According to the Administrative Disputes Act, the rule is that administrative disputes are conducted in Croatian and in the Latin script. However, parties and participants in administrative disputes have the right to use their own language with a certified translator before the court. Translation costs must be covered by the party to whom they refer unless special law provides differently. There are no exceptional rules set in environmental legislation related to this.

1.8. Special procedural rules

County-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no specific rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening. A decision on EIA screening or whether to carry out and EIA procedure or not is made in the form of administrative decision (rješenje/upravni akt). This means that such a decision can be challenged and the same rules that apply to other environmental procedures can be applied here (standing rules described under section 1.4 point 3). For example, if the authority issues a decision that the EIA is not needed, an NGO or natural person can challenge that decision before the Administrative Court. The timeframe is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Decision on scoping is not made in the form of administrative decision (rješenje/upravni akt) so this decision cannot be challenged separately but only later, together with the final decision on EIA.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Administrative decisions on environmental projects can be challenged when made in the form of administrative act (rješenje/upravni akt) so in the final EIA decision but also in the screening phase.

The timeframe for submitting a claim to the Administrative Court is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry).

In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

Final authorisation of the project can be challenged as described under the previous point. Standing rules are the same according to the Environmental Protection Act for all environmental procedures conducted under that Act. An EIA decision can be challenged by a natural person, group of individuals (for example neighbours, owners of the same property, etc.) and an NGO which fulfills specific requirements. However, this is more restricted in the case of a construction permit, meaning the final authorisation of the project since the legislation regulating this field determines more strictly who can be a party in the process (owners of the neighbouring properties).

According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) (OG 80/13, 153/13, 78/15, 12/18) Art 167 par 1 and Art 168 par 1, individuals have the right to file an appeal if they can prove impairment of their right due to the location and/or nature and impact of the project and if they participated in the procedure as a member of the public concerned.

According to the EPA Art 167 par 2 and Art 168 par 2, An NGO has a sufficient legal interest in the procedures regulated by the Environmental Protection Act which provide for the participation of the public concerned, if it fulfills the following requirements:

- If it is registered in accordance with special regulations governing associations and if environmental protection, including protection of human health and protection or rational use of natural resources, is set out as a goal in its statute,
- If it has been registered for at least two years prior to the initiation of the public authority’s procedure (in relation to which it is expressing its legal interest), and if it can prove that in that period it actively participated in activities related to environmental protection in the territory of the city or municipality where it has a registered seat in accordance with its Statute. Such an NGO must have the right to file an appeal with the Ministry or file a lawsuit before the competent court, for the purpose of challenging the procedural and/or substantive legality of decisions, actions or omissions. The right of an NGO to access to justice in environmental matters is not dependent on participation in administrative procedures which lead to the decision which is challenged before the court.

The Environmental Protection Act does not have specific provisions on access to justice in environmental matters for foreign NGOs, but also it does not have a provision which would forbid that. In that sense, if a foreign NGO can meet all the requirements needed for NGOs to have standing, it would probably be allowed by the Court.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

The Administrative Court can review substantive and procedural legality of an EIA decision-making process. In practice the Court does not review scientific accuracy of an environmental impact statement. So it actually only controls procedural legality in practice, although it can appoint experts witnesses or allow parties in the procedure to suggest experts. The Administrative Court hears lawsuits both as a court of Cassation (procedural mistakes and wrong implementation of material law) and a Reformatory court (establishment of facts). However, since the reformatory powers of the Administrative courts were only recently introduced (2012), the courts are still shy of using these powers. As a consequence, in practice the court mainly acts as a Court of Cassation, especially in complex matters such as environmental law. There are no specific rules for acting on a motion for environmental matters, but they are the same in all cases.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?
As a rule, decisions, acts or omissions are challengeable together with the final administrative decision (EIA decision; permit, etc.).

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
The Court will reject the claim if the hierarchy of legal remedies was not followed. If that environmental administrative decision was issued by a lower level of environmental authority, for example city, municipality or county (regional) level, it is possible to appeal to the Ministry of Economy and Sustainable Development. Appeals decided by the Ministry can be challenged before the administrative court. The appeal to the Ministry must be used before going to the Court, so the Ministry issues a decision which can then be brought to the Administrative Court.
When an administrative decision has been delivered by the Ministry, there is no higher body for appeal but it is possible to start a dispute before the Administrative Court.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
Yes for individuals and no for NGOs. Based on the wording of Article 168 of Environmental Protection Act (hereinafter: EPA), access to justice is preconditioned for members of the interested public by public participation. However, there is an additional provision provided for NGOs (fulfilling other requirement, of course) for whom participation in the public consultation phase is not required in order to have standing.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Act on Administrative Disputes, the Court will, before making a decision, give opportunity to each party to express an opinion on demands or statement of other parties and about all the fact and legal questions which are part of the dispute[12]. Also, the Court is obliged to ensure that lack of knowledge and experience of the parties does not cause harm of any rights which they have.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There is no specific rule on timeliness determined for access to justice in EIA cases. See section 1.7.1. point 4.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief is available, as in other administrative procedures there is no specific rule which would apply only to court cases related to EIA procedure. It must be explained here that the Administrative Disputes Act provides for two precautionary measures: the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26) and the interim measure (Art 47). The first can be rendered at the request of a party or ex officio (although the courts do not exercise this power for the time being), and the second can be issued only at the proposal of a party.

The enforcement of the disputed administrative decision may only be postponed through the special institute of the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26). Interim measures from the Administrative Disputes Act have other functions, which are rarely present in an administrative dispute (e. g. measures in proceedings in which no environmental act is passed, prohibition of disposition of property, etc.). There is no appeal against the decision on the delaying effect of a lawsuit (Administrative Disputes Act, Art 67, para 1 and Art 26 para 2).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
There are no specific rules on access to justice in IPPC/IED cases.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
Only final decisions on IPPC/IED can be challenged, meaning the environmental permit (okolišna dozvola). Standing rules are the same according to the Environmental Protection Act for all environmental procedures conducted under that Act. An IPPC/IED decision can be challenged by a natural person, group of individuals (for example neighbours, owners of the same property, etc.) and an NGO which fulfils specific requirements.

According to the Environmental Protection Act (EPA) (OG 80/13, 153/13, 78/15, 12/18) Art 167 par 1 and Art 168 par 1, individuals have the right to file an appeal if they can prove impairment of their right due to the location and/or nature and impact of the project and if they participated in the procedure as a member of the public concerned.

According to the EPA Art 167 par 2 and Art 168 par 2, an NGO has a sufficient legal interest in the procedures regulated by the Environmental Protection Act which provide for the participation of the public concerned if it fulfils the following requirements:
if it is registered in accordance with special regulations governing associations and if environmental protection, including protection of human health and protection or rational use of natural resources, is set out as a goal in its statute, and if it has been registered for at least two years prior to the initiation of the public authority’s procedure (in relation to which it is expressing its legal interest), and if it can prove that in that period it actively participated in activities related to environmental protection in the territory of the city or municipality where it has a registered seat in accordance with its Statute. Such an NGO must have the right to file an appeal with the Ministry or file a lawsuit before the competent court, for the purpose of challenging the procedural and/or substantive legality of decisions, actions or omissions. The right of an NGO to access to justice in environmental matters is not dependent on participation in administrative procedures which lead to decision which is challenged before the court.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
When the EIA and IPPC/IED are integrated procedures, a decision on EIA screening or whether to carry out an EIA procedure or not is made in the form of an administrative decision (rješenje/upravni akt)[14]. This means that such decision can be challenged and the same rules that apply to other environmental procedures can be applied here (standing rules described under section 1.4 point 3). The timeframe for submitting claim to Administrative Court is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to court begins after 9 days from the publication of the decision.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
Decision on scoping is not made in the form of administrative decision[15] (rješenje/upravni akt) so this decision cannot be challenged separately but only later, together with the final decision on EIA, if the IPPC/IED and EIA procedure were integrated.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
As a rule, administrative decisions on environmental projects are challengeable together with the final administrative decision (environmental permit/okolišna dozvola).
The timeframe for submitting a claim to the Administrative Court is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to Court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

NGO or individuals can challenge a final authorisation, meaning an environmental permit.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

The Administrative Court can review substantive and procedural legality of an IED decision-making process (environmental permit/okolišna dozvola). In practice, the Court does not review the scientific accuracy of IED documentation. So, it actually only controls procedural legality in practice, although it can appoint experts witnesses or allow parties in the procedure to suggest experts. The Administrative Court hears lawsuits both as a court of Cassation (procedural mistakes and wrong implementation of material law) and a Reformatory court (establishment of facts). However, since the reformatory powers of the Administrative courts were only recently introduced (2010), the courts are still shy of using these powers. As a consequence, in practice the court mainly acts as a Court of Cassation, especially in complex matters such as environmental law.

