appeal. Both the administrative and the municipal appeal are lodged in the regionally competent administrative court, or in the case of environmental and water permits under the Environmental Protection Act and the Water Act on the Finnish mainland (not covering the Åland Islands), in the Vaasa administrative court, which is specialised in environmental matters.

The administrative court’s decision can be further appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court. The general rule is that a leave to appeal is required at the Supreme Administrative Court, but in some cases a leave to appeal is not needed.

In addition to ordinary appeals, there are a number of particular forms of remedy, such as administrative litigation (hallintorita, förvaltningsritemål), material tax appeal (perustevelius, grundbesvär) and church appeal (kirkollisvalitus, kyrkobesvär), which are not especially relevant with regard to environmental justice.

The AJPA provides for two means of extraordinary appeal concerning decisions that have become final: request for restoration of lapsed time (menetetyn määräajan palauttaminen, återställande av försutten fatalietid), lodged with the Supreme Administrative Court request for annulment of a final decision (purku, återbrytande), lodged with the Supreme Administrative Court. Lapsed time may be restored to a person who has a lawful excuse or who for another very serious reason has been unable to within a time limit to file a request for an administrative review or request a judicial review of a decision by way of appeal or to take other measures in administrative procedure or in administrative judicial procedure (AJPA, Section 114). Where a lawful excuse is claimed in support of the application, the application must be made within 30 days of the cessation of the excuse. In the case of another extremely significant reason the time limit of 30 days is not applicable, but restoration of expired time must be applied for within one year of the end of the original time limit, at the latest. A final decision may be annulled if a party has not been given the right to be heard, or some other procedural error has occurred in considering the matter, the decision is based on a manifestly incorrect application of law or on an error that could have materially affected the decision, new evidence has become available that could have materially affected the matter, and the failure to present the evidence at the time of the decision-making was not due to the applicant or the decision is so unclear or incomplete that it is not evident how the matter has been resolved (AJPA, Section 117).

There are no special rules for introducing preliminary references in the national legislation. The appellant can make a request for making a preliminary reference to the European Court of Justice, which will be considered by the national court.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?
It is ordinarily not possible to officially confirm settlements in administrative court appeal matters, and mediation or other means of alternative dispute resolution are accordingly not available in administrative environmental matters.

In civil matters, different methods of dispute resolution are available. Court mediation is offered by the general courts, and it is also possible to confirm out-of-court settlements. There are no established forms of out of court solutions in the environmental area, but there have been some experimental and academic research projects on mediation in real estate and environmental disputes (like the SOMARI project at Aalto University by the Finnish Forum for Mediation in 2012). The Finnish Forum for Mediation also offers up to date information on mediation in Finland.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?
In addition to directly challenging administrative decisions, the option of making an administrative complaint is also available. Complaints can be filed with municipal or state supervisory authorities, where relevant, or the two supreme overseers. The Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Chancellor of Justice with the Government are the two supreme overseers of public authorities’ and officials’ compliance with law and good administrative practice, with an emphasis on fundamental and human rights. With minor distinctions, the jurisdictions of the supreme overseers are largely the same and extend also to the authorities of the autonomous Åland Islands. The overseers deliver their opinion to complaints lodged with them and are also competent to issue official reprimands as well as initiate criminal prosecution for malfeasance. The overseers can also initiate investigations on their own initiative. It is worth mentioning that the supreme overseers of legality are competent to investigate the actions of courts and court officials, which naturally entails careful consideration with respect to the separation of powers and judicial independence. The overseers are not competent to compel authorities or officials in individual matters or to overturn or amend decisions or to lodge appeals of their own. There are also a number of specialised overseers with a nationwide jurisdiction, such as the Data Protection Ombudsman, the Consumer Ombudsman and the Ombudsman for Minorities, for example, but no such office is designated for especially environmental matters.

Office of the Parliamentary Ombudsman
Office of the Chancellor of Justice
Ombudsman for Minorities

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Section 7 of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA, 808/2019) provides for a general right of appeal against administrative decisions. This right is granted to any person the decision is addressed to or whose right, obligation or interest is directly affected by the decision. In addition, decisions that are subject to municipal appeal, such as land use planning decisions, can be challenged by any member of the municipality, which includes any individual, corporation etc. domiciled in the municipality as well as anyone who owns or occupies property in the municipality (Local Government Act, Sections 3 and 137). Other private legal entities usually have participatory rights and right of appeal according to the same rules as individuals.

An authority has the right to appeal if this is necessary because of a public interest overseen by the authority (AJPA, Section 7). State authorities, municipalities as well as municipal authorities may also have right of appeal under applicable substantive law. Typically, the right to appeal concerning environmental decisions is prescribed to the regional ETE Centre (Centre for economic development, transport and the environment) in matters decided by municipal authorities or other state authorities. Municipal environmental or health protection authorities, regional or national museum authorities as well as municipalities themselves are examples of other authorities which may be entitled to appeal.

Apart from municipal appeal, there is no actio popularis with regard to access to court. Nor are there any general provisions on the right of appeal of NGOs. Right of appeal is provided for NGOs by substantive law in most significant environmental matters (see next section), complemented to a certain extent by case law as well.

The administrative court’s decision can be further appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court, where a leave to appeal is required. The right to appeal against the decision of the administrative court follows the same principles as the right to appeal against the original administrative decision in question. The decision-making authority has the right to continued appeal when the administrative court has reversed or amended its decision (AJPA, Section 109).

As part of the administration of justice, which falls under state competence, right of appeal is regulated by state legislation also on the Åland Islands. Thus, right of appeal in environmental matters is normally resolved according to the state law corresponding to the applicable regional law.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Legal Standing</th>
<th>Administrative Procedure</th>
<th>Judicial Procedure</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Individuals and other legal entities</td>
<td>Obligation to hear parties during the administrative procedure is ordinarily regulated by the applicable substantive law (otherwise APA); others can participate through public consultation according to the applicable substantive legislation. Other private legal entities usually have participatory rights according to the same rules as individuals.</td>
<td>Right of appeal for directly affected parties as well as for others when prescribed by the applicable substantive law; all members of the municipality, in matters subject to municipal appeal. Other private legal entities usually have right of appeal according to the same rules as individuals.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGOs</td>
<td>With a few exceptions, no specific provisions on standing during the administrative procedure, i.e. NGOs can generally participate through public consultation.</td>
<td>Right of appeal is provided for by substantive law in most significant environmental matters, complemented to a certain extent by case law as well. The NGO must be registered, and certain requirements with regard to field of operation (geographic / registration purpose) are usually prescribed.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ad hoc groups</td>
<td>Participation through public consultation; otherwise in the capacity of the individuals concerned.</td>
<td>No, i.e. only in the capacity of the individuals concerned.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foreign NGOs</td>
<td>Participatory rights in cross-border EIA procedure: frontier treaties and other agreements may provide for rights in other procedures.</td>
<td>Right of appeal in accordance with the same provisions as for domestic NGOs, i.e. typically based on field of operation, taking into account possible obligations arising from frontier or other treaties.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Any other</td>
<td>The applicable substantive law may provide that state authorities, municipalities and/or municipal authorities have to be consulted prior to decision-making.</td>
<td>State authorities, municipalities as well as municipal authorities may have right of appeal under applicable substantive law or based on AJPA.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

Substantive environmental legislation often includes superseding provisions, which typically prescribe a wider right of appeal than Section 7 of the AJPA. Thus, the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), for example, provides a general right of appeal for all persons whose rights or interests may be affected by the matter, while the Land Use and Building Act (LUBA) lays down a more detailed framework for right of appeal against different types of building and land use permits under its regime.

Provisions on the right to appeal of environmental NGOs have been introduced in the sectoral legislation under a longer period of time starting with the Nature Conservation Act (Section 61) in 1996 and LUBA (Sections 191 and 193) in 2000. Now there are provisions on the right of appeal of NGOs also in e.g. the EPA, Water Act, Waste Act, Mining Act, Land Extraction Act, Transport System and Highways Act, Railways Act, Hunting Act, Gene Technology Act, Flood Risk Management Act and the Act on the Organisation of River Basin Management and Marine Strategy. The provisions of the EPA are applicable to the installations under the Industrial Emissions Directive. The provisions in the abovementioned acts can differ in e.g. in whether both national and local NGOs have a right to appeal or if the right is only prescribed to local and regional NGOs.

The Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure as well as the Act on the Remediation of Certain Environmental Damages have a general reference to both the AJPA and the sectoral statutes concerning the different permit procedures that can be relevant in connection to the project or activity concerned. This means in practice that the provisions on right to appeal concerning the environmental impact assessment or environmental liability depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project or activity in question.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and Individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)
With a few exceptions, there are no specific provisions on standing during the administrative procedure, i.e. NGOs can generally participate through public consultation in decision-making procedures that include public consultation. Right of appeal is provided for NGOs by substantive law in most significant environmental matters, complemented to a certain extent by case law as well. The NGO must be registered, and certain requirements with regard to field of operation (geographic/registration purpose) are usually prescribed. Consequently, the EPA, for example, provides right of appeal to registered associations or foundations whose purpose is to promote environmental, health or nature protection or the general safeguarding of the environment and whose area of activity is subjected to the environmental impact in question. In cases where the connection between the NGO’s purpose and the challenged decision may not be self-evident, such as various residents’ or village associations, for example, the by-laws of the organisation are usually consulted to resolve right of appeal. There are no requirements pertaining to duration of activity or number of members.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Rights of individuals to use the two national languages, Finnish and Swedish, as provided by Section 17 of the Constitution, are laid down in the Language Act (423/2003). Additional language rights are provided for the indigenous Sámi, especially, as well as other groups such as pupils or students using Romani or sign language (see Language Act for Sámi 1086/2003 and Basic Education Act 628/1998). With relevance to foreigners, Section 6 of the Constitution provides that everyone is equal before the law, and that no one may, without an acceptable reason, be treated differently from other persons on the ground of origin or language, among other things. The Ombudsman for Minorities supervises compliance with prohibitions against ethnic discrimination and works to advance the status and legal protection of ethnic minority and foreigners.

The legislation covering administrative and court procedure (APA, AJPA, CJP and CPA) contains additional provisions on language rights. Additional provisions are included for certain specific procedures, but typically not for environmental procedures. In administrative matters, translation and interpretation can be provided for parties under certain conditions, mainly in authority-initiated matters, but it is also possible for guaranteeing the rights of parties in other matters. General language rights in administrative judicial proceedings correspond with the above but provide for an unconditional right to interpretation when being orally heard. In criminal matters, language rights are naturally more pronounced. In civil disputes, a party who does not speak Finnish, Swedish or Sámi is ordinarily responsible for translation at his/her own expense, unless the court rules otherwise due to the nature of the case. In addition to the above, both administrative authorities and courts are under obligation to ensure that citizens of the other Nordic countries receive the language assistance they require (see AJPA, Section 52).

The stipulations described above mean that individuals with a language foreign to the Nordic countries wishing to take part in an environmental matter will typically have to cover their own translation expenses. However, when legal aid is available, it also applies to required translation and interpretation costs. Translations in transboundary environmental matters are dealt with below (see section 1.8.4).

Unlike the rest of Finland, the autonomous Åland Islands are monolingually Swedish. This applies both to regional and municipal authorities as well as state authorities on the Islands, including courts. The Act on the Autonomy of Åland includes provisions regarding rights to use Finnish in regional state authorities and courts, and the regional act on administrative procedure (Förvaltningslag för landskapet Åland) contains provisions similar to the state legislation on provision of interpretation and translation in regional and municipal authorities.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

With regard to review of facts, the AJPA provides that the court must obtain evidence on its own motion to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the proceedings and the nature of the matter require (Section 37). The court can, for example, request specific evidence from the parties, obtain expert statements or arrange oral hearing or viewing to establish the facts of the case.

When considering appeals, the administrative court usually has access to the complete administrative case file (requesting it from the authority together with a statement is usually the first step to processing an appeal). As has been noted above, the AJPA further imposes a general obligation to ensure that the matter is examined on the court.

The aim is to establish the objective facts of the matter. The court fulfils its obligation by requesting evidence it finds necessary or useful in addition to the administrative case file. Typically, such requests are directed to the authority, while the parties of the case are provided opportunity to provide their own account. The parties have to be heard of all new evidence provided to the court.

Corresponding with this principle of judicial investigation, there are no explicit general rules regarding burden of proof with regard to the parties of appeal proceedings. Certain implicit principles have evolved for different types of matters and situations, sometimes resting also on the case law of the European Court of Justice. However, it must be stressed that issues regarding evidence are usually resolved in first instance by the administrative authority, and, correspondingly, the court’s task is typically not so much to consider new evidence as to review evidence previously submitted to the authority as well as the evaluation made by the authority. In addition to requesting documents or opinions from the first instance authority and the parties, the court can facilitate its review by other means as well.

The court can consult other authorities or arrange a site visit, inspection or oral hearing. Parties are free to introduce evidence of their own to support their claims and arguments.

The parties can also request for the court to employ any of the means of investigation at its disposal. The court exercises discretion in determining whether to agree with requests by the parties. The measure of discretion depends on the type of request as well as the matter at hand, and a refusal to investigate further can naturally be invoked against the court’s final decision, if it is subject to further appeal.

The administrative court is free to independently evaluate the evidence and reassess the facts of the matter even though the court is bound by the claims of the parties when deciding on the final resolution. In this regard, the court is not bound by the parties’ arguments either; i.e. the parties cannot usually settle on the facts of the case. Naturally, allegations pertaining to evidence will guide the court’s attention in the matter. As has been noted above, the court is competent to extend its review to technical or other scientific bases of the challenged decision. Consequently, the court is free to question scientific studies or expert accounts, regardless of who has submitted them or at whose request.

The general courts have the same principal competence to evaluate evidence, but it is worth stressing that in civil disputes the scope of the court’s review is in this regard normally restricted exclusively to the claims and evidence presented by the parties. Correspondingly, the parties’ role in providing also scientific expertise is considerably more pronounced.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

There are no strict time limits for introducing new evidence, and introducing new evidence is therefore usually accepted during the procedure. According to the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act the appellant may present new reasoning for his or her claim after the time allowed for appeal has expired, provided that this does not change the matter itself (Section 41). One can introduce also new evidence in the administrative court, but evidence that could have been presented in the first instance may be disregarded during appeal proceedings. Accordingly, parties should not wait until the appeal stage before introducing evidence relevant to the case, when they have the opportunity to do so already during the administrative procedure.

A new expert study presented by appellants against a decision to grant a permit could, for example, prove conclusively that the permit decision is unlawful, or the court could find it necessary to return the matter and for new evidence to be (re)considered in first instance by the permit authority. With its non-jurist judges, the administrative court of Vaasa is naturally better equipped to directly evaluate scientific evidence and make a substantive decision based on new evidence as well, but the court must obviously be careful not to intrude excessively on the first instance discretion of the administration.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

The expert opinion is not binding on judges, the court can freely consider all the evidence presented in the case (so called free assessment of evidence).

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court.

The administrative court of Vaasa, with nation-wide competence in appeal matters under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and Water Act, makes use of judges trained in natural and technical science in order to provide it with sufficient expertise for such consideration. Also, the Supreme Administrative Court has appointed expert judges who participate in the decision-making in cases concerning EPA and Water Act.

A member of an administrative court, other than a legally trained member, who participates in the consideration of cases on the basis of the EPA and Water Act must have an appropriate Master’s degree in technology or in the natural sciences. In addition, he or she must be familiar with the duties falling within the scope of the applicable legislation. The expert judges are equal members of the court with independent decision-making powers and voting rights and can therefore independently define the scope of the scientific evidence they deem to be relevant.

Court-appointed experts are also possible in every sort of case (not only environmental), but quite rare.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties.

A party may turn to an expert he/she prefers. Professors (even on the field of law) and researchers are sometimes used. There are no public registers with contact details of environmental experts.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

According to the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act, a party to judicial proceedings must be liable to compensate another party for that party’s costs in whole or in part if, particularly in view of the ruling issued in the matter, it is unreasonable for the latter party to be required to meet its own costs (AJPA, Section 95). It is still quite common that the parties bear their own costs. This includes fees for legal counsel as well as possible costs for producing expert statements or other evidence on one’s own initiative. If an oral hearing is held, the state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. Parties, on the other hand, are ordinarily required to compensate witnesses that they have called.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Simple and inexpensive access to court is one of the cornerstones of administrative judicial proceedings, and correspondingly, legal counsel is not mandatory in any environmental administrative court proceedings. Neither is it in practice very common for appealing individuals or NGOs to employ counsel. For corporations, in the capacity of appellant or otherwise concerned party, it is more usual.

The AJPA does not require counsel, when used, to have a law degree or other training, only general suitability is called for (AJPA, Section 30). The only exception for this is the case of extraordinary appeal in the Supreme Administrative Court. To lodge an appeal for annulment of a final decision or judgement the services of an attorney or licensed legal counsel must be used by other applicants than a public authority according to Section 118 of the AJPA. Counsel is not mandatory in general court proceedings either, but here it is more commonplace. In contrast with the AJPA, the CJP also requires legal qualification of the person acting as counsel or attorney, with the exception of certain types of cases (which includes land court cases).

There is no official certification for environmental lawyers in specific, excepting studies undergraduate and postgraduate degrees. Nonetheless, there are lawyers and law firms of various sizes that offer environmentally specialised legal counsel. Most of the larger firms offer services in the area of environmental law, although typically in the context of business law. There is no comprehensive register of environmentally specialised law firms or lawyers available.

NGOs do not typically advertise legal services. The Finnish Bar Association provides a search engine that allows searching for members and firms according to location and areas of expertise, including fields of environmental law, and which includes offices on the Åland Islands as well.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

Many law firms, especially bigger ones, do pro bono legal work, often in accordance with established pro bono programmes of their own. Associations of public utility, including also environmental NGOs, can be recipients of such pro bono legal assistance. There are no widely publicised pro bono programmes providing legal assistance for individuals in environmental matters specifically. On the whole, pro bono work does not play a significant role in environmental judicial proceedings.

For legal aid see section 1.7.3.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

Private law firms offering pro bono assistance have established their own pro bono programmes and criteria for assistance, but there are no widely publicised programmes in environmental matters specifically.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

When looking for law firms offering pro bono assistance the Finnish Bar Association can be contacted.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There are no public registers that might hold contact details of environmental experts. The Finnish Bar Association has an attorney search engine.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field

The following NGOs are active at a national level in Finland but there are also several local or regional organisations that can actively take part in environmental decision-making in their municipality or region. The national NGOs can help you find contact with some of the local associations.

Finnish Association for Nature Conservation
Finnish Society for Nature and Environment

4) List of international NGOs, who are active in the Member State

There are several international NGOs, who are also active in Finland:

BirdLife Finland
WWF Finland

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

Administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body.

However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. The administrative review procedure follows the rules stipulated in the Administrative Procedure Act (APA, 434/2003, Chapter 7a). If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the
The administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body.

As explained above the main rule is that an appeal or a request for an administrative review against a decision automatically delays its execution. In Finland

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

The APA generally provides that an administrative matter must be considered without undue delay. In environmental matters, specific time limits are more typically prescribed for parties than for the authority, although there are exceptions, such as EIA procedure, where deadlines are provided for the authority as well. New national legislation has also been approved to transpose the directive on the promotion of the use of energy from renewable sources (2018/2001 /EU) containing provisions on the duration of the permit-granting processes, and it will enter into force by 30 June 2021. This legislation covers the administrative permits to build, repower and operate plants for the production of energy from renewable sources.

As environmental decisions are taken by a multitude of different administrative authorities, it is not possible to give a comprehensive account on average pending times. The authorities may provide average-based estimates on their websites and are also required by APA to provide a case-specific estimate upon request, as well as respond to queries as to the progress of the matter. In the Regional State Administrative Agencies, which handle the major environmental permit matters, average pending times have varied around 9 to 12 months in recent years.

The regional legislation regulating administrative procedure of the Åland Islands resembles the APA with regard to requirements of timeliness and providing estimates of pending time. However, it also includes a general obligation to decide matters within three months of initiation, when feasible, and further provides that accountable officials must compose a yearly report on the grounds of delay for matters exceeding this time limit. Naturally, environmental matters may very well take a longer time than this to process. With regard to matters decided by the principal regional environmental authority (Ålands miljö- och hälsoskyddsmyndighet), authorisation for lesser activities (miljögranskning), is regularly decided within 6 months, while pending times for environmental permits for major activities (e.g. IPPC/IED) are on average 15 months.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

Administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. This means that usually the administrative decisions concerning environment can be challenged directly before court. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures (also called request for rectification). Typically, internal reviews are not used in cases with multiple parties, so most of the decisions under environmental law are challenged directly before a court. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

With regard to appeal proceedings in the administrative courts, there are no prescribed time limits for the majority of matters. The Constitution provides everyone with the right to have his or her case dealt with without undue delay in a court of law. In addition, certain categories and types of appeal matters are prescribed as urgent by law, which translates in practice to prioritisation in the order of resolution. Examples of such statutory urgent environmental matters are detailed master plans for land use and plans for public roads, when they are considered of communal importance. Although there are no specific provisions with regard to requests for injunctive relief, these are typically processed urgently and can even be resolved in a matter of days or less, in extreme cases. There is no sanction mechanism in place with regard to undue delays, but the courts are subject to the same oversight by the supreme overseers of legality as administrative authorities, as well as possible criminal and tort liability.

An administrative court must, on request, provide an estimate of the time required to consider a matter (AJPA, Section 55).

The pending times for appeal proceedings in the regional administrative courts have in recent years (situation in January 2020) averaged around 10 months in the category of land use and building matters and slightly above 12 months in other environmental matters. In the Supreme Administrative Court the corresponding pending times were approximately 11 and 10 months, respectively.

The procedural legislation governing proceedings in the general courts include more detailed provisions on timeliness for specific stages of the proceedings. The average pending times (2018) in district courts were slightly above 9 months in full-scale civil disputes and around 4.2 months in criminal cases. In courts of appeal, average pending times for appeal proceedings were around 6 months. In the Supreme Court, the averages were around 4.3 months for refused leaves to appeal and 18.7 months for decisions on the merits.

There has been since 2009 also a compensation regime in place for undue delays in the general courts, regulated by the Act on Compensation for Excessive Length of Judicial Proceedings (362/2009). The Act was amended in 2013 to cover also administrative court proceedings. The Act provides that a claim for compensation can be filed with the same court considering the main issue at hand and sets a default value for compensation at 1,500 euros per day of delay. The maximum sum of compensation is 10,000 euros. In administrative proceedings the right to compensation is limited to those individuals who are directly affected by the matter decided in the court, which means that e.g. NGOs can usually not claim for compensation.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The court has wide discretion when deciding upon time limits during the procedure, but these time limits should be reasonable. When a party is given a time limit for his written comments, he or she has to be also notified that the matter can be resolved after the expiry of the time limit even if no comments have been made. A usual time limit for written comments in an administrative court can be 3-4 weeks. A party can always ask for prolongment of the time limit, if he or she has difficulties in keeping it.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

According to general provisions regarding enforceability, an administrative decision qualifying for appeal may not be enforced before (ordinary) means of challenge have been exhausted, i.e. the decision has become final or gained “legal force” (saanut lainvoiman, vunnit laga kraft, AJPA, Section 122). This entails that lodging an appeal against a decision ordinarily automatically delays its execution. The same applies also for a request for an administrative review if such a review process is prescribed in the substantive law, but in the case of the municipal appeal lodging of the appeal does not automatically delay the execution of the decision. Appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court must nevertheless not prevent enforcement of a decision in a matter in which leave to appeal is required. Enforcement may nevertheless not be undertaken if it renders the appeal useless.

Environmental and other permit regimes often provide for an option to request the right to commence work or activities in accordance with the permit decision (miljögranskning), in some cases. There is no sanction mechanism in place with regard to undue delays, but the courts are subject to the same oversight by the supreme overseers of legality as administrative authorities, as well as possible criminal and tort liability.

An administrative court must, on request, provide an estimate of the time required to consider a matter (AJPA, Section 55).
However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, the competences of the authority or the superior authority to order an injunctive relief are usually prescribed in the substantive law as well. The appeal authority may prohibit the implementation of the decision if a right to commence work or activities has been granted (see for example Section 202 of the Land Use and Building Act).

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
There are no separate deadlines for submitting a request for an injunctive relief, but since the time limits for a request for an administrative review and also for processing such request are usually quite short, the request should be made as early in the process as possible. There are no specific conditions in the law for an injunctive relief, but if the request for administrative review would become futile due to the execution of the administrative decision, this supports ordering an injunctive relief.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
Environmental and other permit regimes often provide for an option to request the right to commence work or activities in accordance with the permit decision irrespective of challenges against it. As the conditions for granting such right to commence are laid down by the applicable substantive law, they may vary, but typically the requirements are:
- a justified cause for immediate execution
- that execution does not defeat the purpose of appeals against the decision
- that the applicant lodges an acceptable security.

The right to commence can be granted either together with the actual permit or upon separate request submitted within a period of time after the appeal period has expired (typically 14 days). In most cases a request for right to commence is filed with and subsequently decided by the permit authority.

There are also some types of decisions that are directly enforceable before they have become final, i.e. despite appeals, unless the appeal court rules otherwise. Examples include decisions to implement protected habitats or to enforce protection under the Nature Conservation Act. In cases where there are no specific provisions with regard to enforceability, the Administrative Procedure Act provides for a general possibility of execution before legal force (APA, Section 49f). Such order of execution is permitted if the decision is of a nature requiring immediate enforcement or if its enforcement cannot be delayed for reason of public interest. Such an order is also reviewable by the administrative court.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
As explained above the main rule is that an appeal or a request for an administrative review against a decision automatically delays its execution. If leave to appeal is required in the matter, an appeal will not preclude enforcement. However, even in this case the enforcement may not begin if the appeal would become futile due to the enforcement, or if the Supreme Administrative Court denies enforcement.

If the administrative authority has granted an operator a right to commence work or activities in accordance with the permit decision irrespective challenges against it, the administrative court with which the permit decision has been challenged is competent to review an order to grant right to commence as well, upon application of an appellant or on its own initiative. Standing in interim relief proceedings corresponds with standing in the main proceedings. The court can quash or amend the order or otherwise provide injunctive relief. Typically, any measures that cause or risk irrevocable effects to the environment are suspended.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
The court’s interim decision, whether positive or negative, cannot usually be challenged separately, but the question of interim relief can be raised again if the final decision of the court is challenged with the Supreme Administrative Court. It is, however, possible to file a new application for injunction with the same court, based for example on a change in circumstances. There are also regimes under which the right to commence is decided in first instance by the competent appeal court (e.g. under the Water Act) or where it is possible for the appeal court to issue such an order together with rejecting appeals against the permit decision (e.g. the Environmental Protection Act, the EPA).

No security is required from an applicant for injunction, regardless of whether enforceability is based on a granted right to commence or other order of execution. Another form of interim judicial protection is the power of the court to order an administrative decision to remain in force until a new decision has been taken in a situation where the court rules to overturn it. An example of application would be a case where a decision to implement nature protection is overturned and sent back for partial reconsideration or renewal of incorrect procedure.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.
For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):
- Administrative court: 260 euros
- Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros.

Certain types of matters are categorically exempt from fee, although these are not typically environmental matters. Likewise, individual appellants can be exempted under certain circumstances. An essential ground for exemption is that the appellant is successful in his or her challenge.
There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings, e.g. consideration of an application for injunctive relief or arranging an oral hearing or viewing. Likewise, parties will not be incurred costs for other measures of the court in investigating the matter, such as acquiring a statement from an expert authority.

When multiple persons jointly lodge an appeal, only one fee is charged. For general court proceedings, the following trial fees are charged from the plaintiff/appellant (as of the beginning of 2019), with corresponding or similar exemptions as in administrative court proceeding:
- District court (incl. land court): 65–510 euros
- Court of appeal: 510 euros (260 euros in criminal matters)

Supreme Court: 510 euros.
According to a research commissioned by the National Research Institute of Legal Policy, the average legal expenses in 2008 in civil dispute proceedings in district court the average liability imposed on the losing party was 5,277 euros. There has not been made a more recent study covering the whole country, but according to some studies made in certain district courts the average liability has clearly gone up, even though the variation in legal expenses is big. According to a study of the Finnish Bar Association the average (median) hourly rate charged for legal counsel was 200 euros.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?
No security is required from an applicant for injunction, regardless of whether enforceability is based on a granted right to commence or other order of execution.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
Legal aid is available for persons who need expert assistance in a legal matter according to the Legal Aid Act (257/2002). Legal aid is not commonly used in environmental matters where the costs of the administrative judicial procedure are usually relatively low. Legal aid is provided for persons resident in Finland or another EU or EEA country. It is also provided irrespective of residence, if the recipient has a matter to be heard by a Finnish court or when there is special cause. Legal aid is granted based on the applicant’s available means. It is provided for free to persons without means, while other entitled persons are liable to co-pay for the aid. The aid covers legal advice as well as necessary measures and representation before a court or other authority. For court proceedings, the applicant can choose between representation by a public legal aid attorney or a private attorney. In other matters, legal aid is provided solely by public legal aid attorneys. Persons who are granted legal aid are also exempt from trial fees. There are some exceptions as to when legal aid is provided, such as matters considered legally simple or of little importance to the applicant, as well as matters in which standing is based on municipal membership, for example.

In addition to the above, the right to legal aid may be restricted in part or fully if the applicant has legal expenses insurance covering the matter at hand. This is relatively common, as such insurance is typically included in many kinds of insurance policies, such as home insurance, car insurance as well as trade union insurance. The financial assistance provided by legal expenses insurance varies according to the policy in question, which determines its scope as well as applicable deductibles and maximum compensations. Insurance conditions in common use stipulate a deductible of 15% and a maximum compensation of 10,000 euros.

Legal aid is state administered and thus available according to the same preconditions on the Åland Islands. Separate from legal aid, the defendant in criminal proceedings or pre-trial investigations may be entitled to a public defender regardless of available means.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Legal aid is not available to NGOs or companies. Many law firms, especially bigger ones, do pro bono legal work, often in accordance with established pro bono programmes of their own. Associations of public utility, including also environmental NGOs, can be recipients of such pro bono legal assistance. There are no widely publicised pro bono programmes providing legal assistance for individuals in environmental matters specifically. On the whole, pro bono work does not play a significant role in environmental judicial proceedings.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

Apart from the legal aid and pro bono legal assistance offered by certain law firms, an insurance covering legal expenses is relatively common in Finland. There is no information available about the use of legal expenses insurance in environmental cases.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

Traditionally the “loser party pays” principle has not played a central role in administrative judicial procedure, but since the renewal of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act in 2020 the situation has changed somewhat. According to the AJPA a party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party, in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case that the other party would bear his or her own costs (AJPA, Section 95). This includes fees for legal counsel as well as possible costs for producing expert statements or other evidence on one’s own initiative. If an oral hearing is held, the state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. Parties, on the other hand, are ordinarily required to compensate witnesses that they have called.

With regard to the obligation of another party or the authority whose decision has been challenged to bear these costs in full or in part, the circumstances of the case are tried by the court on a case-by-case basis. The AJPA provides that especially the outcome of the case must be considered. Assessment of the reasonableness of a liability may also consider the legal ambiguity of the matter, the actions of the parties and the significance of the matter for a party. In addition, the AJPA holds that private individuals can be held liable for the costs of a public authority only if they have made a manifestly unfounded claim. In practice, it is not common in environmental cases for private parties to be required to pay other private parties’ expenses. However, it is worth repeating that the administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs, and it is considerably more common that private parties claim no expenses in court than that they do so.

Unlike in administrative court proceedings, the loser pays principle applies to civil disputes in the general courts. This means the party who loses the dispute is assigned responsibility for the reasonable costs of the necessary measures of the opposing party. The CJP also provides for some more specific grounds for exception from or reduction in liability, including frivolous lawsuits, a justifiable reason for pursuing the case that lost or circumstances that would make liability otherwise manifestly unreasonable. If the basis or reasonability of claimed expenses are challenged by the liable party, the court rules on the costs on a case-by-case basis.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

In addition to categorical exemptions from the trial fee, such as when the appellant is successful in his or her challenges, an exemption can be granted on grounds of unreasonable costs on a case-by-case basis by the referendary or rapporteur, who assigns the fee. Although the trial fee is charged together with the decision of the court, it is separately challengeable through a request for reconsideration with the official who has assigned the fee. The decision of the official can be challenged by means of administrative appeal.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

Comprehensive information on access to justice is not available for environmental matters specifically. General information about administrative (and general) court proceedings is available on the website of the Finnish justice system. Information about the legislation is available in the FINLEX database. The general website of the environmental administration provides information on different environmental procedures, including information on access to the courts.

The websites of the four Regional State Administrative Agencies competent in environmental and water permit matters include registers on pending permit matters and permit decisions. Further information on specific environmental procedures and access to justice may be provided on the websites of municipalities, for example.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

According to the Administrative Procedure Act the competent authority is obliged to provide advice on dealing with administrative matters and respond to questions and enquiries concerning the use of its services. Advice must be provided free of charge. In environmental legislation there are often more precise stipulations on the obligation of the authorities to provide with advice and information as described under the next questions.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

The Administrative Procedure Act is generally applied also in environmental administrative procedures. Apart from the general obligations on administrative authorities to provide advice and respond to questions and enquiries there are more detailed obligations in some of the sectoral environmental acts.
According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), which applies to e.g. installations under the IPPC and IED, the permit authority must provide information for the applicant in an electronic format necessary for applying an environmental permit and also anybody else interested in the ongoing procedures or decisions made in a certain area (Sections 39a, 45 and 86). This obligation concerns mainly the Regional State Administrative Agencies, and also the municipal authorities.

According the Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure concerning the EIA, competent authorities are the Centres for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment (so called ETE Centres), which have also the general obligation to provide advice. These ETE Centres are also the national competent authorities with regard to the Water Framework Directive and provide information on the water management planning process.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

Appeal instructions must be appended with a decision eligible for review by appeal. This applies both for an administrative decision and a judgement (APA, Section 47 and AJPA, Section 88). The appeal instructions must indicate the appellate authority, the authority with whom the appeal document is to be lodged and the appeal period and the date when the said period begins to run. Alternatively, the legal basis for a prohibition against appeal must be indicated. The Administrative Judicial Procedure Act further provides that appeals may not be dismissed due to incorrect lodging by reason of lacking or faulty appeal instructions (AJPA, Section 17). Therefore, an appellant acting in accordance with appeal instructions that indicate an incorrect appeal period, for example, should not have his or her appeal dismissed because of exceeding the appeal period.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Rights of individuals to use the two national languages, Finnish and Swedish, as provided by Section 17 of the Constitution, are laid down in the Language Act (423/2003). Additional language rights are provided for the indigenous Sámi, especially, as well as other groups. With relevance to foreigners, Section 6 of the Constitution provides that everyone is equal before the law, and that no one may, without an acceptable reason, be treated differently from other persons on the ground of origin or language, among other things. The Ombudsman for Minorities supervises compliance with prohibitions against ethnic discrimination and works to advance the status and legal protection of ethnic minorities and foreigners.

The legislation covering administrative and court procedure (APA, AJPA, CJJP and CPA) contains additional provisions on language rights. Additional provisions are included for certain specific procedures, but typically not for environmental procedures. In administrative matters, translation and interpretation can be provided for parties under certain conditions, mainly in authority-initiated matters, but it is also possible for guaranteeing the rights of parties in other matters. General language rights in administrative judicial proceedings correspond with the above but provide for an unconditional right to interpretation when being orally heard. In criminal matters, language rights are naturally more pronounced. In civil disputes, a party who does not speak Finnish, Swedish or Sámi is ordinarily responsible for translation at his/her own expense, unless the court rules otherwise due to the nature of the case. In addition to the above, both administrative authorities and courts are under an obligation to ensure that citizens of the other Nordic countries receive the language assistance they require.

The stipulations described above mean that individuals with a language foreign to the Nordic countries wishing to take part in an environmental matter will typically have to cover their own translation expenses. However, when legal aid is available, it also applies to required translation and interpretation costs. Unlike the rest of Finland, the autonomous Åland Islands are monolingually Swedish. This applies both to regional and municipal authorities as well as state authorities on the Islands, including courts. The Act on the Autonomy of Åland includes provisions with regard to rights to use Finnish in regional state authorities and courts, and the regional act on administrative procedure (Förvaltningslag för landskapet Åland) contains provisions similar to the state legislation on provision of interpretation and translation in regional and municipal authorities.

1. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Environmental impact assessment (EIA) procedure is regulated by the Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure (EIA Act, 252/2017) together with a complementary governmental decree (277/2017). The Act has in its Section 37 a general reference to both the AJPA and the sectoral statutes covering the different permit procedures that can be relevant in connection to the project. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal including rules on standing concerning the environmental impact assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project in question.

Annex I to the Act includes a list of activities (thresholds), for which an EIA is always required. In addition, a state authority is competent to decide on whether or not an EIA is required in case of other activities (screening). In most cases, this state authority is the Regional Centre for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment (ETE Centre). In the case of nuclear power plant projects, the competent authority is the Ministry of Economic Affairs and Employment. According to the EIA Act (Section 34) the ETE Centre has always a right to appeal against the final permit or other consent decision, if an assessment has been omitted altogether or if there are essential deficiencies in the assessment.

In cases where a screening decision is positive, i.e. an assessment procedure is required:

The decision can be challenged by administrative appeal with the regional administrative court by the developer/operator

The review proceedings follow ordinary administrative appeal procedure under the AJPA, as described in prior contexts.

In cases where a screening decision is negative:

The decision can only be challenged at a later stage, in the context of a final permit or other consent decision in the matter according to the applicable substantive legislation.

The procedural conditions, including right of appeal, are determined by how this consent decision can be challenged (see further questions 3 to 5).

EIA procedure on the Åland Islands is governed by a regional act (Landskapslag om miljökonskvensbedömning, 2018:31) and decree (Landskapsförordning om miljökonskvensbedömning, 2018:33). In contrast to the state procedure, there is no separate authority responsible for screening, i.e. the administrative authority competent in the main permit or consent matter decides whether there is need for an EIA when it is not required directly by law. The means of challenging EIA decision-making and invoking faulty EIA correspond with what has been described for the state law. Appeals are lodged with either the Administrative Court of Åland or the Supreme Administrative Court, depending on the administrative authority whose consent decision is being challenged.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure has in its Section 37 a general reference to both the AJPA and the sectoral statutes concerning the different permit procedures that can be relevant in connection to the project. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal concerning the environmental impact assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project in question.
Provisional statements issued by the coordinating authority during the scoping or concluding stages of the assessment procedure are not separately appealable. Instead, the EIA Act provides that essential deficiencies in the assessment, which again covers both substantial and procedural shortcomings, can be invoked against the final consent decision. When called for, the court can ascertain the validity of disputed findings of the EIA. Participation in or during the EIA procedure is not a formal prerequisite for challenging either the consent decision or the EIA preceding it.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

The Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure has in its Section 37 a general reference to both the AJPA and the sectoral statutes concerning the different permit procedures that can be relevant in connection to the project. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal including rules on standing concerning the environmental impact assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project in question (see next question). Apart from municipal appeal, there is no actio popularis with regard to access to court. Nor are there any general provisions on the right of appeal of NGOs. Right of appeal is provided for NGOs by substantive law in most significant environmental matters. For example, in the case of the environmental impact assessment of a groundwater extraction project, the provisions of the Water Act on judicial appeal would be applicable. According to the Water Act the permit authority is the Regional State Administrative Agency and the appellate authority is the Vaasa administrative court. An appeal against the decision of the Regional State Administrative Agency to grant a permit to the groundwater extraction project in question can be lodged at the Vaasa administrative court within thirty days of publication of the decision, and the permit decision can be challenged also on the ground of deficiencies in the environmental impact assessment.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

Both the substantial and procedural legality of the screening decision can be reviewed in the court once the final consent decision has been made, and the court’s powers of review accord with the review of the consent decision. Essential deficiencies in the assessment, which again covers both substantial and procedural shortcomings, can also be invoked against the final consent decision. The fact that an assessment has been omitted altogether can be invoked in a similar fashion, which, in accordance with established case law, means that the administrative court is competent to review the need for an EIA whether a screening decision has been issued or not, provided that it has established the necessary facts to resolve this question.

The procedural conditions, including right of appeal, are determined by how the consent decision can be challenged. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the project in question. Right of appeal is granted according to the general provisions of AJPA to any person the decision is addressed to or whose right, obligation or interest is directly affected by the decision. Substantive environmental law typically provides a wider right of appeal than the AJPA.

Right of appeal is provided for NGOs by substantive law in most significant environmental statutes such as the Nature Conservation Act, Land Use and Planning Act, Environmental Protection Act, Water Act, Waste Act, Mining Act, Transport System and Highways Act, Railways Act, etc. These provisions in substantive law can differ in e.g. whether both national and local NGOs have a right to appeal or if the right is only prescribed to local and regional NGOs. The same rules apply for foreign NGOs as for national ones, and the abovementioned differences in substantive law can lead to different outcomes when determining the right of appeal of a foreign NGO.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

Both the substantial and procedural legality of the screening decision can be reviewed in the court once the final consent decision has been made, and the court’s powers of review accord with the review of the consent decision. Essential deficiencies in the assessment, which again covers both substantial and procedural shortcomings, can also be invoked against the final consent decision. The fact that an assessment has been omitted altogether can be invoked in a similar fashion, which, in accordance with established case law, means that the administrative court is competent to review the need for an EIA whether a screening decision has been issued or not, providing that it has established the necessary facts to resolve this question.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

In cases where an EIA screening decision is positive, i.e. an assessment procedure is required:

- The decision can be challenged by administrative appeal with the regional administrative court by the developer/operator.
- The review proceedings follow ordinary administrative appeal procedure under the AJPA, as described in prior contexts.