Administrative courts have the mandate to review administrative decisions (and administrative contracts) to establish whether they meet the minimum requirements for basic legality. However, they can only do this once the party has initiated the proceedings, regardless of whether either of the parties has invoked this as an argument. The court has the official mandate to establish the existence of the minimum legal requirements of an act once this act was put for decision before the court. The court cannot act on its own motion.

The court can start a procedure of assessing the legality of a general act (e.g. law, spatial plan, ordinance etc.) on its own motion. However, this has to be preceded by the information received from a citizen or ombudsman or a request by another court. This narrows the concept of acting on its own motion.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?

As a rule, decisions on an IED are challengeable in the final administrative decision (environmental permit/okolišna dozvola). Exceptionally, if the IED is integrated in an EIA procedure, then there is possibility of challenging a decision on EIA screening.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The Court will reject the claim if the hierarchy of legal remedies was not followed. If the environmental administrative decision was issued by a lower level of environmental authority, for example city, municipality or county (regional) level, one can appeal to the Ministry of Economy and Sustainable Development. Appeals decided by the Ministry can be challenged before the administrative court. The appeal to the Ministry must be filed before going to the Court, so the Ministry issues a decision which one can then bring to the Administration court.

When an administrative decision has been delivered by the Ministry, there is no higher body for appeal but one can start a dispute before the Administrative Court.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Yes for individuals and no for NGOs. Based on the wording of Article 168 of the Environmental Protection Act (hereinafter: EPA) access to justice is preconditioned for members of the interested public by public participation. However, there is additional provision provided for NGOs (fulfilling other requirements, of course) for whom participation in the public consultation phase is not required in order to have standing.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Act on Administrative Disputes, the Court will, before making a decision, give each party the opportunity to express an opinion on demands or statement of other parties and about all the facts and legal questions which are part of the dispute [16]. Also, the Court is obliged to ensure that lack of knowledge and experience of the parties does not cause harm to any rights which they have.

According to the practice of the Constitutional Court, it considers the principle of equality of funds in the sense of fair balance which necessarily entails a reasonable option of parties to present the facts and support them with their evidence in a way that they do not place any of the parties in a significantly worse position than the opposite party [17].

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There is no specific rule on timeliness determined for access to justice in IED cases. See section 1.7.1. point 4.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available, as in other administrative procedures there is no specific rule which would apply only to court cases related to IED procedure. It must be explained here that the Administrative Disputes Act provides for two precautionary measures: the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26) and the interim measure (Art 47). The first can be rendered at the request of a party or ex officio (although the courts do not exercise this power for the time being), and the second can be issued only at the proposal of a party.

The enforcement of the disputed administrative decision may only be postponed through the special institute of the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26). Interim measures from the Administrative Disputes Act have other functions, which are rarely present in an administrative dispute (e.g. measures in proceedings in which no administrative act is passed, prohibition of disposition of property, etc.). There is no appeal against the decision on the delaying effect of a lawsuit (Administrative Disputes Act, Art 67, para 1 and Art 26 para 2).

In the case of a lawsuit made by Želena akcija, Želena Istra and several private plaintiffs against the environmental permit (at that time called an ecological permit) issued by the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Nature for the thermal power plant Plomin C, injunctive relief was claimed. The court denied the injunctive relief since the decision on environmental acceptability does not represent a direct executive act for the realisation of the project. However, the decision does make the necessary condition to obtain such a direct executive act in further steps of the project. The public and public concerned do not have the right to participate in these proceedings and therefore they cannot claim suspension of the enforcement of the environmental acceptability decision before the case is closed in court.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

There are no specific rules on information on access to justice in IED cases.

1.8.3. Environmental liability [16]

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
The EPA[19] provides that the public affected by environmental damage (including the public concerned, i.e. also environmental NGOs) can submit an environmental damage notification (prijava) to the competent authority. The authority decides about this notification in the form of administrative act (upravni akt) which can only be challenged before the Administrative Court and no appeal to administrative authorities is allowed. Standing rules in such cases are the same as in other environmental disputes. Authorities act ex officio through inspections. If they establish the occurrence of damage, they need to follow up by initiating any applicable legislation for the case in question. This can vary from issuing a fine, issuing an order to comply and/or restitution of the original state, or initiating criminal proceedings, if applicable.

However, no access to justice procedure for the interested public, in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD, is envisaged for those cases where the authorities acted ex officio. This means that, following the existing rules, the public would need to initiate a new environmental damage notification (prijava) only to challenge, before the administrative court, the act resolving it if unsatisfied with how the case was handled ex officio (and following the notification). This is surely a redundancy in procedure which leads to unreasonable extension of time needed to address an environmental damage case.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
As mentioned above, appeal is not possible but the deadline for an administrative dispute is the same as in other environmental cases. The timeframe for submitting a claim to the Administrative Court is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to Court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
The EPA[20] provides that an environmental damage notification must be accompanied by appropriate information and data supporting claims on environmental damage. There is no other specific requirement.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
The EPA[21] provides that upon environmental damage notification, the inspection service of the competent authority must carry out an inspection at the location to which the application relates and check if the notification convincingly indicates the existence of environmental damage. The inspection service will then give the operator the opportunity to comment on the claims in the notification.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
I am not aware of required certain manner or time limits set in this sense.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
The operator is responsible for damage to the environment but also for imminent threat of such damage. However, it seems that the public can only make a notification (report to inspections) on environmental damage to the authority and not on the imminent threat of such damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The Ministry of Economy and Sustainable Development is the competent authority for environmental liability.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
As mentioned above, a decision on the notification on environmental damage and the same is with the approval of the remediation plan (sanacijski plan) are issued in the form of an administrative act (upravni akt), so only judicial review is possible.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases
1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
The Environmental Protection Act contains rules that if the Ministry or other administrative environmental body (on County level or level of the City of Zagreb) concludes that specific environmental decision could significantly affect the environment and/or the health of another country, the Ministry or other body is obliged to inform that country about that procedure. It can be a strategy, plan programme (SEA procedure), project, facility (EIA) procedure, industry or similar facility (IED permit). Also, the request for involvement in such a procedure can come from that country which believes it will be affected by specific decision. The rules to challenge environmental decisions are the same for affected countries as for Croatian individuals and NGOs, so final decisions can be challenged before the Administrative Court. The exemption is the decision on SEA which cannot be challenged since it is not issued in the form of an administrative act (upravni akt).

2) Notion of public concerned?
The same rules are applied to public concerned from other countries as for domestic public concerned. There are no specific rules set only for Croatian citizens but also not specifically for citizens of other countries. Environmental administrative procedures are basically open to everyone in the sense of involvement in a specific procedure, it is another thing to have standing.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
The Environmental Protection Act does not have specific provisions on access to justice in environmental matters for foreign NGOs, but neither does it have provisions which would forbid that. In that sense, if a foreign NGO can meet all the requirements needed for NGOs to have standing, it would probably be allowed by the Court. Unfortunately, there is still no case in which an NGO from an affected country has submitted or joined an environmental case, so it is not certain what the court would decide.

Regarding other questions, the rules which are set out for Croatian NGOs would probably be used for foreign NGOs – free legal aid is not provided to NGOs but only to natural persons, administrative decisions can be challenged before Administrative Court, injunctive relief is possible but rarely granted in environmental cases. The timeframe is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to Court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
According to the Environmental Protection Act[22], individuals have the right to file an appeal if they can prove impairment of their right due to the location and/or nature and impact of the project and if they participated in the procedure as a member of the public concerned. So, if a foreign citizen can prove impairment of his/her right in the sense of that provision of EPA, he/she can have standing.