In cases where a screening decision is negative:

- The decision can only be challenged at a later stage, in the context of a final permit or other consent decision in the matter.

The procedural conditions, including right of appeal, are determined by how this consent decision can be challenged.

In general, the substantive and procedural aspects of the EIA can be challenged in the context of a final permit or other consent decision according to the sectoral legislation concerning the project in question. The fact that an assessment has been omitted altogether can be invoked in a similar fashion in the context of a final permit or other consent decision in the matter.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In Finland administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. As an example, the Land Use and Building Act stipulates that court proceedings are preceded by a request for rectification with the municipal supervision authority in cases where a matter has been decided by a subordinate official under delegated competence. In general the substantive law rarely provides for an administrative review in case of those activities, for which environmental impact assessment is required.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearings, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Participation in or during the environmental impact assessment (EIA) procedure is not a formal prerequisite for challenging either the consent decision or the EIA preceding it.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no specific provisions concerning a fair and equitable judicial procedure in the national legislation on environmental impact assessment (EIA). According the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) the appellate authority, or the administrative court, is responsible for leading the process and reviewing the matter. With regard to review of facts, the AJPA provides that the court must obtain evidence on its own motion to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the proceedings and the nature of the matter require. The state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. The authority that has made the decision challenged by an appeal takes part in the administrative judicial procedure and is obliged to give equitable consideration to public and private interests when presenting the facts of the case to the court (AJPA, Section 37).

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions concerning a timely judicial procedure in the national legislation on environmental impact assessment. With regard to appeal proceedings in the administrative courts, there are no prescribed time limits for the majority of matters. The Constitution provides everyone with the right to have his or her case dealt with without undue delay in a court of law.
11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Enforceability and injunctive relief are governed by the procedure observed for the consent decision. In addition, the Act on Environmental Impact Assessment Procedure (EIA Act) provides that, should the implementation of a project not require a permit or other consent decision, and implementation is begun without a necessary EIA, the competent regional state authority has the power to order such implementation to be halted until EIA has been carried out.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

Competence to grant permits under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) for activities that pose a risk of environmental pollution (environmental permits) is divided between four of the Regional State Administrative Agencies (RSA agency; AVI, RFV) and municipal environmental authorities. The permit regime covers activities from animal shelters to major industrial installations (IPPC/IED), and permits can also be integrated with ones under the Water Act. Permit decisions can be challenged through administrative appeal in the Vaasa administrative court, which has a nationwide jurisdiction in appeal matters under the EPA and expert judges trained in natural and technical sciences. An exception from this is the autonomous Åland Islands, which have their own legislation on environmental protection. Permit decisions under this regional legislation are taken by the Environmental and Health Protection Authority of Åland (Ålands miljö- och hälsoskyddsmyndighet) and reviewed on appeal by the Administrative Court of Åland.

In addition to regulating the administrative permit procedure, the EPA also includes some special provisions regarding the court proceedings. The right of appeal is somewhat wider than under the standard provisions of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act, belonging to persons whose rights or interests may be affected by the matter. The right of appeal is also provided for registered associations or foundations whose purpose is to promote environmental, health or nature protection or general safeguarding of the environment and whose area of activity is subject to the environmental impact in question. Certain authorities are also entitled to appeal decisions under the EPA. Participation during the administrative permit procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

The initial stages of the court proceedings in EPA appeal cases differ from the general appeal procedure in some cases. The court announces an appeal of an environmental permit decision by a permit applicant by posting a public notice of it for at least 14 days on the website of the administrative court, in order to allow responses to be submitted (Section 196 of the EPA and Section 62a of the APA). Information about the public notice should also be posted on the website of the municipality within the area impacted by the activity (Section 108 of the Local Government Act). The same applies to the decision of the court.

1) Standing rules, at what stage(s) can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

The Environmental Protection Act (EPA) includes some special provisions regarding the court proceedings. The right of appeal is somewhat wider than under the standard provisions of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act, belonging to persons whose rights or interests may be affected by the matter. The right of appeal is also provided for environmental NGOs, meaning registered associations or foundations whose purpose is to promote environmental, health or nature protection or general safeguarding of the environment and whose area of activity is subject to the environmental impact in question. Certain authorities are also entitled to appeal decisions under the EPA.

The permit authority announces the permit application by posting a public notice of it for at least 30 days on the website of the authority, in order to allow responses to be submitted (Section 44 of the EPA and Section 62a of the APA). Information about the public notice should also be posted on the website of the municipality within the area impacted by the activity (Section 108 of the Local Government Act). The state environmental permit authority must also publish a summary of the permit application for the public on its website, along with other essential contents of the application.

The parties concerned can lodge an objection to the matter and other parties can also express their opinions. Participation during the administrative permit procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court, but in addition to other requirements on delivery and publication of permit decisions, the permit authority is required to give separate notice of its decision to anyone who has lodged an objection during the procedure or requested such notification.

2) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no provisions on screening related to IPPC/IED installations specifically. The screening procedure follows the general rules of the environmental impact assessment (see section 1.8.1). This means that the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) on standing and access to justice described above apply when a decision related to screening of an IPPC/IED installation is challenged.

3) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no provisions on scoping related to IPPC/IED installations specifically. The scoping procedure follows the general rules of the environmental impact assessment (see section 1.8.1). This means that the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) on standing and access to justice described above apply when a decision related to scoping of an IPPC/IED installation is challenged.

4) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

The permit authority must announce the permit application by public notice posted for at least thirty days on the authority’s website and on the websites of municipalities within the area impacted by the activity. The state environmental permit authority must also publish a summary of the permit application for the public on its website, along with other essential contents of the application. The parties concerned can lodge an objection to the matter and other parties can also express their opinions. An appeal against the decisions of the permit authority under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) can be lodged in the Vaasa administrative court within thirty days of publication of the decision.

5) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

The right of appeal under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) is somewhat wider than under the standard provisions of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act, as described under question 2, but there is no actio popularis with regard to access to court. An appeal against the final authorisation or permit decision under the EPA can only be made by those who have standing according to Section 191 of the Act.

6) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

The court’s competence and responsibilities of review are the same as in other administrative appeal matters. Both the procedural and substantial legality of the challenged decision are liable to review, as well as underlying material and technical findings. However, in order to provide the court with sufficient expertise, a number of specialist judges, who are trained in technical or natural science instead of law, are appointed as full members of the Vaasa administrative court. When deciding matters under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) or the Water Act, two jurist members of the court are joined by one or two of these specialist members, instead of the generally competent panel of three legally trained judges. As neither the national EPA nor the linked court specialisation applies to the Åland Islands, corresponding permit appeals are handled in accordance with ordinary administrative court procedure in the Administrative Court of Åland.

The decision of the Vaasa administrative court can be further appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court, where a leave to appeal is required. Justices trained in technical and natural science are employed by the supreme instance as well, on the basis of part-time appointment. These specialist justices also partake in deciding appeals against decisions of the Administrative Court of Åland in environmental protection and water cases.
With regard to acts and omissions and enforcement through a request to the competent supervisory authority, the EPA identifies the competent state supervisory authority as well as requiring the municipality to assign one of its committees as local supervisory authority. At state level, the ETE Centre is according to the EPA the competent supervisory authority in environmental matters. The Chapter 18 of the EPA defines the supervisory authority’s powers of enforcement, i.e. the authority’s competence to use administrative compulsion against someone breaching the provisions of the law. Depending on the case, this may for example entail orders to comply with a permit, prevent or remedy environmental damage or an application to the permit authority for revocation of the permit. In principle, anyone can approach the authority with a request for such enforcement measures from the supervisory authority, although some environmental acts include specific provisions of entitlement. An appeal against the decision by the competent supervisory authority or the permit authority under Chapter 18 of the EPA can be lodged in the Vaasa administrative court.

7) At which stage are these challengeable?

An administrative appeal can be lodged against the decisions of the permit authority and the competent supervisory authority under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) in Vaasa district court within thirty days of publication of the decision.

8) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There are a few provisions on an administrative review procedure in the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) concerning the monitoring and control plans and fishery matters that are in first instance decided by the competent supervisory authority. The application for administrative review is in these cases made to the state permit authority. The operator may also submit a request for an administrative review of a decision by a state supervisory authority (the Centre for economic development, transport and the environment, ETE Centre) concerning permit review to the state environmental permit authority (the Regional State Administrative Agency) once the Commission has published its decision on the conclusions concerning the main activity of an installation covered by the IED. In this case a separate appeal against this decision of the ETE Centre is not possible. An appeal against a decision by the state environmental permit authority under the EPA can be lodged directly with the Vaasa administrative court.

9) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Participation during the administrative permit procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court, but in addition to other requirements on delivery and publication of permit decisions, the permit authority is required to give separate notice of its decision to anyone who has lodged an objection during the procedure or requested such notification.

10) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no specific provisions concerning a fair and equitable judicial procedure in the EPA or other national legislation on IED/IPPC installations. According the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) the appellate authority, or the administrative court, is responsible for leading the process and reviewing the matter. In the Vaasa administrative court, with nationwide competence in appeal matters under the EPA, there are judges trained in natural and technical sciences in order to ensure sufficient expertise. The Supreme Administrative Court has also appointed experts judges that participate in decision-making in cases under the EPA. With regard to review of facts, the AJPA provides that the court must obtain evidence on its own motion to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the proceedings and the nature of the matter require. The state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. The authority that has made the decision challenged by an appeal takes part in the administrative judicial procedure and is obliged to give equitable consideration to public and private interests when presenting the facts of the case to the court (AJPA, Section 37).

11) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions concerning a timely judicial procedure in the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) or other national legislation on IED/IPPC installations. According the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) the appellate authority, or the administrative court, is responsible for leading the process and reviewing the matter. In the Vaasa administrative court, with nationwide competence in appeal matters under the EPA, there are judges trained in natural and technical sciences in order to ensure sufficient expertise. The Supreme Administrative Court has also appointed experts judges that participate in decision-making in cases under the EPA. With regard to review of facts, the AJPA provides that the court must obtain evidence on its own motion to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the proceedings and the nature of the matter require. The state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. The authority that has made the decision challenged by an appeal takes part in the administrative judicial procedure and is obliged to give equitable consideration to public and private interests when presenting the facts of the case to the court (AJPA, Section 37).

12) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental permit matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental permit decision ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. As an exception from this suspensive effect, the administrative authority can under certain conditions issue a provisional order for enforcement of the permit despite appeals, either together with the permit decision or shortly thereafter through a separate decision. The court is competent to review such an order, and to suspend enforcement despite it. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

13) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

Comprehensive information on access to justice is not available for environmental matters or IED specifically. General information about administrative (and general) court proceedings is available on the website of the Finnish justice system. According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), access to information by means of electronic communications is promoted in the sense that anyone has the right to request to be informed of environmental permit matters initiated and permits granted in a specific area by means of electronic communications insofar as the authority’s information systems are able to receive such requests and automatically send messages. The websites of the Regional State Administrative Agencies competent in environmental and water permit matters include registers of pending permit matters and permit decisions and general information on access to justice.

General information on the environmental permit procedures and more precise information on how to lodge an appeal can be found on the common website of thexious Administrative Agencies (more information is provided on the Finnish website).

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

In Finland, the Environmental Liability Directive has been implemented by the Act on the Remediation of Certain Environmental Damages (383/2009) which entered into force on 1 July 2009, i.e. the Environmental Liability Act, and the related changes introduced into the Nature Conservation Act, the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), the Water Act, the Gene Technology Act and the Act on Transport of Dangerous Goods. Based on the Environmental Liability Act, the government has also issued a Decree on the Remediation of Certain Environmental Damages (713/2009), or the Environmental Liability Decree.

The Environmental Liability Act includes provisions on necessary measures related to the remediation of significant damage to protected species, natural habitats and waters, and on liability to pay the costs of such measures. The EPA, the Water Act, the Nature Conservation Act and the Gene Technology Act contain provisions on how, in accordance with the Environmental Liability Act, authorities may issue orders to remedy significant environmental damage. caused by activities falling within the scope of application of these acts. Provisions to be applied in such cases are those on administrative enforcement proceedings set out in the act concerned. Under the reference provision, the EPA applies to the remediation of damage caused by the transport of dangerous goods.

Appeals against the authority’s decision concerning the imposition of remedial measures and liability for costs is prescribed in the act whose administrative enforcement procedures have been followed (Environmental Liability Act, Section 17). This means that the right of appeal is also prescribed in these acts and can vary depending on the act to be applied. In all of these acts the right of appeal is somewhat wider than under the standard provisions of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPAct). An appeal related to matters falling under the scope of the Water Act and the EPA is made to the administrative court of Vaasa. In matters falling under the scope of the Nature Conservation Act, such appeals are made in a regional administrative court. A decision made by the Board for Gene Technology pursuant to the Gene Technology Act is also open to appeal before the administrative court, as referred to in the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act.

More information on remediation of environmental damages and the implementation of ELD in the Finnish legislation can be found in a report of the Ministry of Environment “Remediation of Significant Environmental Damage” from 2012.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

Appeals against the authority’s decision concerning the imposition of remedial measures and liability for costs is prescribed in the act whose administrative enforcement procedures have been followed (Environmental Liability Act, Section 17). An appeal related to matters falling under the scope of the Water Act and the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) has to be made to the administrative court of Vaasa within thirty days of publication of the decision. In matters falling under the scope of the Nature Conservation Act, such appeals are made in a regional administrative court within thirty days of notice of the decision. A decision made by the Board for Gene Technology pursuant to the Gene Technology Act is also open to appeal before the administrative court within thirty days of notice of the decision.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

Anyone who observes environmental damage may inform or notify the supervisory authority, which is usually the nearest Regional Centre for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment (ETE Centre) or the Board for Gene Technology. In cases where the supervisory authority does not take action, the provisions on right to initiate (administrative enforcement) proceedings set out in the applicable act are applied. Administrative enforcement proceedings are initiated in writing, but there are no other requirements for the observations accompanying the request for action. Administrative enforcement proceedings related to environmental damage can be initiated by people concerned, NGOs or other state or municipal authorities. The authority where the administrative enforcement proceedings are initiated is typically the same authority that must be informed of the damage. However, administrative enforcement proceedings falling under the scope of the Water Act are initiated by the Regional State Administrative Agency.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific requirements in Finnish law regarding the plausibility of a claim of environmental damage. If there is justified cause to suspect that significant environmental damage has occurred, the competent authority, usually the regional ETE Centre, should be contacted. It is the duty of the competent authority to assess the scope and extent of the damage and, when necessary, to initiate administrative enforcement proceedings. Competent authorities may use the help of other expert authorities in assessing the significance of the damage.

In practice, to be able to issue administrative enforcement orders for remedial measures, the authorities must establish who the operator is that has caused the damage and show that there is a causal link between the damage and the operator’s activity subject to administrative enforcement. If administrative enforcement proceedings related to environmental damage are initiated by a notification from a person concerned or a NGO, it is not their duty to establish this information, but in some cases it might not be possible for the competent authority to do it either.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

When assessing the significance of environmental damage and the necessary remedial measures, the authority must hear other affected parties, such as landowners and inhabitants. According to the administrative enforcement proceedings, the affected parties, including the entitled NGOs, have the right to be heard before the authority decides on remedial measures. Typically, the hearing focuses on the proposal for remedial measures that was prepared by the operator causing the damage.

According to the APA, any decision taken by the competent authority must be issued in writing and instructions for requesting an administrative review must be provided at the same time as the decision. An authority must serve its decision without delay on the party concerned and on other known persons who have the right to request an administrative or judicial review of the decision, including the entitled environmental NGOs. The decision is usually communicated to the address indicated by the person in question. There are no time limits in the substantive legislation for completing the administrative enforcement proceedings.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

There is no extension of the entitlement to request action concerning the cases of imminent threat of a damage to the environment in the substantive environmental legislation, nor are these cases excluded from the scope of the administrative enforcement proceedings. Depending on the substantive law the competencies of different authorities and also the duties of operators differ in some ways in different cases of imminent threat of a damage.

According to the Water Act, an operator who has caused damage or harm or the imminent threat thereof must immediately notify the state supervisory authority (Regional Centre for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment, the ETE Centre) and take appropriate measures to prevent or minimise the damage or harm. A decision on the remediation, according to the Water Act cannot be made by the ETE Centre, which has to initiate administrative enforcement proceedings in the regional state administrative authority if the operator has not done so.

According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), the operator must notify the ETE Centre without delay of any substantial damage and the imminent threat thereof. In case of damage to nature the operator who has caused the damage or harm or the imminent threat of it must immediately notify the ETE Centre acting as the supervisory authority and take appropriate measures to prevent or minimise said damage or harm. In these cases the ETE Centre is competent to decide on both the immediate measures to prevent damage and the remediation measures.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

Regional Centres for Economic Development, Transport and the Environment (the ETE Centres) can issue orders in accordance with the Nature Conservation Act and the Environmental Protection Act (EPA). Regional State Administrative Agencies can issue orders based on the Water Act, and the Board for Gene Technology can issue orders in accordance with the Gene Technology Act. In ETE Centres, activities related to the remediation of environmental damage are part of the area of responsibility for the environment and natural resources, which is addressed at 13 regional ETE Centres. If there is justified cause to suspect that significant environmental damage has occurred, primary contacts include the regional ETE Centre, and in urgent cases, the local rescue authorities.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
There are no provisions on administrative review procedures in connection with the administrative enforcement proceedings in the relevant environmental statutes. The appeal against a decision by the competent authority concerning the imposition of remedial measures and liability for costs can be made directly in an administrative court.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

In order to transpose the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment (Espoo Convention) and other international obligations, the Finnish EIA Act contains provisions with regard to projects likely to have significant environmental impacts on the territory of another country. The Act requires that the competent EIA authority notifies the Ministry of the Environment, which is responsible for coordination with other concerned states. States concerned are notified of the pending project and provided with information about its transboundary impacts as well as assessment and consent procedure. This generally includes translations at least to the extent required to understand the matter at hand, as well as information on possible public hearing events in the target country or in Finland. A time limit is provided for authorities and the public to notify the Ministry of their wish to participate in the assessment procedure. Public consultation corresponding with the domestic EIA procedure is then arranged in the neighbour country, ordinarily by a contact authority belonging to the state in question. The geographical scope of notification for the consultation is not specified in the Act, but neither is the right to comment restricted. The developer is responsible for the costs of required translations. The Ministry of Environment is also responsible for coordinating public consultation and communicating the views of Finnish participants in cases where Finland is likely to be affected by a foreign project.

The Act on the Assessment of the Effects of Certain Plans and Programmes on the Environment (SEA Act, 200/2005) contains similar provisions with regard to strategic environmental assessment of plans and programmes. The SEA Act transposes the Protocol on Strategic Environmental Assessment to the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context. As far as land use plans are concerned, the Protocol has been transposed to Finnish legislation by Land Use and Building Act.

There are also some provisions concerning certain activities such as installations covered by the Industrial Emissions Directive (IED). According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), if the operations of an installation covered by the IED or of a waste facility for extractive waste posing a risk of a major accident are likely to cause significant harmful environmental impacts in the territory of another Member State of the European Union, the state environmental permit authority must provide the other state with information about the environmental permit application for the activity in question and any related documents at the same time as public notice of them is given and hearing of views is arranged. If necessary, the Ministry of the Environment must hold consultations with the competent authority of the other state before the permit matter is resolved to ensure that the environmental permit application and the related documents are made available to the public for an appropriate period in the state in question for possible comments. Frontier treaties or other agreements between states together with corresponding legislation may include more detailed provisions on transboundary assessment procedure (e.g. the Agreement between Estonia and Finland on transboundary EIA), as well as provisions on standing and participation in environmental matters that do not entail an EIA (e.g. the Nordic Environmental Protection Convention or the Agreement between Finland and Sweden concerning transboundary rivers).

In accordance with the Act on the Autonomy of Åland, the state has principal legislative authority in matters relating to foreign affairs. Although the regional act on EIA contains some provisions on delivery of information in case of transboundary impacts, international hearing is arranged through the Ministry of Environment.

2) Notion of public concerned?

The notion of public concerned does not make a distinction between the public in the country of the installation or the activity and the public in other affected countries. This is also explicitly formulated in some environmental statutes. According to Section 211 of the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), the environmental impacts of an activity referred to in the Act that extend into another state, must be taken into account in the same manner in which account would be taken of corresponding impacts in Finland. A similar provision about the impacts on a water body and groundwater can be found in the Water Act.

Legal aid is not available to NGOs or companies. NGOs or individuals with a language foreign to the Nordic countries wishing to take part in an environmental matter will typically have to cover their own translation expenses. With regard to legal aid and language, see also sections above (1.7.3 and 1.7.4, respectively).

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Foreign NGOs have in case law been granted right of appeal according to the same criteria as domestic NGOs. Once standing in court is established, the same basic procedural rights (to request an injunction, for example) apply regardless of nationality. As an example of the recent case law of the Supreme Administrative Court, see case KHO 2019:97 on the right of appeal of a Polish foundation against a decision granting a water permit for gas pipes on the bottom of the Baltic Sea.

Legal aid is not available to NGOs or companies. NGOs or individuals with a language foreign to the Nordic countries wishing to take part in an environmental matter will typically have to cover their own translation expenses. With regard to legal aid and language, see also sections above (1.7.3 and 1.7.4, respectively).

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The substantive environmental acts have various provisions on providing information to the public concerned. If there are possible environmental impacts in another country the information should be provided to the public in that other country at the same time as in Finland. In practice the information especially on smaller scale activities or installations is in many cases published on the websites of the authorities only in Finnish or Swedish.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

The timeframes for public involvement vary depending on the substantive environmental law in question, but as an example a permit application under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) has to be announced for at least thirty days on the website of the permit authority to allow for objections and opinions by the public concerned. In most of the environmental decisions the appeal period is thirty days.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Appeal instructions must be appended with a decision eligible for review by appeal. These instructions must indicate the appellate authority, the authority with whom the appeal document is to be lodged and the appeal period and the date when the said period begins to run.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participate? What are the rules applicable?

NGOs or individuals with a language foreign to the Nordic countries wishing to take part in an environmental matter will typically have to cover their own translation expenses. With regard to language and translation, see also section 1.7.4.
9) Any other relevant rules?

If a project requires permits in two (or more) countries, individuals or NGOs may want/need to pursue their interests in proceedings on both sides of the border. With regard to permit requirements and other public law liabilities, opportunities to choose in which jurisdiction to act are usually quite limited. Transboundary civil law liabilities, on the other hand, are typically governed by bilateral or multilateral treaties and national and EU legislation transposing them. As an example, the Convention of the Protection of the Environment between Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden provides that claims for damages can be filed with the competent court of the state where the potentially damaging activity has taken place.

Last update: 19/05/2024
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The Habitats Directive and the Birds Directive have been transposed into Finnish law mainly by the Nature Conservation Act (1096/1996). The right of appeal according to the Nature Conservation Act is wider than under the standard provisions of the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA), mainly in regard to certain NGOs. The right to appeal is granted to those whose rights or interests are affected by the matter in question. In matters other than compensation, the local authority also has the right of appeal. In matters other than compensation and those involving certain derogations from protection orders, the right of appeal is also granted to any registered local or regional association whose purpose is to promote nature conservation or environmental protection. A decision taken by the Government concerning the adoption of a nature conservation programme can also be appealed by a corresponding national organisation or any other national organisation safeguarding the interests of landowners.

In addition, anyone who incurs inconvenience, as well as the above-mentioned local or regional NGOs, has the right to request the environmental authority to take coercive measures against someone who is acting contrary to the Nature Conservation Act (Section 57.2). The authority may upon this request forbid that person from continuing or repeating the offence or instance of negligence and require that he correct the unlawful situation or redress his negligence. A decision by the authority not to take action can be challenged in the administrative judicial procedure by the party making the request.

The same rules apply in principle for domestic and foreign NGOs, but in practice foreign NGOs can rarely be considered as local or regional associations in the meaning of the above-mentioned provisions.

According to the Hunting Act similar provisions on standing and access to justice to those in the Nature Conservation Act apply also to decisions by the Finnish Wildlife Agency concerning derogations from certain prohibitions under the Habitats Directive and the Birds Directive.

For activities falling within the scope of the Water Framework Directive, the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and the Water Act are of importance (for the provisions on access to justice of the EPA see also section 1.8.2). These acts cover water related activities listed in Article 11 of the Water Framework Directive and requiring prior authorisation or regulation. Both of these acts include some special provisions regarding the court proceedings. These provisions of the two acts are very similar due to the common history of water legislation and the fact that according to these two acts the permit procedures in the Regional State Administrative Agencies can be combined.

The right of appeal according to the EPA and the Water Act is somewhat wider than under the standard provisions of the AJPA, granted to persons whose rights or interests may be affected by the matter. The right of appeal is also provided for environmental NGOs, meaning registered associations or foundations whose purpose is to promote environmental, health or nature protection or general safeguarding of the environment and whose area of activity is subject to the environmental impact in question. The same rules apply to foreign NGOs. Certain authorities are also entitled to appeal decisions under the EPA and the Water Act.

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. In the above-mentioned statutes, there are only a few provisions on administrative review e.g. in the EPA and the Water Act concerning decisions on monitoring and control plans of activities that have already been granted a permit under those acts. This means that in most of the environmental decisions the appeal period is thirty days and the appellate authority is the regionally competent administrative court or in case of environmental and water permits according to EPA and Water Act the Vaasa administrative court.

The general provisions of Administrative Procedure Act (APA) and Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) on access to justice are central also when assessing access to justice in environmental matters. However, there are numerous special provisions in the Finnish environmental legislation on access to justice and especially the standing of NGOs, which is a special feature of the environmental law. These special provisions have since the 1990s gradually widened to cover a large number of activities and decisions related to the environment. The provisions on standing and access to justice in different acts can differ in their details and a clear overall picture can therefore be difficult to obtain. As an example, in some cases only local and regional environmental NGOs have a right to appeal whereas the right to appeal in other cases covers also national NGOs. The Aarhus Convention and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union have played an important role in this development of the legislation and in the case law of the Supreme Administrative Court, but also the coherence of the national legislation has been emphasised in the national case law (see KHO 2004:76, KHO 2011:49 and KHO 2019:97). In light of the national case law, access to national courts in environmental matters is guaranteed in an effective way.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. The administrative appellate authority is competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of decisions. The court’s competence and responsibilities of review are the same as in other administrative appeal matters. Both the procedural and substantial legality of the challenged decision are liable to review, as well as underlying material and technical findings.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. Ordinarily only those who have submitted a request for administrative review are entitled to challenge the review decision through appeal, unless the original decision is changed as result of the request (Administrative Judicial Procedure Act, Section 7). An example of a provision concerning administrative review in the environmental matters described in this section is the decision of the fisheries authority to approve implementation plan for a fisheries obligation according to the Water Act; a request for administrative review has to be submitted to the permit authority, which is the Regional State Administrative Agency.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Participation during the administrative procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There are no provisions precluding certain grounds or arguments from the judicial review phase. The administrative court is not strictly bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. When it is called for, the court will assess the validity of material and technical findings, on which a decision has been based. However, courts have to ensure adherence to claims in their decision-making.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? There are no specific provisions concerning a fair and equitable judicial procedure in the national legislation concerning the environmental decisions described in this section. According the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) the appellate authority, or the administrative court, is responsible for leading the process and reviewing the matter. In the Vaasa administrative court, with nationwide competence in appeal matters under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and the Water Act, there are judges trained in natural and technical sciences in order to provide sufficient expertise. The Supreme Administrative Court has also appointed expert judges that participate in decision-making in cases under the EPA and Water Act. With regard to review of facts, the AJPA provides that the court must on its own motion obtain evidence to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the procedure and the nature of the case so require. The state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. The authority that has made the decision challenged by an appeal takes part in the administrative judicial procedure and is obliged to give equitable consideration to public and private interests when presenting the facts of the case to the court (AJPA, Section 37).

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? There are no specific provisions concerning a timely judicial procedure in the national legislation on the decisions falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation. With regard to appeal proceedings in the administrative courts, there are no prescribed time limits for the majority of matters. The Constitution provides everyone with the right to have his or her case dealt with without undue delay in a court of law.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental decision described in this section, such as a water permit decision or a derogation from the prohibitions in the Nature Conservation Act, ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. As an exception from this suspensive effect, the administrative authority can under certain conditions issue a provisional order for enforcement of the permit despite appeals, either together with the permit decision or shortly thereafter through a separate decision. The court is competent to review such an order, and to suspend enforcement despite it. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):

- Administrative court: 260 euros
- Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros

There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings. The costs of legal counsel form a major part of the costs of an administrative judicial procedure but use of legal counsel is not always necessary. A party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case, that the other party should bear his or her own costs. The administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs. (For more information on costs see section 1.7.3.)

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The content and procedure related to SEA can only be challenged in connection to the decision-making procedure of the plan or programme in question. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal concerning the strategic environmental assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the plan or programme. The SEA Act contains a similar general reference to the sectoral statutes with regard to strategic environmental assessment of plans and programmes as the EIA Act concerning access to justice. The Governmental Decree on the Assessment of the Effects of Certain Plans and Programmes (347/2005) includes a list of plans and programmes, for which a strategic environmental assessment according to the SEA Act is always required. Some of these plans and programmes, such as the national land use objectives under the Land Use and Building Act, are adopted by the Council of State, and others, such as the flood risk plans, by a Ministry. An appeal against these decisions of the Council of State or a Ministry is made directly to the Supreme Administrative Court. Other plans and programmes are adopted at the regional level, such as the regional waste plans. According to the Waste Act, the regional waste plans are adopted by the ETE Centres (centres for economic development, transport and the environment). An appeal against these regional decisions is submitted to the regional administrative courts. Right of appeal pertains to individuals affected by the decision. Apart from municipal appeal, there is no actio popularis with regard to access to court. Nor are there any general provisions on the right of appeal of NGOs. Right of appeal is provided for NGOs by most of the sectoral statutes applicable to the plans and programmes listed in the SEA Decree.

Decisions to approve municipal land use plans (local master or detail plans) under the Land Use and Building Act (LUBA) can be challenged by means of municipal appeal with the regional administrative court. In addition to directly concerned parties, the right of appeal is granted to all members of the municipality. This includes registered associations domiciled in the municipality. In addition, the right of appeal is granted to any other registered local or regional organisation when the matter concerns its sphere of activity.

In addition to the above, also nationally active organisations are entitled to appeal against decisions to approve regional plans on certain grounds, specified in the Act. Since planning decisions are reviewed on municipal appeal, the court’s review is strictly confined to the grounds of illegality stated by the appellant. As an exception to the cassatory nature of the municipal appeal, the LUBA includes provisions that enable the court to make slight amendments to the plan under specified conditions. In other regards, the proceedings follow the general procedure under the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act.

In the Act on the Organisation of River Basin Management and Marine Strategy, there is a reference to the SEA Act stating that provisions on the environmental report that must be presented as part of the river basin management plan and the marine strategy document, are laid down in the SEA Act. An appeal against the Government’s decision to approve the river basin management plan or the marine strategy document can be lodged at the Supreme Administrative Court. The right of appeal applies to anyone whose right, obligation or interest may be impacted by the decision, the municipality concerned, an authority supervising the public interest, and a registered local or regional association or foundation whose function is to promote environmental protection or nature conservation and whose operating area the river basin management plan concerns.

In the Flood Risk Management Act there is a similar reference to the SEA Act as in the Act on the Organisation of River Basin Management and Marine Strategy concerning the environmental report in connection to the flood risk management plans. An appeal against the decision of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry to approve the flood risk management plan can be lodged at the Supreme Administrative Court. A decision may be appealed by a party whose right, obligation or benefit may be impacted by the decision, relevant municipality, Regional Council or regional rescue service, an authority supervising the public interest and a registered local or regional association or foundation whose purpose is to promote environmental or nature protection or use of water resources and in whose territory the flood risk management plan is applicable.

In the Transport System and Highways Act there is also a reference to the SEA Act concerning the national plan for transport network. The Government’s decision to adopt the plan for transport network can be appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court.

SEA procedure on the Åland Islands is governed by the same regional act as the EIA procedure (Landskapslag om miljökonsekvensbedömning, 2018:31). The provision on SEA procedure in Chapter 3 of the Act are applied on plans and programmes adopted by the government and the municipalities of the Åland Islands. Appeals are lodged with either the Administrative Court of Åland or the Supreme Administrative Court, depending on the administrative authority whose consent decision is being challenged.

The Åland Islands have their own regional act governing plans and construction (Plan- och bygglag för landskapet Åland, 2008:102). The regional act provides two levels of plans: local master and detail plans. Like their counterparts under the LUBA, such plans are approved by the municipality and challenged by means of municipal appeal to the administrative court of Åland. In addition to directly concerned parties and members of the municipality, the right of appeal is granted to organisations registered in the region when the matter concerns its sphere of activity.

The general provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) and the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) on access to justice are central also when assessing access to justice in environmental matters. However, there are numerous special provisions in the Finnish environmental legislation on access to justice and especially on the standing of NGOs, which is a special feature of environmental law. These special provisions have gradually widened to cover a number of plans and programmes related to the environment. The provisions on standing and access to justice in different acts can differ in their details and a clear overall picture can therefore be difficult to obtain. As an example, in some cases only local and regional environmental NGOs have a right to appeal whereas the right to appeal in other cases covers also national NGOs. In light of the national case law, access to national courts in environmental matters is guaranteed in an effective way.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The court’s powers of review accord with the review of the decision to adopt the plan or programme. The fact that an assessment has been omitted altogether can always be invoked in the court according to Section 11 of the SEA Act.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. At the moment there are no such provisions concerning the plans and programmes covered by the SEA Directive.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Participation during the administrative procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental decision described in this section, such as adoption of a nature conservation programme under the Nature Conservation Act, ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. As an exception from this suspensive effect, the administrative authority can under certain conditions issue a provisional order for enforcement of the plan despite appeals. The court is competent to review such an order, and to suspend enforcement despite it. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):

Administrative court: 260 euros
Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros

There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings. The costs of legal counsel form a major part of the costs of an administrative judicial procedure but use of legal counsel is not always necessary. A party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case, that the other party should bear his or her own costs. The administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs. (For more information on costs see section 1.7.3.)
time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

In Section 3 of the Act on the Assessment of the Effects of Certain Plans and Programmes on the Environment (SEA Act, 200/2005) there is a general obligation on the authorities to assess the effects of all plans and programmes that might have significant effects on the environment. This general obligation is not limited to the plans and programmes under the SEA Directive, which are listed in the Governmental Decree described in section 2.2. The SEA Act contains a similar general reference to the sectoral statutes with regard to strategic environmental assessment of plans and programmes as the EIA Act concerning access to justice. This means in practice that the provisions on judicial appeal concerning the strategic environmental assessment depend on the case and the sectoral legislation applicable to the plan or programme in question.

Apart from the plans and programmes covered by the SEA Directive and the Finnish SEA Act described in section 2.2 there are several plans and programmes that are relevant in connection to the question of access to justice in environmental matters. In general, the provisions of Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) on standing and access to justice are applied to plans and programmes adopted by the state authorities and the provisions of Local Government Act on municipal appeal to plans and programmes at the local level of administration.

The Environmental Protection Act (EPA) lays down rules on the adoption of air quality protection plans according to the Directive on ambient air quality and cleaner air for Europe (2008/50/EC), emission reduction programmes according to the Directive on the reduction of national emissions of certain atmospheric pollutants (2016/2284/EU) and national noise abatement action plans according to the Directive relating to the assessment and management of environmental noise (2002/49/EC). The air quality protection plans are adopted by the municipalities (EPA, Section 145) and the national emission reduction plans are prepared by the Ministry of Environment and adopted by the Government (EPA, Section 149c). The noise abatement action plans are adopted by the municipalities or the Finnish Transport Agency depending on the areas concerned (EPA, Section 152). The provisions of public participation procedures guarantee all the persons and NGOs the right to participate in the preparation and modification or review of these plans (EPA, Sections 147, 149c, 152 and 204). There are no provisions on access to justice related to these plans in the EPA. This has been justified by the lack of a requirement for access to justice in the relevant EU directives and the nature of these plans as establishing a general framework for necessary national or regional measures. However, anyone can make a complaint to the Parliamentary Ombudsman or to the Chancellor of Justice if the relevant competent authorities fail to fulfil their responsibilities to prepare these plans or do not comply the public participation procedures or other relevant legal requirements while preparing these plans. The special provisions in the Finnish legislation on access to justice and especially the standing of NGOs in environmental matters have gradually widened to cover several plans and programmes related to the environment. This means in practice that the provisions on standing and access to justice differ in their details and a clear overall picture can therefore be difficult to obtain. In light of the national case law access to national courts in environmental matters is guaranteed in an effective way.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. The court’s competence and responsibilities for review are the same as in other administrative and municipal appeal matters. When an administrative appeal has been lodged both the procedural and substantial legality of the challenged decision are liable to review, as well as underlying material and technical findings. When a decision taken by a municipal authority is challenged by means of municipal appeal, the court's review is more strictly confined to the grounds of illegality stated by the appellant.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. Ordinarily only those who have submitted a request for administrative review are entitled to challenge the review decision through appeal, unless the original decision is changed as result of the request.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Participation during the administrative procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental decision described in this section ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. As an exception from this suspensive effect, the administrative authority can under certain conditions issue a provisional order for enforcement of the plan despite appeals. The court is competent to review such an order, and to suspend enforcement despite it. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):

Administrative court: 260 euros
Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros

There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings. The costs of legal counsel form a major part of the costs of an administrative judicial procedure but use of legal counsel is not always necessary. A party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case, that the other party should bear his or her own costs. The administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs. (For more information on costs see section 1.7.3.)

14. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Apart from the plans and programmes covered by the SEA Directive and the Finnish SEA Act described in section 2.2 there are several plans and programmes that are relevant in connection to the question of access to justice in environmental matters. In general, the provisions of Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPA) on standing and access to justice are applied to plans and programmes adopted by the state authorities and the provisions of Local Government Act on municipal appeal to plans and programmes at the local level of administration.
In section 2.3 certain plans under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) are mentioned, since the provisions of the EPA are applied to the adoption of air quality protection plans according to the Directive on ambient air quality and cleaner air for Europe (2008/50/EC), emission reduction programmes according to the Directive on the reduction of emissions of certain atmospheric pollutants (2003/35/EU) and national noise abatement action plans according to the Directive relating to the assessment and management of environmental noise (2002/49/EC).

The Water Framework Directive and the Marine Strategy Directive have been transposed into Finnish law by the Act on the Organisation of River Basin and Marine Strategy. In this Act there is a reference to the SEA Act stating, that provisions on the environmental report that must be presented as part of the river basin management plan and the marine strategy document, are laid down in the SEA Act. An appeal against the Government’s decision to approve the river basin management plan or the marine strategy document can be lodged at the Supreme Administrative Court. The right of appeal applies to anyone whose right, obligation or interest may be impacted by the decision, the municipality concerned, an authority supervising the public interest, and a registered local or regional association or foundation whose function is to promote environmental protection or nature conservation and whose operating area the river basin management plan concerns.

The maritime spatial plans according to the Directive establishing a framework for maritime spatial planning (2014/89/EU) are covered by the Chapter 8A of the Land Use and Building Act (LUBA). Drawing up the maritime spatial plans is the responsibility of the regional councils, which are in charge of other regional planning as well. The LUBA contains provisions on the planning procedure and the interaction with different stakeholders. However, the provisions on maritime spatial plans have been criticised because there are no clear stipulations on how the regional council’s decision to approve a maritime spatial plan can be challenged. The content of a maritime spatial plan has not yet been the object of a case in the courts.

The flood risk management plans according to the Directive on the assessment and management of flood risks (2007/60/EC) are regulated under the Flood Risk Management Act, which contains provisions on the planning procedure and participation and communication during the process. An appeal against the decision of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry to approve the flood risk management plan can be lodged at the Supreme Administrative Court. A decision may be appealed by a party whose right, obligation or benefit may be impacted by the decision, a relevant municipality, Regional Council or regional rescue service, an authority supervising the public interest and a registered local or regional association or foundation whose purpose is to promote environmental or nature protection or use of water resources and in whose territory the flood risk management plan is applicable. The provisions of the Land Use and Building Act concerning the appeal and right to appeal a decision concerning the approval of local plans apply to the appeal of a decision by a municipality concerning the approval of a flood risk management plan for stormwater and meltwater flood risks.

The special provisions in the Finnish legislation on access to justice and especially the standing of NGOs in environmental matters have gradually widened to cover several plans and programmes related to the environment. This means in practice that the provisions on standing and access to justice differ in their details and a clear overall picture can therefore be difficult to obtain. In light of the national case law, access to national courts in environmental matters is guaranteed in an effective way.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also section 2.5 below)?

In general, the provisions of Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPAct) on standing and access to justice are applied to plans and programmes adopted by the state authorities. An appeal against the decision of the Council of State and also certain decisions by a Ministry to adopt a plan or a programme is lodged directly in the Supreme Administrative Court. An appeal against a decision by a regional state authority to adopt a plan or a programme is lodged in the regional administrative courts.

The provisions of Local Government Act on municipal appeal are applied to plans and programmes at the local level of administration. According to the Local Government Act the right of appeal is granted to all members of the municipality, in addition to directly concerned parties.

There is no regular review procedure concerning the decisions by a legislative body e.g. the Parliament of Finland or the Council of State when adopting normative instruments such as Acts or Decrees (see also section 2.5). There are some plans and programmes, such as the climate change policy plans and the annual climate change report according to the Climate Change Act, that are reported to the Parliament, but at the moment there are no plans or programmes that would be adopted directly by the Parliament. According to Section 8 of the AJPAct an appeal against a decision by the Council of State (the government plenary session) is lodged in the Supreme Administrative Court.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The court’s competence and responsibilities of review are the same as in other administrative appeal matters. Both the procedural and substantial legality of the challenged decision are liable to review, as well as underlying material and technical findings.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. At the moment there are no provisions on a review procedure concerning plans and programmes to be prepared under EU environmental legislation.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Participation during the administrative procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

6) Are there any grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no provisions precluding certain grounds or arguments from the judicial review phase. The administrative court is not strictly bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. When it is called for, the court will assess the validity of material and technical findings, on which a decision has been based.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There are no specific provisions concerning a fair and equitable judicial procedure in the national legislation on the environmental decisions described in this section. According to the Administrative Judicial Procedure Act (AJPAct), the appellate authority, or the administrative court, is responsible for leading the process and reviewing the matter. The Supreme Administrative Court has appointed expert judges who participate in decision-making in cases under the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) and the Water Act and also the Act on the Organisation of River Basin Management and Marine Strategy. With regard to review of facts, the AJPAct provides that the court must obtain evidence on its own motion to the extent that the impartiality and fairness of the proceedings and the nature of the matter require. The state is responsible for compensating witnesses and experts called by the court on its own initiative. The authority that has made the decision challenged by an appeal takes part in the administrative judicial procedure and is obliged to give equitable consideration to public and private interests when presenting the facts of the case to the court (AJPAct. Section 37).

8) How is the notion of 'timely' implemented by the national legislation?

There are no specific provisions concerning a timely judicial procedure in the national legislation on the decisions falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation. With regard to appeal proceedings in the administrative courts, there are no prescribed time limits for the majority of matters. The Constitution provides everyone with the right to have his or her case dealt with without undue delay in a court of law.
9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental decision described in this section ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. As an exception from this suspensive effect, some of the plans described in this section, like the water management plans, can be enforced despite appeals according to special provisions in the substantive law. The court is competent to suspend enforcement despite the special provisions if necessary. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):

- Administrative court: 260 euros
- Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros

There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings. The costs of legal counsel form a major part of the costs of an administrative judicial procedure but use of legal counsel is not always necessary. A party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case that the other party should bear his or her own costs. The administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs. (For more information on costs see section 1.7.3.)

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

According to the Constitution of Finland (731/1999), the legislative powers are exercised by the Parliament, which has also adopted all the Acts that form the most important part of the environmental legislation. The President of the Republic, the Government and a Ministry may issue Decrees on the basis of authorisation given to them in the Constitution or in another Act. There is no Constitutional Court or other regular review procedure concerning the decisions by a legislative body e.g. the Parliament of Finland or the Council of State when adopting normative instruments such as Acts or Decrees. According to Section 74 of the Constitution of Finland, the Constitutional Law Committee of the Parliament must issue statements on the constitutionality of legislative proposals and other matters brought for its consideration, as well as on their relation to international human rights treaties.

If, in a matter being tried by a court of law, the application of an Act would be in evident conflict with the Constitution, the court of law must according to Section 106 of the Constitution give primacy to the provision in the Constitution. If a provision in a Decree or another statute at a lower level than an Act is in conflict with the Constitution or another Act, it may not be applied by a court of law or by any other public authority.

Normative instruments cannot usually be challenged directly by appeal in court. In order to obtain a court ruling on the implementation of an Act or Decree used to implement EU environmental legislation, a first instance decision from the authority applying that Act or Decree is generally required. In case of an omission of a national regulatory act, an individual can seek enforcement of environmental responsibilities based on EU law by approaching the competent municipal or state authority with a request for enforcement measures. Upon review of the decision of the municipal or state authority the national administrative court has to consider the conformity of the national legislation with EU legislation and the need to seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice of the European Union of the interpretation or validity of the EU law according to the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The court’s competence and responsibilities for review are the same as in other administrative appeal matters. Both the procedural and substantial legality of the challenged decision are subject to review, as well as underlying material and technical findings.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In Finland, administrative procedure does not include a general stage of internal review, i.e. reconsideration by the decision-maker or a superior administrative body. However, substantive law can prescribe such administrative review procedures. If a review procedure is provided for, it cannot be bypassed by directly lodging an appeal with the court. Ordinarily only those who have submitted a request for administrative review are entitled to challenge the review decision through appeal, unless the original decision is changed as result of the request.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Participation during the administrative procedure is not a prerequisite for standing in court.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Since the normative instruments cannot usually be challenged directly by appeal in court, the court is only competent to give execution orders concerning the decision of the authority applying the normative instrument in question. The general rule in all administrative judicial proceedings, which applies also to environmental matters, is that administrative decisions can be executed only after means of and time limits for challenging the decision through appeal have been exhausted. Thus, appealing against an environmental decision described in this section ordinarily suspends commencement of the authorised activity until the appeal court has ruled on the matter. (This system of injunctive relief is described in more detail in section 1.7.2.)

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

For administrative judicial proceedings, the following trial fee is charged from the appellant, according to appeal stage (as of the beginning of 2019):

- Administrative court: 260 euros
- Supreme Administrative Court: 510 euros

There are no additional court fees for any further stages of the proceedings. The costs of legal counsel form a major part of the costs of an administrative judicial procedure but use of legal counsel is not always necessary. A party has the obligation to bear the costs of another party in full or in part, if it would be unreasonable in light of the outcome of the case, that the other party should bear his or her own costs. The administrative judicial proceedings typically give rise to relatively low costs. (For more information on costs see section 1.7.3.)
7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[4]

As explained above, normative instruments cannot usually be challenged directly by appeal in court. In order to obtain a court ruling on the implementation of an Act or Decree used to implement EU environmental legislation, a first instance decision from the authority applying that Act or Decree is generally required. The appellant can make a request to the national court to seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) on the interpretation or validity of the EU law according to the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. Upon review of the decision of the municipal or state authority, the national administrative court has to consider the need to seek a preliminary ruling. There are no provisions on requests for preliminary ruling from the CJEU in the national legislation.

The judgement of the CJEU of 26.10.2016 in case C-506/14, Yara Suomi Oy and Others, concerning Commission Decision 2013/448/EU on greenhouse gas emission allowance trading within the European Union, is an example of a case where certain provisions of the Commission decision were declared invalid by the CJEU after requests for preliminary ruling of the validity of that decision made by the appellants in the first hand to the Supreme Administrative Court in Finland and other national courts in several member states.

[1] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[2] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[3] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[4] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoeksche Waard, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Last update: 19/05/2024

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Ordinarily, the most easily available means for an individual to seek enforcement of environmental responsibilities against private entities is to approach the competent municipal or state authority with a request for enforcement measures. Private enforcement of public law is not possible, i.e. private individuals cannot take other private parties to court for breach of environmental responsibilities toward the public.

With regard to enforcement through a request to the competent supervisory authority, the correct authority to approach is generally identified in the applicable substantive law or, in the case of municipal authorities, in municipal regulations issued on the basis of this law. Hence the Environmental Protection Act (EPA), for example, identifies the competent state supervisory authority as well as requiring the municipality to assign one of its committees as local supervisory authority. At state level, the ETE Centre (Centre for economic development, transport and the environment) is typically the competent supervisory authority in environmental matters.

The substantive law defines the supervisory authority’s powers of enforcement, i.e. the authority’s competence to use administrative compulsion against someone breaching the provisions of the law. Depending on the case, this may for example entail orders to comply with a permit, prevent or remedy environmental damage or revocation of a permit. The supervisory authority can usually also reinforce the prohibition or order that it has issued with a notice of a conditional fine or a notice that the activity that has been neglected must be carried out at the expense of the negligent party according to the Act on Conditional Fines (see e.g. Section 184 of the EPA). In principle, anyone can approach the authority and inform it about possible breaches of environmental law.

The right to request for enforcement measures depends on the applicable substantive law. As an example in EPA the right to initiate proceedings is granted to parties concerned, environmental NGOs, certain municipal and state authorities and the Sámi Parliament (Section 186).

In order to obtain a court ruling obliging a public authority to take action, a first instance decision from the authority itself is generally required. Only upon review of this decision, the administrative court is competent to find enforcement measures warranted. When directly challenging an administrative decision is not possible due to the silence of the administration, also the option of making an administrative complaint is available (Administrative Procedure Act, Chapter 8a). Complaints can be filed with municipal or state supervisory authorities, where relevant, or the two supreme overseers, the Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Chancellor of Justice. A supervisory authority may in its decision draw the attention of the supervised entity to the requirements of good administration or inform it of the authority’s understanding of lawful conduct. If this is not found sufficient, the supervised entity may be given an warning, unless the nature or severity of the act forming the subject of the complaint requires measures to institute a procedure provided in another act. The supreme overseers deliver their opinion on complaints lodged with them and are also competent to issue official reprimands as well as initiating criminal prosecution for malfeasance. The overseers can also initiate investigations on their own initiative (for the supreme overseers see also section 1.3).

Regardless of whether a public liability or other matter of supervision or enforcement has been initiated through a private request or on the authority’s own initiative, the final decision in the matter can usually be challenged through appeal in regular fashion. This means that a decision compelling an operator to remedy a situation that breaches its permit, for example, can be challenged by the operator in question, while a decision not to require measures from the operator can be challenged by an interested third party (e.g. an NGO that requested enforcement). As usual, the right of appeal is regulated by the applicable substantive law. In most situations, neighbours and NGOs are entitled to appeal, at least if they have been involved in the process earlier.

The supervisory authorities must report any act or omission in breach of the environmental law to the police for preliminary investigation, unless the illegal conduct can be considered minor in view of the circumstances. Penalties for environmental offences are stipulated in Chapter 48 of the Criminal Code of Finland (39/1889). Chapter 40 of the Criminal Code covers offences in office including a violation of official duty, which could be relevant in connection with providing effective access to justice. There are no specific national rules on penalties to be imposed on the public administration for failing to provide access to justice.

If there is a decision of an authority or a judgement that is legally binding (meaning that it cannot be challenged by ordinary means of appeal), the police have an obligation to provide executive assistance to the environmental supervisory authorities so that the decision or judgement can be complied with.

Enforcement of private environmental liabilities is also possible. Compensation for damages resulting from environmental nuisance, such as property damage, health injuries or financial loss, can be sought in the general courts. There is a specific act regulating this type of private damages, the Act on Compensation for Environmental Damage (737/1994), which is complemented by the general Tort Liability Act (412/1974). The first-mentioned act also covers costs of measures to prevent environmental damage threatening the person undertaking the measures, as well as measures to reinstate damaged environment. This means that it is possible to seek a court judgment regarding costs to restore one's property directly against the liable party, without requesting an order for clean-up or suchlike from the public authorities. With rare exceptions, private individuals cannot otherwise pursue compensation for damage to public interests toward the environment. Certain activities and situations, such as nuisance due to land extraction or permit-authorised water pollution, are subject to specifically regulated compensation procedures, which bypass the general liability legislation. Injunctive orders cannot ordinarily be sought against operators directly in court; the competent administrative supervisory authority must be approached for such enforcement.

On the other hand, compensation for damages caused by exercise of public authority can, under certain conditions, be claimed directly in the general courts on the basis of the Tort Liability Act. Naturally, if claims are directed against the state or municipality in capacity of operator, for example, the same liability procedures as for private operators apply.

In the context of criminal proceedings, the public prosecutor is, upon request, required to pursue a private claim for damages on behalf of an injured party. This assistance is provided free of charge, and the prosecutor can refuse the request only if the claim is obviously ill-founded or its presentation would significantly impair the prosecution of the case. Injured parties also have a secondary right of prosecution. In other words, in a criminal case where the prosecutor has decided not to prosecute, an injured party is entitled to press criminal charges for the offence and have the case decided by the court. Nationally, there are a number of prosecutors specialised in environmental matters, who can be assigned, by special order, to cases outside their ordinary jurisdiction.

With regard to the Aland Islands, the state tort law applies in the autonomous region as well. Likewise, the principles for requesting authority enforcement correspond with what has been described above. The primary supervisory authorities on the Islands are the Environmental and Health Protection Authority of Aland, the regional government and municipal building supervision authorities.

Last update: 19/05/2024

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Sweden
To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 30/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

The right for individuals and NGOs to challenge environmental decisions, acts and omissions can mainly be found in three different Swedish acts; the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act.

Legislation is the key tool in Sweden with which principles of environmental policy are converted into practical action. Environmental rules in Sweden come in the form of acts, ordinances (decided by the Government) and regulations decided on by the main authorities for the protection of the environment. A hierarchy of these rules means that ordinances and regulations decided on by authorities can never be contrary to the laws. The Parliament (Riksdagen) is the national law-making body responsible for adopting all acts. The executive power rests with the Government (regeringen), and the Government is in turn responsible to the Parliament. The Government is assisted in its work by the Government Offices, comprising all ministries, and some 400 central government agencies and public authorities. Administrative functions may further be entrusted to regional or local authorities or delegated to other public as well as private bodies. Government agencies carry out their tasks independently under the laws and other legislation. The relevant ministry is therefore not permitted to intervene in an individual matter that is being handled by an agency.

The main authorities for the protection of the environment are the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency (Naturvårdsverket), the Swedish Chemicals Agency (Kemiinspektionen), the Swedish Agency for Marine and Water Management (Havs- och vattenmyndigheten) and the Swedish Radiation Safety Authority (Strålskyddsmyndigheten).

Sweden is divided into 21 counties (län) and 290 municipalities (kommuner). Each county has a County Administrative Board (länsstyrelsen). Constitutorially, each County Administrative Board constitutes a government agency subordinate to the Government with expert staff in various areas, such as environmental protection.

The County Administrative Boards (together with the Land and Environment Courts) are the main licensing authorities in environmental matters. Twelve of the County Administrative Boards have an Environmental Permit Office that issues permits for environmentally hazardous activities in accordance with the Environmental Code. In their decision-making, the Environmental Permit Offices are independent from the County Administrative Boards. The County Administrative Boards are also responsible for “green” issues and supervision concerning water-related activities and larger industrial activities. Additionally, the County Administrative Boards issue permits for waste transportation and disposal, and chemical activities, amongst other things.

Each municipality has an elected assembly, the municipal council (kommunfullmäktige), which is the decision-making body for municipal matters. The municipal council appoints the municipal executive board (kommunstyrelsen), which leads and coordinates the municipal tasks and responsibilities. The Swedish municipalities are responsible for executing and providing a significant proportion of all public tasks and services, including environmental and health protection. The competence to issue plans and permits under the Planning and Building Act resides with the municipalities. For some minor environmentally hazardous activities, carrying is out at municipality level.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The main provisions are found in the Instrument of Government, which also sets out some principles of relevance to access to justice in environmental matters. Chapter 1 Section 1 states the fundamental provision that the public power is exercised under the law. The public institutions shall promote sustainable development leading to a good environment for present and future generations (Chapter 1, Section 2). All courts, the public administration and others performing functions within the public administration shall observe the principle of equality of all persons before the law and be objective and impartial (Chapter 1, Section 9). It is also stipulated that no act of law or other provision may be promulgated in contradiction of Sweden’s obligations under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The right to a fair and public hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal must be upheld (European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Article 6).

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

The main environmental law in Sweden is the Environmental Code (1998:808), which constitutes a framework legislation consisting of the general provisions regarding environmental protection. It applies to all human activities that might harm the environment. The Code contains the environmental principles and provisions providing for environmental quality norms as well as environmental impact assessments. Certain water operations, industrial undertakings, quarries and other environmentally hazardous activities are subject to permit or notification requirements, as specified in Governmental Ordinances. The Code also contains provisions relating to nature protection, flora and fauna, genetically modified organisms, chemicals and waste.

Under the Environmental Code, there are several ordinances decided on by the Government containing more specific rules. Certain activities are also regulated in special sectoral legislation. Planning and building issues are covered by the Planning and Building Act (2010:900). Infrastructure installations, such as railroads and highways, also have regulations of their own, as do mining and forestry. Fauna is protected, in part, through hunting law.

By statutory authorisation, many of the central administrative authorities are responsible for issuing regulations in the field of operation. The central administrative authorities are often designated as the Swedish competent authorities, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency and the Swedish Agency for Marine and Water Management.

Both the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act include special provisions on access to justice. When it comes to sectoral legislation, such as the Game Act, the Forestry Act and the Minerals Act, the provision on access to justice may be found in the general rule in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

List of relevant national legislation
- Access to justice found in Chapter 16, Sections 12, 13 and 14
- Access to justice found in Chapter 13
- Administrative Procedure Act (2017:900) [Förvaltningslag (2017:900)]
- Access to justice found in Section 42
- Judicial Review of Certain Government Decisions Act
- Access to justice found in Sections 1 and 2

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The access to justice of the public affected has been developed through case law. The courts most important when it comes to case law in environmental matters are the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, both of which may decide on judgments that may become precedents in those cases where their rulings include more general principles. Important case law has also been developed by the Supreme Administrative Court in cases related to i.a. forestry and legal review of Governmental decisions.

Judgments from the Supreme Courts or appeals courts are not binding for lower courts, except where they refer to formal issues in a specific case. The judgments from the Supreme Courts, however, are regarded as guiding and there must be reasons of some importance to deviate from what has been decided.

NJA 2004, p. 590 and NJA 2012, p. 921. The Supreme Court stated that the right to appeal must apply to any person liable to be harmed, injured or otherwise inconvenienced as a result of the activity for which a permit is sought. The risk of injury or inconvenience should concern an interest that is protected by the legal order and should not be purely theoretical or completely insignificant.

MÖD 2011:46. The Land and Environment Court of Appeal stated that an individual affected should be given the right to appeal a decision not to request the withdrawal of a permit for environmentally hazardous activities.

MÖD 2000:43 and MÖD 2004:43. Nearby residents were held to have the right to appeal a decision by a supervisory authority not to intervene against environmentally hazardous activities.

The right of environmental NGOs to appeal public authority decisions under other administrative environmental legislation has also been developed in case law.

NJA 2012 p.921. The Supreme Court affirmed that organisations that meet the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code have the right to appeal, but in cases where an organisation does not meet the criteria an assessment has to be made of all the circumstances in the particular case. The court concluded that a generous assessment should be made of the right of environmental NGOs to appeal, since they can base their right to appeal on representing public interests, even in situations where no individuals can invoke such interests.

Case law has given environmental NGOs the right to also appeal decisions other than those stated explicitly in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code, including supervisory decisions under the Environmental Code with reference to article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention and Sweden’s obligations under EU law. The courts have also given the expression ‘decision concerning permits or exemptions’ a broad interpretation (MÖD 2012:47, MÖD 2012:48, MÖD 2013:6, MÖD 2014:30 and the judgment of the Land and Environment Court of Appeal of 18 March 2014 in cases M 11609-13 and MÖD 2015:17).

Recent case law from the Supreme Court has given NGOs the right to appeal decisions on building permits, NJA 2020 p. 190, and a decision to adopt a detailed plan that was alleged to interfere with interest of cultural values, judgment 9 July 2020 Ö 6554-19, with reference to a judgment from the Supreme Administrative Court, HDF 2018 ref. 10 II.

In case T 5637-19 from October 2020, the Supreme Court stated that an NGO with only 5-10 members was considered to fulfil the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 and hence given the right to appeal.

According to firmly established case law, environmental NGOs have the right to appeal decisions under the Game Ordinance on hunting of species protected by Directive 92/43/EEC of 21 May 1992 on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora, the ‘Habitats Directive’ (see the judgment of the Administrative Court of Appeal in Stockholm in cases 4390-12 and 4396-12 and subsequent judgments).

The Supreme Administrative Court 2014 ref.8. The Supreme Administrative Court gave an environmental NGO that met the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code the right to appeal the decision of the Swedish Forest Agency to grant a permit for the felling of subalpine forest, partly because decisions on permits for the felling of subalpine forest are covered by article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention.
The Administrative Court of Appeal in Gothenburg in case 1186-16. A decision on a permit for intrusion in historic remains under the Historic Environment Act (1988:950) was held to be covered by article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention. A nature conservation society that met the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code was therefore held to have the right to appeal the decision.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

In Sweden, international conventions do not have direct effect so they must be incorporated in Swedish law to be applicable. However, by ratifying a convention Sweden becomes bound by the convention in terms of international law and national regulations should be interpreted in the light of the convention.

EU regulations apply directly as national law, while EU directives are transposed at the most appropriate level in the hierarchy to meet the given objectives. For provisions of a directive to be transposed into a Swedish ordinance or administrative provision, there must be a statutory delegation in a Swedish act.

The provisions on access to justice in EU directives are also incorporated into Swedish law.

Parties involved in administrative or court procedure may, though, rely directly on international environmental agreements in their arguments.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Court judgments are not recognised as a formal source of law, but the courts have a role as interpreters of law and other legal regulation. The courts have an independent status within the Swedish constitution. Neither the Parliament nor any other authority may decide on, or otherwise interfere in, matters handled by the courts.

Judgments from the Supreme Courts or appeals courts are not binding on lower courts, except where they refer to formal issues in a specific case. The judgments from the Supreme Courts, however, are regarded as guiding and there must be reasons of some importance to deviate from what has been decided.

There are three kinds of courts in Sweden:

- the general courts, which comprise district courts, courts of appeal and the Supreme Court;
- the general administrative courts; administrative courts, administrative courts of appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court; and
- the special courts, which determine disputes within specific areas such as environment.

Usually the number of levels in the court system, regardless of whether the case concerns administrative decisions or a civil or criminal case, is three. In most cases there is a need for a leave to appeal (review permit) to get access to justice in the highest courts (the Supreme Administrative Court, the Supreme Court and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal). The main rule is that the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court only grant leave to appeal if the Supreme Court's judgment or decision can have significance as a precedent, i.e. provide guidance on how the courts should assess similar cases. Apart from the precedent reason, the Land and Environment Court of Appeal may also grant a leave to appeal if there may be a reason to change the decision of the Land and Environment Court and it is needed for the Land and Environmental Court of Appeal to be able to better assess whether the Land and Environmental Court has ruled correctly or there are other special reasons to try the appeal such as risk of severe damage to the environment.

If the higher court finds that none of these conditions are met, it will not try the case.

It should also be noted that decisions by authorities under the Environmental Code may be challenged through the system of Land and Environment Courts, but only up to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal as the final instance. Appealed decisions from authorities under the Planning and Building Act, as well as property cases, may be appealed to the Supreme Court, but only where the Land and Environment Court of appeal so allows, which is mainly if that court deems that there is a need for precedence regarding a disputed issue.

2) Rule of competence and jurisdiction - how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

For matters pertaining to environmental law, as well as matters of property registration, planning and building, Sweden has developed a system of special courts. This system consists of five Land and Environment Courts, and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities.

The five Land and Environment Courts are each incorporated as a special branch within five designated district courts located in various parts of Sweden, each responsible for their respective part of the country (according to law). The Land and Environment Court of Appeal is part of the Svea Court of Appeal and is responsible for the entire country. The Supreme Court in turn hears virtually all cases, including matters of environmental law, of precedential significance.

The administrative courts try some cases regulated in sectoral legislation concerning hunting, forestry and mining.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

For matters pertaining to environmental law as well as matters of property registration, planning and building, Sweden has developed a system of special courts. This system consists of five Land and Environment Courts, and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities.

Installations and activities involving a substantial environmental impact must obtain a permit from the Land and Environment Court, as must most kinds of water operations. In these cases, the court is exercising administrative powers usually allocated to authorities. This is a unique situation for Sweden. The Land and Environment Courts also try civil cases related to the environment, decisions appealed from administrative authorities, and handle cases on imposition of conditional fines after application from the supervisory authorities. It should be noted that most decisions from local authorities are first challenged through administrative appeal to the County Administrative Boards and then to the Land and Environment Court.

The Land and Environment Courts are specifically designed to deal with the technical complexity of the matters under their authority. The Land and Environment Courts rule on cases with one legally trained judge presiding over the case and a technically trained judge providing the special competence often needed due to the distinctive nature of the matters. In cases relating to environmental permitting, the two judges are assisted by two technical counsellors. Industry and national public authorities nominate the last two. The underlying philosophy is that experts will contribute their experience of municipal or industrial operations or public environment supervision. Depending on the case at hand and the issues involved, more than one technical judge, and then with additional technical/scientific competence, may participate.

The Land and Environment Court of Appeal rules on cases with three legally trained judges, one of whom presides over the case, and one technically trained judge.

All members of the courts have an equal vote. In the majority of cases, though, the chair has a casting vote where voting is tied.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.
The administrative courts, as well as the Land and Environment Courts, decide cases on their merits in a reformatory procedure, meaning that they may replace the appealed decision with a new one. It should be noted that the administrative court procedure is simpler and less formal than the civil procedure. Another vital difference is that in the administrative procedure the ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The principle means both that the examining courts (and authorities) have an obligation to ensure that a satisfactory investigation is made of each individual matter and that the courts may base their judgment on causes of action other than invoked by the parties. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. In administrative cases (challenged decisions from authorities and applications on imposition of conditional fines), the Court may, on its own initiative, perform investigations at the location in question if this is deemed necessary in order to examine the case.

In Sweden, in the judicial review procedure the relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The legislation forms the framework for this review. It consists of both substantive provisions on environmental protection and procedural rules, both specific to environmental cases and general. The Court has the right to try any issues related to this substantive and procedural law framework, and the Courts’ obligation to examine the case on its own initiative does not only apply to substantive issues, but also to procedural issues. The Court would thus raise issues regarding the correctness of a decision, whether it has been adopted by the competent authority (or whether the authority has abused its powers), whether the required form of a decision has been respected, and also whether the decision is appropriate in relation to the substantive and formal space given to the deciding authority. Though bound by the claims of the parties setting the framework of the process, in these cases the court in principle is put in the same position as the first deciding authority.

When a permit application is appealed and the court finds that the permit should not have been issued because of infringements of procedural or substantive nature, the court may reject the permit application and the permit will then no longer exist. However, if the Court finds that amendments to the permit conditions make it possible to conduct the activities in accordance with the Environmental Code, the court may add additional conditions to the permit, or amend conditions already prescribed by the authority, instead of revoking the permit. In addition, the court may deliver a new decision instead of the appealed one, repealing or changing the old decision, or remitting it back to the administrative decision-maker. As a main rule, they must not deliver a decision beyond the claims of the parties, but exceptions can be made to the benefit of the individual if this is not detrimental to involved private interests. There is no Constitutional Court in Sweden, nor any abstract norm control. Instead, when a court is dealing with a case, it is obliged to control the legal basis for the decision and must disregard any act or statute which is in conflict with the Constitution or superior norms.

1.3. Organization of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The Environmental Code

To ensure effective compliance with the general rules of the Environmental Code, many activities and operations are subject to permits. Such activities and operations may not commence without a permit from a competent authority. The permit sets out the scope of the activity concerned and must include the conditions under which the activity may be carried out. If the surveys are not sufficient to decide on “final” conditions, a licence may be issued where certain issues are to be further investigated during a certain period in which provisional conditions on precautionary measures will be applicable. The activities or operations for which permits are compulsory are specified either in the Code or in ordinances issued under the Code based on their typical environmental impact.

The Environmental Code divides competence between the local administration and the Land and Environment Courts. Licensing of very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations, is carried out by the Government. Licensing of larger industrial installations basically following the 2010/75 EU directive on industrial emissions and water activities is carried out by the Land and Environment Courts and licensing of medium-size polluting activities is carried out by the County Administrative Boards Environmental Permit Office. For some minor environmentally hazardous activities, licensing or a notification procedure is carried out at municipality level.

For the purpose of overseeing compliance with the requirements set out in the Environmental Code and ordinances issued under the Code, as well as the requirements set out in permits, the Environmental Code also contains provisions concerning supervision. The supervision is conducted by certain supervisory authorities whose authority and responsibility are set out in the Environmental Code and in an ordinance issued under the Code. With some exceptions, the operative supervisory actions, such as inspections and enforcement, are carried out at regional or local level by the County Administrative Boards or by the municipalities. The County Administrative Boards are generally responsible for the supervision of larger hazardous activities and compliance with legislation based on EU directives. The duties of the County Administrative Board can be transferred to the municipality according to a special procedure. In turn, the municipality is assigned general supervisory responsibility for all other environmentally hazardous activities within the municipality. In addition, there are twelve central government agencies, including the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency, which are assigned operative supervisory responsibilities within specific fields, such as chemicals, forestry or agriculture. To ensure compliance with the Environmental Code and ordinances issued under the Code, the supervisory authority may issue an injunction, often combined with conditional fines.

Planning and Building Act

The municipalities are responsible for the planning of land and water areas within their geographical boundaries. It is only the municipality that has the authority to adopt plans and decide whether the planning is to be implemented or not. The municipality must have a current comprehensive plan that covers the entire area of the municipality. The act also contains regulations on detailed development plans, area regulations and building permits.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Individuals concerned and NGOs meeting the requirements according to the Environmental Code may appeal an administrative environmental decision made by the County Administrative Board or the Environmental Permit Office of the County Administrative Board to the Land and Environment Court. Individuals concerned and NGOs meeting the requirements according to the Environmental Code may also appeal administrative decisions according to sectoral legislations such as the Forestry Act and the Minerals Act.

The appeal must be in writing, stating the claim and reasons, and is sent to the authority, which will check that the appeal was made in time and send it to the court. The appeal process can take different lengths of time depending on the scope of the case. A final ruling by the court may be expected within somewhere between 6 months and one year.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

Sweden has special courts for matters pertaining to environmental law as well as matters of property registration, planning and building. There are five Land and Environment Courts and one Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities. The five Land and Environment Courts are each incorporated as a special branch within five designated district courts located in various parts of Sweden, each responsible for their respective part of the country (according to law). The Land and Environment Court of Appeal is part of the Svea Court of Appeal and is responsible for the entire country.
4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

The Environmental Code

The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing, dispensation exemptions or injunctions according to the Environmental Code are as follows:

- Local municipality – County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)
- County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)
- Land and Environment Court – County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed)

In certain cases, the Government decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

The applicant and the other parties in the procedure, as well as certain other stakeholders, can appeal against a permit decision. The right to appeal also applies to non-profit organisations or other legal persons with the primary purpose of promoting nature conservation and environmental protection interests or recreational interests, provided they also meet certain other specified requirements.

Planning and Building Act

Municipal decisions on planning and building licensing according to the Planning and Building Act are appealed directly to one of the Land and Environment Courts and may be appealed further to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed).

Decisions on licensing according to the Planning and Building Act are first challenged through administrative appeal to the County Administrative Board and then, via the Land and Environment Court, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. If that court gives permission to appeal its ruling, the case may end up in the Supreme Court. Leave to appeal is still needed, as at the Land and Environment Court of Appeal.

Other sectoral legislation related to the environment

Some cases are dealt with in a different manner. For example, some decisions on hunting, forestry, mining and infrastructure projects are appealed to the administrative courts or to the Government.

Decisions by the County Administrative Boards on licence hunting according to the Game Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions by the Swedish Forest Agency according to the Forestry Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions of the Mining Inspectorate on exploration permits according to the Minerals Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions of the Mining Inspectorate on exploitation concessions according to the Minerals Act – the Government

Decisions concerning infrastructure projects that are decided by national authorities can be appealed to the Government.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

Judicial review by the Supreme Administrative Court

The Supreme Administrative Court is the supreme general administrative court and considers determinations on appeal from any of the four administrative courts of appeal in Sweden. The Supreme Administrative Court can also, under certain circumstances, examine whether a decision made by the Government is in contravention of the rule of law. This institution is known as judicial review pursuant to the Judicial Review of Certain Government Decisions Act.

According to this act, a prerequisite for judicial review is that the decision involves an examination of the individual's civil rights or obligations as referred to in Article 6.1 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, or, if the applicant is an environmental NGO, the government decision refers to Article 9.2 of the Aarhus Convention.

Preliminary rulings from the EU Court

All parties in an ongoing case may petition that the court trying the case request a preliminary ruling from the EU Court. This may be done regardless of which court is reviewing the case. It is up to the court to decide whether or not a preliminary ruling is necessary.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

In Sweden, there are no out-of-court solutions such as mediation in environmental cases.

In civil cases, however, e.g. compensation for environmental damage, it is mandatory for the court to try to mediate, either by itself or by involving an external mediator.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsmen

The Parliamentary Ombudsmen (JO) and the Chancellor of Justice (JK) are both designated to ensure that public authorities and their staff comply with laws and other statutes and fulfil their obligations in other respects. They have a disciplinary function and act through opinions and prosecution for administrative misconduct.

The Ombudsmen ensure in particular that the courts and public authorities, in the course of their activities, act with objectivity and impartiality and that the fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens are not encroached upon in public administration.

Supervision is exercised by the Ombudsmen in assessing complaints made by the public and by means of inspections and such other inquiries as the Ombudsmen may find necessary.

Public prosecutor

The regulation on environmental crimes is under general public prosecution.

The public has very limited access to criminal proceedings, as the power to prosecute is the prerogative of the public prosecutor.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

There are provisions in the Environmental Code and in administrative law that make it possible to appeal against the decisions of public authorities in general. These decisions may concern permits, other approvals, exemptions and supervision.

Appealable judgments and decisions may be appealed by anyone who is the subject of a decision against them. It has not been specified in Swedish law who should be considered a person concerned; this is decided on a case by case basis. Under Swedish law, it is generally not specified that ‘person’ refers to both natural and legal persons. Decisions and judgments may be directed to legal persons and it is possible that legal persons may suffer harm from a permit decision and could therefore also have standing on that ground.

The preparatory work of the Environmental Code explains that the concept of standing shall be interpreted widely and shall be decided on a case by case basis by the court. According to case law, any person who may suffer harm or be subjected to some other detriment as a result of the activity for which a permit is being sought has the right to be a party and to appeal a decision if the risk of harm or detriment concerns an interest that is protected by the legal system and is not solely theoretical or wholly insignificant.
NGOs who meet the requirements stipulated in the Environmental Code may challenge many administrative decisions. The requirements are that the NGO is a non-profit association whose purpose according to its statutes is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests. The association furthermore must have conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years and have at least 100 members or, by some other means, show that its activities are supported by the public. In respect of shore protection, the provisions also apply to non-profit associations whose purpose according to their statutes is to promote outdoor interests.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

Rules on legal standing can be found in the Environmental Code, Chapter 16, Sections 12 and 13, in the Planning and Building Act and in sectoral legislation. Some of this sectoral legislation lacks specific regulation on standing. In these cases, the general rule on standing found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable.

The general right of environmental NGOs to appeal environmental matters, including permit decisions, is regulated specifically in both the Environmental Code and in a number of sectoral legislations, such as the Minerals Act. These environmental NGOs also have an explicit right to apply for judicial review of permit decisions by the Government according to the Act on judicial review of certain government decisions. Regarding sectoral legislation which does not specifically refer to the rule of standing for NGOs in the Environmental Code, such as the Forestry Act and the Game Act, the right for NGOs to appeal has been opened up by case law.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The standing rules according to the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act are the same regardless of whether the case concerns standing for administrative review, standing for judicial review in the court of first instance or standing for appealing decisions of courts of first instance.

The Environmental Code:
Chapter 16 Section 12
Appeals may be made against appealable judgments or decisions by:
any person who is the subject of a judgment or decision against them;
local employees’ associations that organise workers in the activity to which the decision relates in the case of judgments and decisions concerning permits for environmentally hazardous activities;
national employees’ organisations within the meaning of the Codetermination at Work Act (1976:580), the corresponding employers’ organisations and consumer associations in the case of decisions taken by a County Administrative Board or a central administrative authority pursuant to an authorisation issued in accordance with chapter 14, provided that the decision does not relate to an individual case; and authorities, municipal committees or other bodies which have a right of appeal pursuant to specific provisions in this Code or to rules issued in pursuance thereof or pursuant to the Act (2010: 897) on border river agreements between Sweden and Finland.

The provisions of this section shall be without prejudice to the right of appeal provided by the Code of Judicial Procedure.

Chapter 16 Section 13
Appealable judgments and decisions concerning permits, approvals or exemptions issued pursuant to this Code, concerning withdrawal of the status of protected areas pursuant to Chapter 7, or concerning supervision pursuant to Chapter 10 or questions relating to provisions adopted pursuant to this Code, may be appealed by a non-profit association or other legal person:
whose primary purpose is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests;
that is not run for profit;
that has conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years; and that has at least 100 members or, by some other means, shows that its activities are supported by the public.

The right to appeal pursuant to the first paragraph also applies if the appeal only refers to a condition or other provision in the judgment or decision, and also if the judgment or decision is the result of an assessment pursuant to Chapter 22, Section 26 or Chapter 24, Section 2, 3, 5, 6 or 8 of this Code, or an assessment pursuant to Chapter 7, Section 13, 14 or 16 of the Water Operations (Special Provisions) Act (1998:812). However, the right to appeal pursuant to the first paragraph does not apply to judgments or decisions relating to the Swedish Armed Forces, the Swedish Fortifications Agency, the Swedish Defence Materiel Administration or the National Defence Radio Establishment.

Anyone who wishes to appeal pursuant to the first or second paragraph must do so within the time limit set for the parties and for other concerned persons.

Chapter 16 Section 14
The provisions of section 13 on the right of certain non-profit associations to appeal also apply in respect of shore protection to a non-profit association which, according to its statutes, has the purpose of safeguarding recreational interests.

The Planning and Building Act
The Planning and Building Act regulates the right for environmental NGOs referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13, of the Environmental Code to appeal a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan likely to have a significant environmental impact given that the planned area may be used for certain types of activity, and a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan which means that an area will no longer be covered by shore protection.

For individuals, the general rule on standing in the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable. According to case law, an individual may usually appeal building permits and development plans which may affect them personally (they are neighbours or living within or directly adjacent to the area to which a municipal plan applies).

Chapter 13 Section 8
Provisions on who may appeal a decision referred to in Sections 2 a, 3, 5 and 6 can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Chapter 13 Section 11
A decision to adopt, amend, or repeal a detailed development plan or area regulations may only be appealed by someone who, prior to the expiration of the review period, has presented opinions in writing that have not been approved.
Curtailment of the right to appeal as determined by the first paragraph does not apply if:
the decision has gone against the affected party through the proposal being amended after the review period; or the appeal is based on the decision not having been established according to the regulations prescribed by law.

Chapter 13 Section 12
A non-profit organisation or other legal entity of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code may appeal a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan that can be assumed to result in a significant environmental impact owing to the fact that the planned area may be used for activities or measures indicated in Chapter 4, Section 34 of this Act.
A non-profit organisation or other legal entity of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code, or a non-profit organisation of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 14 of the Environmental Code, may appeal a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan that entails an area no longer being covered by shore protection in accordance with Chapter 7 of the Environmental Code.

The Administrative Procedure Act

Section 42

A person whom the decision concerns may appeal against it, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal.

The Administrative Procedure Act also gives provisions regarding who may appeal against decisions according to:

the Minerals Act (1991:45)
the Forestry Act (1979:429)
the Heritage Conservation Act (1988:950)
the Game Act (1987:259)
the Fishing Act (1993:787)
the Road Act (1971:948)
the Act on Construction of Railways (1995:1649)
the Electricity Act (1997:857)

Judicial Review of Certain Government Decisions Act

Section 1

An individual may apply for judicial review of such decisions by the Government which include an examination of the civil rights or obligations of the individual within the meaning of Article 6 (1) of the European Convention of 4 November 1950 on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Section 2

An environmental organisation referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code may apply for judicial review of such permit decisions by the Government covered by Article 9 (2) of the Convention of 25 June 1998 on access to information, public participation in decision-making processes and access to judicial review in environmental matters.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

The main rule is that the language in courts and administrative authorities is Swedish, though there is a special regulation (Act 2009:724 on National Minorities and National Minority Languages) giving citizens in certain municipalities in the north of Sweden the right to speak i.a. Finnish or Sami in court.

The general rules on translation and interpretation in administrative authorities and courts are codified in the respective procedural rules.

According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 13, an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.

According to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 5, Section 6, for a party, witness or other person who is to be heard before the court and does not have mastery of Swedish, the court may employ an interpreter. If a suspect or a prosecutor in a criminal case does not have mastery of Swedish, an interpreter should be hired for a court hearing. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, this provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

If a party, witness or other person who is to be heard before the court does not speak Swedish, the court shall, if necessary, employ an interpreter. The court may also, in other instances where necessary, hire an interpreter or translate documents (according to Section 50 of the Administrative Court Procedure Act).