Regarding other questions, administrative decisions can be challenged before the Administrative Court, injunctive relief is possible but rarely granted in environmental cases, the timeframe is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day
Act on the State Administration system on whose motion the procedure was initiated, against whom the procedure is conducted or who is entitled to participate in the procedure in order to protect her rights or legal interests can be a party to the administrative procedure. A general rule stipulates that a party to the administrative procedure is “a natural person or legal entity based on whose motion the procedure was initiated, against whom the procedure is conducted or who is entitled to participate in the procedure in order to protect her rights or legal interests”.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The information to the public concerned of another country is provided in the same time and under the same conditions as for domestic public concerned. This is not so clearly stated in the EPA but for each procedure (SEA, EIA, IED) it is determined that rules on access to information must be provided with provisions of the EPA and Ordinance on Access to Information and Public Participation in Environmental Matters.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

The timeframe is the same as in other administrative cases, 30 days from the delivery of the decision which can be challenged. There is an additional deadline if the decision was not delivered but made publicly available (for example on the website of the Ministry). In that case the 30-day deadline for submitting the claim to Court begins after 8 days from the publication of the decision. Non-Croatian citizens can obtain legal aid in Croatia, so can hire lawyers easily but it could be hard to obtain free legal aid as it is already also pretty hard to get it for Croatian citizens.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

There is no special rule provided regarding information on access to justice to foreign parties. All administrative decisions, including environmental decisions, have to contain information on access to justice (CRO: pouka o pravnom lijeku).

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

According to the Administrative Disputes Act, the rule is that administrative disputes are conducted in Croatian and in the Latin script. However, parties and participants in administrative dispute have the right to use their own language with a certified translator before the court. Translation costs must be covered by the party to whom they refer unless special law provides differently.

Regarding documents submitted to Court, the rule is that all documents are in Croatian or translated into Croatian. In practice if some documentation is submitted in a foreign language, the Court can order the party to translate it, the Court can order a translation or it disregards documentation which is not in Croatian.

Ministry of Justice also provides a list of Permanent Court Interpreters (stalni sudski tumač) for different languages.

9) Any other relevant rules?

I am not aware of any other important rule besides those already described in this chapter.

---

[1] Constitution, Art 118/3
[2] Šarin D.; Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia, Zagreb, Croatia
[3] Act on the State Administration system (Zakon o sustavu državne uprave) (O.G. 150/11, 12/13, 93/16, 104/16)
[4] According to Administrative judge in Rijeka Alen Ražko statement
[8] General Administrative Procedure Act, Art. 112 par 3
[9] Article 79, Administrative Dispute Act
[10] Article 90 of Environmental Protection Act, NN 118/18
[11] Article 86 of the Environmental Protection Act
[12] Art 6 of the Act on Administrative Disputes
[14] Article 90 of Environmental Protection Act, NN 118/18
[15] Article 86 of the Environmental Protection Act
[16] Art 6 of the Act on Administrative Disputes
[17] Dr.sc. Šarin D., page 736. and 737, Aspekti prava na pravično suđenje.
[18] See also case C-529/15
[19] Environmental Protection Act, OG 12/2018, Art 191
[20] Environmental Protection Act, OG 12/2018, Article 191
[21] Environmental Protection Act, OG 12/2018, Article 191
[22] EPA; OG 80/13, 153/13, 78/15, 12/18 Art 167 par 1 and Art 168 par 1

Last update: 26/10/2022

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELCD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Basic rules for administrative procedures are given in the General Administrative Procedure Act of 2009 (hereinafter: GAPA). GAPA has basic provisions (Articles 1-39) which are applicable to all administrative procedures. Sectoral specificities of administrative procedures can be detailed in sectoral laws but they may not derogate from the basic provisions of GAPA. GAPA has a general provision on standing which is given in Article 4 and which determines who can be a party to the administrative procedure. A general rule stipulates that a party to the administrative procedure is “a natural person or legal entity based on whose motion the procedure was initiated, against whom the procedure is conducted or who is entitled to participate in the procedure in order to protect her rights or legal interests”.
So, according to general provisions, in addition to the direct parties to the proceedings, a party to the proceedings can also be one capable of proving the impairment of their right. Under the general provisions, only parties to the proceedings can appeal or have recourse to judicial review. Appeal is submitted within 15 days of the delivery of decision (unless stated differently), and a lawsuit is submitted within 30 days of the delivery (unless stated differently). Sectoral laws usually define an exhaustive list of possible parties to the administrative procedure in question. E.g. the Spatial Planning Act defines the possible parties for the issuing of a location permit as a party requesting the permit, owner or holder of rights over the real-estate for which the permit is issued, and owner or holder of rights over the adjoining real-estate. In practice, parties which might prove the impairment of rights (e.g. owners of the real-estate not directly bordering the real-estate in question), and following the provision of Article 4 GAPa could be afforded legal standing in the issuing of a location permit, are usually not recognized as parties which could prove an impairment of a right under Article 4 of GAPa. Effectively, legal standing is enforced only based on express provisions on legal standing contained in sectorial laws. Special standing rights are recognized for environmental NGOs for those administrative procedures carried out on the basis of the Environment Protection Act (EIA, IED, SEA etc.). Although NGOs are not recognized as parties to those proceedings, but participate as public and interested public, they can nevertheless access courts and challenge decisions passed in those procedures.

A lawsuit may be submitted to the court against decisions which cannot be appealed, or against unsuccessful appeals. Based on the sectoral laws, only the parties to the procedure can submit a lawsuit. The lawsuits generally need to be submitted within 30 days since of delivery of the administration decision (or rejection of administrative appeal) to the parties. However, the general law governing administrative disputes before Administrative courts contains much wider general provisions. Based on the Act on Administrative Disputes (hereinafter: AAD), parties to the administrative dispute are the plaintiff, respondent and interested (third) party. Not only is the plaintiff very broadly defined, but so is the interested party. The plaintiff is any natural or legal person whose rights or legal interests have been impaired by an individual decision, act or omissions of the public authority or by the failure of the public authority to pass an individual decision or act within a prescribed time limit, or by the conclusion, termination or implementation of the administrative contract (Administrative contracts are concluded between a public authority and a party to the administrative proceedings for the purpose of implementing rights and obligations of the decision passed in the administrative procedure in those instances when a conclusion of such contract is expressly provided in the sectoral law). An interested party, one intervening in the administrative dispute between the plaintiff and the respondent, is any person whose rights or legal interests would be affected by the annulment, modification, or the passing of an individual decision, by the act or omission of the public authority, and by the conclusion, termination or implementation of the administrative contract. There is also an additional, special type of interested party – e.g. ombudsman, but parties of this type very rarely decide to take part in disputes. The Administrative Court hears lawsuits both as a court of Cassation (procedural mistakes and wrong implementation of material law) and a Reformatory court (establishment of facts). However, since the reformatory powers of the Administrative courts were only recently introduced (2010), the courts are still shy of using these powers. As a consequence, in practice the court mainly acts as a Court of Cassation, especially in complex matters such as environmental law.