The court may, if necessary, according to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if this is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, this provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Both administrative authorities and all Swedish courts involved in environmental cases have extensive obligations to examine a case and ensure that it is examined to the extent needed, and, for this purpose, to ask the parties questions throughout the procedure. The Court may even carry out investigations at a location if it deems it necessary. New facts are thus added to the case throughout the procedure and the Court must also consider any additional facts provided by the Parties. There is thus no partial preclusion requirement. It should be noted that this does not apply in civil cases tried by the Land and Environment Courts.

As the ultimate responsibility to investigate the case according to the "ex officio principle" in the Environmental Code lies with the administration and the Land and Environment Courts, which both have technicians participating in the decision-making, there are no stipulations in Swedish law that an individual or an environmental NGO should have to present expert opinions, even if the proceedings are initiated by them. Accordingly, a Swedish administrative authority or court can never order an individual or an environmental NGO to produce such experts (although a court may require such an expert opinion from an applicant for a permit or an operator of an environmentally hazardous activity). Also, there are no requirements under Swedish law that individuals or environmental NGOs should have to present or bear the costs of experts or witnesses.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

The ex officio principle at both administrative and judicial levels means there are no limits to how and when new evidence can be introduced. Having said that, it is still primarily up to the party to be responsible for presenting the evidence. This can be done both at the very beginning of a case and later during the court procedure. Evidence may also be introduced in the next instance during an appeal. It should be noted that administrative cases are handled differently from civil cases, where the possibility to present new evidence is more restricted.

Written documents which are relied upon as evidence must be submitted to the court without delay. The same applies to items which are relied upon as evidence and can be moved to court. If necessary, the court may order the party which relied on the evidence to submit this within a specified time. Such an order must include information that the case may be decided even if the party has not provided the evidence. At a hearing, witness hearings may be held.

The testimony may be required to be given under oath.

Any party may present experts to strengthen their legal action. Any party may also ask the court to call for expert witnesses, such as experts from environmental authorities.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.

In administrative cases, the court often at its own initiative refers a case or specified questions to authorities, e.g. national authorities, with expert knowledge within certain fields. This is also practised at appeal level.

Any party may present experts to strengthen their legal action. Any party may also ask the court to call for expert witnesses, such as experts from environmental authorities.
It is very common for an applicant for a permit to present multiple experts to speak on their behalf. There may also be situations where it is of great advantage, albeit not essential, for individuals and environmental NGOs to be able to present experts of their own or expert reports to prove the veracity of their claim. Mostly such reports are made by experts working within the NGOs themselves and consequently they are mostly free of charge. Another way to obtain expert reports is to resort to independent researchers from universities or to other outside experts who may offer to make such a report for free or for travel expenses and, if needed, compensation for accommodation. Sometimes, though, if the case concerns a very large and/or complicated issue, the environmental NGOs pay to engage an outside expert. There are no publicly available lists and registries of experts.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

Expert opinions are not binding on the judges and can be disregarded.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

According to Chapter 22 Section 12 of the Environmental Code, the Land and Environment Court, where a special investigation or valuation is necessary for assessment of the case, may appoint one or more experts to deliver an opinion in the case after carrying out a preliminary investigation. Such an investigation shall be carried out as soon as possible. If it is necessary in view of the nature of the case or the purpose of the investigation, the court shall notify the parties by suitable means of the time when the investigation will take place. This possibility is available when the court is trying first instance permit cases. It is not a general option for environmental cases. However, the rule is also applicable when the Land and Environment Court of Appeal tries cases which are appealed.

If a case concerns an activity or a measure that affects the aquatic environment, the court shall obtain an opinion from the County Administrative Board that is the relevant water authority if the investigation in the case gives reason to assume that any factor of importance for the environmental quality standard does not conform to the basis for such a standard and the non-compliance is relevant to the ability to determine reasonable and appropriate environmental conditions.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

An appeal shall include the grounds of appeal and in what respect the reasons for the decision are, in the appellant's view, incorrect, and the evidence relied on and what is to be proved by each specific piece of evidence. This may include expert opinions if the party so wishes.

In civil cases, the plaintiff has to present the claims, causes of action and evidence that is invoked. This may be completed later on during the process. Experts called upon by parties are regarded during the process as witnesses and not as experts called upon by the court.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

There are no procedural fees in relation to expert opinions and expert witnesses.

In administrative cases, the court will cover costs for witnesses called by the court. Experts assisting a party, though, are in principle not regarded as witnesses. The party invoking an expert opinion has to do so at its own expense, and its costs will not be compensated or covered by the opposite party even if the former party wins the process.

In civil cases, the costs will initially be covered by the party that has invoked the witness/expert. In the end, the loser pays principle will apply in civil cases.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participant to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Anyone who is a party in an environmental case may use a legal representative or assistant. This person must be suitable for the assignment, but does not have to be a lawyer. Swedish environmental legislation does not, however, require legal representation, neither for the administrative nor the judicial review procedure, and not even for appeals to the Environment Court of Appeal or to the Supreme Court.

Most of the environmental NGOs which operate at national level (e.g. Greenpeace Sweden, the Swedish Carnivore Association, SOF-Birdlife, the Swedish Botanical Society, and others) and local level have no legal representatives employed. The biggest environmental NGO in Sweden, the Swedish Society for Nature Conservation, is the only Swedish environmental NGO which currently has three employed legal advisors.

There are no publicly accessible internet links to a registry or website of all specialised lawyers in the environmental field. However, the Swedish Bar Association has a search function on its website. Lawyers who are not members of the Association are naturally not included.

1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is no organised pro bono assistance available.

There are only a few law firms engaged in representing the public concerned in environmental cases. Furthermore, there are practically no public interest lawyers or law clinics dealing with environmental cases in Sweden.

Officers are free to set their own fees, but there are no legal limitations for lawyers to take on this kind of pro bono work.

In civil cases, property cases and applications for permits for water operations the court may, if it considers the fees to be unreasonable, reduce the compensation for litigation costs either at the request of the losing party or on its own initiative. In other administrative cases, each party has to cover its own costs, irrespective of the outcome, and the court will not intervene regarding costs.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

No expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts exist.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The list below is not exhaustive. In alphabetical order:

- Birdlife Sweden
- Climate Action
- Greenpeace Sweden
- Norduv
- Protect the Forest
- Swedish Botanical Society

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member Stat

- Swedish Outdoor Association
- Association for Protection of the Swedish Landscape
- River Rescuers
- Swedish Carnivore Association (SCA)
- Swedish Society for Nature Conservation
- Urbergsgruppen
- WWF

4) List of international NGOs, who are active in the Member Stat
1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

As a general rule, for the administrative authorities and the administrative courts an appeal of a decision must have been received by the decision-making authority or administrative court within three weeks of the date on which the appellant received the decision through that authority. However, if the appellant is a party representing the public, the appeal must have been received within three weeks from the date of the decision being notified. The decision-making authority or administrative court then makes sure that the appeal was made within the right time limit and sends the appeal to the court or authority which will try the case.

When it comes to decisions and judgments from the Land and Environment Courts, with the exception of preliminary decisions during the preparation of the case the time for appeal is linked to the date of the ruling.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

There are no clear provisions protecting the interest of the public concerned to have their cases handled in a timely manner by an administrative organ, except for a very general statement in the Administrative Procedure Act: a case must be handled as simply, quickly and cost-effectively as possible without compromising the rule of law. However, if an authority assesses that the decision in a case initiated by an individual party will be materially delayed, the authority shall inform the party thereof. In such a notification, the authority shall provide the reason for the delay. If a case initiated by an individual party has not been settled in the first instance within six months, the party may request in writing that the authority shall decide the case. The Authority shall, within four weeks from the date of such a request, either decide the matter or, in a special decision, reject the request. Such a decision to reject a request that the case be decided may be appealed to the court or administrative authority competent to review an appeal against the decision in the case.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing, dispensation exemptions or injunctions are as follows:

- Local municipality – County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)[1].
- County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed).
- Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

Many environmental cases start at the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, which means that the decisions may be challenged directly to court.

The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. The Government also tries certain appeals according to the Code and sectoral legislation, such as the Minerals Act. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

There are no set rules for the national courts to deliver judgments.

In first instance permit cases at the Land and Environment Courts, the Environmental Code provides that the Land and Environment Court shall deliver the judgment as soon as possible in view of the nature of the case and other circumstances (Chapter 22, Section 21 of the Environmental Code). This also applies when the Land and Environment Court of Appeal tries a case. If a main hearing has been held, a judgment shall be delivered within two months of the conclusion thereof, unless exceptional circumstances exist.

In other administrative cases there are no such rules. In civil cases, the general rule is that the judgment should be delivered within 14 days from the main hearing. It should be noted that, according to the Priority Review Act, a party may ask for priority of a case handled at a court.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

There are no fixed legal time limits applicable during the procedure. The administrative organ or the court trying a case decides on a case to case basis the time limits and deadlines for submitting evidence, opinions and other material needed.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgements

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Under Swedish law, appeals have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law. Normally a decision according to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act can only be executed when the decision can no longer be contested through a legal remedy. There are some exceptions to the rule according to special legislation, such as protective hunting according to the Game Act and exploration permits according to the Minerals Act.

Normally a permit according to the Environmental Code cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicant to start their activity. As with permits, orders from a supervisory authority do not take legal effect until they are finally decided on appeal. If there is an urgent need, the authority can decide that the order shall take effect even if it is appealed.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

As long as the matter has not been delivered to the superior authority, the first deciding authority may revise and stop an execution of its own decision, if this is not to the detriment of a private opposing party.

If a go-ahead decision has been granted or the case concerns a decision where the rule on an appeal’s suspensive effect is not applicable, the public concerned can ask the authority for an injunction of that decision. According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 48, an authority trying an appeal may decide on injunctive relief.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

A request for injunctive relief may be made at any time during the procedure, but is normally made at the same time as the appeal itself. Such a request may also be repeated if not successful.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Under Swedish law, appeals have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law. Normally a decision according to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act can only be executed when the decision can no longer be contested through a legal remedy. In those cases where this does not apply, the Environmental Code, as well as the Planning and Building Act, gives the supervisory authority the possibility, if urgent, to decide that a prohibition or an order shall be immediately binding.

There are some exceptions to the rule according to special legislation, such as protective hunting according to the Game Act and exploration permits according to the Minerals Act.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Appeals normally have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law.

During the court procedure, the court, if requested by one of the parties, can decide on interim measures either to allow or restrict an activity.

****

Normalt kan ett tillstånd enligt miljöbalken således inte användas förrän det vunnit laga kraft. Tillståndsbeslut kan dock kombineras med ett verkställighetsförordnande som gör det möjligt för den sökande att starta sin verksamhet trots att tillståndet överklagas. Liksom vad som gäller för tillstånd får ett föreliggande från en tillsynsmyndighet inte rättssig verkan förrän det vunnit laga kraft. Om det finns ett brädskande behov kan myndigheten dock besluta att beslutet ska träda i kraft genast.

---

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

If a go-ahead decision has been granted or the case concerns a decision where the rule on an appeal’s suspensive effect is not applicable, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision. This may be done during the whole procedure but is normally done at the same time as the appeal itself.

According to the Court Matters Act, a court that is to hear an appeal may decide that the appealed decision may not be enforced for the time being. The legal provision on such “inhibition” is rather vague; the details are found in case law. According to the Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, inhibition shall be granted when the prospects for the success of the appeal are good. An inhibition may also be granted if the appellant has a legitimate interest in having the decision scrutinised by the court or there are vital interests at stake, for example the risk of irrevocable damage. There are no requirements, or legal possibilities, to ask the claimant for a financial deposit. There is, however, one exception. If the applicant for a permit for a water operation asks for a decision on an immediate enforceable permit, they must pay a financial deposit.

1.7.3. Costs – Legal aids – Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

The rules on costs for trials concerning environmental matters are provided in Chapter 25 of the Environmental Code.

As a general rule, the procedures related to administrative environmental matters in Sweden are free of charge. There are no application or court fees, no obligation to pay the opponent’s costs, no bonds to be paid for obtaining injunctive relief or other costs to be covered, irrespective of whether the case is subject to an administrative or a judicial review procedure.

For as experts’, and lawyers’ fees, these have to be calculated on a case by case basis after contact with them.

Each party has to cover its own costs in administrative cases.

The loser pays principle is not applicable as in civil cases. In civil cases, there is also a court fee for the plaintiff, around 300 euros.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

Injunctive relief and interim measures are free of charge.

If, however, the applicant for a permit for a water operation asks for a decision on an immediate enforceable permit, they must provide a financial deposit.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Considering that the procedures related to environmental cases in Sweden are free of charge, there is little legal aid available. According to the Legal Aid Act (1996:1619), an appellant may, under certain conditions, get legal aid and certain costs associated with the process paid. The act, however, due to the official principle, has very little significance in cases that are appealed to the Land and Environment Courts. One of the criteria for being awarded legal aid is that the appellant needs legal assistance in addition to advice and that this need cannot be met in any other way. Because of these criteria, there is almost no possibility for individuals to obtain legal aid in environmental cases.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Environmental NGOs or other legal persons may never obtain legal aid according to the Swedish Legal Aid Act.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

Some of the national authorities provide grants for environmental NGOs which they can use at their own discretion. Most importantly, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency each year distributes funds to organisations to be used for taking legal action in order to develop case law in the environmental area. Furthermore, the Swedish Transport Administration and the Swedish Consumer Agency provide grants to NGOs to increase public influence in different decision-making processes in the environmental field.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The majority of environmental disputes are pursued through cost-free administrative procedures where the appellate levels have an obligation to ex officio examine the case.

The loser party pays principle does normally not apply. Each party only has to bear its own costs, but Swedish environmental legislation does not require legal representation, neither for the administrative nor the judicial review procedure, and not even for appeals to the Land and Environmental Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court. The only exception to the general rule of a free environmental procedure is found in the permitting procedure for water operations.

The applicant here has to pay the litigation costs of all those who will be affected by the activity. This circle of people, however, is narrower than the public concerned and consists of those whose real estate will be affected by the activity, for example by flooding, loss of fishing water and so on.

In civil cases concerning economic damages, the general rules on legal procedure apply, which means that the losing party has to pay all the winning party’s legal costs; the loser party pays principle in full. Civil cases in environmental matters in Sweden are quite rare. Many civil cases relate to intrusion in the landowner’s rights, e.g. to establish a nature reserve, and in such cases the main rule is that the landowner will have their costs covered irrespective of the outcome.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

Since no such costs exist in administrative environmental cases, there is no need for rules on exemptions.

In civil cases, the loser pays principle is not absolute, as the rules give the court space to consider facts related to how the process was pursued, if there were reasons for initial claims due to the action of the opposing party etc., and cases where restrictions are imposed on how the landowner may use the land or the land is expropriated for public interests.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice – provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

The right for individuals and NGOs to challenge environmental decisions, acts and omissions is mainly found in three different Swedish laws: the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act. Generally they state that individuals must be concerned and NGOs must fulfill the requirements set out in the Code in order to have standing.
There is no structured dissemination on where to find the rules on access to justice available in Sweden. However, rudimentary information may be found on the websites of some of the main authorities for the protection of the environment, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency and the National Board of Housing, Building and Planning. Some general information on access to justice can also be found on the website of the Swedish Courts.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

During the preparation of a matter at an authority or a case at a court, the main rule is that documents are open to the public. The registries where the respective instance is obliged to register all incoming documents in the particular case are also open. Certain information can be kept secret according to provisions in the Public Access to Information and Secrecy Act. For the parties in a case or a matter before an authority, the space to keep document secrets is very restricted.

In permit cases related to water operations and environmentally harmful operations, the Land and Environment Courts and the County Administrative Boards appoint a person or authority to keep a copy of all documents for the public to access instead of visiting the court or the County Administrative Board, also for such applications that do not need an EIA. This is of particular importance if the proposed activity is located far from the court or the County Administrative Board.

As a general rule, judgments and decisions in cases before courts and authorities must be documented in writing. In addition, there are provisions for judgments to be kept available at the court's office and at the custodian, when notified.

To a large extent, judgments are promulgated in the press and on the website of the court taking the decision in application cases. This applies equally to the County Administrative Boards’ decisions and other authorities.

The Ordinance (2003:234) on the Time for the Provision of Judgments and Decisions contains provisions on the time for delivery of documents, on how documents are to be provided and on information for individuals also. A judgment or decision in a case before a public court shall be sent to the parties on the day of the decision.

The Swedish public principle also means that anyone has the opportunity to read the decision text. Also, in the Administrative Procedure Act and the Code of Judicial Procedure there are provisions on the issuing of judgments and decisions. Provisions in the Environmental Code, the Judicial Code, the Administrative Procedure Act, the Law on Judicial Matters and the Administrative Procedure Act further regulate what a judgment or decision should contain. Every appealable decision and judgement must be accompanied by information on access to justice information.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

The same rules on access to information on access to justice apply regardless of whether the case concerns an administrative environmental case or a civil case according to the Environmental Code, or a case on planning according to the Planning and Building Act.

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding on the public, only indicative or binding on authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. Thus, there are no rules on access to information on access to justice for these kinds of plans and programmes.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

It is mandatory for authorities giving an administrative decision and courts to provide access to justice information in the decision and/or judgment.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

There is no structured dissemination on where to find the rules on access to justice available in Sweden, neither in Swedish nor in any other language. However, rudimentary information may be found on the websites of some of the main authorities for the protection of the environment, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency, and the National Board of Housing, Building and Planning. Some general information on access to justice can also be found on the website of the Swedish Courts. This information may be found in English.

For individuals involved in an ongoing case, the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 13, states that an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.

The court may, if necessary, according to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if this is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, that provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Activities subject to the EIA requirements of the EIA Directive are subject to regulation regarding environmental impact assessments, permits etc. according to the Environmental Code or other specific legislation. Among other things, the application for a permit must include an EIA and a technical description of the planned activity or operation.

Provisions regulating when an EIA is required and what information it must contain are set out in Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code and in an underlying ordinance. Neither the Planning and Building Act nor sectoral environmental legislation have specific rules on the procedure or the content of the EIA, but refer to the rules of the Code.

An EIA must be prepared before the application for a permit is made and should be submitted as a supplement to the application. When preparing the permit application and the EIA, the applicant is obliged to consult the County Administrative Board, the supervisory authority and the private individuals likely to be particularly affected by the activity. For activities which typically have a significant environmental impact, the applicant is also obliged to consult central government agencies and the municipality, the public and the organisations that are likely to be affected by the activity. Prior to the consultation, the applicant should provide information about the activity with regard to location, scope, design and possible environmental impacts.

Furthermore, there are mandatory provisions concerning the minimum details that an EIA must contain. Upon receiving the EIA, the permitting authority is obliged to publicly announce the EIA and make it available to the general public, who should be given the opportunity to comment on it.

Not all activities that are within the scope of the EIA Directive fall within the scope of environmentally hazardous activities under the Environmental Code. Some activities that require environmental impact assessment under the Directive (building of industrial areas, shopping malls, parking spaces, subways or tramways, tourist attractions such as ski slopes and lifts, marinas for leisure boats, holiday villages, hotel complexes, camping sites and theme parks) are therefore dealt with under the Planning and Building Act. The environmental impact assessment required under the Directive for the above-mentioned activities is carried out under the Planning and Building Act within the framework of decisions on detailed urban development plans. It is proposed that from 1 July 2021 certain steps related to the EIA will also be conducted in a subsequent building permits procedure, however this is not related to the regulation of the EIA Directive.
In Sweden, the EIA is thus an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. The EIA shall be approved only if the direct and indirect impacts of the planned activity are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and if approved this will be noted in the decision concerning the permit.

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

Rules on standing are generally that individuals must be concerned and NGOs must fulfill the requirements set out in the Environmental Code.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

Rules on standing are generally that individuals must be concerned and NGOs must fulfill the requirements set out in the Environmental Code.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

The final decision on authorisation and, if any, preliminary decisions, e.g. on permissibility or the start of construction works, may be appealed following the general rules, that is three weeks from delivering the decision or three weeks after receiving the decision if from the County Administrative Board.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the environmental permit as such according to the Environmental Code. Decision of the County Administrative Boards may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed). Decisions of the Land and Environment Court may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) and to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. The Government also tries certain appeals according to the Code and sectoral legislation, such as the Minerals Act. Decisions by the Government, including EIA, cannot be appealed, but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

Permit judgments and decisions, including the EIA, may be appealed by anyone who is the subject of a decision according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code. Permit judgments and decisions may also be appealed by environmental NGOs according to Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Code. No foreign NGO can appeal, since there is a requirement that the organisation has to have been operating in Sweden for at least three years. The provision referred to may be regarded as discriminatory and would probably be set aside in court. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that it had not showed that it had the support of the public. In principle, the organisation’s reference to the Polish public seems to have been accepted.

Decisions on urban detailed development plans, both those subject to an EIA and those not, are adopted by the municipality according to the Planning and Building Act and may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. The Land and Environment Court of Appeal may allow appeal of its ruling to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

As regards appeals of decisions on urban detailed development plans, persons with the right to appeal are those whom the decision concerns, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal (Chapter 13 Section 8 of the Planning and Building Act). NGOs which meet the requirements in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code also have legal standing according to the Planning and Building Act. A party challenging such a decision must also have made statements against the plan and/or EIA for the plan during the public consultation stage, otherwise the challenge would be precluded (Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act).

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.

When a decision on an urban detailed development plan which includes an EIA is appealed to the court and the court finds that the decision contains substantive or procedural infringements, the court repeats the decision on the adoption of the plan. It should be noted that the court does not have the right to change the detailed development plan. The scope for the court in these cases is more narrow, similar to a legal review and in principle restricted to the causes of action invoked by the party. This is regulated in Chapter 13 Section 17 of the Planning and Building Act.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

No matter who makes the decisions concerning activities under the EIA Directive, the County Administrative Board or the Land and Environment Court when it comes to permits according to the Environmental Code, or the municipality when it comes to certain plans according to the Planning and Building Act, an appeal may be filed directly with the court of appeal according to the route of appeal described above.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed plan which includes an EIA according to the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person or NGO may only appeal a decision on an urban detailed development plan if they submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered.
9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings.
Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no clear provisions protecting the interest of the public concerned to have their cases handled in a timely manner by an administrative organ, except for a very general statement in the Administrative Procedure Act that a case must be handled as simply, quickly and cost-effectively as possible without compromising the rule of law. However, if an authority assesses that the decision in a case initiated by an individual party will be materially delayed, the authority shall inform the party thereof. In such a notification, the authority shall report the reason for the delay. If a case initiated by an individual party has not been settled in the first instance within six months, the party may request in writing that the authority shall decide the case. The Authority shall, within four weeks from the date of such a request, either decide the matter or, in a special decision, reject the request. Such a decision to reject a request that the case be decided may be appealed to the court or administrative authority competent to review an appeal against the decision in the case.
In court, a party may apply for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
Normally a permit or an urban development plan cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicant to start their activity. If a go-ahead decision has been granted, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision.

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
All activities subject to the requirements of the IPPC/Industrial Emissions Directive require a permit according to the Environmental Code. Before such a permit can be issued, an EIA must be performed.
The rules under the Environmental Code on access to justice are general, and thus also to apply to these cases.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
There are provisions in the Environmental Code that make it possible to appeal the final decisions and judgments on permits. Both individuals and environmental NGOs can appeal environmental decisions, but this right is limited in some cases. Preliminary decisions, e.g. regarding permissibility or construction works, taken during the preparation of the case may also be challenged.
According to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code, appeals may be made against appealable judgments or decisions by any person who is the subject of a judgment or decision against them.

NGOs which meet the requirements stipulated in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code may challenge many administrative decisions. The requirements are that the NGO is a non-profit association whose purpose according to its statutes is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests. The association furthermore must have conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years and have at least 100 members or by some other means show that its activities are supported by the public. In respect of shore protection, the provisions also apply to non-profit associations whose purpose according to their statutes is to promote outdoor interests (Chapter 16 Section 14 of the Code).

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
In Sweden, the EIA is an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. Because of the Swedish system, the EIA is carried out together with the IED/IPPC process, which means that no part, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, can be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
In Sweden, the EIA is an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. Because of the Swedish system, the EIA is carried out together with the IED/IPPC process, which means that no part, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, can be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
The permit can be appealed. Preliminary decisions, e.g. regarding permissibility or construction works, taken during the preparation of case may also be challenged.
The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing are as follows:
County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)
Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed)
The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities such, as facilities for nuclear operations. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

As a general rule, an appeal of a decision must have been received by the decision-making authority within three weeks of the date on which the appellant received the decision through that authority. However, if the appellant is a party representing the public, the appeal must have been received within three weeks from the date of the decision being notified. The time limit regarding judgments from the Land and Environment Courts follows the general rule for district courts in civil cases, that is three weeks from the passing of the judgment. The decision-making authority or court then makes sure that the appeal was made within the right time limit and sends the appeal to the court or authority which will try the case.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
In order to challenge the final authorisation, you need to show that you are a party concerned according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code or an NGO which meets the requirements in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Code.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio princi". The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.
8) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Regardless of who makes the decisions, the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, an appeal may be filed directly with a court; the Land and Environment Court if the licensing authority is the County Administrative Board or the Land and Environment Court of Appeal if the permit is issued by the Land and Environment Court.

9) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

10) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings. Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party.

11) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation? There are no clear provisions protecting the interest of the public concerned to have their cases handled in a timely manner by an administrative organ, except for a very general statement in the Administrative Procedure Act that a case must be handled as simply, quickly and cost-effectively as possible without compromising the rule of law. However, if an authority assesses that the decision in a case initiated by an individual party will be materially delayed, the authority shall inform the party thereof. In such a notification, the authority shall report the reason for the delay. If a case initiated by an individual party has not been settled in the first instance within six months, the party may request in writing that the authority shall decide the case. The Authority shall, within four weeks from the date of such a request, either decide the matter or, in a special decision, reject the request. Such a decision to reject a request that the case be decided may be appealed to the court or administrative authority competent to review an appeal against the decision in the case. In court, a party may apply for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.

12) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible if this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions? Normally a permit cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a "go-ahead decision" enabling the applicant to start their activity. If a go-ahead decision has been granted, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision.

13) Is there a time limit for an application to be accepted? There is no structured dissemination on where to find the rules on access to justice available in Sweden. Every party in an ongoing process will be sent the decision or judgment by mail and/or email. This applies to all environmental cases according to the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act and the sectoral legislation. It is mandatory for authorities giving an administrative decision and courts to provide access to justice information in the decision and/or judgment.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD? Anyone, both individuals and NGOs, may request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD from certain supervisory authorities whose authority and responsibility are set out in the Environmental Code and in an ordinance issued under the Environmental Code.

A decision by a supervisory authority not to intervene or to take measures perceived as too lean, in these cases mostly the County Administrative Boards, can be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) even if it states that the authority will take no action. The same rules on standing apply as for permits according to the Environmental Code (Chapter 16 Sections 12 and 13); individuals have to be concerned and NGOs must meet the requirements of the law. In certain cases, though, the supervisory authority is the municipality. If the decision is taken by a local authority, appeal must first be made to the County Administrative Board before it may be challenged at court.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals? A request for action from a supervisory authority can be made at any time. A decision from the authority may be appealed within three weeks from the decision received by the party. Judgments from the Land and Environment Court must be appealed within three weeks from when they are passed.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones? A request may be delivered anonymously and the authority is still obliged to start an investigation to see whether there is any substance in the submission. According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 19, an individual can initiate a case with an authority through an application, notification or other petition. The petition should state what the case is about and what the individual wants the authority to do. It should also be clear which circumstances are the basis of the individual's request, if this is not obviously unnecessary. An individual party initiating a case shall participate by submitting, as far as possible, the investigation that the party wishes to invoke in support of its request. However, there are no rules on the need for such a request to be accompanied by scientific underpinning or data, but of course it makes the case stronger if such data is available. If a request is incomplete or unclear, the authority shall primarily assist the individual in rectifying their request. If necessary, the authority shall work to make the party clarify or supplement the request. An authority must always ensure that a case is investigated to the extent required by its nature.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding "plausibility" for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones? There are no specific requirements regarding plausibility for showing that environmental damage occurred.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)? After receiving a request for action and after investigating the case, the supervisory authority has to make a decision on how to proceed. According to Section 9 of the Administrative Procedure Act, each matter shall be handled as simply, rapidly and economically as is possible without jeopardising legal security. The decision must be made in writing.

According to Section 33 of the same act, an authority that announces a decision in a case shall, as soon as possible, notify the party of the complete content of the decision, unless this is clearly unnecessary. If the party is entitled to appeal the decision, they must also be informed of the procedure. The authority decides how the notification is to be made; however, a notification must always be in writing if a party so requests.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage? There is no need for such an extension of entitlement.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS? With some exceptions, the operative supervisory actions, such as enforcement, are carried out at regional or local level by the County Administrative Boards or the municipalities. The County Administrative Boards are generally responsible for the supervision of larger activities and compliance with legislation based on EU directives. The duties of the County Administrative Board can be transferred to the municipality according to a special procedure. In turn, the municipality is assigned general supervisory responsibility for all other environmentally hazardous activities within the municipality. In addition, there are twelve central government agencies, including the Swedish EPA, which are assigned operative supervision responsibilities within specific fields, such as forestry or agriculture. When it comes to liability according to Article 12 of the ELD, the County Administrative Boards are the supervisory authorities.

To ensure compliance with the Code and legislation issued under the Code, the supervisory authority may issue an injunction. Such injunctions may differ depending on the activity concerned and the actions needed. Should a permit holder disregard a condition set out in the permit, or otherwise breach environmental legislation, the supervisory authority may order them to rectify the matter, or start a procedure to revoke or restrict the scope of the permit. Injunctions can also include an order to cease operations or to prohibit an operator from starting a specific operation. To ensure compliance with an injunction, the supervisory authority may also impose conditional fines. Should the operator fail to observe the injunction, the supervisory authority may turn to the Land and Environment Court for a ruling on the fines, which will then be subject to enforcement.

6) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
A decision by a municipality must undergo administrative appeal at the County Administrative Board prior to a possibility to have it tried in court. A decision by a County Administrative Board can be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) even if it states that the authority will take no action. The same rules on standing apply as for permits according to the Environmental Code (Chapter 16 Sections 12 and 13).

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code and the Ordinance on Environmental Assessments include regulation on involving other countries in the EIA process. If a harmful activity or measure is likely to have a significant environmental impact in another country, or if a country that may be significantly affected by the activity or the measure so requests, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall:
inform the competent authority of the other country about the activity or measure, its possible cross-border consequences and the type of decision that may be made; and give the competent authority of the other country reasonable time to comment on whether it wants to participate in the environmental assessment. If the other country wishes to participate in the environmental assessment, the Agency shall give the other country the opportunity to participate in a consultation process on the environmental impact assessment and the final permit application.

2) Notion of public concerned?
When consultations are to take place with another country according to Chapter 6 Section 13 or 33 of the Environmental Code, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall agree with the responsible authority in that country on how the consultation is to be carried out so that the authorities and the public concerned in the other country are given the opportunity to submit comments within a reasonable time, which should be at least 30 days. For the purpose of completing consultations with other countries, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency may announce information in Sweden, in another country in the European Union and in another country that is a party under the Espoo Convention on Environmental Impact Assessments in a Transboundary Context. Before an announcement is made in another country, the Agency must consult that country's responsible authority.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
When it comes to participating during consultation with other countries, foreign NGOs are part of the public concern.

The general rule on standing for NGOs can be found in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code. This rule, however, excludes foreign NGOs, since it clearly states that an NGO needs to have been operating in Sweden for at least three years. Due to the 1974 Nordic Environmental Protection Convention, special legislation exists, however, on non-discrimination of Nordic environmental NGOs. As the current Swedish legislation does not provide standing for foreign NGOs, there are no specific procedural rules on when to appeal, procedural assistance etc.

In the EU context, the current Swedish provision is to be regarded as discriminatory. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a challenge from a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that the organisation had not shown that it had support by the public. The judgment with reasoning regarding the support by the public in Poland indicates that a court would set aside the current provision and not dismiss a foreign NGO on the ground that it has not been operating in Sweden. The problem has been discussed in Governmental bill regarding EIAs, and the provision has been found discriminatory and thus should be altered, but so far nothing has happened.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
If an individual living in another country can show that they are a person whom the judgment or decision concerns and that the decision affects them adversely according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code or Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act, they have the same rights as an individual living in Sweden, including the right to injunctive relief where such is possible.

As for legal aid and pro bono help, there is no such help available for any party in environmental matters. The general rules will apply and are motivated by the ex officio principle for the decision-maker to examine the case.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
If a harmful activity or measure can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact in another country, or if a country that may be significantly affected by the activity or action so requests, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall inform the other country of the activity or measure. If the other country wishes to participate in the environmental assessment, the Agency shall give the other country the opportunity to participate in a consultation process on the environmental impact assessment and the final permit application.

When consultations are to take place with another country, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall agree with the responsible authority in that country on how the consultation is to be carried out so that the authorities and the public concerned in the other country are given the opportunity to submit comments within a reasonable time, which should be at least 30 days.

A decision may be appealed within three weeks from when the decision or judgement is made.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
Section 33 of the Administrative Procedure Act stipulates that an authority that announces a decision in a case shall, as soon as possible, notify the party of the complete content of the decision, unless this is clearly unnecessary. If the party is entitled to appeal the decision, they must also be informed of the procedure. The authority shall at the same time inform the party of dissenting opinions that have been recorded in accordance with section 30 or in accordance with special provisions in another constitution. A notice of how to appeal must contain information about what requirements are placed on the form and content of the appeal and what applies in terms of filing and appeal time.

A similar rule can be found in Section 30 of the Court Matters Act. In cases where a decision can be appealed, the parties shall be informed of this. If the decision means that the case has been decided, the parties shall be informed of what they must observe in an appeal. If the case has not been decided, the parties shall be informed that they may, on request, obtain such information from the court. If leave to appeal is required on appeal, the parties shall also be informed of this and of the grounds on which such leave may be granted.

6) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 3, an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.

The court may, if necessary, according to Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if it is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance.

According to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, that provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the land and environment courts.

---

[1] There are some exceptions to this main rule: Decisions on environmental sanction fees and on legally binding land use plans are challenged directly to the Land and Environment Court and not via the County Administrative Board.

Last update: 30/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.
Decisions on protective hunting are, if the requirements based on the Habitats Directive and on the Bird Directive are met, taken by the County Administrative Boards according to the Game Act and the Game Ordinance. The decision can be appealed to the Administrative Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court. Rules on standing can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act. A person whom the decision concerns may appeal against it, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal. According to established case law, environmental NGOs also have the right to appeal decisions under the Game Ordinance on hunting of species protected by the Habitats Directive and the Bird Directive.

In order to start a mine in Sweden, three different permits are needed. An exploration permit gives access to the land and an exclusive right to explore within the permit area, while an exploitation concession gives the holder the right to exploit a proven, extractable mineral deposit for a period of 25 years according to the Minerals Act. A permit according to the Environmental Code is also needed. Exploration for minerals may affect water quality and nature. However, the rules on standing when it comes to exploration permits are limited through case law. The general rule for individuals can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act. In case law, the Administrative Court of Appeal has ruled that only those who own the land where the exploration will take place and others with special rights, such as land tenants and holders of hunting and fishing rights, in the same area have standing. NGOs have no standing and cannot appeal an exploration permit, not even if the exploration affects nature or water. When it comes to permits according to the Environmental Code, the ordinary rules in Chapter 16 Sections 12, 13 and 14 apply.

Chapter 16 Section 13 stipulates that an NGO must have been conducting activities in Sweden for three years in order to have legal standing. This requirement of a three-year period of conducting activities in Sweden appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention and general EU principles of non-discrimination. This restriction means that no environmental organisations from other EU Member States may have standing before the Swedish courts.

There may be industrial emission activities that affect the environment in other Member States, but environmental organisations from these other Member States would not be able to bring a case regarding these activities in Sweden. (There is an Environmental Protection Convention between Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, which at least ensures that environmental organisations from these countries will have standing before Swedish courts). In the EU context, the current Swedish provision is to be regarded as discriminatory. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a challenge from a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that the organisation had not showed that it had support by the public. The judgment with reasoning regarding the support by the public in Poland indicates that a court would set aside the current provision and not dismiss a foreign NGO on the grounds that it has not been operating in Sweden. The problem has been discussed in a Governmental bill regarding EIAs, and the provision has been found discriminatory and thus should be altered, but so far nothing has happened.

The Planning and Building Act refers to the general rules in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act and, by reference to the rules in Chapter 16 Sections 13 and 14, NGOs have been given the right to standing, but in principle only in cases regarding detailed municipal land use plans. The narrow scope, though, has been expanded through recent case law from the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court. According to Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. Hence, the right to appeal for persons concerned and NGOs is, when it comes to urban detailed development plans, limited to those who have submitted their opinions on the matter during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered. This rule appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Regardless of who makes the decisions, the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, an appeal may be filed directly with a court; the Land and Environment Court if the licensing authority is the County Administrative Board, or the Land and Environment Court of Appeal if the permit is issued by the Land and Environment Court. If the first decision is taken by a local authority, with few exceptions an appeal must first be made through administrative appeal at the County Administrative Board prior to challenging the decision at court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgment on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

An exception to this general rule is decisions of a municipality regarding detailed development plans under the Planning and Building Act. To challenge such decisions, the appellant must have raised the objections during the preparatory procedure in the consultation phase.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

No grounds or arguments are precluded from the judicial review phase.

The absence of litigation costs in administrative cases means that each party has to cover its own costs. This may result in an unequal situation, but this is intended to be regulated by the ex officio principle and the burden on the court to investigate the case, not just to clarify foggy parts.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings. Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party. The absence of litigation costs in administrative cases means that each party has to cover its own costs. This may result in an unequal situation, but this is intended to be regulated by the ex officio principle and the burden on the court to investigate the case, not just to clarify foggy parts.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

In the Swedish judicial system, there are no binding time limits within which a court must handle a case. Sweden has incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into Swedish law through the Act on the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Article 6(1) of the ECHR states that everyone shall have the right to ‘a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law’. There is a possibility for a party to ask for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.
8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Normally a permit or an exception cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Hence there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases. There is, though, a possibility to decide that such decisions, as well as decisions from the supervisory authority, shall be directly executable. If appealed, the higher instance (irrespective of whether this is a County Administrative Board or a court) can decide on injunctive relief following the general rules.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no costs for bringing a case to court according to these rules. Each party only has to bear its own costs, but the Swedish environmental legislation does not require legal representation, neither for the administrative procedure nor for the judicial review procedure, and not even for appeals to the Environmental Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court. The only exception to the general rule of a free environmental procedure is found in the permitting procedure for water operations. The applicant here has to pay the litigation costs of all those who will be affected by the activity.

In civil cases concerning damages, the general rules on legal procedure apply, which means that the losing party has to pay all the winning party’s legal costs; the loser party pays principle in full. In civil cases, the litigant has to pay a court fee, around 300 Euros. Because of this there is no need for rules to safeguard the cost being prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedure to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Chapter 6 Sections 3 to 19 of the Environmental Code sets out the rules for strategic environmental assessments for plans and programmes falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable to all plans and programmes drawn up for a number of sectors, setting out the framework for future authorisations for the projects listed in Annexes I and II to Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment, and all plans and programmes which have been deemed to require an assessment in accordance with the Habitat Directive.

In Sweden, the SEA is an intrinsic part of the planning procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the plan or programme. The SEA shall be approved only if the direct and indirect impacts of the plan or programme are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and, if approved, this will be noted in the decision concerning the plan or programme. Because of this system, the SEA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the plan as such.

Spatial planning

Sweden has no cross-sector planning for land on the national level; however, there is national-level maritime planning. By 2021 there will be three maritime spatial plans for separate geographical zones. National transportation infrastructure planning also affects the conditions of municipal and regional physical planning.

Like the national planning, the regional planning is relatively limited. The Planning and Building Act stipulates that the municipalities are responsible for the planning of the use of land and water within their geographical boundaries.

The municipality must have a current comprehensive plan that covers the entire area of the municipality. In this plan, the municipality shall present the basic characteristics of its intended use of land and water areas. The plan also has to indicate how the municipality intends to take into account national and regional goals, plans and programmes of significance for sustainable development within the municipality. The stipulations in a comprehensive plan are not legally binding. But if statements are clear and well developed, the practice of the courts show that these plans can have a strong guiding effect. If the land is unexploited, then an urban detailed development plan process generally needs to be initiated. A detailed development plan enables the municipality to regulate the use of land and water areas in a particular area and is regularly required for all operations listed in Annexes I and II of the EIA Directive and for all public and environmental private projects which have been deemed to require an assessment in accordance with the Habitat Directive. The detailed development plan regulates what are public spaces, development districts and water areas, and how they are to be used and designed. The stipulations in a detailed development plan are binding for adjudication of subsequent building permit applications.

According to the Planning and Building Act, Chapter 13, Section 1, a municipal decision on comprehensive plans may be appealed by any member of a municipality to the Administrative Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court within three weeks of the decision. In these cases, the administrative courts only try the legality of the municipality’s or region’s decision. There is no requirement to participate in the public participation stage of the administrative procedure. There is no cost involved in bringing a challenge of a comprehensive plan to court. Each party is only responsible for its own costs, even if it loses the case. The comprehensive plan does not enter into force until the possibility of appeal has passed. Hence there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases.

Municipal decisions on detailed development plans according to the Planning and Building Act, Chapter 13, Section 2, are appealed directly to one of the Land and Environment Courts and may be appealed further to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed). In its judgment, the Land and Environment Court of Appeal may decide to grant permission to appeal the judgment to the Supreme Court, if the decision is of interest as a precedent. The Supreme Court still decides on whether or not to grant leave to appeal.

The Planning and Building Act regulates the right for environmental NGOs referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13, of the Environmental Code to appeal a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan likely to have a significant environmental impact given that the planned area may be used for certain types of activity, and a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan that stipulates that an area will no longer be covered by shore protection. The right to standing for environmental organisations applies provided that decisions on the matter can be expected to have an adverse environmental effect.

For individuals, the general rule on standing in the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable. According to case law, an individual may usually appeal building permits and development plans which may affect them personally (they are neighbours or living within or directly adjacent to the area to which a municipal plan applies).

According to Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. Hence the right to appeal for the persons concerned is, when it comes to urban detailed development plans, limited to those who have submitted their opinions on the matter during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered. This rule appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Planning cases may only be challenged at court. There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even, on its own initiative, perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues.

The scope of the review in planning cases, however, is more restricted than in other administrative cases, and in principle just focuses on the issues raised by the appellant, Chapter 13 Section 17 of the Planning and Building Act.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The decisions on planning taken by the municipality according to the Planning and Building Act may be appealed directly to the Land and Environment Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and, finally, to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed) if the Land and Environment Court of Appeal provides for this in its judgment (when a precedence is desired).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan according to the Building and Planning Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority during the public consultation phase as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person may only appeal a decision on a detailed development plan if they have submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinion have not been considered.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The urban detailed development plan does not enter into force until the possibility of appeal has passed, so there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is no cost involved in bringing a challenge of a comprehensive or a detailed development plan to court. Each party is only responsible for its own costs, even if they lose the case. Because of this, there is no need for rules to safeguard against the cost being prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

An exception is municipal comprehensive and regional planning according to the Planning and Building Act, which may be challenged through legal review.

Any member of a municipality or region has the right to have the legality of the municipality's or region's decision on the plans reviewed by appealing the decision directly to the Administrative Court. The scope of the examination of the court is narrow and the “ex officio principle” does not apply. In examining the appeal, the court may not take into account circumstances other than those to which the appellant referred before expiry of the appeal period. An appealed decision shall be set aside if it has not come about legally; the decision concerns something that is not a matter for the municipality or the region; the body which took the decision did not have the right to do so; or the decision is otherwise contrary to law or other constitution. There are no requirements for participation in the public participation phase of the administrative procedure before filing a complaint to the court. There are no costs for bringing a case to court, not even if the case is lost.

The administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirement of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention are mainly found in Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code.

In Sweden, the consulting procedures are an intrinsic part of the planning procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the plan or programme. The plan or programme shall be approved only if the consultation has taken place and if the direct and indirect impacts of the plan or programme are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and, if approved, this will be noted in the decision concerning the plan or programme.

Because of this system, the procedure itself cannot be appealed separately. However, the procedural requirements and the information contained in a specific case can be challenged when appealing the plan or programme as such.

Chapter 6 of the Code includes regulation on screening, scoping and final authorisation of the plans and programmes relating to the environment, not only those falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable for all plans and programmes if the implementation of the plan, programme or change can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact. This includes action plans necessary to comply with an environmental quality standard, national and municipal waste plans, municipal comprehensive plans (covering the whole municipality), regional planning, municipal plans for supply, distribution and use of energy, regional plans for transport infrastructure, marine spatial planning, national plans for sustainable hydropower and any other plans or programmes relating to agriculture or forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, regional development, waste management, water management, telecommunications, tourism, spatial planning or land use.

The rules stipulate that the authority responsible for the plan or programme shall consult municipalities, County Administrative Boards and other authorities that, due to their special environmental responsibility, can be assumed to be affected by the plan or programme (Chapter 6, Sections 6 and 9). There are no rules stipulating the participation of the public concerned (neither individuals nor NGOs) when it comes to plans and programmes, only when it comes to environmentally hazardous activities. But nothing prevents an authority from consulting the public as well.

Chapter 6, Section 15, stipulates that the authority or municipality, as early as possible in the work on the proposal for a plan or programme, shall produce the environmental impact assessment and make it and the proposal available to the public and the municipalities and authorities that, due to their special environmental responsibility, can be assumed to be affected. They must be given information on how they can take part in the proposal and the
6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

4) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[4]

Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code includes regulation on screening, scoping and final authorisation of plans and programmes relating to the environment, not only those falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable for all plans and programmes if the implementation of the plan, programme or change can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact. This includes action plans necessary to comply with an environmental quality standard, national and municipal waste plans, municipal comprehensive plans, marine spatial planning, national plans for sustainable hydropower and any other plans or programmes relating to agriculture or forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, regional development, waste management, water management, telecommunications, tourism, spatial planning or land use.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

6) Are there any grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

8) How is the notion of “timely” Implemented by the national legislation?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or containing the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

EU legislation is implemented in Sweden through acts adopted by the Parliament (Riksdag) or by ordinances adopted by the Government. By statutory authorisation, many of the central administrative authorities are also responsible for issuing regulations within their field of operation.

The Government and other regulatory bodies regularly apply consultation procedure in connection with the preparation of rules that have general interest.

The Government will then appoint a commission of inquiry. After a commission of inquiry has submitted its report, the Government forwards it to relevant public agencies, organisations and municipalities in order to hear their opinions on the proposals. This is known as referral of a report for consideration.

Anyone, including private individuals, is entitled to submit comments to the Government. The Government can also adopt rules without having to present a proposal to the Riksdag first. Such rules are known as ordinances. The Instrument of Government sets out what must be decided by law and what can be decided in an ordinance.

There is no Constitutional Court in Sweden, nor any abstract norm control. Instead, when a court is dealing with a case, it is obliged to control the legal basis for the decision and must disregard any act or statute which is in conflict with the Constitution or superior norms. During an ongoing individual case there exists a right of judicial review, meaning that courts and other public bodies have the right to override laws that are contrary to the Constitution and thereby also contrary to EU law. The Swedish right of judicial review for courts is regulated in Chapter 11 Section 14 of the Instrument of Government for Government and in Chapter 12 Section 10 of the Instrument of Government for authorities.

Since there is a need for an individual case in order to also bring up questions on implementation of EU environmental legislation and other regulatory acts, the rules on standing are the same as in any other individual environmental case in Sweden. The main rules for individuals may be found in Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code and in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act, and the main rules for NGOs may be found in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code. When a case is open, the individual and NGO with standing may also argue that EU legislation has not been implemented correctly into Swedish law. It is also possible in an ongoing case for individuals and NGOs to bring a legal challenge before the court to ask for the possibility to get a preliminary ruling concerning the interpretation of EU legislation according to Article 267 TFEU.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material or procedural issues, but also issues such as whether EU legislation is implemented in a correct way. The Court is bound by the claims of the parties, though not the causes of action invoked, and can base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked by the parties.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Decisions made by the County Administrative Boards according to the Environmental Code and municipal decisions on planning according to the Planning and Building Act can be directly appealed to the Land and Environment Court. In principle, all other decisions from the municipality are appealed via the County Administrative Board prior to challenge in Court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation in the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed plan or area regulations according to the Building and Planning Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person may only appeal a decision on a detailed development plan if they have submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Normally a permit or plan cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicant to start their activity. If a go-ahead decision has been granted, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision.
Penalties for the de-facto contempt of the court, e.g. when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected

If the error is small, in view of all the circumstances, no penalty may be pronounced. Such disciplinary sanctions are a warning and a salary deduction.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

There are no costs for bringing a case to court according to these rules, not even if the case is lost. Because of this, there is no need for rules to safeguard against the cost being prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[6]

All parties in an ongoing case may petition that the court trying the case request a preliminary ruling from the EU Court. This may be done regardless of which court is reviewing the case. It is up to the court to decide whether a preliminary ruling is necessary.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Remedies against administrative passivity

For the purpose of overseeing compliance with the requirements set out in the Environmental Code and legislation issued under the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act, as well as the requirements set out in permits, the law contains provisions concerning supervision.

Both affected individuals and NGOs may at any time make a request to the supervisory authority to take actions against an activity. The supervisory authority is often, but not always, the County Administrative Board, but it may also be the local municipality or another government authority. If the supervision authority then chooses to do nothing, this decision may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. The courts can then, if they choose to rule in favour of the appellant, send the case back to the supervisory authority for them to act, or decide e.g. to issue an order on precautionary measures or to prohibit an activity.

Administrative passivity may also be addressed by the Parliamentary Ombudsman (JO) or the Chancellor of Justice (JK), which are both designated to ensure that public authorities and their staff comply with laws and other statutes. They have a disciplinary function and act through opinions and prosecution for administrative misconduct. The Chancellor of Justice may also regulate certain claims for damages directed against the State. The claims for damages that the JK handles are primarily those based on a state authority having made an incorrect decision.

The Chief Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Parliamentary Ombudsmen are required to supervise that those who exercise public authority obey the laws and other statutes and fulfil their obligations in other respects.

The Ombudsmen are required to ensure in particular that the courts and public authorities, in the course of their activities, obey the requirements of the Instrument of Government on objectivity and impartiality, and that the fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens are not encroached upon in public supervision. Supervision is exercised by the Ombudsmen in assessing complaints made by the public and by means of inspections and such other inquiries as the Ombudsmen may find necessary.

The Ombudsmen conclude cases with an adjudication which states an opinion as to whether a measure taken by an authority or an official is in breach of the law or some other statute or is otherwise erroneous or inappropriate. The Ombudsmen may also make statements intended to promote uniform and appropriate application of the law. In the role of extraordinary prosecutor, an Ombudsman may initiate legal proceedings against an official who, in disregarding the obligations of their office or commission, has committed a criminal offence. Cases can be pursued to the Supreme Court if there are exceptional grounds for doing so. Individual complaints should be made in writing. The written complaint should indicate the authority to which the complaint is addressed, or grant injunctive relief, and the institution is therefore not regarded as an effective remedy according to Article 9 of the Aarhus Convention. However, although the JO can only examine a case after it has been decided and their scrutiny is limited to the handling of the case, the opinions have great importance for the understanding of the concept of good governance.

Penalties when public administration fail to provide effective access to justice

Apart from the role of the Ombudsmen, Chapter 20 Section 1 of the Criminal Code (1962:700) states that anyone who intentionally, or through negligence in the exercise of authority, by act or omission, violates what is applicable for the task shall be sentenced to misconduct, a fine or imprisonment for a maximum of two years. If the act, with regard to the perpetrator's powers or the task's connection with the exercise of authority in general, or to other circumstances, is to be regarded as minor, the person shall not be held liable. For instance, municipal officials and politicians in municipal committees and boards are covered by the rules on misconduct in the exercise of their authority. On the other hand, members of state or municipal assemblies, i.e. members of the Riksdag and members of municipal and county council assemblies, are exempt from responsibility for measures they take in this capacity. A public prosecutor can decide to take the accused to District Court.

The Public Employment Act, applicable for all employees of the Parliament and its authorities and for authorities reporting to the Government, stipulates that an employee who intentionally, or through negligence, violates their obligations in their employment, may be given a disciplinary sanction for misconduct. If the error is small, in view of all the circumstances, no penalty may be pronounced. Such disciplinary sanctions are a warning and a salary deduction.

Penalties for the de-facto contempt of the court, e.g. when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[3] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschevaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschevaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
When it comes to contempt of court by administrations such as municipalities, there are various instruments for controlling municipal activities. However, there are not many different sanctions available apart from those mentioned above. There is, however, a possibility, in certain areas, such as supervision duties under the Environmental Code, for the County Administrative Board to order a municipality to fulfill its obligations regarding supervision (Chapter 26 Section 8).

In summary, it can be stated that there are currently very few legally based opportunities to prevent defiance. The legal situation in Sweden is that the municipalities and their representatives in certain areas can choose to disregard applicable laws and regulations and even court judgments. There are no legal possibilities to demand responsibility or sanction decision-makers other than those mentioned.

Last update: 30/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Sweden

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 22/09/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1. General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

The right for individuals and NGOs to challenge environmental decisions, acts, and omissions can mainly be found in three different Swedish acts: the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act.

Legislation is the key tool in Sweden with which principles of environmental policy are converted into practical action. Environmental rules in Sweden come in the form of acts, ordinances (decided by the Government) and regulations decided on by the main authorities for the protection of the environment. A hierarchy of these rules means that ordinances and regulations decided on by authorities can never be contrary to the laws.

The Parliament (Riksdagen) is the national law-making body responsible for adopting all acts. The executive power rests with the Government (regeringen), and the Government is in turn responsible to the Parliament. The Government is assisted in its work by the Government Offices, comprising all ministries, and some 400 central government agencies and public authorities. Administrative functions may furthermore be entrusted to regional or local authorities or delegated to other public as well as private bodies.

Government agencies carry out their tasks independently under the laws and other legislation. The relevant ministry is therefore not permitted to intervene in an individual matter that is being handled by an agency.

The main authorities for the protection of the environment are the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency (Naturvårdsverket), the Swedish Chemicals Agency (Kemikalieinspektionen), the Swedish Agency for Marine and Water Management (Havs- och vattenmyndigheten) and the Swedish Radiation Safety Authority (Strålskyddsmyndigheten).

Sweden is divided into 21 counties (länn) and 290 municipalities (kommuner). Each county has a County Administrative Board (länsstyrelsen).

Constitutionally, each County Administrative Board constitutes a government agency subordinate to the Government with expert staff in various areas, such as environmental protection.

The County Administrative Boards (together with the Land and Environment Courts) are the main licensing authorities in environmental matters. Twelve of the County Administrative Boards have an Environmental Permit Office that issues permits for environmentally hazardous activities in accordance with the Environmental Code. In their decision-making, the Environmental Permit Offices are independent from the County Administrative Boards. The County Administrative Boards are also responsible for “green” issues and supervision concerning water-related activities and larger industrial activities. Additionally, the County Administrative Boards issue permits for waste transportation and disposal, and chemical activities, amongst other things.

Each municipality has an elected assembly, the municipal council (kommunfullmäktige), which is the decision-making body for municipal matters. The municipal council appoints the municipal executive board (kommunstyrelsen), which leads and coordinates the municipal tasks and responsibilities. The Swedish municipalities are responsible for executing and providing a significant proportion of all public tasks and services, including environmental and health protection. The competence to issue plans and permits under the Planning and Building Act resides with the municipalities. For some minor environmental hazardous activities, licensing is carried out at municipality level.

2. Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The main provisions are found in the Instrument of Government, which also sets out some principles of relevance to access to justice in environmental matters. Chapter 1 Section 1 states the fundamental provision that the public power is exercised under the law. The public institutions shall promote sustainable development leading to a good environment for present and future generations (Chapter 1, Section 2). All courts, the public administration and others performing functions within the public administration shall observe the principle of equality of all persons before the law and be objective and impartial (Chapter 1, Section 9). It is also stipulated that no act of law or other provision may be promulgated in contradiction of Sweden’s obligations under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The right to a fair and public hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal must be upheld (European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Article 6).

3. Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. – main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

The main environmental law in Sweden is the Environmental Code (1998:808), which constitutes a framework legislation consisting of the general provisions regarding environmental protection. It applies to all human activities that might harm the environment. The Code contains the environmental principles and provisions providing for environmental quality norms as well as environmental impact assessments. Certain water operations, industrial undertakings, quarries and other environmentally hazardous activities are subject to permit or notification requirements, as specified in Governmental Ordinances. The Code also contains provisions relating to nature protection, flora and fauna, genetically modified organisms, chemicals and waste. Under the Environmental Code, there are several ordinances decided on by the Government containing more specific rules. Certain activities are also regulated in special sectoral legislation. Planning and building issues are covered by the Planning and Building Act (2010:900). Infrastructure installations, such as railroads and highways, also have regulations of their own, as do mining and forestry. Fauna is protected, in part, through hunting law. By statutory authorisation, many of the central administrative authorities are responsible for issuing regulations in the field of operation. The central administrative authorities are often designated as the Swedish competent authorities, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency and the Swedish Agency for Marine and Water Management. Both the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act include special provisions on access to justice. When it comes to sectoral legislation, such as the Game Act, the Forestry Act and the Minerals Act, the provision on access to justice may be found in the general rule in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

List of relevant national legislation
- Access to justice found in Chapter 16, Sections 12, 13 and 14
- Access to justice found in Chapter 13
- Administrative Procedure Act (2017:900) [ Förvaltningslag (2017:900)]
- Access to justice found in Section 42
- Judicial Review of Certain Government Decisions Act
- Access to justice found in Sections 1 and 2

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases
The access to justice of the public affected has been developed through case law. The courts most important when it comes to case law in environmental matters are the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, both of which may decide on judgments that may become precedents in those cases where their rulings include more general principles. Important case law has also been developed by the Supreme Administrative Court in cases related to i.a. forestry and legal review of Governmental decisions. Judgments from the Supreme Courts or appeals courts are not binding for lower courts, except where they refer to formal issues in a specific case. The judgments from the Supreme Courts, however, are regarded as guiding and there must be reasons of some importance to deviate from what has been decided.

NJA 2004, p. 590 and NJA 2012, p. 921. The Supreme Court stated that the right to appeal must apply to any person liable to be harmed, injured or otherwise inconvenienced as a result of the activity for which a permit is sought. The risk of injury or inconvenience should concern an interest that is protected by the legal order and should not be purely theoretical or completely insignificant.

MÖD 2011:46. The Land and Environment Court of Appeal stated that an individual affected should be given the right to appeal a decision not to request the withdrawal of a permit for environmentally hazardous activities.

MÖD 2000:43 and MÖD 2004:43. Nearby residents were held to have the right to appeal a decision by a supervisory authority not to intervene against environmentally hazardous activities.
The right of environmental NGOs to appeal public authority decisions under other administrative environmental legislation has also been developed in case law.

NJA 2012 p.921. The Supreme Court affirmed that organisations that meet the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code have the right to appeal, but in cases where an organisation does not meet the criteria an assessment has to be made of all the circumstances in the particular case. The court concluded that a generous assessment should be made of the right of environmental NGOs to appeal, since they can base their right to appeal on representing public interests, even in situations where no individuals can invoke such interests.

Case law has given environmental NGOs the right to also appeal decisions other than those stated explicitly in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code, including supervisory decisions under the Environmental Code with reference to article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention and Sweden's obligations under EU law. The courts have also given the expression 'decision concerning permits or exemptions' a broad interpretation (MÖD 2012:47, MÖD 2012:48, MÖD 2013:6, MÖD 2014:30 and the judgment of the Land and Environment Court of Appeal of 18 March 2014 in cases M 11609-13 and MÖD 2015:17). Recent case law from the Supreme Court has given NGOs the right to appeal decisions on building permits, NJA 2020 p. 190, and a decision to adopt a detailed plan that was alleged to interfere with interest of cultural values, judgment 9 July 2020 Ö 6554-19, with reference to a judgment from the Supreme Administrative Court, HFD 2018 ref. 10 II.

In case T 5637-19 from October 2020, the Supreme Court stated that an NGO with only 5-10 members was considered to fulfil the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 and hence given the right to appeal. According to firmly established case law, environmental NGOs have the right to appeal decisions under the Game Ordinance on hunting of species protected by Directive 92/43/EEC of 21 May 1992 on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora, the “Habitats Directive” (see the judgment of the Administrative Court of Appeal in Stockholm in cases 4390-12 and 4396-12 and subsequent judgments).

The Supreme Administrative Court 2014 ref.8. The Supreme Administrative Court gave an environmental NGO that met the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code the right to appeal the decision of the Swedish Forest Agency to grant a permit for the felling of subalpine forest, partly because decisions on permits for the felling of subalpine forest are covered by article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention.

The Administrative Court of Appeal in Gothenburg in case 1196-16. A decision on a permit for intrusion in historic remains under the Historic Environment Act (1988:950) was held to be covered by article 9, point 3 of the Aarhus Convention. A nature conservation society that met the criteria in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code was therefore held to have the right to appeal the decision.

6) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?
In Sweden, international conventions do not have direct effect so they must be incorporated in Swedish law to be applicable. However, by ratifying a convention Sweden becomes bound by the convention in terms of international law and national regulations should be interpreted in the light of the convention.

EU regulations apply directly as national law, while EU directives are transposed at the most appropriate level in the hierarchy to meet the given objectives. For provisions of a directive to be transposed into a Swedish ordinance or administrative provision, there must be a statutory delegation in a Swedish act. The provisions on access to justice in EU directives are also incorporated into Swedish law.
Parties involved in administrative or court procedure may, though, rely directly on international environmental agreements in their argumentations.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Court judgments are not recognised as a formal source of law, but the courts have a role as interpreters of law and other legal regulation. The courts have an independent status within the Swedish constitution. Neither the Parliament nor any other authority may decide on, or otherwise interfere in, matters handled by the courts.

Judgments from the Supreme Courts or appeals courts are not binding on lower courts, except where they refer to formal issues in a specific case. The judgments from the Supreme Courts, however, are regarded as guiding and there must be reasons of some importance to deviate from what has been decided.

There are three kinds of courts in Sweden:

- the general courts, which comprise district courts, courts of appeal and the Supreme Court;
- the general administrative courts; administrative courts, administrative courts of appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court; and
- the special courts, which determine disputes within specific areas such as environment.

Usually the number of levels in the court system, regardless of whether the case concerns administrative decisions or a civil or criminal case, is three. In most cases there is a need for a leave to appeal (review permit) to get access to justice in the highest courts (the Supreme Administrative Court, the Supreme Court and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal). The main rule is that the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court only grant leave to appeal if the Supreme Court’s judgment or decision can have significance as a precedent, i.e. provide guidance on how the courts should assess similar cases. Apart from the precedent reason, the Land and Environment Court of Appeal may also grant a leave to appeal if there may be a reason to change the decision of the Land and Environment Court and it is needed for the Land and Environmental Court of Appeal to be able to better assess whether the Land and Environmental Court has ruled correctly or there are other special reasons to try the appeal such as risk of severe damage to the environment.

If the higher court finds that none of these conditions are met, it will not try the case.

It should also be noted that decisions by authorities under the Environmental Code may be challenged through the system of Land and Environment Courts, but only up to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal as the final instance. Appealed decisions from authorities under the Planning and Building Act, as well as property cases, may be appealed to the Supreme Court, but only where the Land and Environment Court of appeal so allows, which is mainly if that court deems that there is a need for precedence regarding a disputed issue.

2) Rule of competence and jurisdiction - how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

For matters pertaining to environmental law, as well as matters of property registration, planning and building, Sweden has developed a system of special courts. This system consists of five Land and Environment Courts, and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities.

The five Land and Environment Courts are each incorporated as a special branch within five designated district courts located in various parts of Sweden, each responsible for their respective part of the country (according to law). The Land and Environment Court of Appeal is part of the Svea Court of Appeal and is responsible for the entire country. The Supreme Court in turn hears virtually all cases, including matters of environmental law, of precedential significance.

The administrative courts try some cases regulated in sectoral legislation concerning hunting, forestry and mining.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

For matters pertaining to environmental law as well as matters of property registration, planning and building, Sweden has developed a system of special courts. This system consists of five Land and Environment Courts, and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities.

Installations and activities involving a substantial environmental impact must obtain a permit from the Land and Environment Court, as must most kinds of water operations. In these cases, the court is exercising administrative powers usually allocated to authorities. This is a unique situation for Sweden. The Land and Environment Courts also try civil cases related to the environment, decisions appealed from administrative authorities, and handle cases on imposition of conditional fines after application from the supervisory authorities. It should be noted that most decisions from local authorities are first challenged through administrative appeal to the County Administrative Boards and then to the Land and Environment Court.

The system of Land and Environment Courts is specifically designed to deal with the technical complexity of the matters under their authority. The Land and Environment Courts rule on cases with one legally trained judge presiding over the case and a technically trained judge providing the special competence often needed due to the distinctive nature of the matters. In cases relating to environmental permitting, the two judges are assisted by two technical counsellors. Industry and national public authorities nominate the last two. The underlying philosophy is that experts will contribute their experience of municipal or industrial operations or public environment supervision. Depending on the case at hand and the issues involved, more than one technical judge, and then with additional technical/scientific competence, may participate.

The Land and Environment Court of Appeal rules on cases with three legally trained judges, one of whom presides over the case, and one technically trained judge.

All members of the courts have an equal vote. In the majority of cases, though, the chair has a casting vote where voting is tied.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

The administrative courts, as well as the Land and Environment Courts, decide cases on their merits in a reformatory procedure, meaning that they may replace the appealed decision with a new one. It should be noted that the administrative court procedure is simpler and less formal than the civil procedure.

Another vital difference is that in the administrative procedure the ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The principle means both that the examining courts (and authorities) have an obligation to ensure that a satisfactory investigation is made of each individual matter and that the courts may base their judgment on causes of action other than invoked by the parties. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. In administrative cases (challenged decisions from authorities and applications on imposition of conditional fines), the Court may, on its own initiative, perform investigations at the location in question if this is deemed necessary in order to examine the case.

In Sweden, in the judicial review procedure the relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The legislation forms the framework for this review. It consists of both substantive provisions on environmental protection and procedural rules, both specific to environmental cases and general. The Court has the right to try any issues related to this substantive and procedural law framework, and the Courts’ obligation to examine the case on its own initiative does not only apply to substantive issues, but also to procedural issues. The Court would thus raise issues regarding the correctness of a decision, whether it has been adopted by the competent authority (or whether the authority has abused its powers), whether the required form of a decision has been respected, and also whether the decision is appropriate in relation to the substantive and formal space given to the deciding authority. Though bound by the claims of the parties setting the framework of the process, in these cases the court in principle is put in the same position as the first deciding authority.

When a permit application is appealed and the court finds that the permit should not have been issued because of infringements of procedural or substantive nature, the court may reject the permit application and the permit will then no longer exist. However, if the Court finds that amendments to the permit conditions make it possible to conduct the activities in accordance with the Environmental Code, the court may add additional conditions to the permit, or amend conditions already prescribed by the authority, instead of revoking the permit. In addition, the court may deliver a new decision instead of the appealed one, repealing or changing the old decision, or remitting it back to the administrative decision-maker. As a main rule, they must not deliver a decision beyond the claims of the parties, but exceptions can be made to the benefit of the individual if this is not detrimental to involved private interests. There is no Constitutional Court in Sweden, nor any abstract norm control. Instead, when a court is dealing with a case, it is obliged to control the legal basis for the decision and must disregard any act or statute which is in conflict with the Constitution or superior norms.

1.3. Organization of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The Environmental Code

To ensure effective compliance with the general rules of the Environmental Code, many activities and operations are subject to permits. Such activities and operations may not commence without a permit from a competent authority. The permit sets out the scope of the activity concerned and must include the conditions under which the activity may be carried out. If the surveys are not sufficient to decide on “final” conditions, a licence may be issued where certain issues are to be further investigated during a certain period in which provisional conditions on precautionary measures will be applicable. The activities or operations for which permits are compulsory are specified either in the Code or in ordinances issued under the Code based on their typical environmental impact.

The Environmental Code divides competence between the local administration and the Land and Environment Courts. Licensing of very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations, is carried out by the Government. Licensing of larger industrial installations basically following the 2010/75 EU directive on industrial emissions and water activities is carried out by the Land and Environment Courts and licensing of medium-size polluting activities is carried out by the County Administrative Boards Environmental Permit Office. For some minor environmentally hazardous activities, licensing or a notification procedure is carried out at municipality level.

For the purpose of overseeing compliance with the requirements set out in the Environmental Code and ordinances issued under the Code, as well as the requirements set out in permits, the Environmental Code also contains provisions concerning supervision. The supervision is conducted by certain supervisory authorities whose authority and responsibility are set out in the Environmental Code and in an ordinance issued under the Code. With some exceptions, the operative supervisory actions, such as inspections and enforcement, are carried out at regional or local level by the County Administrative Boards or by the municipalities. The County Administrative Boards are generally responsible for the supervision of larger hazardous activities and compliance with legislation based on EU directives. The duties of the County Administrative Board can be transferred to the municipality according to a special procedure. In turn, the municipality is assigned general supervisory responsibility for all other environmentally hazardous activities within the municipality. In addition, there are twelve central government agencies, including the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency, which are assigned operative supervision responsibilities within specific fields, such as chemicals, forestry or agriculture. To ensure compliance with the Environmental Code and ordinances issued under the Code, the supervisory authority may issue an injunction, often combined with conditional fines.

Planning and Building Act

The municipalities are responsible for the planning of land and water areas within their geographical boundaries. It is only the municipality that has the authority to adopt plans and decide whether the planning is to be implemented or not. The municipality must have a current comprehensive plan that covers the entire area of the municipality. The act also contains regulations on detailed development plans, area regulations and building permits.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Individuals concerned and NGOs meeting the requirements according to the Environmental Code may appeal an administrative environmental decision made by the County Administrative Board or the Environmental Permit Office of the County Administrative Board to the Land and Environment Court. Individuals concerned and NGOs meeting the requirements according to the Environmental Code may also appeal administrative decisions according to sectoral legislations such as the Forestry Act and the Minerals Act.

The appeal must be in writing, stating the claim and reasons, and is sent to the authority, which will check that the appeal was made in time and send it to the court.

The appeal process can take different lengths of time depending on the scope of the case. A final ruling by the court may be expected within somewhere between 6 months and one year.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

Sweden has special courts for matters pertaining to environmental law as well as matters of property registration, planning and building. There are five Land and Environment Courts and one Land and Environment Court of Appeal. Their jurisdiction covers all kinds of decisions made pursuant to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act. They are also competent in cases concerning damages and private actions against hazardous activities. The five Land and Environment Courts are each incorporated as a special branch within five designated district courts located in various parts of Sweden, each responsible for their respective part of the country (according to law). The Land and Environment Court of Appeal is part of the Svea Court of Appeal and is responsible for the entire country.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

The Environmental Code

The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing, dispensation exemptions or injunctions according to the Environmental Code are as follows:

Local municipality – County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)

Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed)

In certain cases, the Government decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

The applicant and the other parties in the procedure, as well as certain other stakeholders, can appeal against a permit decision. The right to appeal also applies to non-profit organisations or other legal persons with the primary purpose of promoting nature conservation and environmental protection interests or recreational interests, provided they also meet certain other specified requirements.
Municipal decisions on planning and building licensing according to the Planning and Building Act are appealed directly to one of the Land and Environment Courts and may be appealed further to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed). Decisions on licensing according to the Planning and Building Act are first challenged through administrative appeal to the County Administrative Board and then, via the Land and Environment Court, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. If that court gives permission to appeal its ruling, the case may end up in the Supreme Court. Leave to appeal is still needed, as at the Land and Environment Court of Appeal.

Other sectoral legislation related to the environment

Some cases are dealt with in a different manner. For example, some decisions on hunting, forestry, mining and infrastructure projects are appealed to the administrative courts or to the Government.

Decisions by the County Administrative Boards on licence hunting according to the Game Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions by the Swedish Forest Agency according to the Forestry Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions by the Mining Inspectorate on exploration permits according to the Minerals Act – Administrative Court – Administrative Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – Supreme Administrative Court (leave to appeal needed)

Decisions by the Mining Inspectorate on exploitation concessions according to the Minerals Act – the Government

Decisions concerning infrastructure projects that are decided by national authorities can be appealed to the Government.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules for introducing preliminary references

Judicial review by the Supreme Administrative Court

The Supreme Administrative Court is the supreme general administrative court and considers determinations on appeal from any of the four administrative courts of appeal in Sweden. The Supreme Administrative Court can also, under certain circumstances, examine whether a decision made by the Government is in contravention of the rule of law. This institution is known as judicial review pursuant to the Judicial Review of Certain Government Decisions Act.

According to this act, a prerequisite for judicial review is that the decision involves an examination of the individual's civil rights or obligations as referred to in Article 6.1 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, or, if the applicant is an environmental NGO, the government decision refers to Article 9.2 of the Aarhus Convention.

Preliminary rulings from the EU Court

All parties in an ongoing case may petition that the court trying the case request a preliminary ruling from the EU Court. This may be done regardless of which court is reviewing the case. It is up to the court to decide whether or not a preliminary ruling is necessary.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

In Sweden, there are no out-of-court solutions such as mediation in environmental cases.

In civil cases, however, e.g., compensation for environmental damage, it is mandatory for the court to try to mediate, either by itself or by involving an external mediator.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsmen

The Parliamentary Ombudsmen (JO) and the Chancellor of Justice (JK) are both designated to ensure that public authorities and their staff comply with laws and other statutes and fulfill their obligations in other respects. They have a disciplinary function and act through opinions and prosecution for administrative misconduct.

The Ombudsmen ensure in particular that the courts and public authorities, in the course of their activities, act with objectivity and impartiality and that the fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens are not encroached upon in public administration.

Supervision is exercised by the Ombudsmen in assessing complaints made by the public and by means of inspections and such other inquiries as the Ombudsmen may find necessary.

Public prosecutor

The regulation on environmental crimes is under general public prosecution.

The public has very limited access to criminal proceedings, as the power to prosecute is the prerogative of the public prosecutor.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

There are provisions in the Environmental Code and in administrative law that make it possible to appeal against the decisions of public authorities in general. These decisions may concern permits, other approvals, exemptions and supervision.

Appealable judgments and decisions may be appealed by anyone who is the subject of a decision against them. It has not been specified in Swedish law who should be considered a person concerned; this is decided on a case by case basis. Under Swedish law, it is generally not specified that ‘person’ refers to both natural and legal persons. Decisions and judgments may be directed to legal persons and it is possible that legal persons may suffer harm from a permit decision and could therefore also have standing on that ground.

The preparatory work of the Environmental Code explains that the concept of standing shall be interpreted widely and shall be decided on a case by case basis by the court. According to case law, any person who may suffer harm or be subjected to some other detriment as a result of the activity for which a permit is being sought has the right to be a party and to appeal a decision if the risk of harm or detriment concerns an interest that is protected by the legal system and is not solely theoretical or wholly insignificant.

NGOs who meet the requirements stipulated in the Environmental Code may challenge many administrative decisions. The requirements are that the NGO is a non-profit association whose purpose according to its statutes is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests. The association furthermore must have conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years and have at least 100 members or, by some other means, show that its activities are supported by the public. In respect of shore protection, the provisions also apply to non-profit associations whose purpose according to their statutes is to promote outdoor interests.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

Rules on legal standing can be found in the Environmental Code, Chapter 16, Sections 12 and 13, in the Planning and Building Act and in sectoral legislation. Some of this sectoral legislation lacks specific regulation on standing. In these cases, the general rule on standing found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable.

The general right of environmental NGOs to appeal environmental matters, including permit decisions, is regulated specifically in both the Environmental Code and in a number of sectoral legislations, such as the Minerals Act. These environmental NGOs also have an explicit right to apply for judicial review of permit decisions by the Government according to the Act on judicial review of certain government decisions. Regarding sectoral legislation which does not specifically refer to the rule of standing for NGOs in the Environmental Code, such as the Forestry Act and the Game Act, the right for NGOs to appeal has been opened up by case law.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (In administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The standing rules according to the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act are the same regardless of whether the case concerns standing for administrative review, standing for judicial review in the court of first instance or standing for appealing decisions of courts of first instance.

The Environmental Code:

Chapter 16 Section 12

Appeals may be made against appealable judgments or decisions by:

- any person who is the subject of a judgment or decision against them;
- local employees’ associations that organise workers in the activity to which the decision relates in the case of judgments and decisions concerning permits for environmentally hazardous activities;
- national employees’ organisations within the meaning of the Codetermination at Work Act (1976:580), the corresponding employers’ organisations and consumer associations in the case of decisions taken by a County Administrative Board or a central administrative authority pursuant to an authorisation issued in accordance with chapter 14, provided that the decision does not relate to an individual case; and
- authorities, municipal committees or other bodies which have a right of appeal pursuant to specific provisions in this Code or to rules issued in pursuance thereof or pursuant to the Act (2010: 897) on border river agreements between Sweden and Finland.

The provisions of this section shall be without prejudice to the right of appeal provided by the Code of Judicial Procedure.

Chapter 16 Section 13

Appealable judgments and decisions concerning permits, approvals or exemptions issued pursuant to this Code, concerning withdrawal of the status of protected areas pursuant to Chapter 7, or concerning supervision pursuant to Chapter 10 or questions relating to provisions adopted pursuant to this Code, may be appealed by a non-profit association or other legal person:

- whose primary purpose is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests;
- that is not run for profit;
- that has conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years; and
- that has at least 100 members or, by some other means, shows that its activities are supported by the public.

The right to appeal pursuant to the first paragraph also applies if the appeal only refers to a condition or other provision in the judgment or decision, and also if the judgment or decision is the result of an assessment pursuant to Chapter 22, Section 26 or Chapter 24, Section 2, 3, 5, 6 or 8 of this Code, or an assessment pursuant to Chapter 7, Section 13, 14 or 16 of the Water Operations (Special Provisions) Act (1998:812). However, the right to appeal pursuant to the first paragraph does not apply to judgments or decisions relating to the Swedish Armed Forces, the Swedish Fortifications Agency, the Swedish Defence Materiel Administration or the National Defence Radio Establishment.

Anyone who wishes to appeal pursuant to the first or second paragraph must do so within the time limit set for the parties and for other concerned persons.

Chapter 16 Section 14

The provisions of section 13 on the right of certain non-profit associations to appeal also apply in respect of shore protection to a non-profit association which, according to its statutes, has the purpose of safeguarding recreational interests.

The Planning and Building Act

The Planning and Building Act regulates the right for environmental NGOs referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13, of the Environmental Code to appeal a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan likely to have a significant environmental impact given that the planned area may be used for certain types of activity, and a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan which means that an area will no longer be covered by shore protection.

For individuals, the general rule on standing in the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable. According to case law, an individual may usually appeal building permits and development plans which may affect them personally (they are neighbours or living within or directly adjacent to the area to which a municipal plan applies).

Chapter 13 Section 8

Provisions on who may appeal a decision referred to in Sections 2 a, 3, 5 and 6 can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Chapter 13 Section 11

A decision to adopt, amend, or repeal a detailed development plan or area regulations may only be appealed by someone who, prior to the expiration of the review period, has presented opinions in writing that have not been approved.

Curtailment of the right to appeal as determined by the first paragraph does not apply if:

- the decision has gone against the affected party through the proposal being amended after the review period; or
- the appeal is based on the decision not having been established according to the regulations prescribed by law.

Chapter 13 Section 12

A non-profit organisation or other legal entity of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code may appeal a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan that can be assumed to result in a significant environmental impact owing to the fact that the planned area may be used for activities or measures indicated in Chapter 4, Section 34 of this Act.

Chapter 13 Section 13

A non-profit organisation or other legal entity of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code, or a non-profit organisation of the kind referred to in Chapter 16, Section 14 of the Environmental Code, may appeal a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan that entails an area no longer being covered by shore protection in accordance with Chapter 7 of the Environmental Code.

The Administrative Procedure Act

Section 42

A person whom the decision concerns may appeal against it, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal. The Administrative Procedure Act also gives provisions regarding who may appeal against decisions according to:

- the Minerals Act (1991:45)
- the Forestry Act (1979:429)
- the Heritage Conservation Act (1988:950)
- the Game Act (1987:259)
An individual may apply for judicial review of such decisions by the Government which include an examination of the civil rights or obligations of the individual within the meaning of Article 6 (1) of the European Convention of 4 November 1950 on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Section 2
An environmental organisation referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13 of the Environmental Code may apply for judicial review of such permit decisions by the Government covered by Article 9 (2) of the Convention of 25 June 1998 on access to information, public participation in decision-making processes and access to judicial review in environmental matters.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?
The main rule is that the language in courts and administrative authorities is Swedish, though there is a special regulation (Act 2009:724 on National Minorities and National Minority Languages) giving citizens in certain municipalities in the north of Sweden the right to speak i.a. Finnish or Sami in court.

The general rules on translation and interpretation in administrative authorities and courts are codified in the respective procedural rules. According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 13, an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.

According to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 5, Section 6, for a party, witness or other person who is to be heard before the court and does not have mastery of Swedish, the court may employ an interpreter. If a suspect or a prosecutor in a criminal case does not have mastery of Swedish, an interpreter should be hired for a court hearing. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, this provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

If a party, witness or other person who is to be heard before the court does not speak Swedish, the court shall, if necessary, employ an interpreter. The court may also, in other instances where necessary, hire an interpreter or translate documents (according to Section 50 of the Administrative Court Procedure Act).