Capacities of Croatian environmental NGOs are fairly limited, so they carefully choose cases to initiate. Usually these are straightforward ius standi cases regulated under the Environment Protection Act. So, the authors are unfamiliar if there are any test cases which would invoke access to justice based on ECJ case law. However, even in the “regular” cases, courts are reluctant to apply and interpret ECJ case law. They are grossly unfamiliar with the workings of the EU judicial system and lack knowledge and capacities to consult ECJ case law. Even when ECJ case law is invoked by parties and when courts decide in line with it, they usually tend to ignore invoking the ECJ case law as part of their decision-making process. Even in those cases decisions are justified in reference to domestic legal norms. Consequently, domestic legal norms are rarely, if ever, averted in favour of the ECJ case law, and ECJ case law is sometimes not even invoked by the parties due to poor chances of success. In general, it could be concluded that NGOs are not obstructed in exercising their access to justice rights by being denied a possibility to submit a lawsuit or administrative appeal. However, the poor quality of review and limited possibilities to review factual questions seriously undermine the effectiveness of legal remedies and consequently of access to justice rights.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? Administrative review is available when a first instance decision was passed by an authority other than the central public authority, e.g. county office for environmental matters or another type of regional/local authority. The central public authority (i.e. the Ministry) has all the powers in establishing the facts needed for passing the decision as does the first instance authority. However, the Ministry rarely establishes facts on their own and usually looks only at the procedural legality of the challenged decision and application of law. It either confirms the decision or remits it to the first instance authority for a retrial. When a Ministry confirms a first instance decision made by another authority, or when it passes such decisions itself as a first instance authority, usually no appeal is available but there is a recourse to judicial review before an administrative court via lawsuit. As mentioned above, the Administrative Court hears lawsuits both as a court of Cassation (procedural mistakes and wrong implementation of material law) and a Reformatory court (establishment of facts). Hence the court has the mandate to establish all necessary facts. In environmental matters it rarely acts on that mandate and usually only looks at the procedural legality of the decision and the application of law. It is an overwhelming experience of environmental NGOs that their substantiated requests to establish facts by way of expert testimony are overruled.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Yes, if such review procedures are available. If a decision is made by the authority against whose decisions there is no possibility of administrative appeal to the superior authority (e.g. the Ministry), then the first next step is a judicial review.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts Is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Yes for individuals and no for NGOs. Based on the wording of Article 168 of the Environmental Protection Act (hereinafter: EPA), access to justice is preconditioned for members of the interested public by public participation. However, there is additional provision provided for NGOs (fulfilling other requirement, of course) for whom participation in the public consultation phase is not required in order to have standing.

In a procedure based on the Act on Spatial Planning, if a party does not respond to a call for public inquiry in the process of issuing a location permit, that party loses a right to request a renewal of the procedure.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? In the judicial proceedings against the EIA permit, according to the established case law a fact that a project is not in line with the spatial planning documents cannot be substantially challenged. The fact that the project is in line with the spatial planning documents is proven in the EIA procedure by way of the Opinion or other document of the competent authority (which is an authority other than that competent for the EIA process). In the appeal against an EIA permit, only the existence of such an opinion or document can be challenged and not its content/veracity. The fact of conformity of a project with the spatial planning documents is established in the procedure of issuing a location permit. However, although the location permit is a development consent as defined by the EIA Directive, the public has no legal standing to challenge the location permit (as it does for the EIA permit). Hence, the public has no direct legal standing to challenge the conformity of projects with the spatial plans.
6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

GAPA, in its article 6, provides that a principle of proportionality must be maintained between protecting the party’s interests and the public interest. The right of a party may be limited only where such limitation is prescribed by law and only in as much as it is necessary for achieving the purpose of the law in a manner proportionate with the aim to be achieved. When, based on law, an obligation is set upon a party, the measures prescribed must be the most advantageous for the party if the purpose of the law may be achieved by those measures. The authorities are in general obligated to enable the easiest and the fastest fulfilment of party’s rights. Article 6 provides for the establishment of material truth, i.e. all facts and circumstances important for reaching the correct and legal decision. The authority is free to establish all facts and assess their meaning and in doing so it must take into account all available evidence and facts, taken independently and in their correlation.

The Act on Administrative Disputes which relates to judicial review of administrative decisions further strengthens the position of the parties in administrative disputes. The disputes are conducted as direct, oral and public disputes in which each party needs to be given an opportunity to address requests and arguments of other parties to the dispute and all facts and legal questions of the case in question. It should be noted that there are a few exceptions to the obligation to hold an oral hearing (Administrative Disputes Act, Art 36), but they are rarely applied in environmental cases, where key facts are most often disputed. According to the Act on Administrative Disputes, the Court will, before making a decision, give each party the opportunity to express opinion on demands or statement of other parties and about all the facts and legal question which are part of the dispute[2]. Also, the Court is obliged to ensure that lack of knowledge and experience of the parties does not cause harm of any rights which they have.

According to the practice of the Constitutional Court, it considers the principle of equality of funds in the sense of fair balance which necessarily entails a reasonable option of parties to present the facts and support them with their evidence in a way that they do not place any of the parties in a significantly worse position than the opposite party[3]. These rights are further elaborated through a 2012 decision (U-III6002/2011) of the Constitutional Court. In the cited decision, the court establishes the elements of a fair trial as proscribed in the Article 6.1. of the European Convention on Human Rights and in Article 29.1 of the Croatian Constitution. It finds that administrative proceedings are inherently at risk of being biased towards the state’s authority and that this risk needs to be mitigated through careful consideration of all aspects of the case in question and by giving all parties equal opportunities to prove facts they deem important and to provide evidence for such facts. This is especially important given the fact that administrative dispute is the only recourse against a decision of the public authority in the administrative proceedings. Irrespective of this decision, administrative courts as a rule reject all evidence to establish facts proposed by environmental NGOs.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The general provision is that administrative matters in which the public authority acts upon the request by the party and directly resolves the matter in question should be handled immediately and no later than 30 days from the application. In cases when the authority needs to establish facts the deadline is 60 days. Deadlines vary depending on the type and complexity of procedure and they can be differently set in sectoral legislation.

Judicial review is not bound by any deadlines which would be provided in the legislation. The speed of resolving administrative disputes is mostly impacted by the court’s workload. Whereas previously the average time for resolving administrative disputes was between 2 and a half and 3 and a half years, lately this was reduced to a year and a half on average.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the national general provisions?

An appeal in the administrative procedure generally postpones the enforcement of the decision, unless stated differently. Submitting a lawsuit in an administrative dispute procedure before the court generally does not delay the enforcement of the administrative decision.

It must be explained here that the Administrative Disputes Act provides for two precautionary measures: the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26) and the interim measure (Art 47). The first can be rendered at the request of a party or ex officio (although the courts do not exercise this power for the time being), and the second can be issued only at the proposal of a party.

The enforcement of the disputed administrative decision may be postponed only through the special institute of the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26). Interim measures from the Administrative Disputes Act have other functions, which are rarely present in an administrative dispute (e.g. measures in proceedings in which no administrative act is passed, prohibition of disposition of property, etc.). There is no appeal against the decision on the delaying effect of a lawsuit (Administrative Disputes Act, Art 67, para 1 and Art 26 para 2).

Interim measures exist as a possibility under the provision of Article 47 AAD. The types of interim measures are not specified so, logically, any measure capable of achieving the purpose for which it is granted is allowed. Most commonly, these would be connected to the postponing of the effects of administrative decision. The purpose of allowing an interim measure is to prevent grave and irreparable damage to the party requesting the interim measure. E.g. this can be either from the direct damaging effects of the administrative decision or by the acts of the authority which would prevent the party from benefitting from a judicial decision should it be different from the administrative decision.

The other instrument is the Enforcement Postponement. As mentioned already above, a lawsuit against an administrative decision does not postpone its enforcement. However, two different instruments enable the postponement of administrative decisions.

First is the provision of Article 140/1 GAPA. Under this provision, a deciding public authority can decide to postpone the enforcement of its decision if the following conditions are cumulatively met:

- postponement was requested by the party to the proceedings;
- the purpose of the postponement is to avoid the occurrence of damage which would be hard to amend (but not impossible, i.e. not irreparable damage);
- that the postponement is not expressly forbidden by law for the particular decision;
- that the postponement does not contravene the public interest.

Second is the provision of Article 26/2 AAD. Under this provision the administrative court can decide that the filing of a lawsuit postpones the enforcement of the administrative decision if the following conditions are cumulatively met:

- If the enforcement would result in a damage for the plaintiff which would be hard to amend, and
- if the law does not provide that the appeal (in administrative procedure, not in administrative dispute) against that particular decision does not postpone its enforcement (as it usually does).

However, this request is hardly ever used. One of the major reasons is that the courts rarely ever allow it, and in most cases do not even decide on it.

In most cases they reach a decision about the request for enforcement postponement together with the decision about the main issue, in the final judgment, rendering enforcement postponement completely purposeless.

The main difference between the two instruments, interim measures and enforcement postponement, is in the conditions which need to be met for their application. The first and obvious difference is the quality of the impending damage – for the interim measure, the damage needs to be irreparable and for the enforcement postponement it needs to be hard to amend. Public interest is another condition which differently applies. Enforcement postponement... cannot contravene the public interest, whereas an interim measure can go even against the public interest if the impending damage is grave and irreparable. Also, interim measures can be issued even in situations where the law prescribes that the appeal does not postpone the enforcement of the decision.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The court fees for lawsuits in the administrative dispute procedure are based on a flat rate, regardless of the value of the case. A fee for submitting a lawsuit and a fee for passing a judgment is paid. They amount to about 150 Euros. However, these are not the only costs. Usually the costs relate to the representation of the plaintiff and the interested party by a lawyer, and to the presentation of evidence. The defendant/respondent (a public body) cannot be represented by a lawyer, but some defendants (central state bodies) can be represented by the state attorney's office (which is rare in practice). This office is entitled to representation costs (equal to attorneys).

For each submission and each access to the hearing, the lawyer can request a reward of HRK 2,500.00 (approximately EUR 330) + VAT (25%). Courts do not usually award costs related to submissions that do not contain additional arguments, or, after the lawsuit has been filed, contain reasons that may also be presented at the hearing.

The loser pays rule is applied. So, costs of the case may also include material costs of travelling to court for any of the parties. These vary depending in which of the four courts (Zagreb, Osijek, Split and Rijeka) the procedure is conducted. The costs are usually calculated as 2 HRK per km for car travel + per diem (ca. 170 kn per day). Accommodation costs are usually not invoked and could hardly be justified due to Croatia's size.

The most significant cost is legal representation costs (a lawyer's fee) which can be requested if an interested party is represented by a lawyer, which it usually is. At least one hearing is held, but usually two or three are held. Any additional costs, such as expertise on a particular issue, vary depending on the complexity of the issue at hand and the amount of work connected to it. They are generally paid in advance by the requesting party. There is no express statutory reference that costs should not be prohibitive. The case law of the Constitutional Court regarding the proportionality of awarded costs is applicable and this practice mainly refers to the case law of the ECHR (e.g. Klauz v. Croatia, etc.).

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The process of a Strategic Environmental Assessment is concluded by issuing a Report on the results of the Assessment (Article 73/2 EPA). The Report is not considered a decision on the specific issue passed in the administrative procedure– administrative decision (cro: upravni akt). Appeals in the administrative procedure and lawsuits in the administrative dispute procedures are initiated against an administrative decision. Hence, there is no recourse to judicial review.

However, plans and programmes for which the SEA is conducted are considered general acts. Review of their legality is possible before the High Administrative Court in a sui generis review procedure. Although anyone has the right to initiate the review of legality of general acts, this right is however limited by the condition that the review can only be initiated based on the individual act passed based on the general act, e.g. location permit issued based on the spatial plan in question.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? Administrative review is practically not applicable here, but most likely in the case when a superior body decides on a first instance decision, it covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Yes, in other cases. But, as there is no possibility of administrative review of decisions which are the case here, there is no such requirement here.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure— to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

5) Is it not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure but there is no possibility of judicial review here. Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

As it is highly unlikely that such decisions are disputed before the Administrative Court, the use of injunctive relief here is also unlikely.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There are no costs as access to justice is currently not possible in these cases.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[5]

Example of plan or program not submitted to the procedure set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment can be:

any strategy, plan or program which is issued for use of small areas on local level or minor changes and/or amendments of any strategies, plans or programs for which SEA is obligatory when authority decides that the draft of the plan should not be submitted to SEA.

This means that for aforementioned strategies, plans and programmes as well as minor changes of strategies, plans and programmes for which SEA is obligatory, the authority (ministry or County administrative body) conducts an assessment to determine if SEA is needed and decides that it is not needed. The main issue here is that such a decision is not issued in the form of an administrative act (upravni akt/rješenje), as well as the decision on SEA itself, too.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain administrative review and legal challenge before national court are limited in such cases. The main problem is that decision on such plans or programmes is not made in the form of an administrative act (upravni akt). This means that such decisions (odluke) cannot be the subject of an administrative review or disputed before the Administrative Court. Such decisions do not even have information on legal remedies at the end.
Such decision (odluke) can be annulled by the administrative body which issued them. Also, in cases where the first instance decision was issued by the county level administrative body, the Ministry (as a superior body) can initiate an annulment. Individuals and NGOs could most likely send a request for annulment but there is no obligation for the administrative body to do that. Given the high level of discretion on side of the administrative authorities to act in such cases, this cannot be considered a means of access to justice.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? Administrative review is practically not applicable here, but most likely in cases where a superior body decides on a first instance decision, it covers procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Yes, in other cases. But, as there is no possibility of administrative review of decisions which are the case here, there is no such requirement here.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Standing is not applicable here, so this is no precondition.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no special rules applicable to each sector apart from general national provisions on injunctive relief. It must be explained here that the Administrative Disputes Act provides for two precautionary measures: the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26) and the interim measure (Art 47). The first can be rendered at the request of a party or ex officio (although the courts do not exercise this power for the time being), and the second can be issued only at the proposal of a party. The enforcement of the disputed administrative decision may be postponed only through the special institute of the delaying effect of the lawsuit (Art 26). Interim measures from the Administrative Disputes Act have other functions, which are rarely present in an administrative dispute (e. g. measures in proceedings in which no administrative act is passed, prohibition of disposition of property, etc.). There is no appeal against the decision on the delaying effect of a lawsuit (Administrative Disputes Act, Art 67, para 1 and Art 26 para 2).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? Since there is not possibility of access to justice in these areas, there are no costs.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

The Waste Management Plan of Croatia is one example of a plan required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation. The Waste Management Plan of Croatia for 2017-2022 was issued by the Government in the form of a decision (odluke), which is legislation such as government regulation. The Plan was adopted by the Government based on the Act on the Sustainable Waste Management, Art 173, OG 94/13.

The other example is the River Basin Management Plan of Croatia for 2016-2021. This Plan was also issued by the Government in the form of decision (odluke), which is a piece of legislation such as a regulation. The Plan was adopted by the Government based on the Act on Water, Art 36, OG 153/09, 63 /11, 130/11, 56/13 i 14/14.

In general, there is still no case law in Croatia which can demonstrate application of the Janacek case, but in my opinion current Croatian legislation does not provide for the efficient application of the Janacek case. In that case, the Court required that an individual, whose health was endangered by high levels of prohibited emissions in the air, was directly entitled to require the competent authorities to prepare an action plan to remove such emissions. Thus, it requires that an individual has judicial means against failure of public authorities to enact an act of general application. Under general rules of judicial review, when a person claims that a public body has failed to enact certain decision, he may initiate judicial review against such failure if he shows probable legal interest, which may consist in the violation of his right to a healthy life. However, the action can only be brought before the Administrative Court if the decision at issue was an individualised decision. Thus, judicial review cannot be initiated against the failure of public authorities to enact an act of general application.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? If the Plan is adopted in the form of legislation, the only possibility of its direct judicial review is before the Constitutional Court. In Croatia, the Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of laws with the constitution, on the compliance of other regulations with the constitution and laws, and on the compliance of laws with international treaties. There are three ways to institute the procedure of assessing the constitutionality and legality at the Constitutional Court: by the request of authorised institutions, by the decision of the Constitutional Court based on the proposal of any natural or legal person, and by the initiative of the Constitutional Court itself. Authorised persons for filing a request to institute the procedure of the assessment of the constitutionality and legality are one-fifth of the members of the Croatian Parliament, a working body of the Croatian Parliament, the President of the Republic of Croatia, the Government (in relation to by-laws, but not laws), the Supreme Court or another court (if the question of constitutionality and legality appears in court process), the ombudsman, and the representative bodies of local and regional government (about the issues of structure, scope and funding of local authorities). The Constitutional Court must make a decision on such a request following an urgent procedure within 30 days.