The court may, if necessary, according to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if this is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, this provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

1.4. Evidence and experts in the procedures

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?
Both administrative authorities and all Swedish courts involved in environmental cases have extensive obligations to examine a case and ensure that it is examined to the extent needed, and, for this purpose, to ask the parties questions throughout the procedure. The Court may even carry out investigations at a location if it deems it necessary. New facts are thus added to the case throughout the procedure and the Court must also consider any additional facts provided by the Parties. There is thus no partial preclusion requirement. It should be noted that this does not apply in civil cases tried by the Land and Environment Courts.

As the ultimate responsibility to investigate the case according to the “ex officio principle” in the Environmental Code lies with the administration and the Land and Environment Courts, which both have technicians participating in the decision-making, there are no stipulations in Swedish law that an individual or an environmental NGO should have to present expert opinions, even if the proceedings are initiated by them. Accordingly, a Swedish administrative authority or court can never order an individual or an environmental NGO to produce such experts (although a court may require such an expert opinion from an applicant for a permit or an operator of an environmentally hazardous activity). Also, there are no requirements under Swedish law that individuals or environmental NGOs should have to present or bear the costs of experts or witnesses.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
The ex officio principle at both administrative and judicial levels means there are no limits to how and when new evidence can be introduced. Having said that, it is still primarily up to the party to be responsible for presenting the evidence. This can be done both at the very beginning of a case and later during the court procedure. Evidence may also be introduced in the next instance during an appeal. It should be noted that administrative cases are handled differently from civil cases, where the possibility to present new evidence is more restricted. Written documents which are relied upon as evidence must be submitted to the court without delay. The same applies to items which are relied upon as evidence and can be moved to court. If necessary, the court may order the party which relied on the evidence to submit this within a specified time. Such an order must include information that the case may be decided even if the party has not provided the evidence. At a hearing, witness hearings may be held. The testimony may be required to be given under oath.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.
In administrative cases, the court often at its own initiative refers a case or specified questions to authorities, e.g. national authorities, with expert knowledge within certain fields. This is also practised at appeal level.

Any party may present experts to strengthen their legal action. Any party may also ask the court to call for expert witnesses, such as experts from environmental authorities.

It is very common for an applicant for a permit to present multiple experts to speak on their behalf. There may also be situations where it is of great advantage, albeit not essential, for individuals and environmental NGOs to be able to present experts of their own or expert reports to prove the veracity of their claim. Mostly such reports are made by experts working within the NGOs themselves and consequently they are mostly free of charge. Another way to obtain expert reports is to resort to independent researchers from universities or to other outside experts who may offer to make such a report for free or for travel expenses and, if needed, compensation for accommodation. Sometimes, though, if the case concerns a very large and/or complicated issue, the environmental NGOs pay to engage an outside expert.

There are no publicly available lists and registries of experts.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
Expert opinions are not binding on the judges and can be disregarded.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
According to Chapter 22 Section 12 of the Environmental Code, the Land and Environment Court, where a special investigation or valuation is necessary for assessment of the case, may appoint one or more experts to deliver an opinion in the case after carrying out a preliminary investigation. Such an investigation shall be carried out as soon as possible. If it is necessary in view of the nature of the case or the purpose of the investigation, the court shall notify the parties by suitable means of the time when the investigation will take place. This possibility is available when the court is trying first instance permit cases. It is not a general option for environmental cases. However, the rule is also applicable when the Land and Environment Court of Appeal tries cases which are appealed.

If a case concerns an activity or a measure that affects the aquatic environment, the court shall obtain an opinion from the County Administrative Board that is the relevant water authority if the investigation in the case gives reason to assume that any factor of importance for the environmental quality standard does not conform to the basis for such a standard and the non-compliance is relevant to the ability to determine reasonable and appropriate environmental conditions.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
An appeal shall include the grounds of appeal and in what respect the reasons for the decision are, in the appellant's view, incorrect, and the evidence relied on and what is to be proved by each specific piece of evidence. This may include expert opinions if the party so wishes.

In civil cases, the plaintiff has to present the claims, causes of action and evidence that is invoked. This may be completed later on during the process. Experts called upon by parties are regarded during the process as witnesses and not as experts called upon by the court.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
There are no procedural fees in relation to expert opinions and expert witnesses.

In administrative cases, the court will cover costs for witnesses called by the court. Experts assisting a party, though, are in principle not regarded as witnesses. The party invoking an expert opinion has to do so at its own expense, and its costs will not be compensated or covered by the opposite party even if the former party wins the process.

In civil cases, the costs will initially be covered by the party that has invoked the witness/expert. In the end, the loser pays principle will apply in civil cases.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participant to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Anyone who is a party in an environmental case may use a legal representative or assistant. This person must be suitable for the assignment, but does not have to be a lawyer. Swedish environmental legislation does not, however, require legal representation, neither for the administrative nor the judicial review procedure, and not even for appeals to appeals or to the Supreme Court.

Most of the environmental NGOs which operate at national level (e.g. Greenpeace Sweden, the Swedish Carnivore Association, SOF-Birdlife, the Swedish Botanical Society, and others) and local level have no legal representatives employed. The biggest environmental NGO in Sweden, the Swedish Society for Nature Conservation, is the only Swedish environmental NGO which currently has three employed legal advisors.

There are no publicly accessible internet links to a registry or website of all specialised lawyers in the environmental field. However, the Swedish Bar Association has a search function on its website. Lawyers who are not members of the Association are naturally not included.

1.1. Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is no organised pro bono assistance available. There are only a few law firms engaged in representing the public concerned in environmental cases. Furthermore, there are practically no public interest lawyers or law clinics dealing with environmental cases in Sweden.

Attorneys are free to set their own fees, but there are no legal limitations for lawyers to take on this kind of pro bono work.

In civil cases, property cases and applications for permits for water operations the court may, if it considers the fees to be unreasonable, reduce the compensation for litigation costs either at the request of the losing party or on its own initiative. In other administrative cases, each party has to cover its own costs, irrespective of the outcome, and the court will not intervene regarding costs.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

No expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts exist.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The list below is not exhaustive. In alphabetical order:

- Birdlife Sweden
- Climate Action
- Greenpeace Sweden
- Nordv
- Protect the Forest
- Swedish Botanical Society
- Swedish Outdoor Association
- Association for Protection of the Swedish Landscape
- River Rescuers
- Swedish Carnivore Association (SCA)
- Swedish Society for Nature Conservation
- Urbergsgruppen
- WWF

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

As a general rule, for the administrative authorities and the administrative courts an appeal of a decision must have been received by the decision-making authority or administrative court within three weeks of the date on which the appellant received the decision through that authority. However, if the appellant is a party representing the public, the appeal must have been received within three weeks from the date of the decision being notified. The decision-making authority or administrative court then makes sure that the appeal was made within the right time limit and sends the appeal to the court or authority which will try the case.

When it comes to decisions and judgments from the Land and Environment Courts, with the exception of preliminary decisions during the preparation of the case the time for appeal is linked to the date of the ruling.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing, dispensation exemptions or injunctions are as follows:

- Local municipality – County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) [1].
- County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed).
- Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

Many environmental cases start at the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, which means that the decisions may be challenged directly to court.

The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. The Government also tries certain appeals according to the Code and sectoral legislation, such as the Minerals Act. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

There are no set rules for the national courts to deliver judgments.

In first instance permit cases at the Land and Environment Courts, the Environmental Code provides that the Land and Environment Court shall deliver the judgment as soon as possible in view of the nature of the case and other circumstances (Chapter 22, Section 21 of the Environmental Code). This also applies when the Land and Environment Court of Appeal tries a case. If a main hearing has been held, a judgment shall be delivered within two months of the conclusion thereof, unless exceptional circumstances exist.

In other administrative cases there are no such rules. In civil cases, the general rule is that the judgment should be delivered within 14 days from the main hearing. It should be noted that, according to the Priority Review Act, a party may ask for priority of a case handled at a court.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

There are no fixed legal time limits applicable during the procedure. The administrative organ or the court trying a case decide on a case to case basis the time limits and deadlines for submitting evidence, opinions and other material needed.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgements

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Under Swedish law, appeals have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law. Normally a decision according to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act can only be executed when the decision can no longer be contested through a legal remedy. There are some exceptions to the rule according to special legislation, such as protective hunting according to the Game Act and exploration permits according to the Minerals Act.

Normally a permit according to the Environmental Code cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicant to start their activity. As with permits, orders from a supervisory authority do not take legal effect until they are finally decided on appeal. If there is an urgent need, the authority can decide that the order shall take effect even if it is appealed.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

As long as the matter has not been delivered to the superior authority, the first deciding authority may revise and stop an execution of its own decision, if this is not to the detriment of a private opposing party.

If a go-ahead decision has been granted or the case concerns a decision where the rule on an appeal’s suspensive effect is not applicable, the public concerned can ask the authority for an injunction of that decision. According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 48, an authority trying an appeal may decide on injunctive relief.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

A request for injunctive relief may be made at any time during the procedure, but is normally made at the same time as the appeal itself. Such a request may also be repeated if not successful.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Under Swedish law, appeals have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law. Normally a decision according to the Environmental Code and the Planning and Building Act can only be executed when the decision can no longer be contested through a legal remedy. In those cases where this does not apply, the Environmental Code, as well as the Planning and Building Act, gives the supervisory authority the possibility, if urgent, to decide that a prohibition or an order shall be immediately binding.

There are some exceptions to the rule according to special legislation, such as protective hunting according to the Game Act and exploration permits according to the Minerals Act.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Appeals normally have suspensive effect unless otherwise provided by the law.

During the court procedure, the court, if requested by one of the parties, can decide on interim measures either to allow or restrict an activity.

Normalt kan ett tillstånd enligt miljöbalken anläggas för att avsevärt minskas kraft. Tillståndet kan dock kombineras med ett verkställighetsförordning som gör det möjligt för den sökande att starta sin verksamhet trots att tillståndet överklagas. Liksom vad som gäller för tillstånd får ett föreläggande från en tillsynsmyndighet inte rättslig verkan förrän det vunnit laga kraft. Om det finns ett brådskande behov kan myndigheten dock besluta att beslutet ska träda i kraft genast.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
If a go-ahead decision has been granted or the case concerns a decision where the rule on an appeal’s suspensive effect is not applicable, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision. This may be done during the whole procedure but is normally done at the same time as the appeal itself.

According to the Court Matters Act, Section 26, a court that is to hear an appeal may decide that the appealed decision may not be enforced for the time being. The legal provision on such “inhibition” is rather vague; the details are found in case law. According to the Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, inhibition shall be granted when the prospects for the success of the appeal are good. An inhibition may also be granted if the appellant has a legitimate interest in having the decision scrutinised by the court or there are vital interests at stake, for example the risk of irrevocable damage.

There are no requirements, or legal possibilities, to ask the claimant for a financial deposit. There is, however, one exception. If the applicant for a permit for a water operation asks for a decision on an immediate enforceable permit, they must provide a financial deposit.

1.7.3. Costs – Legal aids – Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

The rules on costs for trials concerning environmental matters are provided in Chapter 25 of the Environmental Code.

As a general rule, the procedures related to administrative environmental matters in Sweden are free of charge. There are no application or court fees, no obligation to pay the opponent’s costs, no bonds to be paid for obtaining injunctive relief or other costs to be covered, irrespective of whether the case is subject to an administrative or a judicial review procedure.

For as experts’ and lawyers’ fees, these have to be calculated on a case by case basis after contact with them.

Each party has to cover its own costs in administrative cases.

The loser pays principle is not applicable as in civil cases. In civil cases, there is also a court fee for the plaintiff, around 300 euros.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

Injunctive relief and interim measures are free of charge.

If, however, the applicant for a permit for a water operation asks for a decision on an immediate enforceable permit, they must provide a financial deposit.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Considering that the procedures related to environmental cases in Sweden are free of charge, there is little legal aid available. According to the Legal Aid Act (1996:1619), an applicant may, under certain conditions, get legal aid and certain costs associated with the process paid. The act, however, due to the official principle, has very little significance in cases that are appealed to the Land and Environment Courts. One of the criteria for being awarded legal aid is that the applicant needs legal aid in addition to advice and that this need cannot be met in any other way. Because of these criteria, there is almost no possibility for individuals to obtain legal aid in environmental cases.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Environmental NGOs or other legal persons may never obtain legal aid according to the Swedish Legal Aid Act.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

Some of the national authorities provide grants for environmental NGOs which they can use at their own discretion. Most importantly, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency each year distributes funds to organisations to be used for taking legal action in order to develop case law in the environmental area. Furthermore, the Swedish Transport Administration and the Swedish Consumer Agency provide grants to NGOs to increase public influence in different decision-making processes in the environmental field.

6) Does the ‘loser pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The majority of environmental disputes are pursued through cost-free administrative procedures where the appellate levels have an obligation to ex officio examine the case.

The loser pays principle does normally not apply. Each party only has to bear its own costs, but Swedish environmental legislation does not require legal representation, neither for the administrative nor the judicial review procedure, and not even for appeals to the Land and Environmental Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court. The only exception to the general rule of a free environmental procedure is found in the permitting procedure for water operations.

The applicant has to pay the litigation costs of all those who will be affected by the activity. This circle of people, however, is narrower than the public concerned and consists of those whose real estate will be affected by the activity, for example by flooding, loss of fishing water and so on.

In civil cases concerning economic damages, the general rules on legal procedure apply, which means that the losing party has to pay all the winning party’s legal costs; the loser pays principle in full. Civil cases in environmental matters in Sweden are quite rare. Many civil cases relate to intrusion in the landowner’s rights, e.g. to establish a nature reserve, and in such cases the main rule is that the landowner will have their costs covered irrespective of the outcome.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

Since no such costs exist in administrative environmental cases, there is no need for rules on exemptions.

In civil cases, the loser pays principle is not absolute, as the rules give the court space to consider facts related to how the process was pursued, if there were reasons for initial claims due to the action of the opposing party etc., and cases where restrictions are imposed on how the landowner may use the land or the land is expropriated for public interests.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice – provisions related to Directive 2003/4EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

The right for individuals and NGOs to challenge environmental decisions, acts and omissions is mainly found in three different Swedish laws; the Environmental Code, the Planning and Building Act, and the Administrative Procedure Act. Generally they state that individuals must be concerned and NGOs must fulfil the requirements set out in the Code in order to have standing.

There is no structured dissemination on where to find the rules on access to justice available in Sweden. However, rudimentary information may be found on the websites of some of the main authorities for the protection of the environment, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency and the National Board of Housing, Building and Planning. Some general information on access to justice can also be found on the website of the Swedish Courts.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

During the preparation of a matter at an authority or a case at a court, the main rule is that documents are open to the public. The registries where the respective instance is obliged to register all incoming documents in the particular case are also open. Certain information can be kept secret according to provisions in the Public Access to Information and Secrecy Act. For the parties in a case or a matter before an authority, the space to keep document secrets is very restricted.

In permit cases related to water operations and environmentally harmful operations, the Land and Environment Courts and the County Administrative Boards appoint a person or authority to keep a copy of all documents for the public to access instead of visiting the court or the County Administrative Board, also for such applications that do not need an EIA. This is of particular importance if the proposed activity is located far from the court or the County Administrative Board.

As a general rule, judgments and decisions in cases before courts and authorities must be documented in writing. In addition, there are provisions for judgments to be kept available at the court’s office and at the custodian, when notified.

To a large extent, judgments are promulgated in the press and on the website of the court taking the decision in application cases. This applies equally to the County Administrative Boards’ decisions and other authorities.

The Ordinance (2003:234) on the Time for the Provision of Judgments and Decisions contains provisions on the time for delivery of documents, on how documents are to be provided and on information for individuals also. A judgment or decision in a case before a public court shall be sent to the parties on the day of the decision.

The Swedish public principle also means that anyone has the opportunity to read the decision text. Also, in the Administrative Procedure Act and the Code of Judicial Procedure there are provisions on the issuing of judgments and decisions. Provisions in the Environmental Code, the Judicial Code, the Administrative Procedure Act, the Law on Judicial Matters and the Administrative Procedure Act further regulate what a judgment or decision should contain. Every appealable decision and judgement must be accompanied by information on access to justice information.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

The same rules on access to information on access to justice apply regardless of whether the case concerns an administrative environmental impact assessment or a civil case according to the Environmental Code, or a case on planning according to the Planning and Building Act.

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding on the public, only indicative or binding on authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. Thus, there are no rules on access to information on access to justice for these kinds of plans and programmes.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

It is mandatory for authorities giving an administrative decision and courts to provide access to justice information in the decision and/or judgment.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

There is no structured dissemination on where to find the rules on access to justice available in Sweden, neither in Swedish nor in any other language. However, rudimentary information on where to find the websites of some of the main authorities for the protection of the environment, such as the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency, and the National Board of Housing, Building and Planning. Some general information on access to justice can also be found on the websites of the Swedish Courts. This information may be found in English.

For individuals involved in an ongoing case, the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 13, states that an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.

The court may, if necessary, according to the Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if this is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, that provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the Land and Environment Courts.

1.8 Special procedural rules

Activities subject to the EIA requirements of the EIA Directive are subject to regulation regarding environmental impact assessments, permits etc. according to the Environmental Code or other specific legislation. Among other things, the application for a permit must include an EIA and a technical description of the planned activity or operation.

Provisions regulating when an EIA is required and what information it must contain are set out in Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code and in an underlying ordinance. Neither the Planning and Building Act nor sectoral environmental legislation have specific rules on the procedure or the content of the EIA, but refer to the rules of the Code.

An EIA must be prepared before the application for a permit is made and should be submitted as a supplement to the application. When preparing the permit application and the EIA, the applicant is obliged to consult the County Administrative Board, the supervisory authority and the private individuals likely to be particularly affected by the activity. For activities which typically have a significant environmental impact, the applicant is also obliged to consult central government agencies and the municipality, the public and the organisations that are likely to be affected by the activity. Prior to the consultation, the applicant should provide information about the activity with regard to location, scope, design and possible environmental impacts. Furthermore, there are mandatory provisions concerning the minimum details that an EIA must contain. Upon receiving the EIA, the permitting authority is obliged to publicly announce the EIA and make it available to the general public, who should be given the opportunity to comment on it.

Not all activities that are within the scope of the EIA Directive fall within the scope of environmentally hazardous activities under the Environmental Code. Some activities that require environmental impact assessment under the Directive (building of industrial areas, shopping malls, parking spaces, subways or tramways, tourist attractions such as ski slopes and lifts, marinas for leisure boats, holiday villages, hotel complexes, camping sites and theme parks) are therefore dealt with under the Planning and Building Act. The environmental impact assessment required under the Directive for the above-mentioned activities is carried out under the Planning and Building Act within the framework of decisions on detailed urban development plans. It is proposed that from 1 July 2021 certain steps related to the EIA will also be conducted in a subsequent building permits procedure, however this is not related to the regulation of the EIA Directive.

In Sweden, the EIA is thus an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. The EIA shall be approved only if the direct and indirect impacts of the planned activity are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and if approved this will be noted in the decision concerning the permit.

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.
3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Because of the system described above, the EIA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

The final decision on authorisation and, if any, preliminary decisions, e.g. on permissibility or the start of construction works, may be appealed following the general rules, that is three weeks from delivering the decision or three weeks after receiving the decision if from the County Administrative Board.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the environmental permit as such according to the Environmental Code. Decision of the County Administrative Boards may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed). Decisions of the Land and Environment Court may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) and to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities, such as facilities for nuclear operations. The Government also tries certain appeals according to the Code and sectorial legislation, such as the Minerals Act. Decisions by the Government, including EIA, cannot be appealed, but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court.

Permit judgments and decisions, including the EIA, may be appealed by anyone who is the subject of a decision against them according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code. Permits and decisions may also be appealed by environmental NGOs according to Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Code. No foreign NGO can appeal, since there is a requirement that the organisation has to have been operating in Sweden for at least three years.

The provision referred to may be regarded as discriminatory and would probably be set aside in court. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that it had not showed that it had the support of the public. In principle, the organisation’s reference to the Polish public seems to have been accepted.

Decisions on urban detailed development plans, both those subject to an EIA and those not, are adopted by the municipality according to the Planning and Building Act and may be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. The Land and Environment Court of Appeal may allow appeal of its ruling to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed).

As regards appeals of decisions on urban detailed development plans, persons with the right to appeal are those whom the decision concerns, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal (Chapter 13 Section 8 of the Planning and Building Act). NGOs which meet the requirements in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code also have legal standing according to the Planning and Building Act. A party challenging such a decision must also have made statements against the plan and/or EIA for the plan during the public consultation stage, otherwise the challenge would be precluded (Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act).

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and compelled to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.

When a decision on an urban detailed development plan which includes an EIA is appealed to the court and the court finds that the decision contains substantive or procedural infringements, the court repeals the decision on the adoption of the plan. It should be noted that the court does not have the right to change the detailed development plan. The scope for the court in these cases is more narrow, similar to a legal review and in principle restricted to the causes of action invoked by the party. This is regulated in Chapter 13 Section 17 of the Planning and Building Act.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

No matter who makes the decisions concerning activities under the EIA Directive, the County Administrative Board or the Land and Environment Court when it comes to permits according to the Environmental Code, or the municipality when it comes to certain plans according to the Planning and Building Act, an appeal may be filed directly with the court of appeal according to the route of appeal described above.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 127?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed plan which includes an EIA according to the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person or NGO may only appeal a decision on an urban detailed development plan if they submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings. Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are no clear provisions protecting the interest of the public concerned to have their cases handled in a timely manner by an administrative organ, except for a very general statement in the Administrative Procedure Act that a case must be handled as simply, quickly and cost-effectively as possible without compromising the rule of law. However, if an authority assesses that the decision in a case initiated by an individual party will be materially delayed, the authority shall inform the party thereof. In such a notification, the authority shall report the reason for the delay. If a case initiated by an individual party has not been settled in the first instance within six months, the party may request in writing that the authority shall decide the case. The Authority shall, within four weeks from the date of such a request, either decide the matter or, in a special decision, reject the request. Such a decision to reject a request that the case be decided may be appealed to the court or administrative authority competent to review an appeal against the decision in the case.

In court, a party may apply for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.
11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Normally a permit or an urban development plan cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicant to start their activity. If a go-ahead decision has been granted, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision.

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

All activities subject to the requirements of the IPPC/Industrial Emissions Directive require a permit according to the Environmental Code. Before such a permit can be issued, an EIA must be performed. The rules under the Environmental Code on access to justice are general, and thus also apply to these cases.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

There are provisions in the Environmental Code that make it possible to appeal the final decisions and judgments on permits. Both individuals and environmental NGOs can appeal environmental decisions, but this right is limited in some cases. Preliminary decisions, e.g. regarding permitting or construction works, taken during the preparation of the case may also be challenged. According to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code, appeals may be made against appealable judgments or decisions by any person who is the subject of a judgment or decision against them.

NGOs which meet the requirements stipulated in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code may challenge many administrative decisions. The requirements are that the NGO is a non-profit association whose purpose according to its statutes is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests. The association furthermore must have conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years and have at least 100 members or by some other means show that its activities are supported by the public. In respect of shore protection, the provisions also apply to non-profit associations whose purpose according to their statutes is to promote outdoor interests (Chapter 16 Section 14 of the Code).

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

In Sweden, the EIA is an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. Because of the Swedish system, the EIA is carried out together with the IED/IEDPC process, which means that no part, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, can be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

In Sweden, the EIA is an intrinsic part of the permitting procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the permit for an activity. Because of the Swedish system, the EIA is carried out together with the IED/IEDPC process, which means that no part, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, can be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the permit as such.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

The permit can be appealed. Preliminary decisions, e.g. regarding permitting or construction works, taken during the preparation of case may also be challenged. The routes of appeal in cases concerning licensing are as follows:

- County Administrative Board – Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed)
- Land and Environment Court – Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) – the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed)

The Government, in certain cases according to the Environmental Code, decides on permissibility for very large hazardous activities such, as facilities for nuclear operations. Decisions by the Government cannot be appealed but may be subject to a legal review by the Supreme Administrative Court. As a general rule, an appeal of a decision must have been received by the decision-making authority within three weeks of the date on which the appellant received the decision through that authority. However, if the appellant is a party representing the public, the appeal must have been received within three weeks from the date of the decision being notified. The time limit regarding judgments from the Land and Environment Courts follows the general rule for district courts in civil cases, that is three weeks from the passing of the judgment. The decision-making authority or court then makes sure that the appeal was made within the right time limit and sends the appeal to the court or authority which will try the case.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

In order to challenge the final authorisation, you need to show that you are a party concerned according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code or an NGO which meets the requirements in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Code.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.

8) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Regardless of who makes the decisions, the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, an appeal may be filed directly with a court; the Land and Environment Court if the licensing authority is the County Administrative Board or the Land and Environment Court of Appeal if the permit is issued by the Land and Environment Court.

9) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

10) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings. Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party.
11) How is the notion of "timeliness" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no clear provisions protecting the interest of the public concerned to have their cases handled in a timely manner by an administrative organ, except for a very general statement in the Administrative Procedure Act that a case must be handled as simply, quickly and cost-effectively as possible without compromising the rule of law. However, if an authority assesses that the decision in a case initiated by an individual party will be materially delayed, the authority shall inform the party thereof. In such a notification, the authority shall report the reason for the delay. If a case initiated by an individual party has not been settled in the first instance within six months, the party may request in writing that the authority shall decide the case. The Authority shall, within four weeks from the date of such a request, either decide the matter or, in a special decision, reject the request. Such a decision to reject a request that the case be decided may be appealed to the court or administrative authority competent to review an appeal against the decision in the case. In court, a party may apply for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.

12) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

13) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

1.8.3. Environmental liability

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
A decision by a municipality must undergo administrative appeal at the County Administrative Board prior to a possibility to have it tried in court.
A decision by a County Administrative Board can be appealed to the Land and Environment Court and the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed) even if it states that the authority will take no action. The same rules on standing apply as for permits according to the Environmental Code (Chapter 16 Sections 12 and 13).

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code and the Ordinance on Environmental Assessments include regulation on involving other countries in the EIA process. If a harmful activity or measure is likely to have a significant environmental impact in another country, or if a country that may be significantly affected by the activity or measure so requests, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall:

- inform the competent authority of the other country about the activity or measure, its possible cross-border consequences and the type of decision that may be made; and
- give the competent authority of the other country reasonable time to comment on whether it wants to participate in the environmental assessment.

If the other country wishes to participate in the environmental assessment, the Agency shall give the other country the opportunity to participate in a consultation process on the environmental impact assessment and the final permit application.

2) Notion of public concerned?

When consultations are to take place with another country according to Chapter 6 Section 13 or 33 of the Environmental Code, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall agree with the responsible authority in that country on how the consultation is to be carried out so that the authorities and the public concerned in the other country are given the opportunity to submit comments within a reasonable time, which should be at least 30 days. For the purpose of completing consultations with other countries, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency may announce information in Sweden, in another country in the European Union and in another country that is a party under the Espoo Convention on Environmental Impact Assessments in a Transboundary Context. Before an announcement is made in another country, the Agency must consult that country's responsible authority.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

When it comes to participating during consultation with other countries, foreign NGOs are part of the public concern.

The general rule on standing for NGOs can be found in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code. This rule, however, excludes foreign NGOs, since it clearly states that an NGO needs to have been operating in Sweden for at least three years. Due to the 1974 Nordic Environmental Protection Convention, special legislation exists, however, on non-discrimination of Nordic environmental NGOs.

As the current Swedish legislation does not provide standing for foreign NGOs, there are no specific procedural rules on when to appeal, procedural assistance etc.

In the EU context, the current Swedish provision is to be regarded as discriminatory. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a challenge from a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that the organisation had not shown that it had support by the public. The judgment with reasoning regarding the support by the public in Poland indicates that a court would set aside the current provision and not dismiss a foreign NGO on the ground that it has not been operating in Sweden.

The problem has been discussed in Governmental bill regarding EIAs, and the provision has been found discriminatory and thus should be altered, but so far nothing has happened.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

If an individual living in another country can show that they are a person whom the judgment or decision concerns and that the decision affects them adversely according to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code or Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act, they have the same rights as an individual living in Sweden, including the right to injunctive relief where such is possible.

As for legal aid and pro bono help, there is no such help available for any party in environmental matters. The general rules will apply and are motivated by the ex officio principle for the decision-maker to examine the case.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

If a harmful activity or measure can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact in another country, or if a country that may be significantly affected by the activity or action so requests, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall inform the other country of the activity or measure. If the other country wishes to participate in the environmental assessment, the Agency shall give the other country the opportunity to participate in a consultation process on the environmental impact assessment and the final permit application.

When consultations are to take place with another country, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall agree with the responsible authority in that country on how the consultation is to be carried out so that the authorities and the public concerned in the other country are given the opportunity to submit comments.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

When consultations are to take place with another country according to Chapter 6 Section 13 or 33 of the Environmental Code, the Swedish Environmental Protection Agency shall agree with the responsible authority in that country on how the consultation is to be carried out so that the authorities and the public concerned in the other country are given the opportunity to submit comments within a reasonable time.

A decision may be appealed within three weeks from when the decision or judgement is made.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Section 33 of the Administrative Procedure Act stipulates that an authority that announces a decision in a case shall, as soon as possible, notify the party of the complete content of the decision, unless this is clearly unnecessary. If the party is entitled to appeal the decision, they must also be informed of the procedure. The authority shall at the same time inform the party of dissenting opinions that have been recorded in accordance with section 30 or in accordance with special provisions in another constitution. A notice of how to appeal must contain information about what requirements are placed on the form and content of the appeal and what applies in terms of filing and appeal time.

A similar rule can be found in Section 30 of the Court Matters Act. In cases where a decision can be appealed, the parties shall be informed of this. If the decision means that the case has been decided, the parties shall be informed of what they must observe in an appeal. If the case has not been decided, the parties shall be informed that they may, on request, obtain such information from the court. If leave to appeal is required on appeal, the parties shall also be informed of this and of the grounds on which such leave may be granted.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

According to the Administrative Procedure Act, Section 3, an authority shall use an interpreter and ensure that documents are translated if necessary in order for the individual to be able to exercise their right when the authority has contact with someone who does not have mastery of Swedish.
The court may, if necessary, according to Code of Judicial Procedure, Chapter 33, Section 9, translate documents that are sent in or sent out by the court. The court is obliged to translate a document in a criminal case, or the most important parts of it, for the suspect or at the request of an appellant, if a translation is essential to enable the suspect or appellant to exercise their right. The translation may be made orally if it is not inappropriate for the purposes of the document or the case or any other circumstance. By reference to Section 48 of the Court Matters Act, that provision is also applicable in administrative cases at the land and environment courts.

[1] There are some exceptions to this main rule: Decisions on environmental sanction fees and on legally binding land use plans are challenged directly to the Land and Environment Court and not via the County Administrative Board.

Last update: 22/09/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

On a high level, the Swedish review procedures cover most of the provisions of the Aarhus Convention. There are, however, some limitations in the access to justice due to leave to appeal obligations and standing restrictions for environmental organisations, which gives rise to conformity concerns. There is also a lack of information regarding the possibility of the public concerned to appeal permit decisions under the Environmental Code.

The Environmental Code constitutes a framework legislation that consists of the general provisions regarding environmental protection. It applies to all human activities that might harm the environment. The Code contains the environmental principles and provisions providing for environmental quality norms as well as environmental impact assessments. Certain water operations, industrial undertakings, quarries and other environmentally hazardous activities are subject to permit or notification requirements in Government ordinances. The Code also contains provisions relating to nature protection, flora and fauna, genetically modified organisms, chemicals and waste. Thus, the Code regulates issues concerning the EIA, the IPPC/IED Directives and the ELD Directive, as well as other environmental decisions, acts and omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation. The general rules on legal standing in Chapter 12 Sections 13 and 14 of the Environmental Code are also applicable in those cases that fall outside the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED and ELD.

According to Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code, appeals may be made against appealable judgments or decisions by any person who is the subject of a judgment or decision against them.

NGOs which meet the requirements stipulated in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code may challenge many administrative decisions. The requirements are that the NGO is a non-profit association whose purpose according to its statutes is to safeguard nature conservation or environmental protection interests. The association furthermore must have conducted activities in Sweden for at least three years and have at least 100 members or by some other means show that its activities are supported by the public. In respect of shore protection, the provisions also apply to non-profit associations whose purpose according to their statutes is to promote outdoor interests (Chapter 16 Section 14 of the Code).

When a permit has been granted through a judgement by the Land and Environment Court, this judgment may be appealed, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal. In second instance, the judgment may, with leave to appeal, be appealed to the Supreme Court. This limits the right to access to a review procedure for decisions issued by the Land and Environment Court in the first instance. Consequently, in situations where the initial permit decision is taken by the Land and Environment Court and is appealed to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal, the Swedish review system does not appear to comply with the Convention.

Rules on natural habitat protection originating in the Habitat Directive and in the Bird Directive have been implemented both in Chapter 7 of the Environmental Code and in the Ordinance on Area Protection. Permits are required to conduct activities or take measures that can significantly affect the environment in a Natura 2000 site. Such permits are issued by the County Administrative Boards for smaller activities and measures, but if the activity or measure also requires permits according to EIA- and/or IPPC/IED-related rules, an overall assessment is made and the licensing authority may then be the County Administrative Board or the Land and Environment Court, depending on the type of activity in question.

Rules on species protection originating in the Habitat Directive and in the Bird Directive have been implemented both in Chapter 8 of the Environmental Code and in the Species Protection Ordinance, the Game Act and the Fishing Act. The Species Protection Ordinance includes regulation on protection of wild birds, wild animal species and plant species protected in the stated directives. In individual cases, the County Administrative Boards may, under certain circumstances, grant exemption from the prohibitions. Decisions on exemptions or omissions concerning species protection can be appealed under the same regulations as those applicable in other cases under the Environmental Code. The authorities' decisions are appealed to the Land and Environment Court and, after leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal.

Decisions on hunting are, if the requirements based on the Habitat Directive and on the Bird Directive are met, taken by the County Administrative Boards according to the Game Act and the Game Ordinance. The decision can be appealed to the Administrative Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court. Rules on standing can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act. A person whom the decision concerns may appeal against it, provided that the decision affects them adversely and is subject to appeal. According to established case law, environmental NGOs also have the right to appeal decisions under the Game Ordinance on hunting of species protected by the Habitats Directive and the Bird Directive.

In order to start a mine in Sweden, three different permits are needed. An exploration permit gives access to the land and an exclusive right to explore within the permit area, while an exploitation concession gives the holder the right to exploit a proven, extractable mineral deposit for a period of 25 years according to the Minerals Act. A permit according to the Environmental Code is also needed. Exploration for minerals may affect water quality and nature. However, the rules on standing when it comes to exploration permits are limited through case law. The general rule for individuals can be found in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act. In case law, the Administrative Court of Appeal has ruled that only those who own the land where the exploration will take place and others with special rights, such as land tenants and holders of hunting and fishing rights, in the same area have standing. NGOs have no standing and cannot appeal an exploration permit, not even if the exploration affects nature or water. When it comes to permits according to the Environmental Code, the ordinary rules in Chapter 16 Sections 12, 13 and 14 apply.

Chapter 16 Section 13 stipulates that an NGO must have been conducting activities in Sweden for three years in order to have legal standing. This requirement of a three-year period of conducting activities in Sweden appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention and general EU law principles of non-discrimination. This restriction means that no environmental organisations from other EU Member States may have standing before the Swedish courts. There may be industrial emission activities that affect the environment in other Member States, but environmental organisations from these other Member States would not be able to bring a case regarding these activities in Sweden. (There is an Environmental Protection Convention between Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, which at least ensures that environmental organisations from these countries will have standing before Swedish courts). In the EU context, the current Swedish provision is to be regarded as discriminatory. In a decision of 21 December 2018 from the Supreme Administrative Court, case 4840-18, a challenge from a Polish NGO was dismissed, but on the grounds that the organisation had not showed that it had support by the public. The judgment with reasoning regarding the support by the public in Poland indicates that a court would set aside the current provision and not dismiss a foreign NGO on the grounds that it has not been operating in Sweden. The problem has been discussed in a Governmental bill regarding EIAs, and the provision has been found discriminatory and thus should be altered, but so far nothing has happened.

The Planning and Building Act refers to the general rules in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act and, by reference to the rules in Chapter 16 Sections 13 and 14, NGOs have been given the right to standing, but in principle only in cases regarding detailed municipal land use plans. The narrow scope, though, has been expanded through recent case law from the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court. According to Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. Hence, the right to appeal for persons concerned and NGOs is, when it comes to urban detailed development plans, limited to those who have submitted their opinions on the matter during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered. This rule appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even perform investigations at the location in question if this is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues. The claims of the parties will set the frame for the process, however the court is not bound by the causes of action invoked and may base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Regardless of who makes the decisions, the County Administrative Board or a Land and Environment Court, an appeal may be filed directly with a court; the Land and Environment Court if the licensing authority is the County Administrative Board, or the Land and Environment Court of Appeal if the permit is issued by the Land and Environment Court.

If the first decision is taken by a local authority, with few exceptions an appeal must first be made through administrative appeal at the County Administrative Board prior to challenging the decision at court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation at the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgment on a permit has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

An exception to this general rule is decisions of a municipality regarding detailed development plans under the Planning and Building Act. To challenge such decisions, the appellant must have raised the objections during the preparatory procedure in the consultation phase.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

No grounds or arguments are precluded from the judicial review phase.

The absence of litigation costs in administrative cases means that each party has to cover its own costs. This may result in an unequal situation, but this is intended to be regulated by the ex officio principle and the burden on the court to investigate the case, not just to clarify foggy parts.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Swedish law requires equal opportunities of the parties in environmental proceedings. Each party has the same legal rights to call witnesses and experts and to challenge argumentation and experts presented by the other party.

The absence of litigation costs in administrative cases means that each party has to cover its own costs. This may result in an unequal situation, but this is intended to be regulated by the ex officio principle and the burden on the court to investigate the case, not just to clarify foggy parts.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

In the Swedish judicial system, there are no binding time limits within which a court must handle a case. Sweden has incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into Swedish law through the Act on the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Article 6(1) of the ECHR states that everyone shall have the right to ‘a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law’.

There is a possibility for a party to ask for priority of a case according to the Priority Review Act.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Normally a permit or an exemption cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Hence there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases. There is, though, a possibility to decide that such decisions, as well as decisions from the supervisory authority, shall be directly executable. If appealed, the higher instance (irrespective of whether this is a County Administrative Board or a court) can decide on injunctive relief following the general rules.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no costs for bringing a case to court according to these rules. Each party only has to bear its own costs, but the Swedish environmental legislation does not require legal representation, neither for the administrative procedure nor for the judicial review process, and not even for appeals to the Environmental Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court. The only exception to the general rule of a free environmental procedure is found in the permitting procedure for water operations. The applicant here has to pay the litigation costs of all those who will be affected by the activity.

In civil cases concerning damages, the general rules on legal procedure apply, which means that the losing party has to pay all the winning party’s legal costs; the loser party pays principle in full. In civil cases, the litigant has to pay a court fee, around 300 Euros.

Because of this there is no need for rules to safeguard the cost being prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedure to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Chapter 6 Sections 3 to 19 of the Environmental Code sets out the rules for strategic environmental assessments for plans and programmes falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable to all plans and programmes drawn up for a number of sectors, setting out the framework for future authorisations for the projects listed in Annexes I and II to Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment, and all plans and programmes which have been deemed to require an assessment in accordance with the Habitat Directive.

In Sweden, the SEA is an intrinsic part of the planning procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the plan or programme. The SEA shall be approved only if the direct and indirect impacts of the plan or programme are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and, if approved, this will be noted in the decision concerning the plan or programme.

Because of this system, the SEA, or any part of it, such as screening, scoping or final authorisation of the EIA itself, cannot be appealed separately. However, the EIA, including both the procedural requirements and the information it contains in a specific case, can be challenged when appealing the plan as such.

Spatial planning

Sweden has no cross-sector planning for land on the national level; however, there is national-level maritime planning. By 2021 there will be three maritime spatial plans for separate geographical zones. National transportation infrastructure planning also affects the conditions of municipal and regional physical planning.

Like the national planning, the regional planning is relatively limited. The Planning and Building Act stipulates that the municipalities are responsible for the planning of the use of land and water within their geographical boundaries.

The municipality must have a current comprehensive plan that covers the entire area of the municipality. In this plan, the municipality shall present the basic characteristics of its intended use of land and water areas. The plan also has to indicate how the municipality intends to take into account national and regional goals, plans and programmes of significance for sustainable development within the municipality. The stipulations in a comprehensive plan are not legally binding. But if statements are clear and well developed, the practice of the courts show that these plans can have a strong guiding effect.

If the land is unexploited, then an urban detailed development plan process generally needs to be initiated. A detailed development plan enables the municipality to regulate the use of land and water areas in a particular area and is regularly required for all operations listed in Annexes I and II of the EIA Directive and for all public and environmental private projects which have been deemed to require an assessment in accordance with the Habitat Directive.

The detailed development plan regulates what are public spaces, development districts and water areas, and how they are to be used and designed. The stipulations in a detailed development plan are binding for adjudication of subsequent building permit applications.

According to the Planning and Building Act, Chapter 13, Section 1, a municipal decision on comprehensive plans may be appealed by any member of a municipality to the Administrative Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court within three weeks of the decision. In these cases, the administrative courts only try the legality of the municipality’s or region’s decision. There is no requirement to participate in the public participation stage of the administrative procedure. There is no cost involved in bringing a challenge of a comprehensive plan to court. Each party is only responsible for its own costs, even if it loses the case. The comprehensive plan does not enter into force until the possibility of appeal has passed. Hence there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases.