Everyone, i.e. any natural or legal person (so also NGOs), may submit a proposal to the Constitutional Court to institute the procedure of assessment of whether laws comply with the Constitution and whether other regulations comply with the Constitution and laws. The Constitutional Court decides in a session whether to accept the proposal and start the procedure, in which case it will begin the procedure no later than within a year from the date of filing the proposal.

If a law is proclaimed unconstitutional by the decision of the Constitutional Court – it shall be repealed. If some other regulation (by-laws) is found unconstitutional or illegal – it shall be repealed or annulled (ceases to be valid from the date of the promulgation). The difference between a repeal and annulment is that if the regulation is annulled, it is as if that regulation has never been in force at all, and all the legal consequences that occurred between the date of becoming effective and the date of annulment are also annulled. However, if the regulation is repealed, the relevant moment is the date of the decision of the Constitutional Court. All legal consequences that occurred prior to that moment remain in force, but the regulation is from that date onward without any legal effect. Legal consequences of the repeal are such that anyone successful in requesting the assessment of constitutionality/legality of law or regulation, whose rights have been violated by a decision based on the repealed regulation or law, has the right to file a request with competent authority for the amendment of that decision. All others have that right only if the regulation was annulled. The proposal may be filed within six months from the moment the decision of the Constitutional Court is announced.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?
It does make a difference since if a plan or programme is adopted in the form of legislation then access to justice is provided only before the Constitutional Court. The formal nature of the act is decisive.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Administrative review and judicial review are not applicable here. In Croatia, the Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of laws with the constitution, on the compliance of other regulations with the constitution and laws, and on the compliance of laws with international treaties.

There are three ways to institute the procedure of assessing the constitutionality and legality at the Constitutional Court: by the request of authorised institutions, by the decision of the Constitutional Court based on the proposal of any natural or legal person, and by the initiative of the Constitutional Court itself. Authorised persons for filing a request to institute the procedure of the assessment of the constitutionality and legality are one-fifth of the members of the Croatian Parliament, a working body of the Croatian Parliament, the President of the Republic of Croatia, the Government (in relation to by-laws, but not laws), the Supreme Court or another court (if the question of constitutionality and legality appears in court process), the ombudsman, and the representative bodies of local and regional government (about the issues of structure, scope and funding of local authorities). The Constitutional Court must make a decision on such request following an urgent procedure within 30 days.

Everyone, i.e. any natural or legal person (so also NGOs), may submit a proposal to the Constitutional Court to institute the procedure of assessment whether laws comply with the Constitution and whether other regulations comply with the Constitution and laws. The Constitutional Court decides in a session whether to accept the proposal and start the procedure, in which case it will begin the procedure no later than within a year from the date of filing of the proposal.

If a law is proclaimed unconstitutional by the decision of the Constitutional Court – it shall be repealed. If some other regulation (by-laws)[9] is found unconstitutional or illegal – it shall be repealed or annulled (ceases to be valid from the date of the promulgation). The difference between a repeal and annulment is that if the regulation is annulled, it is as if that regulation has never been in force at all, and all the legal consequences that occurred between the date of becoming effective and the date of annulment are also annulled. However, if the regulation is repealed, the relevant moment is the date of the decision of the Constitutional Court. All legal consequences that occurred prior to that moment remain in force, but the regulation is from that date onward without any legal effect. Legal consequences of the repeal are such that anyone successful in requesting the assessment of constitutionality/legality of law or regulation, whose rights have been violated by a decision based on the repealed regulation or law, has the right to file a request with competent authority for the amendment of that decision. All others have that right only if the regulation was annulled. The proposal may be filed within six months from the moment the decision of the Constitutional Court is announced.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Yes generally, but it is not applicable here.[10]

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is a possibility to comment on draft legislation during the public consultation process but this is not a requirement for individuals or NGOs to ask judicial review when this legislation is adopted.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In its article 6, GAPA provides that a principle of proportionality between protecting the party’s interests and the public interest must be maintained. The right of a party may be limited only where such limitation is prescribed by law and only in as much as it is necessary to achieve the purpose of the law in a manner proportionate with the aim to be achieved. When, based on law, an obligation is set upon a party, the measures proscribed must be the most advantageous for the party if the purpose of the law may be achieved by those measures. The authorities are in general obligated to enable the easiest and the fastest fulfilment of party’s rights. Article 8 provides for the establishment of material truth, i.e. all facts and circumstances important for reaching the correct and legal decision. The authority is free to establish all facts and assess their meaning and in doing so it must take into account all available evidence and facts, taken independently and in their correlation. The Act on Administrative Disputes further strengthens the position of the parties in the administrative disputes. The disputes are conducted as direct, oral and public disputes in which each party needs to be given an opportunity to address requests and arguments of other parties to the dispute and all facts and legal questions of the case in question. According to the Act on Administrative Disputes, the court will, before making a decision, give each party the opportunity to express opinion on demands or statement of other parties and about all the fact and legal question which are part of the dispute[11]. Also, the Court is obliged to ensure that lack of knowledge and experience of the parties does not cause harm of any rights which they have.

According to the practice of the Constitutional Court, it considers the principle of equality of funds in the sense of fair balance which necessarily entails a reasonable option of parties to present the facts and support them with their evidence in a way that they do not place any of the parties in a significantly worse position than the opposite party[12]. These rights are further elaborated through a 2012 decision (U-III6002/2011) of the Constitutional Court. In the cited decision, the court establishes the elements of the fair trial as prescribed in Article 6.1. of the European Convention on Human Rights and in Article 29.1 of Croatian Constitution. It finds that administrative proceedings are inherently at risk of being biased towards the state’s authority and that this risk needs to be mitigated through careful consideration of all aspects of the case in question and by giving all parties equal opportunities to prove facts they deem important and to provide evidence for such facts. This is especially important given the fact that an administrative dispute is the only recourse against a decision of the public authority in the administrative proceedings. Irrespective of this decision, administrative courts as a rule reject all evidence to establish facts proposed by environmental NGOs.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The Croatian legislation (Act on Courts, Act on Civil Court Procedure) as well as the Constitution mention the importance of delivering the judgment within a reasonable time-limit, but there is no clear practice as to what is considered as such. However, it is important to note that the Constitutional Court is not willing to recognize a violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time if the party has not used the legal instruments available to it by the Law on Courts to protect this right[13]. These instruments are a request for protection of the right to a trial within a reasonable time and a request for payment of appropriate compensation for violation of the right to a trial within a reasonable time (Article 64, paragraph 1, items 1 and 2 of the Courts Act).

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no “traditional” injunctive relief available in this case, but pending the final judgment the Constitutional Court may provisionally suspend the application of the act at issue.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
Access to the Constitutional Court is free, there are no fees envisaged. However, if individuals hire lawyers (which is not obligatory) then lawyers’ fees must be covered. Third parties are not introduced in the proceedings and loser pays principle does not apply here.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[14]

The Waste Management Plan of Croatia is an example of a plan required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation. The Waste management Plan of Croatia for 2017-2022 was issued by the Government in the form of decision (odluka), which is legislation such as a government regulation. The Plan was adopted by the Government based on the Act on the Sustainable Waste Management, Art 173, OG 94/13.

Another example is the River Basin Management Plan of Croatia for 2016-2021. This Plan was also issued by the Government in the form of decision (odluka), which is piece of legislation such as a regulation. The Plan was adopted by the Government based on the Act on Water, Art 36, OG 153/09, 63/11, 130/11, 56/13 i 14/14.

The Plan for air protection, ozone layer and climate change mitigation of the Republic of Croatia is also issued in the form of Government decision (odluka), so it is also legislation. This Plan was adopted under the Air Protection Act, OG 127/19.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

In Croatia, the Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of laws with the constitution, on the compliance of other regulations with the constitution and laws, and on the compliance of laws with international treaties. There are three ways to institute the procedure of assessing the constitutionality and legality at the Constitutional Court: by the request of authorised institutions, by the decision of the Constitutional Court based on the proposal of any natural or legal person, and by the initiative of the Constitutional Court itself. Authorised persons for filing a request to institute the procedure of the assessment of the constitutionality and legality are one-fifth of the members of the Croatian Parliament, a working body of the Croatian Parliament, the President of the Republic of Croatia, the Government (in relation to by-laws, but not laws), the Supreme Court or another court (if the question of constitutionality and legality appears in court process), the ombudsman, and the representative bodies of local and regional government (about the issues of structure, scope and funding of local authorities). The Constitutional Court must make a decision on such request following an urgent procedure within 30 days.

Everyone, i.e. any natural or legal person (so also NGOs), may submit a proposal to the Constitutional Court to institute the procedure of assessment of whether laws comply with the Constitution and whether other regulations comply with the Constitution and laws. The Constitutional Court decides in a session whether to accept the proposal and start the procedure, in which case it will begin the procedure no later than within a year from the date of filing the proposal. If a law is proclaimed unconstitutional by the decision of the Constitutional Court – it shall be repealed. If some other regulation (by-laws)[15] is found unconstitutional or illegal – it shall be repealed or annulled (ceases to be valid from the date of the promulgation). The difference between a repeal and annulment is that if the regulation is annulled, it is as if that regulation has never been in force at all, and all the legal consequences that occurred between the date of becoming effective and the date of annulment are also annulled. However, if the regulation is repealed, the relevant moment is the date of the decision of the Constitutional Court. All legal consequences that occurred prior to that moment remain in force, but the regulation is from that date onward without any legal effect. Legal consequences of the repeal are such that anyone successful in requesting the assessment of constitutionality/legality of law or regulation, whose rights have been violated by a decision based on the repealed regulation or law, has the right to file a request with competent authority for the amendment of that decision. All others have that right only if the regulation was annulled. The proposal may be filed within six months from the moment the decision of the Constitutional Court is announced.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? There is no possibility of administrative review of a piece of legislation. The only possibility is judicial review by the Constitutional court which then covers both procedural and substantive legality and constitutionality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? There is a general requirement to exhaust all legal remedies before going before Constitution Court. However, as in this case there is no other legal remedy against legislation, one can go to the Constitutional court without any prior procedure.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is a possibility to comment on draft legislation during public consultation process but this is not a requirement for individuals or NGOs to ask judicial review when this legislation is adopted.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There is no “traditional” injunctive relief available in this case but pending the final judgment, the Constitutional Court may provisionally suspend the application of the act at issue.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? Access to the Constitutional Court is free, there are no fees envisaged. However, if individuals hire lawyers (which is not obligatory) then lawyers’ fees must be covered. Third parties are not introduced in the proceedings and loser pays principle does not apply here.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how[16]? I am not aware of any specific procedure according to national law to challenge directly a piece of legislation adopted by the EU institution or body before the national court.

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters
[4] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
It is important to note that in Croatia an administrative dispute and judicial review may be initiated if an administrative body has not issued an administrative decision that it was obliged to issue, in the case of the silence of the administration (šutnja uprave). One needs to distinguish here between two types of administrative procedures based on which the time limits for reviews are calculated. One is a simpler administrative procedure when the court can immediately establish the relevant facts (no opposing parties to the proceedings) (Croc: neposredno rješavanje upravne stvari). The deadline to pass a decision in such cases is 30 days. The other is an investigative administrative procedure in which the authority needs to establish the relevant facts in order to pass a decision (Croc: ispitni postupak). The deadline to pass a decision in such cases is 60 days. Second instance decisions on appeals are also due in 60 days.

For example, if a second instance body, in Croatia within 60 days, failed to render a decision on the party's appeal against the first instance decision, such party may institute a judicial review as if the appeal was rejected. It should be noted that the judicial review can only be initiated, whereas there is no such condition for the administrative appeal, no earlier than 8 days before the appeal should have been decided (so 60 + 8 days). The following relate to cases where somebody does not comply with the rules of a judgment:

According to the Act on Courts[1] (Zakon o sudovima), everyone in the Republic of Croatia is obliged to respect the final enforceable and executive court decision and obey it. Although it is a general duty, it is particularly binding on the defendants in an administrative dispute since these are public law bodies, which form part of the apparatus in the function of legal order[2].

One of the principles of the administrative disputes is the obligatory status of the court decisions[3]. Failure to execute a final administrative court judgment constitutes a criminal offence against the judiciary – non-execution of a court decision[4]. When execution of a judgment represents an obligation of a public official then it is a violation of official duty to public service legislation[5].

The Criminal Code determines that an official or responsible person who does not execute the final court decision which was obliged to be executed (if any other criminal offence for which heavier sentence is determined), will be punished by imprisonment of up to 2 years.

Failure to execute a final administrative court judgment represents a serious breach of official duty since it is considered as non-performance, negligent, untimely or careless performance of official duties according to the Civil Servants Act, as well as of the Law on Civil Servants and Employees in Local and Regional Self-Government (OG 86/06, 61/11, 04/18, 112/19). The Court on Civil Servants (Službenički sud) decides about these breaches of official duties. This court, as well as the Higher Court on Civil Servants, are established by the Government for one or more public bodies.

There are cases that show that the timeline for final judgment and then for the execution of the judgment are very important in environmental matters. Despite the requirement for urgency envisaged by the EPA, the reality is different. For example, in a decision of 2009 the Administrative Court ordered that the EIA procedure for asphalt base must be repeated as public participation was not enabled in the public consultation process. The action was brought by a group of citizens in 2003, and the project was implemented in the meantime. The procedure lasted for 6 years. Upon the court’s decision, the public discussion was organized, all the objections of the citizens were dismissed, and the asphalt base constructed 6 years ago for the purposes of a quarry still exists near citizens’ houses. It can be seen in this case that although the court decision was executed it actually did not make any sense, it was just correction of the procedural mistake and without any impact on the EIA decision.

[1] Zakon o sudovima, Article 6, Par 3
[2] Dr.sc. Rajko Alen, Razlozi neizvršenja odluka upravnog suca i sredstva pravne zaštite, page 247
[3] Act on Administrative Dispute, Article 10
[5] Civil Servants Act, Art 38 OG 92/05, 140/05, 142/06, 77/07, 27/08, 34/11, 49/11, 150/11, 34/12, 38/13 and 37/13

Last update: 26/10/2022
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Italy
To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

Italy is a non-federal State with a certain degree of decentralisation. In 2001, a Constitutional reform changed the Italian Constitution and adopted a sort of federal model of distribution of competences between the central State and the Regions. Art. 117.2 of the Italian Constitution, as modified in 2001, identifies a list of areas in the exclusive competence of the State. Article 117.3 establishes matters of concurrent competence between State and Regions. In this case, the Regions have the legislative competence, to be exercised in accordance with the fundamental principles elaborated by the central State. Furthermore, the Regions alone have legislative competence in all matters which are not listed as exclusive State or concurrent State and Regional matters (Regional exclusive competence).

The power to legislate on environmental matters falls within the exclusive competence of the State (Art. 117.2 Italian Constitution). However, Art. 117.3 of the Italian Constitution gives Regions concurrent legislative competence in many areas relating to the environment, such as urban planning, health, civil protection, production, transportation and energy distribution. Furthermore, several provisions of the Environmental Code (Legislative Decree 152/2006, or the “EC”), allow Regions to maintain or introduce more stringent protective measures. Rules enacted at the regional level have however a limited impact on matters regulated by the EC, as they usually reproduce State legislation.[1] For example, legal standing, including in environmental matters, is an area falling under the exclusive competence of the State. National rules on standing thus apply to the entire territory of the State.

Today, most Italian environmental laws are transpositions of EU laws, as harmonised and codified in the EC.

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

In the Italian system, the environment is considered as an absolute primary value, and it is protected as both as a matter of public interest with primary constitutional value[2] and as a fundamental personal good.[3] The Ministry of the Environment and of the Territory and Sea Protection (“MATTM”) is the competent authority for the enforcement of environmental policies and granting environmental permits for plants with the most significant environmental footprints. The MATTM can also impose fines for infringements of such permits. It also oversees the clean-up procedures on contaminated land located in the most polluted areas of the country.