Municipal decisions on detailed development plans according to the Planning and Building Act, Chapter 13, Section 2, are appealed directly to one of the Land and Environment Courts and may be appealed further to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal (leave to appeal needed). In its judgment, the Land and Environment Court of Appeal may decide to grant permission to appeal the judgment to the Supreme Court, if the decision is of interest as a precedent. The Supreme Court still decides whether or not to grant leave to appeal.

The Planning and Building Act regulates the right for environmental NGOs referred to in Chapter 16, Section 13, of the Environmental Code to appeal a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan likely to have a significant environmental impact given that the planned area may be used for certain types of activity, and a decision to adopt, amend or set aside a detailed development plan that stipulates that an area will no longer be covered by shore protection. The right to standing for environmental organisations applies provided that decisions on the matter can be expected to have an adverse environmental effect.

For individuals, the general rule on standing in the Administrative Procedure Act is applicable. According to case law, an individual may usually appeal building permits and development plans which may affect them personally (they are neighbours or living within or directly adjacent to the area to which a municipal plan applies).

According to Chapter 13 Section 11 of the Planning and Building Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. Hence the right to appeal for the persons concerned is, when it comes to urban detailed development plans, limited to those who have submitted their opinions on the matter during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered. This rule appears to be contrary to the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Planning cases may only be challenged at court.

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court may even, on its own initiative, perform investigations at the location in question if it is needed in order to examine the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material issues, but also to procedural issues.
The scope of the review in planning cases, however, is more restricted than in other administrative cases, and in principle just focuses on the issues raised by the appellant, Chapter 13 Section 17 of the Planning and Building Act.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
The decisions on planning taken by the municipality according to the Planning and Building Act may be appealed directly to the Land and Environment Court and, with leave to appeal, to the Land and Environment Court of Appeal and, finally, to the Supreme Court (leave to appeal needed) if the Land and Environment Court of Appeal provides for this in its judgment (when a precedence is desired).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed development plan according to the Building and Planning Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority during the public consultation phase as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person may only appeal a decision on a detailed development plan if they have submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinion have not been considered.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
The urban detailed development plan does not enter into force until the possibility of appeal has passed, so there is no need for injunctive relief in these cases.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
There is no cost involved in bringing a challenge of a comprehensive or a detailed development plan to court. Each party is only responsible for its own costs, even if they lose the case.

Because of this, there is no need for rules to safeguard against the cost being prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

An exception is municipal comprehensive and regional planning according to the Planning and Building Act, which may be challenged through legal review. Any member of a municipality or region has the right to have the legality of the municipality's or region's decision on the plans reviewed by appealing the decision directly to the Administrative Court. The scope of the examination of the court is narrow and the "ex-officio principle" does not apply. In examining the appeal, the court may not take into account circumstances other than those to which the appellant referred before expiry of the appeal period. An appealed decision shall be set aside if it has not come about legally; the decision concerns something that is not a matter for the municipality or the region; the body which took the decision did not have the right to do so; or the decision is otherwise contrary to law or other constitution. There are no requirements for participation in the public participation phase of the administrative procedure before filing a complaint to the court. There are no costs for bringing a case to court, not even if the case is lost.

The administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirement of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention are mainly found in Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code.

In Sweden, the consulting procedures are an intrinsic part of the planning procedure, and this assessment is not made separately to the decision regarding the plan or programme. The plan or programme shall be approved only if the consultation has taken place and if the direct and indirect impacts of the plan or programme are deemed to be adequately described in accordance with the provisions of the Code, and, if approved, this will be noted in the decision concerning the plan or programme.

Because of this system, the procedure itself cannot be appealed separately. However, the procedural requirements and the information contained in a specific case can be challenged when appealing the plan or programme as such.

Chapter 6 of the Code includes regulation on screening, scoping and final authorisation of the plans and programmes relating to the environment, not only those falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable for all plans and programmes if the implementation of the plan, programme or change can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact. This includes action plans necessary to comply with an environmental quality standard, national and municipal waste plans, municipal comprehensive plans (covering the whole municipality), regional planning, municipal plans for supply, distribution and use of energy, regional plans for transport infrastructure, marine spatial planning, national plans for sustainable hydropower and any other plans or programmes relating to agriculture or forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, regional development, waste management, water management, telecommunications, tourism, spatial planning or land use.

The rules stipulate that the authority responsible for the plan or programme shall consult municipalities, County Administrative Boards and other authorities that, due to their special environmental responsibility, can be assumed to be affected by the plan or programme (Chapter 6, Sections 6 and 9). There are no rules stipulating the participation of the public concerned (neither individuals nor NGOs) when it comes to plans and programmes, only when it comes to environmentally hazardous activities. But nothing prevents an authority from consulting the public as well.

Chapter 6, Section 15, stipulates that the authority or municipality, as early as possible in the work on the proposal for a plan or programme, has to conduct an environmental impact assessment and make it and the proposal available to the public and the municipalities and authorities that, due to their special environmental responsibility, can be assumed to be affected. They must be given information on how they can take part in the proposal and the environmental impact assessment, as well as how and within what time comments can be submitted. The time for submitting comments must be reasonable.

In a decision to adopt a plan or programme, there shall be an account of how the environmental aspects have been integrated into the plan or programme; how the environmental impact assessment and comments received have been taken into account; the reasons why the plan or programme has been adopted instead of the options considered; and the measures planned to monitor and follow up the significant environmental impact of the implementation of the plan or programme (Chapter 6, Section 16). The plan or programme shall be made available to the public and the authorities and municipalities that, due to their special environmental responsibility, can be assumed to be affected.

There are also general rules in the Administrative Procedure Act that an authority must provide the individual with assistance such that they can protect their interests. The assistance shall be provided to the extent that is appropriate with regard to the nature of the issue, the individual's need for assistance and the authority's activities. It should be given without undue delay (Section 6).
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act, or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Plans and programmes not falling under the SEA Directive are, under Swedish law, generally not binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

Chapter 6 of the Environmental Code includes regulation on screening, scoping and final authorisation of plans and programmes relating to the environment, not only those falling under the SEA Directive. The rules are applicable for all plans and programmes if the implementation of the plan, programme or change can be assumed to have a significant environmental impact. This includes action plans necessary to comply with an environmental quality standard, national and municipal waste plans, municipal comprehensive plans (covering the whole municipality), regional planning, municipal plans for supply, distribution and use of energy, regional plans for transport infrastructure, marine spatial planning, national plans for sustainable hydropower and any other plans or programmes relating to agriculture or forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, regional development, waste management, water management, telecommunications, tourism, spatial planning or land use.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

7) Fair, equitable — what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

None of the plans and programmes mentioned above are, according to Swedish law, binding for the public, only indicative or binding for authorities. They are not therefore considered to be such decisions as are appealable by individuals or NGOs. There is no legal remedy against these legal instruments.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

EU legislation is implemented in Sweden through acts adopted by the Parliament (Riksdag) or by ordinances adopted by the Government. By statutory authorisation, many of the central administrative authorities are also responsible for issuing regulations within their field of operation.

The Government and other regulatory bodies regularly apply consultation procedure in connection with the preparation of rules that have general interest. The Government will then appoint a commission of inquiry. After a commission of inquiry has submitted its report, the Government forwards it to relevant public agencies, organisations and municipalities in order to hear their opinions on the proposals. This is known as referral of a report for consideration.

Anyone, including private individuals, is entitled to submit comments to the Government. The Government can also adopt rules without having to present a proposal to the Riksdag first. Such rules are known as ordinances. The Instrument of Government sets out what must be decided by law and what can be decided in an ordinance.

There is no Constitutional Court in Sweden, nor any abstract norm control. Instead, when a court is dealing with a case, it is obliged to control the legal basis for the decision and must disregard any act or statute which is in conflict with the Constitution or superior norms. During an ongoing individual case there exists a right of judicial review, meaning that courts and other public bodies have the right to override laws that are contrary to the Constitution and thereby also contrary to EU law. The Swedish right of judicial review for courts is regulated in Chapter 11 Section 14 of the Instrument of Government for Government and in Chapter 12 Section 10 of the Instrument of Government for authorities.

Since there is a need for an individual case in order to also bring up questions on implementation of EU environmental legislation and other regulatory acts, the rules on standing are the same as in any other individual environmental case in Sweden. The main rules for individuals may be found in Chapter 16 Section 12 of the Environmental Code and in Section 42 of the Administrative Procedure Act, and the main rules for NGOs may be found in Chapter 16 Section 13 of the Environmental Code. When a case is open, the individual and NGO with standing may also argue that EU legislation has not been implemented correctly into Swedish law. It is also possible in an ongoing case for individuals and NGOs to bring a legal challenge before the court to ask for the possibility to get a preliminary ruling concerning the interpretation of EU legislation according to Article 267 TFEU.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are no administrative procedural rules under Swedish law that set out the scope of the review of the Court. The relevant court will review both the substantive and procedural legality of the judgment or decision. The ultimate responsibility for the investigation of the case rests with the court according to the “ex officio principle”. The Court must, through communication with the parties, ensure that the case is examined properly and that any ambiguities are clarified. It is thus obliged and competent to fully examine the facts/merits of the case. The Court’s obligation to examine the case on its own initiative applies not only to material or procedural issues, but also issues such as whether EU legislation is implemented in a correct way. The Court is bound by the claims of the parties, though not the causes of action invoked, and can base its judgment on circumstances other than those invoked by the parties.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Decisions made by the County Administrative Boards according to the Environmental Code and municipal decisions on planning according to the Planning and Building Act can be directly appealed to the Land and Environment Court. In principle, all other decisions from the municipality are appealed via the County Administrative Board prior to challenge in Court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There are no requirements under the Swedish Environmental Code regarding participation in the public consultation stage in order to be able to appeal a decision. There are thus no preclusion requirements. Once a decision or judgement has been issued, it may be appealed by anyone who is adversely affected by the decision.

When it comes to a decision to adopt, amend or repeal a detailed plan or area regulations according to the Building and Planning Act, the appellant is obliged to participate in the administrative procedure with the permitting authority as a precondition for being entitled to take a case to national court. A person may only appeal a decision on a detailed development plan if they have submitted their opinions on the matter in writing during the initial examination period at the municipality and those opinions have not been considered.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Normally a permit or plan cannot be utilised until the possibility of appeal has passed. Permit decisions may, however, be combined with a “go-ahead decision” enabling the applicants to start their activity. If a go-ahead decision has been granted, the public concerned can ask the court for an injunction of that decision.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no costs for bringing a case to court according to these rules, not even if the case is lost. Because of this, there is no need for rules to safeguard against the cost being prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[8]

All parties in an ongoing case may petition that the court trying the case request a preliminary ruling from the EU Court. This may be done regardless of which court is reviewing the case. It is up to the court to decide whether a preliminary ruling is necessary.
In summary, it can be stated that there are currently very few legally based opportunities to prevent defiance. The legal situation in Sweden is that the duty under the Environmental Code, for the County Administrative Board to order a municipality to fulfil its obligations regarding supervision (Chapter 26 Section 1 of the Environmental Code) is that the Board can only order an inspection or a report. There are not many different sanctions available apart from those mentioned above. There is, however, a possibility, in certain areas, such as supervision of municipalities, to take the accused to District Court.

Penalties when public administration fail to provide effective access to justice

Apart from the role of the Ombudsmen, Chapter 20 Section 1 of the Criminal Code (1962:700) states that anyone who intentionally, or through negligence in the exercise of authority, by act or omission, violates what is applicable for the task shall be sentenced to misconduct, a fine or imprisonment for a maximum of two years. If the act, with regard to the perpetrator's powers or the task's connection with the exercise of authority in general, or to other circumstances, is to be regarded as minor, the person shall not be held liable. For instance, municipal officials and politicians in municipal committees and boards are covered by the rules on misconduct in the exercise of their authority. On the other hand, members of state or municipal assemblies, i.e. members of the Riksdag and members of municipal and county council assemblies, are exempt from responsibility for measures they take in this capacity. A public prosecutor can decide to take the accused to District Court.

The Public Employment Act, applicable for all employees of the Parliament and its authorities and for authorities reporting to the Government, stipulates that an employee who intentionally, or through negligence, violates their obligations in their employment, may be given a disciplinary sanction for misconduct. If the error is small, in view of all the circumstances, no penalty may be pronounced. Such disciplinary sanctions are a warning and a salary deduction.

Penalties when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected

When it comes to contempt of court by administrations such as municipalities, there are various instruments for controlling municipal activities. However, there are not many different sanctions available apart from those mentioned above. There is, however, a possibility, in certain areas, such as supervision duties under the Environmental Code, for the County Administrative Board to order a municipality to fulfil its obligations regarding supervision (Chapter 26 Section 8).

In summary, it can be stated that there are currently very few legally based opportunities to prevent defiance. The legal situation in Sweden is that the municipalities and their representatives in certain areas can choose to disregard applicable laws and regulations and even court judgments. There are no legal possibilities to demand responsibility or sanction decision-makers other than those mentioned.
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - United Kingdom

Constitutional Foundations

Judiciary

Access to Information Cases

Access to Justice in Public Participation

Access to Justice against Acts or Omissions

Other Means of Access to Justice

Legal Standing

Legal Representation

Evidence

Injunctive Relief

Costs

Financial Assistance Mechanisms

Timeliness

Other Issues

Being a Foreigner

Transboundary Cases

Introduction

The UK consists of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. It also has international responsibility for Gibraltar, Guernsey, Jersey, and the Isle of Man. The relevant law for England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland is set out in the main text. Please see separate Annexes for information on Gibraltar, Guernsey, Jersey and the Isle of Man.

Constitutional foundations

The UK does not have a single codified written constitution. Environmental actions in respect of the decisions of a public authority may be brought under Article 8 of, or Article 1 of Protocol 1 to, the European Convention on Human Rights where there is interference with the peaceful enjoyment of a possession. The Convention is implemented in the UK by the Human Rights Act 1998. While parties may not rely directly on the provisions of an international treaty that has not been implemented in UK law by an Act of Parliament or secondary legislation, a court will try and construe legislation in a way that accords with the UK’s international obligations.

Courts and administrative bodies do not apply the Aarhus Convention directly except for those provisions of it that have been implemented by an Act or Order, or through EU law, which is directly applicable in domestic law – Morgan v Hinton Organics (Wessex) Ltd [2009] EWCA Civ 107. However in Walton v Scottish Ministers [2012] UKSC 44 it was said that decisions of the Aarhus Compliance Committee should be treated with respect.

It should be noted that upon signature (confirmed upon ratification) the United Kingdom made the following statement in relation to the Aarhus Convention: “The United Kingdom understands the references in article 1 and the seventh preambular paragraph of this Convention to the ‘right’ of every person ‘to live in an environment adequate to his or her health and well-being’ to express an aspiration which motivated the negotiation of this Convention and which is shared fully by the United Kingdom. The legal rights which each Party undertakes to guarantee under article 1 are limited to the rights of access to information, public participation in decision-making and access to justice in environmental matters in accordance with the provisions of this Convention.”

Courts

There are no specialist environmental courts in the UK. In England and Wales (E&W) and Northern Ireland (N.I.) environmental criminal cases begin in the magistrates’ court – presided over by lay magistrates or a District Judge. Serious cases are tried in the Crown Court by a judge and jury. In Scotland minor criminal cases are dealt with by the Justice of the Peace courts, while more serious cases are tried in the Sheriff court by a Sheriff, alone or with a jury. The most serious cases are heard in the High Court of Justiciary by a judge and jury.

Magistrates (Sheriffs) can hear statutory nuisance cases – nuisances that are defined by statute - where the aim is to abate the nuisance rather than recover damages. Civil cases in E&W and N.I. such as nuisance actions are usually tried in the county court by a circuit judge in E&W and by a county court judge in NI. Cases that are more complicated or of high value are tried in the High Court by a high court judge. The Technology and Construction Court is a division of the High Court in E&W which specialises in technically complex issues. In Scotland smaller claims are heard in the Sheriff Court and more valuable ones in the Outer House of the Court of Session.

Cases where a judicial review is brought against decisions of the government or local government are heard in E&W and N.I. by the administrative division of the High Court by a high court judge. In Scotland they are heard in the Court of Sessions.

Judges are drawn from the legal profession and have to have been in practice for a certain amount of years before they can apply to become a judge. Many in E&W start as Recorders – part time judges – before going on to become Circuit or High Court Judges. In Scotland they often start as part-time Sheriffs or have been senior lawyers and in NI they start as deputy sitting part time. Judges are independent of the state. There are no specialist environmental judges, although judges dealing with environmental cases have naturally built up expertise in that area.

Tribunals

In E&W, where a planning decision is disputed the applicant – but not any objectors – may appeal against the decision. The appeal will be heard by an inspector from the Planning Inspectorate. These inspectors will also hear an applicant’s or permit holder’s appeals from decisions in respect of environmental permits, water abstraction licences and other environmental regulatory matters. In Scotland such appeals are dealt with either by a Reporter appointed by the Directorate for Planning and Environmental Appeals or, in respect of certain planning applications, by the planning authority’s Local Review Body, depending on the scale of the development and each planning authorities own procedures. In Northern Ireland appeals are heard by Commissioners from the Planning Appeals Commission.

Where someone is in breach of certain environmental legislation in E&W the relevant Agency can impose civil sanctions rather than take criminal proceedings – Environmental Civil Sanctions (England) Order 2010 (SI 2010/1157 (W. 2010/1821). Appeals in respect of such sanctions are heard by the First Tier (Environment) Tribunal. The legislatures of Northern Ireland and Scotland are considering similar provisions.
There is no forum shopping for different types of court available in civil actions in the UK. However a claimant may be able to bring an action in different local courts if he lives in one area but the harm occurred in another area. In Scotland claimants may in certain cases have a choice between bringing an action in the Sheriff Court or the Court of Session. In criminal cases (E&W) a defendant may choose to be tried in the magistrates’ court or the Crown Court if the offence is one that can be heard by that court.

Appeals and extraordinary remedies

Appeals from magistrates in E&W and N.I. are heard by a judge in the crown (county N.I.) court. If the appeal is as to the law, then the defendant can require the magistrates to state a case for the High Court. Appeals from the crown or county court are to the Court of Appeal (Criminal) Division. Appeals from the Court of Appeal go to the Supreme Court.

Appeals from a county court decision in a civil case will go either to a high court judge or the Court of Appeal, depending on the nature of the case. Anyone wishing to appeal must get permission from the court. Appeals from a high court decision in a civil or administrative case go to the Court of Appeal and again permission is required.

In Scotland civil appeals from the sheriff are heard by the Court of Session (Inner House). Appeals from there go to the UK Supreme Court. Criminal appeals from the sheriff are heard by the High Court of Justiciary. There is a separate avenue in Scotland for ECHR appeals to go to the Supreme Court.

There are extraordinary remedies in UK law such as injunctions/interdicts, mandatory orders and prohibiting orders. These are discussed below.

Cassation

In the UK where a judicial review is made of an administrative decision the court only has power to uphold that decision, to quash it or to require an authority to redress a failure to act. The court cannot put itself in the place of the administrative body and take the decision for it. In criminal cases, appeal courts will impose the sentence they think appropriate, they do not send the case back to the lower court (E&W). In planning / environmental permit appeals the administrative decision maker can change the substance of the original decision.

Judicial procedures

In the UK criminal prosecutions are brought by public prosecutors (and in E&W by public authorities or private individuals). They are started by the issue of an information in the magistrates’ court (E&W), summons in the magistrates court (NI) or by complaint to the Sheriff court or justice of the peace court or an indictment in the Sheriff court or High Court (Scotland). Environmental cases (E&W) will usually be brought by the Environment Agency, the Natural Resources Body for Wales or by local authorities.

Civil actions in E&W and N.I. to recover damages are dealt with by county courts or the High Court under the Civil Procedure Rule 1988 which set out the way in which cases should be brought and determined. In Northern Ireland, the County Court Rules (Northern Ireland) 1981 or the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980 apply. In Scotland the procedure is provided for in the Sheriff Court Ordinary Cause Rules or the Rules of the Court of Session. Environmental cases are usually actions for nuisance or allege negligence.

Actions to judicially review the decision of a public authority are started in the High Court under rule 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules in E&W, Order 53 of the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980 or rule 58 of the Rules of the Court of Session. Environmental cases are dealt with procedurally in the same way as other judicial reviews.

Judicial action from own motion

UK courts use an adversarial approach, rather than an inquisitorial one, reflecting the country’s common law heritage. Thus cases have to be brought by parties and the courts cannot initiate an action by their own motion. Where a case is before the court, the court can raise issues of its own motion but the parties must be allowed to address the judge on them.

III Access to Information

Remedies

Where an applicant for information considers that the relevant authority has failed to comply with a request the first step is to go back to the authority under regulation 11 (E&W and N.I.) or 16 (Scot) and ask it to review its decision. If the applicant is still dissatisfied after this process then a complaint can be made in E&W and N.I.to the Information Commissioner's Office under section 50 of the 2000 Act or to the Scottish Information Commissioner under section 47 of the 2002 Act. Appeals against the Commissioner's decision are usually made in E&W and N.I. to the First-tier Tribunal or in Scotland to the Court of Session.

If an authority refuses a request it must write to the applicant and explain why the request was refused. It must say what exemptions apply (reg 14(3)&(4) E&W and N.I.(13 (b) & (c) Scot)) and what the applicant can do if he or she wants to challenge the decision – reg. 14(5) or13(e)

Procedure

The Regulations impose a duty upon a public authority that holds environmental information to make it available on request. That duty is subject to a number of exceptions found in regulations 12 and 13 E&W and N.I. (10 & 11 Scot). A refusal of a request for environmental information must be made in writing as soon as possible and no later than 20 days (or 40 days in a complex case, reg. 7 (both)) after the date of receipt of the request, reg. 14 (13 Scot). A person whose request has been refused may ask the authority to review their decision. The review decision must be notified as soon as possible, and not later than 40 days after receipt of the request for a review, reg.11 (16 Scot). If the refusal to disclose is maintained the person whose request has been refused (“the complainant”) may apply for a decision from the Commissioner, section 50 of the 2000 Act as applied by reg. 18 (E&W and N.I.)(Section 47, Scot). The Commissioner will issue a formal decision notice under section 50(3) (49(5), Scot) on the application. The complainant or the public authority may appeal to the Tribunal against the Commissioner's decision notice, section 54 as applied ibid - to the Court of Session,( section 56, Scot). In E&W and N.I. an appeal to the Tribunal is governed by the Tribunal Procedure (First-tier Tribunal) (General Regulatory Chamber) Rules 2009. A notice of appeal must be received by the Tribunal within 28 days of the Commissioner's decision notice, rule 28(1). There is a further appeal on a point of law from the Tribunal to the Upper Tribunal.

The Commissioners will see the disputed information and have powers of entry and inspection (section 55 E&W and N.I.) (section 54 Scot) to obtain further information if they consider the provisions of the legislation are not being complied with. Where the release of information is contested in court, the court will view the information and rule as to whether it should be released, having regard to its contents.

Courts order information to be disclosed in civil and criminal proceedings. This will be under rule 31 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W) (Rule 9a, Sheriff Court Ordinary Cause Rules (Scot) or Parts 21-26 of the Criminal Procedure Rules (E&W) Chapter 7a Criminal Procedure Rules (Scot).

IV Access to Justice in Public Participation

Administrative procedures

Environmental licences such as permits for waste management sites or water abstraction licences are issued by the Environment Agency (E), the Department of the Environment in NI through the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, or the Natural Resources Body in Wales (“the Agencies”). The Agencies also enforce environmental protection legislation such as the Transfrontier Shipment of Waste Regulations 2007 and the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 2007. The regulation of the marine environment is mainly in the hands of the Marine Management Organisation (E&W and N.I.) who will issue licences under Part 4 of the Marine and Coastal Access Act 2009. For devolved consents, Marine Scotland has a similar role in waters adjacent to Scotland. Nature conservation matters such as establishing and supervising Sites of Special Scientific Interest (in N.I known as Areas of Special Scientific Interest) are handled by Natural England, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, by Scottish Natural Heritage and in Wales by the Natural Resources Body.

These bodies are concerned with major environmental issues. Local authorities will also have a role to play. They will licence some installations that can cause air pollution, monitor the quality of drinking water and be involved in nature conservation issues. They play a major role in the remediation of contaminated land under Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 does not extend to N.I. Contaminated Land in N.I is covered by part III of the Waste and Contaminated Land (N.I) Order 1996 which has not been commenced.

The decisions of these bodies, whether local or national like the Agencies, are generally subject to appeal to the government (Secretary of State, Scottish or Welsh Ministers). Thus for example a decision by the Agencies to refuse a water abstraction licence/CAR licence (controlled activities regulations licence) can be appealed to the Secretary of State or the Ministers by the unsuccessful applicant. In N.I such appeals lie to the Planning Appeals Commission.

Appeals to the Secretary of State, the Ministers or the Planning Appeals Commission are only available to applicants for the licence etc. or the person who is the subject of an enforcement notice. They are rarely allowed to go direct to court. Any other individual who has an interest in the matter and who wishes to question a first instance decision can seek leave to bring a judicial review in respect of it.

Judicial review of administrative procedures

Generally any alternative remedies should be exhausted before making an application for judicial review. This is not a decisive rule, but the applicant must have permission from the court to bring the action and permission may be refused if alternative remedies have not been exhausted – e.g R (Davies & ors) v Financial Services Authority [2003] EWCA Civ 1128. In Scotland, the Court of Session Rules, Chapter 58.3 provide that reviews cannot be brought if the matter could be dealt with by appeal or review under or by virtue of any enactment.

Judicial review in E&W, Scotland and N.I will look at procedural impropriety. That can involve issues like failing to adequately consult those who may be affected by a scheme – R(Greenpeace Ltd) v Secretary of State [2007] EWHC 311 (Admin) – failure to follow procedural steps required by the relevant legislation or rules – R (Kerr) v Cambridge City Council [2011] EWHC 1623 (Admin) - and failure to give adequate reasons for the decision – R (London

The courts will look at the legality of the substantive decision. A public authority must act within the powers granted to it by Parliament – Stewart v Perth and Kinross Council [2004] SC (HL) 71. If it does not, the exercise of a purported power is ultra vires – outside the body’s powers - and will be quashed. However courts will not second guess a democratically elected authority or a body like the Environment Agency that is appointed by Parliament to exercise statutory powers; as the authority to exercise that power has been given to the Agency, not the courts. But if the substantive decision is so unreasonable that no reasonable authority, properly advised, would have taken it then a court may quash it – R (Technoprint Ltd) v Leeds City Council [2010] EWHC 581 (Admin).

Generally courts will not verify material and technical findings and calculations in a judicial review. Unless a party raises the issue these matters are considered to have been rightly determined by the public authority. If there is a dispute it may be dealt with on the documents or, in rare cases, by cross-

Review of land use planning decisions

(Scotland) Act 1997). In E&W, regional strategies are required by Part 5 of the Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Act 2009 while local development documents will be made under Part 3 (Part 6 (W)) of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. The Planning Act 2006 sets out a special regime for major projects such as airports or large reservoirs. In Northern Ireland such projects may be dealt with under article 31 of the Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991. In Scotland the 1997 Act provides for the National Planning Framework (Part 1A) and for strategic and local development plans (Part II).

In England, Wales and Northern Ireland, all these strategies or plans will usually be subjected to a public inquiry. An inspector (Commissioner N.I. Reporter (S)) will hold the inquiry and report to the Secretary of State (E) or Ministers (N.I. S&W). The Secretary of State or Ministers may require an authority to reconsider parts of the plan.

In Scotland, the National Planning Framework will be published following public consultation and parliamentary consideration; and strategic and local development plans will be subject to examinations, carried out by reporters, into unresolved issues arising from public consultation.

Once a strategy or plan has been formally approved by the authority any legal challenge must be made to it within six weeks of that approval. The challenge can only be made by a “person aggrieved” by the relevant document on the grounds that it is not within the appropriate power or that a procedural requirement has not been complied with. The case is dealt with by the High Court (E&W and N.I.) or the Court of Session (S) - Planning Act 2004, section 113, T&C&P(S)A 1997, s. 238. The High Court can quash the relevant document wholly or in part or remit to the adopting authority with relevant directions –
PA 2008, s.113 (7) – (7C), while the Court of Session may quash it wholly or in part – s. 238(2)(b). Actions are brought under Part 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W) (Order 53 of the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980, Chapter 58 of the Rules of the Court of Session (S)) and evidence is by relevant documents and written statements – see e.g. Heard v Broadland District Council & ors [2012] EWHC 344 (Admin).

Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA)

EIA is prescribed for applications for planning permission for certain developments in England by the Town and Country Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations 2011 - SI2011/1824 and in N.I by the Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2012 (N.I 2012
59, S 2011/139 W. SI 1999/293). These development regulations are supplemented by others dealing with specific regimes such as the Water Resources

Screening decisions can be reviewed by the courts on an application for judicial review. An application (E&W) must be brought within three months of the relevant decision – R(U & Ptnrs (East Anglia)Ltd) v Broads Authority [2011] EWHC 1824 (Admin). The review is brought under Part 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W), (Chapter 58 of the Court of Session Rules) Order 53 of the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980). The review can be in respect of a failure to follow proper procedure – R (Birch) v Bamsley MBC [2010] EWCA Civ 1180 – failure to give adequate reasons as to why no EIA is required – R (Batemian) v South Cambridge DC [2011] EWCA Civ 157 – or because there was insufficient information on which the planning authority could determine whether EIA was required or not – R (Cooperative Group Ltd) v Northumberaland County Council [2010] EWHC 373 (Admin).

Scoping decisions can also be reviewed by the courts. The rules are the same as for any other judicial review of an EIA decision. However the Regulations provide for the planning authority to give a scoping opinion on request by the developer. If it fails to do so the remedy is to ask the Secretary of State (Minister) to give a relevant direction. Thus scoping reviews are likely to be rare if an opinion has been sought; although an objector could challenge the opinion or direction.

Final decisions can also be challenged in judicial review proceedings in the same way as other EIA judicial reviews. A review of a final decision may consider the adequacy of the EIA but the courts are reluctant to find a document that has been through the EIA process to be inadequate – R (Edwards & Pallikaropoulos) v Environment Agency [2008] UKHL 22. The courts consider that the Regulations recognise that an environmental statement may well be deficient, and make provision through the publicity and consultation processes for any deficiencies to be identified so that the resulting "environmental information" provides the local planning authority with as full a picture as possible. There may be cases where the document purporting to be an environmental statement could not reasonably be described as an environmental statement as defined by the Regulations but they are likely to be few and far between – R (Blewett) v Derbyshire County Council [2003] EWHC 2775 (Admin).

The court will look at the procedural legality of EIA decisions. They will not go into the merits of the case unless it can be shown that the resulting decision was irrational – R (Bowen West) v SoS for Communities and Local Government [2012] EWCA Civ 321 The court will look at further evidence in relation to material and technical findings etc. A mistake of fact giving rise to unfairness is a valid ground for review but any such mistake would have to have made a material difference to the relevant decision – Eley v SoS for Communities and Local Government [2009] EWHC 660 (Admin).

An application for review can be made by anyone "aggrieved" by the decision T&CPA 1990, s. 288(1) (T&CP(S)A 1997, s. 239 - as applied by regulation 42 of the Town and Country Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) (Scotland) Regulations 2011). While normally participation in the decision sought to be challenged is required, it may not be a decisive factor if the applicant has a substantial interest that is prejudiced by the decision – Ashton v SoS for Communities and Local Government & ors [2010] EWCA Civ 800. Non-governmental organisations may have a sufficient interest but may have to have participated in the process for their application for judicial review to be permitted.

A court can grant an interim injunction to halt a project where it is alleged that the EIA was inadequate pending the resolution of that issue – Belize Alliance of Conservation NGOs v Department of the Environment [2003] UKPC 63. An application for an injunction will be made as the relief sought in judicial review proceedings. Usually the applicant will have to offer the court an undertaking that it will meet any losses caused to the developer if an injunction is refused. In E&W and NI if, in a case to which the Aarhus Convention applies, the court is satisfied that an injunction is necessary to prevent significant environmental damage and to preserve the factual basis of the proceedings, it must, in considering whether to require an undertaking and its terms, have particular regard to the need for the order overall such as would make continuing with the case prohibitively expensive for the applicant and to make any necessary directions to ensure that the case is heard at the earliest opportunity. (Practice Direction 25, Civil Procedure Rules (E&W)) and the Costs Protection (Aarhus Convention) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 (NI)) The court will consider the balance of convenience between the parties in determining the application – R (Save Britain’s Heritage) v SoS for Communities and Local Government & or [2010] EWCA Civ 1500. There are no special rules in respect of injunctions in EIA cases.

IPPC Decisions

In E&W IPPC decisions are made under the Environmental Permitting (England and Wales) Regulations 2010 – 2010/675. In Northern Ireland they are made under the Pollution Prevention and Control (NI) Regulations 2013 – SR 2013/160. In Scotland they are made under the Pollution Prevention and Control (Scotland) Regulations 2000 (SSI 2000/323) and Pollution Prevention and Control (Scotland) Regulations 2012 (SSI 2012/360).

IPPC decisions can be reviewed in the courts in the same way as other administrative decisions. A person seeking to challenge a decision must have sufficient standing. The challenge is made under Part 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W), (Order 53 of the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980, Chapter S8 of the Court of Session Rules (S)). Evidence is given in accordance with the relevant Rules and is usually by written witness statement and documents.

The courts will consider whether the correct procedures have been followed – R (Rockware Glass) v Chester City Council [2006] EWCA Civ 992. They will consider whether the relevant plant falls within the Regulations – Scottish Power Generation (No.2) v Scottish Environment Protection Agency 2005 SLT 641. They will not consider the substantive merits of the decision on the basis that this would be to usurp the function of the body entrusted by Parliament to make that decision. They will look at the technical evidence and if the decision was based on a material error that affected the decision they may quash that decision.

In R (Edwards) v The Environment Agency [2004] EWHC 736 Mr Edwards was a resident in a town in which a cement factory was seeking a permit under IPPC Regulations. He did not make any representations to the Agency during the consultation. He brought proceedings for a judicial review of the decision. Even though he was temporarily homeless at the time it was held he had a sufficient interest as a resident to bring the action.

Injunctive relief is available in judicial review proceedings in the same way as for EIA cases. There are no special rules applicable to IPPC procedures besides those generally applying nationally.

V Access to Justice against Acts or Omissions

Civil claims

A civil – as opposed to criminal – claim can be brought against someone whose activities adversely affect private property. This will usually be an action in nuisance that must be brought by someone who enjoys exclusive possession of the property. The principles in determining whether a nuisance has been suffered by the claimant were set out in Barr v Biffa [2012] EWCA Civ 312. The English (W and NI) law of nuisance is set out in text books such as Clerk & Lindsell on Torts 20th edn. Chapter 20. In these jurisdictions there is no requirement to establish fault on the part of the Defendant. In Scotland the test for nuisance is slightly different - what can reasonably be described as intolerable behaviour or as something which would not be tolerated by a reasonable person – Robb v Dundee City Council 2002 SC 301. In addition there must be an averment of fault - RHM Bakeries (S) Ltd v Strathclyde RC 1985 SC (HL) 17

Where contaminants flow from one person’s land to another’s the person whose land is contaminated may have an action in trespass. It may also be negligent to cause environmental harm so that, if damage is caused and the person causing the damage owes a duty of care to the person suffering from it, he will be liable. In all cases the courts may award pecuniary damages and may also issue an injunction to stop it happening again.

Claims in nuisance, trespass or negligence can be directly made against state bodies where their activities have caused the harm – Dennis v Ministry of Defence [2003] EWHC 793 (QB). However if the cause of the harm is the result of a body carrying out operations authorised by statute it will have to be shown that it was acting negligently – Allen v Gulf Oil Refining Ltd 1981 AC 1001. If the allegation of negligence amounts to saying that the relevant body should have spent public funds to prevent the harm a court may hold that the issue is not justiciable as decisions as to spending funds are for that body – Dobson v Thames Water Utilities Ltd [2011] EWCA 3253 (TCC). Where the issue of an environmental permit or planning permission results in harm to someone, the state body that issued the permit or permission is rarely liable in negligence as the body usually owes no duty of care to the affected person.

Authorities are not usually liable to compensate an individual simply for breaching a duty – Bourgoin SA v Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food [1986] QB 716. However where in a judicial review the court finds a breach of duty it may award damages as long as damages are not the sole relief claimed. In addition damages may be awarded where a breach of the claimant's human rights is found. A claim against a state body can include a claim for an injunction.

Environmental liability

The EU Directive on Environmental liability (2004/35/EC) is implemented in England by the Environmental Damage (Prevention and Remediation) Regulations 2009 – SI 2009/153 (W. 2009/995) In Northern Ireland they are implemented by SR 2009/252 and in Scotland by the Environmental Liability (Scotland) Regulations (SSI 2209/266). The competent authorities for the purposes of the Directive are in E&W usually the Environment Agency or the Natural Resources Body for Wales, but can be Natural England for habitats or species on land or the Secretary of State for the sea. In N.I. the Department of the Environment is the authority while in Scotland it will usually be SEPA but Scottish Natural Heritage for harm to protected species and habitats on land or inland waters and the Scottish Ministers for harm in the coastal sea or territorial waters.

The Regulations provide for an “interested person” – which would include a non-governmental body promoting environmental protection – to be able to request the competent authority to take action under them. A request must be made in writing and set out the person’s interest (E&W and N.I.) and give enough information to enable the authority to identify the nature and location of the incident.

A court review of decisions made by competent authorities on requests for action under the Regulations will be the same as for any other judicial review. The court will ensure that correct procedures were followed. It will review the legality of the decision. It may intervene on technical or other errors if those errors were material and that affected the decision it may quash that decision.

An action to enforce liability will be brought under Part 54 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W), (Order 53 of the Rules of the Court of Judicature (Northern Ireland) 1980, Chapter 58 of the Court of Session Rules (S))). The applicant for judicial review issues a claim form in the High Court (E&W) in accordance with Part 54 or Order 53 (N.I.) or in Scotland a petition under Chapter 58 of the Rules. Evidence is given in accordance with the relevant Rules and is usually by written witness statement and documents.

VI Other Means of Access to Justice

In E&W and S an action for statutory nuisance – a nuisance as defined in the relevant statute - can be brought in a magistrates’ or sheriff court under Part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Section 79(1) of the Act sets out what constitutes a statutory nuisance. Under section 82 an individual can bring his action in the relevant court if he is “aggrieved” by the nuisance. The court can make an order for the abatement of the nuisance and, under section 82, fine the Defendant. In N.I. this procedure is available under Part 7 of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011.

The Parliamentary Ombudsman (E&W), The Assembly Ombudsman (N.I.) or the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman investigate issues of maladministration by government bodies. In E&W, the Local Government ombudsmen will do the same for local authorities, while in N.I. this will be done by the Northern Ireland Ombudsman – the SPSPO investigates local authorities in Scotland. The E&W ombudsmen can act jointly and did so in a case of maladministration involving the Environment Agency and two local authorities who were ordered to pay the claimants a total of £95,000 in respect of a failure to deal properly with an illegal waste site. Complaints to the E&W Parliamentary Ombudsman must be referred to her by a Member of Parliament – Assembly Ombudsman by an Assembly member. A complaint to the Local Government Ombudsman, NI Ombudsman or SPSPO should only be made after the relevant body has been given a chance to deal with the issue. The ombudsmen can ask the body for an apology, repayment of money due, for example, tax or benefit, compensation, for example, for delays, improved procedures or better administrative procedures at the relevant body.

Public prosecutions in respect of environmental offences (E&W) will usually be brought by the competent authority in relation to that offence – for example the Environment Agency. These authorities have powers to investigate offences and enter land or buildings to take samples and interview people in relation to a suspected offence.

A private prosecution can be brought in E&W in respect of many environmental offences – Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, section 6 - but some may only be brought by or with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions. In Scotland private prosecutions are very rare and need the consent of the Lord Advocate. In Northern Ireland private prosecutions may need the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Most national or local government bodies will also have internal complaints mechanisms. If the result is unsatisfactory the complainant can go to the relevant Ombudsman or seek a judicial review. There are specific complaints organisations for utilities such as water services - the Consumer Council for Water (E&W) or the Water Industry Commission for Scotland, the Consumer Council for Water (N.I.)

VII Legal Standing

Non-governmental organisations may have a sufficient interest but would probably – the case law does not provide certainty - have to have participated in the process for their application for judicial review to be permitted. In practice, there are few examples of individuals and NGOs being denied standing. An unincorporated association such as a member’s club has no legal personality and so cannot sue or be sued. Actions by or against such associations are brought by or against the chairman or some other member. However such organisations may be amenable to judicial review – R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers ex p. Datafin [1987] QB 815.

Legal Standing

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Administrative Procedure</th>
<th>Judicial procedure</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>(Planning or IPPC inquiry)</td>
<td>(Judicial review)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Only developer / permit holder may bring appeal</td>
<td>Take part in an appeal</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Individuals</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGOs</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other legal entities</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ad hoc groups</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foreign NGOs</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Any other</td>
<td>Yes</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

To bring a private civil action in nuisance – such as noise or odour - the claimant must have exclusive possession of the property affected by the nuisance. However a ‘statutory nuisance’ action under section 82 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 can be brought by a person “aggrieved” by the nuisance. Anyone has standing to bring a private criminal prosecution where such an action is available.

There are no different rules for sectoral legislation. In the UK judicial review procedures apply to all judicial reviews. Although legislation like the Environmental Permitting (England and Wales) Regulations 2010 (SI 2010/875 Schedule 5, Part 1) in E&W makes special provision for public consultation, the definition of “public consultee” is “a person whom the regulator considers is affected by, is likely to be affected by, or has an interest in, an application.” There is no difference here between the ordinary judicial review standard of “sufficient interest.” The term “sufficient interest” for judicial review cases was considered in Axa General Insurance Ltd v The Lord Advocate [2011] UKSC 46.

There is no formal actio popularis in UK law. However the rights of NGOs or individuals to intervene in administrative decisions means that there is effectively such an action.

A state body is a legal entity just like a private company. The Environment Agency, for example is a body corporate. It can bring or defend legal actions. Thus the Agency could in theory bring an action for the judicial review of a decision by another government body. The same is true of ombudsmen or public prosecutors like the Crown Prosecution Service. However this is very unlikely to ever happen in practice and the courts do not favour this type of action and expect government bodies to resolve their differences without recourse to legal action.

VIII Legal Representation
The UK has an adversarial system reflecting its common law heritage. In environmental judicial review proceedings (E&W) the claimant’s lawyer will formulate the application for permission to bring the action, setting out the grounds on which it is based. Usually the application is dealt with on the claimant’s evidence without a hearing. However if there is an oral hearing, the defendant’s lawyer may attend and explain to the court why it is considered that permission should not be granted. If permission is granted, the defendant will file its evidence. Both lawyers will file a skeleton argument with the court, presenting an outline of their case. At the hearing each lawyer will supplement the skeleton argument with oral submissions.

It is not compulsory to have a lawyer in any environmental hearing, whether at a planning or other inquiry or a judicial review.

Lawyers who specialise in environmental law can be found using directories such as Chambers & Partners or the Legal 500. These directories are issued every year. The Environmental Law Foundation (ELF) specialises in environmental law and the UK Environmental Law Association (UKELA) is a body of environmental lawyers. The Planning and Environmental Bar Association (PEBA) is a body of barristers in E&W who do environmental and planning cases.

IX Evidence

In criminal cases evidence is by witnesses giving evidence orally and subject to cross-examination. In civil claims written witness statements are provided on which the witnesses are cross-examined on oath (E&W). In Scotland evidence is given orally by witnesses. In administrative hearings such as planning inquiries witnesses statements are provided on which the witnesses are cross examined but rarely under oath. In judicial review hearings the evidence is all written witness statements or documents with no cross-examination (E&W). In Scotland most judicial reviews are decided at the First Hearing on the basis of legal argument, but if there is a hearing on evidence, that would be given orally by witnesses.

The evidence of the witnesses in major criminal cases is evaluated by a jury. While the judge may comment on the evidence of fact, the jury is the sole arbiter of the facts in the case. In all other trials the magistrate, judge or inspector (reporter) evaluates the evidence given. He or she must take into account all the material relied on and give reasons for preferring one side to the other.

It is for the parties to provide the evidence for the court. On a judicial review the administrative body whose decision is being reviewed has a duty to disclose all relevant documents – a duty of candour. New evidence can be introduced if material. The court can request evidence from one party or the other but usually does not.

Parties can instruct experts to give evidence in a case. For example in a civil claim each party may instruct experts on the operation of the relevant facility and how harm from it can be avoided. The court may order that such evidence is to be given by a joint expert (E&W).

Expert evidence is not binding on the judge. It is for the judge to evaluate all the evidence and accept or reject it. In criminal cases the role of the expert is to provide the judge or jury with the necessary scientific criteria for testing the accuracy of their conclusions, so as to enable the judge or jury to form their own independent judgment by the application of those criteria to the facts proved in evidence.

X Injunctive Relief

In some legislation it is provided that the bringing of an appeal will not have the effect of suspending a decision or notice – e.g. Environmental Permitting (England and Wales) Regulations 2010, reg. 31. In other legislation it is stated that the relevant notice will have no effect until the appeal is finally determined or withdrawn – Town and Country Planning Act 1990, s. 175(4) (in Scotland, 1997 Act s. 131(3)). In judicial review proceedings the applicant can ask the court for an interim order to stay the effect of the relevant decision until the case is decided.

Where the legislation states that the bringing of the appeal does not suspend the decision or notice, that decision or notice will have immediate effect. In cases where the usual rule is that the notice is of no effect until the appeal is determined the authority may be able to serve another notice to halt the activity immediately – e.g. a stop notice in planning cases – Town and Country Planning Act 1990, section 183 (in Scotland 1997 Act, s 140). However it may have to compensate someone adversely affected by the stop notice if the enforcement notice is overruled. Where the legislation gives an authority a discretion as to whether or not to suspend the notice pending appeal – e.g Statutory Nuisance (Appeals) Regulations 1995, reg. 3 – the authority must properly consider the balance between the public interest in the notice having immediate effect and the consequences of that to the person served with the notice – Cromarty Firth Port Authority v Ross and Cromarty District Council 1997 S.L.T. 254.

A civil – as opposed to criminal - court can grant an interim injunction – interdict in Scotland - to halt a project where it is alleged that the administrative decision was inadequate pending the resolution of that issue – Belize Alliance of Conservation NGOs v Department of the Environment [2003] UKPC 63.

There are no special rules in respect of injunctions in environmental cases. Local and other authorities, as well as issuing enforcement and other notices, may be able to bring an action for an injunction against someone who is in breach of the relevant legislation – e.g. Environmental Protection Act 1990, s. 81 (5).

Injunctions (interdicts) can also be awarded in cases between individuals or other legal entities. Injunctions are usually awarded to stop an activity but mandatory injunctions are occasionally awarded to require someone to do something. Where there is a risk of impending damage a quia timet injunction – an injunction where harm is feared but has not eventuated - may be granted but these are rare.

An application for an injunction (interdict) will be made as the relief sought in judicial review proceedings or in a claim between individuals etc. The time limits for asking for an injunction are those for bringing the claim. An application for an urgent interim injunction can be made before proceedings are issued. Where an interim injunction (interdict) is sought, usually the applicant will have to offer the court an undertaking that it will meet any losses caused to the defendant if an injunction is refused. In E&W and NI if, in a case to which the Aarhus Convention applies, the court is satisfied that an injunction is necessary to prevent significant environmental damage and to preserve the factual basis of the proceedings, it must, in considering whether to require an undertaking and its terms, have particular regard to the need for the order overall such as would make continuing with the case prohibitively expensive for the applicant and to make any necessary directions to ensure that the case is heard at the earliest opportunity. ([Practice Direction 25, Civil Procedure Rules (E&W)] and the Costs Protection (Aarhus Convention) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 (NI). The court will consider the balance of convenience between the parties in determining the application – R (Save Britain’s Heritage) v SoS for Communities and Local Government & or [2010] EWCA Civ 1500. Courts have the power to suspend the operation of an injunction. The person subject to the injunction may make an application to discharge it.

A decision by a court to award an injunction (interdict) can be appealed to a higher court. Usually the appellant will need leave from either the court that issued the injunction or the appeal court.

XI Costs

An applicant seeking access to justice in environmental matters may have to pay court fees, lawyers’ fees, expert witness’ fees, expenses for other witnesses and the costs involved in preparing documents, plans, etc.

Court fees

There are no court fees in respect of criminal cases at first instance but an appeal to a higher court may involve a fee.

The court fee for starting a judicial review claim is £80 (E&W). For starting a civil claim in E&W the fee varies according to the amount claimed. If the claim is worth between £1,000 - £1,500, the fee is £70. If it is worth between £15,000 - £50,000 the fee is £340. An application for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal is £235 with a further £465 at a later stage. Claimants may be eligible for fee remission depending on their circumstances.

All petitions to the Inner or Outer House of the Court of Session in Scotland cost £180, appeals to the High Court of Justiciary are £300.

In Northern Ireland a notice of motion for judicial review costs £200. A civil claim in the High Court costs a fee of £300. Filing a notice of appeal is £500.
Costs

The level of costs may vary considerably, depending on the nature and complexity of the case, the experience of the lawyer and the amount of documents. In E&W solicitors' fees for cases that will be disputed are known as "contentious costs." The solicitor will usually charge an hourly rate depending on the grade of fee earner. Thus a para-legal might charge £80 an hour while a partner might charge £200 an hour. A barrister in the case will charge a brief fee and hourly fees for drafting or other work. In Scotland 'costs' are known as 'expenses.' To give an idea of costs in judicial review cases in Allen v Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government [2012] EWHC 671 (Admin) the successful applicant was awarded £9,456 plus VAT for a one day case. In Road Sense v Scottish Ministers [2011] CSOH 10 the expenses of one side were estimated at £82,000 to £90,000 for a four day hearing. This range of costs is similar in all UK jurisdictions.

Costs in civil claims may be higher, reflecting the common law legal systems in the UK, which are based on case law rather than a civil code and the corresponding absence of an investigative role for judges (meaning that a heavier burden falls on parties and their legal representatives to present relevant case law before the courts). In a case in nuisance – Bontoft v East Lindsey District Council [2008] EWHC 2923 (QB) - one side's costs were £195,000 for a six day trial. Costs can be increased in cases done under a conditional fee agreement but the legislation allowing such agreements was repealed in April 2013. In Scotland these are 'speculative fees' which are governed by the Act of Sederunt (Fees of Solicitors in Speculative Actions) 1992/1879 and the Act of Sederunt (Fees of Advocates in Speculative Actions) 1992/1897.

Injunctions

There is no different level of fee in injunction (interdict) cases. Usually the party seeking an injunction (interdict) will have to give an undertaking in damages, although see the Civil Procedure Rules, Practice Direction 25 (E&W) and the Costs Protection (Aarhus Convention) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 (NI).

Under the Costs Protection (Aarhus Convention) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 (NI) and the amended Practice Direction 25A of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W) the court must, in Aarhus Convention cases, have particular regard to the need for the terms of the order overall not to be such as would make continuing with the case prohibitively expensive for the applicant when considering whether to require an undertaking by the applicant to pay damages.

Awards of costs (expenses S)

The general rule in UK jurisdictions is that costs (expenses Scot.) follow the event or the loser pays – e.g Civil Procedure Rules (E&W) Part 44.3. However the courts have a wide discretion in awarding costs. The starting point is that the loser pays but the successful party's costs can be reduced if that party has failed on some issues in the case or has raised irrelevant matters. In addition courts favour the use of ADR and a party that unreasonably fails to engage in ADR may suffer costs consequences – Halsey v Milton Keynes General NHS Trust [2004] EWCA Civ 576. The court in making a costs order will also look at the conduct of the parties from the start of the proceedings and consider whether any reduction in costs should be made because improper conduct.

Under Part 36 of the Civil Procedure Rules (E&W) one party can make an offer to the other to settle the claim, usually by offering a sum of money – Minute of Tender (Scot.) If the offer or tender is rejected but the person rejecting it fails to obtain a more advantageous judgment then there may be costs penalties. Special costs rules now apply throughout the United Kingdom for certain environmental cases limiting the exposure of losing parties to the other side's costs.

XII Financial Assistance Mechanisms

There are no special exemptions from court fees or costs in respect of environmental matters in UK jurisdictions. There are such exemptions from fees for those on low incomes.

UK courts have been applying Article 9.4 of the Aarhus Convention – which includes a requirement that environmental cases should not be "prohibitively expensive" – by means of Protective Costs Orders (E&W and NI) or Protective Expenses Orders (Scot.) The law around these orders is relatively new and is still being developed. The Aarhus Convention is now specifically applied to costs in judicial review proceedings in E&W by the Civil Procedure (Amendment) Rules 2013, Part 45; in Scotland, by similar rules applying to all environmental cases, made in March 2013; and in NI by the Costs Protection (Aarhus Convention) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013, which sets out specific rules for fixed protected costs orders for proceedings to which the Convention applies.

According to these rules:

1. At first instance, an appeal that is subject to the Aarhus Convention may not be ordered to pay costs exceeding £5,000 for individuals and £10,000 legal persons and persons representing associations. Costs recovery against a losing defendant is capped at £35,000.

2. On appeal, the rules of the Civil Procedure Rules 52.9A governing costs recovery apply, whereby the court can make an order limiting the costs.

3. The Supreme Court may also make an order limiting costs recovery in an Aarhus case based on the Costs Practice Direction (as per last amendment in November 2013).

Prior to those rules, the award of a PCO in judicial review cases were governed by the 'Corner House' principles which were set out in R (Corner House Research) v The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry [2005] EWCA Civ 192 at para. 74:

(1) A protective costs order must be made at any stage of the proceedings, on such conditions as the court thinks fit, provided that the court is satisfied that:

(i) the issues raised are of general public importance; (ii) the public interest requires that those issues should be resolved; (iii) the applicant has no private interest in the outcome of the case; (iv) having regard to the financial resources of the applicant and the respondent(s) and to the amount of costs that are likely to be involved, it is fair and just to make the order; and (v) if the order is not made the applicant will probably discontinue the proceedings and will be acting reasonably in so doing.

(2) If those acting for the applicant are doing so pro bono this will be likely to enhance the merits of the application for a PCO.

(3) It is for the court, in its discretion, to decide whether it is fair and just to make the order in the light of the considerations set out above.

These principles are modified in environmental cases to remove the public interest requirement and the emphasis on the claimant's means – Road Sense v Scottish Ministers [2011] CSOH 10 the expenses of one side were estimated at £82,000 to £90,000 for a four day hearing. This range of costs is similar in all UK jurisdictions.

Legal Aid

Civil legal aid in E&W is provided by the Community Legal Service (CLS). There is no discrete area of funding for environmental cases. However funding can be obtained through the 'public interest' category. Thus the CLS will only fund for judicial review proceedings concerning the need for a public inquiry into the decommissioning of nuclear submarines as the case had a significant public interest. But many potential actions will fail this test as either not benefiting the wider public or not raising any new issues of law. Thus an application for funding to challenge the decision of the Environment Agency to grant an operating licence for an incinerator near the applicant's home was refused. The Scottish Legal Aid Board has a similar criteria of "wider public interest." The Legal Aid Board may be available for defendants but not for those wishing to bring a private prosecution.

Funding decisions by the CLS are determined by its "Funding Code." Section 7 of the Code deals with judicial review. Section 7.5 states that "Where the case does not appear to have a significant wider public interest, to be of overwhelming importance to the client or to raise significant human rights issues, Legal Representation will be refused if: (i) prospects of success are borderline or poor; or (ii) the likely costs do not appear to be proportionate to the likely benefits of the proceedings having regard to the prospects of success and all the circumstances." This would apply for all individuals. NGOs are unlikely to be able to get legal aid. In Scotland the grant of legal aid is determined by the Civil Legal Aid Handbook, Part IV, Chapter 3 of which is concerned with assessing probable cause and reasonableness.
Pro Bono

Pro bono work in the UK is facilitated through the ProBono UK.net website. This provides access to information about how to get free legal advice. In E&W the Solicitors Pro Bono Group – “LawWorks” also has a website showing where to go for help. For barristers in E&W, the Bar Pro Bono unit acts as a clearinghouse to match barristers to cases. The Unit receives applications for assistance through advice agencies and solicitors. The Unit aims to help in cases where the applicant cannot afford to pay for the assistance sought or obtain public funding, has a meritorious case, and needs the help a barrister can provide. Neither of these organisations specialise in environmental work but can put an individual in touch with those who do.

LawWorks Scotland provides a similar service in Scotland to LawWorks in E&W; although the two bodies are separate entities. The Faculty of Advocates has a Free Legal Services Unit whose work includes planning and environmental cases.

The Northern Ireland Pro Bono Group provides advice and representation by barristers and solicitors who have volunteered to join a panel and who cover the full range of legal specialisations. Volunteers have offered their services free of charge up to 3 days or 20 hours each year. The cases most likely to meet the criterion of the Pro Bono Unit will be appeals, applications for leave to appeal, judicial review applications, specific steps in proceedings, tribunal hearings and advisory work.

Legal clinics

There are no legal clinics specialising in environmental cases in E&W or NI. However Citizens Advice Bureaux and Law Centres will either help with environmental cases or pass the matter on to someone who can help. The Environmental Law Centre Scotland offers advice to the public on environmental issues.

Public Interest organisations

The Environmental Law Foundation is the leading organisation in the UK providing free legal advice to local communities with environmental concerns. For almost two decades it has pioneered the provision of free advice to vulnerable communities facing a range of environmental threats including adverse impacts of pollution and loss of green space and biodiversity. The Public Law Project is a national legal charity which aims to improve access to public law remedies for those whose access to justice is restricted by poverty or some other form of disadvantage. It will do some environmental cases.

XIII Timeliness

Planning applications must be determined within eight weeks although if they require EIA the time limit is extended to sixteen weeks. Authorities determining IPPC applications must usually make a decision within three months, although there are other time limits in the Regulations. Applications for other licences may not have a legal requirement for determination within a specific time but authorities are encouraged to say how long it will take to issue the licence. If a planning decision or environmental permit application is not determined within the required time it will be deemed to have been refused. That enables the applicant to appeal to the Secretary of State or Ministers, or in certain circumstances to a Local Review Body in Scotland.

Court procedures

Prior to 1 July 2013, judicial review applications on environmental matters in E&W must have been brought within three months of the relevant decision. The Civil Procedure Rules stated (S4.5) proceedings must be filed promptly and in any event not later than three months after the grounds to make the claim first arose. However the “promptly” aspect has been considered insufficiently precise. Thus where EU legislation is being considered the claimant has three months – R (U & Ptnrs (East Anglia) Ltd) v Broads Authority [2011] EWHC 1824 (Admin). Since 1 July 2013, the time limits for filing a claim form for judicial review has been amended to six weeks in relation to a decision under the “planning acts” (the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990, the Planning (Hazardous Substances) Act 1990 and the Planning (Consequential Provisions) Act 1990). (The Civil Procedure (Amendment No. 4) Rules 2013 ).

Time limits for the bringing of civil actions in nuisance, trespass or negligence are set out in the Limitation Act 1980 (E&W). Under section 2 of the Limitation Act 1980 an action founded on a tort – such as nuisance – must be brought within six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued. Under section 6 of the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 any claim must be brought within five years. Under article 6 of the Limitation (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 the time is six years. Time starts to run from either the date of the injury or the date – if later - the claimant knew the injury was attributable, in whole or in part, to the act or omission that is alleged to constitute negligence, nuisance or breach of duty. “Knowledge” here means a reasonable belief in the facts leading to attribution – Ministry of Defence v AB & Ors [2012] UKSC 9.

Where an individual intends to bring an action under section 82 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 in a magistrates’ or sheriff court, notice of the action must be given 21 days before proceedings are commenced. (S. 82(6)). Given the nature of the proceedings the nuisance will still be existing at this time.

Duration of cases

The duration of the case depends on the complexity of the legal and factual issues. Judicial review cases - where there is no oral evidence heard – can take from half a day to four or five days. Environmental civil proceedings where both sides call witnesses and experts can take much longer. A relatively simple noise nuisance case might take two or three days. Dobson v Thames Water Utilities Ltd [2011] EWHC 3253 (TCC) involved more than ten witnesses of fact on each side and four experts on each side dealing with different disciplines. The case lasted six weeks.

In criminal cases, the enforcement agency’s investigation may take months or even years from the date of the crime to the issuing of proceedings. Usually there is an initial hearing in a magistrates’ or Sheriff’s court within three weeks of the date proceedings were issued. If a guilty plea is to be made the court will usually deal with it within a month; although in NI, England & Wales magistrates may send the case to a Crown Court if they consider their sentencing powers are not sufficient to deal with the offence. A summary trial in the magistrates’ or sheriff’s court may take from one to three days; although longer cases are possible.

A serious case will be referred by the magistrates to the Crown Court. In a Crown Court with a jury cases will go to Pre-Trial Review which may take more than one hearing so extending the case for several months. The trial itself can be from one day to a month or more – a recent prosecution for waste offences resulted in a six week trial.

Deadline for judgments

There are no set deadlines for judges to give judgments. In straightforward cases (E&W) the judge may give an oral judgment immediately following the hearing. In more complex cases judgment may be reserved and will usually follow in writing within two to six months. Longer than six months is possible but not common.

As there are no set deadlines there are no sanctions against courts delivering decisions in delay. However in cases involving issues of human rights there is an expectation that decisions will issue promptly.

XIV Other issues

Environmental decisions are either challenged during the EIA process or when a decision is issued. If a public inquiry is held before decisions are issued members of the public will be able to address the inquiry.

Although there is currently no single UK government website regarding access to justice in environmental matters, information on various aspects is available through the central government website (http://www.gov.uk/) and the websites of the Scottish Government and Northern Ireland Executive. Information and opinions are also available from NGOs like UKELA or Friends of the Earth and groups like the UK Environmental Law Association (UKELA).
Alternative Dispute Resolution exists in the UK. It is strongly encouraged by the civil courts. The pre-action protocol for judicial review (E&W) states that “both the Claimant and Defendant may be required by the Court to provide evidence that alternative means of resolving their dispute were considered. The Courts take the view that litigation should be a last resort, and that claims should not be issued prematurely when a settlement is still actively being explored.” It is accessible to the public through leaflets such as the Legal Services Commission “Alternatives to Court” CLS Direct Information Leaflet 23. Mediation is frequently used in civil claims between individuals or corporates. Mediation is available in judicial review cases but is not much used – Public Law Project: 2009 Mediation and Judicial Review.

XV Being a Foreigner
There are no specific anti-discrimination clauses regarding language or country of origin found in the procedural laws of the UK. However the courts are public bodies and thus bound by the Equality Act 2010 which makes it unlawful to discriminate on the basis of race or nationality. The Act imposes a race equality duty with which the courts must comply. Courts have guidance on equal treatment of all those who come before them in “Bench Books” that are issued to judges – e.g The Equal Treatment Bench Book for England and Wales.

Use of different languages is facilitated in court procedures. Internally languages like Welsh are provided for in hearings. Other languages can be used with an interpreter. Courts will have advisory leaflets available in a number of languages.

In criminal cases and some tribunal proceedings the court service will arrange for an interpreter and will pay the fee; although in criminal cases if the defendant is convicted the fee may be part of the costs of the case he or she is ordered to pay. In civil cases it is for the parties to make such arrangements and pay the fees.

XVI Transboundary Cases
As the UK consists of islands with only the Ireland / Northern Ireland land borders, transboundary cases are very rare. Under regulation 24 of the Infrastructure Planning (EIA) Regulations 2009 development likely to have significant transboundary effects on the environment in another EEA state must be notified to that state. The state may then participate in the procedure under the Regulations. There are no procedural rules for the participation although EU legislation like the Mediation Directive has been implemented in court rules in the UK. Civil liability is determined under conventions such as the International Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage 1969 where relevant. Otherwise Part III of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 deals with the applicable law. Section 11(2)(a)(ii) provides that the law of the country where the damage occurred is the applicable law.

There are no decisions in UK law on whether a foreign national who is adversely affected by a project in the UK would have sufficient interest to participate in a public inquiry or a judicial review in relation to the project. However if he or she would otherwise have a sufficient interest it might be contrary to the Equality Act 2010 to deny participation. If it was accepted that the person had sufficient interest the procedure would be the same as for anyone else. Legal aid is unlikely to be available given the criteria of “significant wider public interest” discussed above.

If a person has a ‘sufficient interest’ in proceedings then he or she may participate in them. Although there are no decisions of UK courts on this, if a person in the foreign state could be adversely affected by the proposal there is no reason why he or she could not have a significant interest for the purposes of judicial review.

The appropriate forum is the court that is the more preferable for securing the ends of justice - Spiliada Maritime Corporation v Cansulex Ltd [1987] AC 460. This is likely to be the country whose law is applicable to the dispute. In the UK under section 11 of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 the applicable law is usually the country where the injury or damage occurred but this can be displaced in accordance with section 12. If a UK court has accepted jurisdiction in a dispute that decision can be challenged but it will be for the challenger to show that the decision was wrong.

As Gibraltar has a land border with Spain, there is the possibility for transboundary cases to arise. Please see Annex A for details.

Related links

Access to justice

Ombudsmen offices and prosecutor offices

Environmental experts

Expert database (Free) – use keyword ‘environment’ http://www.expertsearch.co.uk/

Environmental lawyers

Chambers & Partners http://www.chambersandpartners.com/UK

Bar Associations

Planning and Environmental Bar Association http://www.peba.org.uk/

Advocates (Scot) specialising in environmental matters http://www.advocates.org.uk/stables/specialareas/P003.html

Pro-Bono environmental law offices

National and International NGOs

Friends of the Earth http://www.foe.co.uk/

Royal Society for the Protection of Birds https://www.rspb.org.uk/
Annex A: Gibraltar

I Constitutional Foundations

Constitutional Foundations

Gibraltar’s written constitution is set out in the Gibraltar Constitution Order 2006. There are no express environmental provisions in the constitution. If a constitutional right is breached in consequence of an environmental harm, article 16 provides access to the Supreme Court.

II Judiciary

Judiciary

Gibraltar is a British Overseas Territory in Europe. The Gibraltar Constitution Order 2006 allows Gibraltar self-government in all matters excluding external affairs, defence and internal security for which the UK Government remains ultimately responsible. HM Government of Gibraltar is responsible for the implementation of EU obligations in Gibraltar.

Introduction

There are no specialist environmental courts in Gibraltar. The court system mirrors that of England and Wales, with environmental criminal cases usually beginning in the Magistrates’ Court, and more serious cases being tried in the Supreme Court by a judge and jury.

Under Part II of the Public Health Act, statutory nuisance cases can be heard in the Magistrates’ Court. Where the Government considers the remedies afforded by the Magistrates’ Court would be inadequate, it may bring proceedings in the Supreme Court under section 89 of the Public Health Act.

Cases where judicial review is brought against decisions of the Government are heard by the Supreme Court, by virtue of section 12 of the Supreme Court Act. Under rule 6 of the Supreme Court Rules 2000 judicial review is brought applying the Civil Procedure Rules applicable in England and Wales.

Judges are appointed by the Governor of Gibraltar on the advice of the Judicial Services Commission. As in England and Wales, judges are drawn from the legal profession. There are no specialist environmental law judges.

Tribunals

In Gibraltar, planning permission is issued by the Development and Planning Commission (“the Commission”). A person may appeal a decision of the Commission to the Development Appeals Tribunal if-

- a. they are an applicant for a permit who is aggrieved by the refusal of the Commission to grant the permit or the imposition of a condition on a permit;
- b. they are a person on whom a completion notice, stoppage order or modification order has been served;
- c. they are a person who has objected to an application, and they are aggrieved by a decision of the Commission; or
- d. they are a person affected by a completion notice, stoppage order or modification order.

Forum Shopping

There is no forum shopping for different types of court available in civil actions in Gibraltar. In criminal cases a defendant may choose to be tried in the Magistrates’ Court or the Supreme Court if the offence is one that can be heard by that court.

Appeals and extraordinary remedies

Appeals from the Magistrates’ Court in Gibraltar are heard by a judge in the Supreme Court. Appeals from the Supreme Court are to the Court of Appeal. Appeals from the Court of Appeal are heard by the Privy Council.

There are extraordinary remedies in Gibraltar law such as injunctions, mandatory orders and prohibiting orders.

Cassation

The position in Gibraltar reflects that of England and Wales.

Judicial procedures

In Gibraltar criminal prosecutions are brought by public authorities or private individuals. They are started in the Magistrates’ Court. Civil actions are usually dealt with by the Supreme Court. Statutory nuisance is usually heard by the Magistrates’ Court, but can be heard by the Supreme Court in certain circumstances.

Judicial action from own motion

As in the UK, the Gibraltar courts use an adversarial approach. Courts are unable to initiate an action by their own motion.

III Access to Information

Access to Information Cases

Access to Justice in Public Participation

Other Means of Access to Justice

Legal Standing

Evidence

Injunctive Relief

Costs

Financial Assistance Mechanisms

Timeliness

Other Issues

Being a Foreigner

Transboundary Cases

Introduction

As in the UK, the Gibraltar courts use an adversarial approach. Courts are unable to initiate an action by their own motion.
The relevant provisions of Directive 2003/4/EC on public access to environmental information are implemented in Gibraltar by the Freedom of Access to Information on the Environment Regulations 2005 ("FAIER").

Remedies
Where an applicant for information considers that the authority has failed to comply with a request or any other requirements of FAIER, he may make representations to the authority under regulation 11 of FAIER. Where an applicant for information is still dissatisfied either with the information disclosed by an authority, the withholding of information by an authority or the lack of response to an application for environmental information, that applicant may apply to the Gibraltar Regulatory Authority for a determination requiring the disclosure of information under regulation 16 of FAIER. If either the applicant or the party on whom a determination has been made is still dissatisfied after this process, then the determination may be appealed in the Magistrates’ Court under regulation 17 of FAIER. If an authority refuses a request it must write to the applicant as soon as possible and explain why the request was refused. It must say what exemptions apply (reg 12(4)&(5) or 13 of FAIER), the matters considered by the public authority in reaching its decision, and what the applicant can do if he or she wants to challenge the decision – reg. 11 or 17 of FAIER.

Procedure
FAIER imposes a duty upon a public authority that holds environmental information to make it available on request. That duty is subject to a number of exceptions found in regulations 12 and 13 of FAIER. A refusal of a request for environmental information must be made in writing as soon as possible and no later than 1 month after the date of receipt of the request, reg. 14 of FAIER. A person whose request has been refused may ask the authority to review its decision. The review decision must be notified as soon as possible, and not later than 2 months after receipt of the request for a review, reg.11 of FAIER. Where the refusal to disclose is maintained the person whose request has been refused ("the complainant") may apply for a determination from the Gibraltar Regulatory Authority as specified above.

IV Access to Justice in Public Participation

Administrative procedures
The Government’s Department of the Environment has responsibility for the regulation of and granting of licences in respect of environmental issues. Some of these powers are delegated to other organisations such as the Animal Welfare Centre (responsible for maintenance of the animal impounding services) or the Environmental Agency (responsible, amongst other things, monitoring air quality, waste and shipment of waste and integrated pollution control, control of waste, and pesticide control). The natural environment is protected by the comprehensive legal framework in particular through the Nature Protection Act 1991. Under this Act, significant areas of Gibraltar’s terrestrial and maritime environment have been designated as special areas of conservation under the Habitats and Wild Birds Directives (92/43 EEC, 2009/147/EC). The Act also provides for the designation of both terrestrial and marine protected areas other than those required by EU obligations.

The Government may appoint Wildlife Wardens to regulate these protected areas.

Where not provided for in any enactment, decisions of emanations of the State may be challenged through Judicial Review as set out below.

Judicial review of administrative procedures
The rules and procedures of judicial review in Gibraltar reflect those of England and Wales.

Review of land use planning decisions
Land use planning in Gibraltar is provided for under the Town Planning Act 1999. Development works cannot be carried out except under the authority of a permit granted by the Development Planning Commission ("the Commission"). Applications for a permit must be submitted to the Commission for approval. The Commission shall consider applications and either grant a permit, refuse a permit or grant a permit subject to conditions. Where the Commission refuses a permit or inserts a condition in the permit, the applicant for that permit may appeal the decision to the Development Appeals Tribunal. Appeals must be submitted in writing within 28 days of notification or the issue of the permit. Proceedings will be held by the Tribunal where it will hear the evidence and reach a decision. The decision of the Development Appeals Tribunal is final.

Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA)
EIA is prescribed for applications for planning permission for certain developments in Gibraltar by the Town Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations 2000.

IPPC Decisions
In Gibraltar IPPC decisions are made under the Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations 2013.

Decisions of the Environmental Agency ("the Agency") under these Regulations may be appealed to the Minister with responsibility for the Environment (reg. 55). Appeals can only be brought by persons who have made an application under these Regulations. The Minister may affirm the decision of the Agency, direct the Agency to grant a permit or vary conditions of the permit, quash any or all of the conditions, direct the Agency to effect a transfer or accept a surrender or quash, affirm or vary a notice.

Where a person is dissatisfied with the determination by the Minister, he may appeal to the Magistrates’ Court on a point of law.

V Access to Justice against Acts or Omissions

Civil claims
The relevant law concerning the bringing of civil claims (in particular an action in nuisance) in Gibraltar reflects that of England and Wales.

Environmental liability
The EC Directive on Environmental liability (2004/35/CE) is implemented in Gibraltar by the Environmental Liability Regulations 2008. The competent authority for the purposes of this legislation is the Minister with responsibility for the Environment or such other person as he may delegate.

Under regulation 16, interested parties may notify the competent authority of any environmental damage of which there is an imminent threat. The notification must be accompanied by a statement explaining why the party will be affected by or has an interest in the damage. It must also give sufficient information for the competent authority to identify the location and nature of the incident. The competent authority must consider the notification and inform the interested party of the action it intends to take.

VI Other Means of Access to Justice
In Gibraltar an action for statutory nuisance – a nuisance as defined in the relevant statute - can be brought in a Magistrates’ Court under Part II of the Public Health Act. Where the Government considers summary proceedings inadequate, it may take proceedings in the Supreme Court. Section 81 of the Act sets out what constitutes a statutory nuisance. Under section 88 an individual aggrieved by a nuisance can make a complaint to a justice of the peace and thereby initiate proceedings. The court can make an order for the abatement of the nuisance under section 82 and where this notice is ignored; make a nuisance order under section 83.

The Gibraltar Public Services Ombudsman investigates complaints in relation to administrative action taken by public authorities. The Public Services Ombudsman is established by the Public Services Ombudsman Act 1998. Complaints may be made by a person aggrieved and, except in special
VII Legal Standing
The legal standing of non-governmental organisations and unincorporated associations in Gibraltar, and the rules for bringing a private civil action in nuisance, reflect that of England and Wales.

VIII Legal Representation
Gibraltar has an adversarial system. It is not compulsory to have a lawyer in any environmental hearing, whether at a planning or other inquiry or a judicial review.

IX Evidence
Rules relating to evidence in criminal and civil cases in Gibraltar reflect those of England and Wales.

X Injunctive Relief
Where legislation states that the bringing of the appeal does not suspend the decision or notice, that decision or notice will have immediate effect. In cases where the usual rule is that the notice is of no effect until the appeal is determined, the authority may be able to serve another notice to halt the activity immediately – e.g. a stoppage order in planning cases - Town Planning Act 1999, section 40. Where the Appeal Tribunal thinks fit, it may suspend the stoppage order pending the determination of the appeal, section 41.

XI Costs
An applicant seeking access to justice in environmental matters may have to pay court fees, lawyers' fees, expert witness' fees, expenses for other witnesses and the costs involved in preparing documents, plans etc.

Awards of costs
The rules in relation to costs in Gibraltar follow those of England and Wales.

XII Financial Assistance Mechanisms
Under the Supreme Court Rules 2000, the Civil Procedure Rules of England and Wales, including those rules relating to costs, are applicable to Gibraltar except where alternative rules are provided for under Gibraltar law.

Civil legal assistance in Gibraltar is provided by the Registrar of the Supreme Court. The provision of legal aid and assistance is governed by the Legal Aid and Assistance Act and the Legal Aid and Assistance Rules.

XIII Timeliness
The Environmental Agency must determine an IPPC application within 3 months of receiving the application. This period may be extended if an agreement is reached between the Environmental Agency and the applicant.

Applications for other licences may not have a legal requirement for determination within a specific time but authorities are encouraged to say how long it will take to issue the licence.

If a planning permit application is not determined within the required time it will be deemed to have been refused and the applicant may appeal to the Development Appeals Tribunal.

Court procedures
The time limitations for the bringing of judicial review applications in Gibraltar reflect those of England and Wales.

Time limits for the bringing of civil actions in nuisance, trespass or negligence in Gibraltar are set out in the Limitation Act. Under section 4 of the Limitation Act an action founded on a tort – such as nuisance – must be brought within 6 years from the date on which the cause of action accrued. In some circumstances, a civil action in negligence may be brought after the standard 6 year limitation period has expired.

Duration of cases
The duration of the case depends on the complexity of the legal and factual issues.

Deadline for judgments
There are no set deadlines for judges to give judgments. In some cases the judge will give judgment immediately after the advocates have addressed the Court. In other cases judgment will be given later.

As there are no set deadlines there are no sanctions against courts delivering decisions in delay.

XIV Other Issues
Representations on the environmental effect of a development can be made to the Development and Planning Commission during the EIA or planning permission process.

Alternative Dispute Resolution exists in Gibraltar. It is strongly encouraged by the civil courts. The pre-action protocol of England and Wales for judicial review applies to Gibraltar.
Mediation is frequently used in civil claims between individuals or corporate bodies.

XV Being a Foreigner

Nationality has no bearing on the ability of a person to prosecute or defend a claim before the Court. Use of different languages is allowed in court procedures. Languages such as French or German can be used with an interpreter. In criminal cases the court service will arrange for an interpreter for the duration of the case. In civil cases it is for the parties to make such arrangements and pay the fees.

XVI Transboundary Cases

Part III of the Town Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations, 2000 deals with developments likely to have a significant transboundary effect. Under regulation 14, where the Commission is aware that a relevant development carried out in Gibraltar is likely to have significant effect on the environment of (or otherwise seriously affect) another Member State it shall deliver a notice to the Minister with responsibility for the Environment. The Minister shall send particulars of the development to the Member State, and give it a reasonable time to indicate whether it will participate in the EIA procedure. Where the Member State indicates it wishes to participate in the EIA procedure the authorities and public concerned shall be given an opportunity, before a permit for the development is granted, to forward to the Commission, their opinion on the information supplied. The Minister shall enter into consultations with the Member State concerned. When the application is determined, it shall inform the Member State of its decision, the reasons for that decision and where necessary a description of relevant measures to avoid, reduce or offset major adverse effects of the development.

Regulation 15 also makes provision for when the Minister for the Environment receives information on a project in another Member State that is likely to affect the environment in Gibraltar.

Related links

Legislation

Public Bodies

Gibraltar Citizens Advice Bureau  http://cab.gi

Last update: 14/09/2016

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Annex D: Isle of Man

The Isle of Man is a Crown Dependency and does not form part of the United Kingdom or of the European Union – Protocol 3 of the Accession Treaty 1972 applies to it. The Department of Environment Food and Agriculture is concerned with environmental matters. There is no specific legislation for EIA for projects on the Isle of Man but the Isle of Man Strategic Plan (Environment Policy 24) provides for EIA for development likely to have a significant effect on the environment. Judicial review of decisions on the environment can be done by a Petition of Doleance under the High Court Act 1991. There is no Freedom of Information Act for the Isle of Man. Access to environmental information can be obtained from the Isle of Man Government Laboratory. Statutory nuisances are provided for in Part 1 of the Public Health Act 1990. Individuals can bring an action against another person in common law for a nuisance, which can include an injunction.

Last update: 14/09/2016

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Annex B: Guernsey

The Bailiwick of Guernsey is a Crown Dependency and includes the separate jurisdictions of Alderney and Sark and the islands of Herm, Jethou and Lihou. Alderney and Sark have independent legislative, executive and judicial systems. Under Protocol 3 to the Accession Treaty of 1972 there is only a limited connection to the European Union for the purposes of free movement of goods. Other EU legislation does not generally apply. Pollution control law is mainly contained in the Environmental Pollution (Guernsey) Law 2004 while land use planning is provided for in the Land Planning and Development (Guernsey) Law 2005. There is provision for EIA in the Land Planning and Development (General Provisions) Ordinance 2007. Judicial review of decisions is available in the Royal Court of Guernsey under the rules in Practice Direction 3 of 2004. There is no freedom of information legislation in Guernsey. The Office of Environmental Health and Pollution Regulation has legal powers to prevent the recurrence of statutory nuisances under the Loi Relative à la Santé Publique, 1934 (as amended) and related legislation. Individuals can bring an action against another person in customary law for a nuisance, which can include an injunction.

Last update: 14/09/2016
The Bailiwick of Jersey is a Crown Dependency. Under Protocol 3 to the Accession Treaty of 1972 there is only a limited connection to the European Union for the purposes of free movement of goods. International environmental legislation such as the Basel Convention on Wastes 1989 is implemented by statutes such as the Waste Management (Jersey) Law 2005. Environmental issues are dealt with mainly by the Planning and Environment Department. EIA is provided for by the Planning and Building (Environmental Impact) (Jersey) Order 2006. Government decisions on environmental matters can be challenged in the Royal Court by a petition of doleance which is “a remedy of last resort” in which the petitioner bears a heavy burden to show that a grave injustice needs to be remedied – The Attorney General v Michel [2006] JRC089. There is no freedom of information legislation in force in Jersey. Statutory nuisances can be dealt by the Minister under the Statutory Nuisance (Jersey) Law 1999, section 8 of which enables an action by a person aggrieved by a nuisance for which the Minister is responsible. Individuals can bring an action against another person in customary law for a nuisance, which can include an injunction.

Last update: 14/09/2016

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.