Another important role in environmental matters is played by the National Superior Institute for Environmental Protection and Research (ISPRA), together with the Regional Agencies for Environmental Protection (ARPA)[4] and the Provincial Agencies for Environmental Protection (APPa), whose main activities are:

- environmental research and monitoring (e.g. situation of coasts, soil, watercourses, pollution, meteorology);
- providing technical support for the environmental impact assessments;
- surveying the territorial impact of human activities by conducting technical inspections.

Finally, the national police forces (which have also a specialised maritime police section), the local police forces, the specialised section of the Carabinieri for environmental protection, the forest guards (which were absorbed by the Arma dei Carabinieri in 2016), and the customs officials have wide powers of inspection to ensure compliance with the environmental law provisions. The Ecological Operational Unit of the Arma dei Carabinieri (Nucleo Operativo Ecologico dei Carabinieri), in particular, is placed within the functional remit of the Ministry of the Environment and of the Territory and Sea Protection for the surveillance, prevention, and punishment of violations committed against the environment. Should these authorities find a breach of the environmental legislation or a failure to meet permit requirements, they are entitled to:

apply administrative fines;
suspend the permits;
report the violation to the public prosecutor.

In the Italian system, individuals and environmental NGOs having a legitimate interest in the decision-making process can challenge the lawfulness of public authorities' actions in environmental matters. Legitimate interest (so called 'interesse legittimo') is the interest of the party in obtaining an administrative decision. A legitimate interest may thus arise every time a public entity exercises, or fails to exercise, an authoritative power affecting individuals (Art.7 Code of Administrative Procedure, “CAP”, Legislative Decree 2 July 2010, no 104). Individuals and environmental NGOs are also entitled to participate in environmental decision-making and to be granted access to environmental information. Furthermore, they are entitled to claim compensation before civil and criminal courts for both financial and non-financial damages they have suffered as a direct result of environmental wrongs.[5]

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The Italian Constitution does not contain any explicit provisions protecting the environment. Nevertheless, the protection of the environment can be inferred from the following combined provisions:

Art. 9 dealing with the protection of the "natural landscape and the historical and artistic heritage";
Art. 32 on the protection of "health as a fundamental value of the individual and as a collective interest";
Art. 41 dealing with the prohibition of "economic enterprise against the common good";
Art. 44 on the "rational use of land";
Art. 117(s) which provides for the exclusive legislative competence of the State (and not of the Regions) in matters regarding the "protection of the environment and the ecosystem".
The Constitution contains explicit provisions on access to justice. Art. 24 states that all persons are entitled to take judicial action to protect their individual rights and legitimate interests. The right of defence is inviolable at every stage and level of the proceedings. Those in need are assured, by appropriate measures, of the means for legal action and defence in all levels of jurisdiction. In addition, Art. 113 of the Constitution states that the judicial safeguarding of rights and legitimate interests before the organs of ordinary or administrative justice is always permitted against acts of the Public Administration ("PA"). Such judicial protection cannot be excluded or limited to particular kinds of appeal or to particular categories of act.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts
In 2006, Italy enacted the EC (Legislative Decree 3 April 2006, no 152), which, as mentioned above, harmonised and codified national environmental laws with EU Directives. The EC sets out the legal framework applicable to: Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC); Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA); Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA); soil protection; water policy and management; waste and packaging management; contaminated land management; air quality; environmental damage and sanctions. Access to information, including information on access to justice, is regulated by Law 241/990 (Arts 22-28),[6] in conjunction with Legislative Decree 195/2005 (Art. 7) and Legislative Decree 104/2010 (Art.118). Furthermore, Art. 3 EPC regulates the right to access environmental information and the right to participate in the decision-making process in environmental matters, and establishes that anyone, without having to prove the existence of an interest, can have access to information regarding the state of the environment and the landscape.

Public participation and access to justice in relation to unlawful decisions by the PA are regulated by Law 241/1990, as amended and implemented in the provisions of the EC[7] regulating participation in specific environmental procedures, including EIA, SEA and IEA procedures. Access to justice in relation to decisions, acts or omissions of the PA is regulated by the EC as amended by Legislative Decree 128/2010 and the by general procedural rules set by Law 241/1990.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases
The Italian Supreme Court (Corte di Cassazione) is the highest judicial body, although it cannot be considered as a third instance court. This Court is competent only to assess violation or the misinterpretation of the law by the lower courts. It also adjudicates on conflicts of competence, jurisdiction and powers within the judiciary. In civil and criminal matters it has the power to re-examine decisions or orders on appeal from lower courts but only on points of law (decision on legitimacy); that is, to confirm whether the court dealing with the merits has applied and interpreted the law correctly.

The Italian Supreme Court has played an important role in the interpretation of national provisions related to the environment. Although the Italian system does not recognise a separate right to a healthy environment, the Italian Supreme Court has interpreted Art. 32 of the Constitution, which guarantees the individual right to health, as the individual right to live in a 'healthy environment'. The Supreme Court affirmed the inviolability of this right, which cannot be suppressed by the Public Administration even for reasons of public order, as it constitutes an absolute right.[8]

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?
Parties to administrative or judicial proceedings can rely on an international agreement only in so far as they refer to the internal act that ratified it.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system
The Italian judicial system is divided into ordinary and non-ordinary jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court is not part of the judiciary although its functions are substantially judiciary. Among the different powers, it judges on controversies relating to the constitutional legitimacy of laws and enactments having the force of law from the State and Regions. It also decides on conflicts of powers between the different institutions of the State, between State and Regions and between Regions. Ordinary jurisdiction deals with civil or criminal matters and is administered by ordinary judges and honorary judges who form the judiciary. Honorary judges are judges who are not professionals and they have jurisdiction over minor civil and criminal cases (for example, justice of the peace or ‘giudice di pace’).

The first instance jurisdiction, either in civil or criminal matters, is exercised by judicial bodies as follows:

- Justices of the Peace, a monocentric honorary body which deals with minor claims (for example claims not exceeding 5000 euros) or predetermined minor crimes;
- Ordinary Tribunal, which may sit as a court with a single judge court or a panel of judges depending on the procedural rules applicable to the case at hand;
- Court of Assizes (Corte D’Assise), which deals only with predetermined very serious crimes (for example terrorism);
- Juvenile Court (Tribunale per i minori).

The second instance jurisdiction, either in civil or criminal matters, is exercised by judicial bodies as follows:

- Court of Appeal (Corte d’appello), which reviews the judgments delivered by the courts of first instance. It can (totally or partially) amend the judgment rendered in the first instance or dismiss the application;
- The Court of Assizes of Appeal (Corte D’Assise d’appello), reviews the judgments of the Courts of Assizes. It can (totally or partially) amend the judgment rendered in the first instance or dismiss the application.

The non-ordinary jurisdiction includes the:

- Court of Auditors (Corte dei Conti)

Military Courts

Administrative Jurisdiction

The administrative jurisdiction aims to guarantee respect by the PA of the principle of the rule of law and to protect individual rights and legitimate interests. As mentioned earlier, legitimate interest is the interest of the party in obtaining an administrative decision. A legitimate interest may thus arise every time a public entity exercises, or fails to exercise, an authoritative power affecting individuals. All administrative decisions may be challenged before the administrative judiciary, including those issued by the highest level of the administration (such as acts issued by the executive). Only political acts cannot be challenged before the administrative judge. The administrative jurisdiction is composed of the Regional Administrative Tribunals (TAR), in the first instance, and the Council of State (Consiglio di Stato), in the second and final instance.

The highest judicial body in civil and criminal matters is the Supreme Court of Cassation. It is not, however, a third instance Court. The Supreme Court of Cassation is in fact competent only to assess violation or the misinterpretation of the law by a lower court. Cases of conflict of competence between special judges or between special and ordinary judges are also referred to the Supreme Court of Cassation, which rules in a joint sitting of all sections (Sezioni Unite).

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?
In criminal proceedings, territorial jurisdiction is determined by the place where the crime was committed. Depending on the type and seriousness of the offence, the crime will be tried before a Justice of the Peace, Ordinary Tribunal, or Court of Assizes. Cases of conflict of competence or jurisdiction can be challenged by the parties or by court’s own motion at every stage of the trial proceedings (Art. 20 Code of Criminal Procedure).
In civil proceedings the general rule is that the competent court is the one in the defendant’s place of residence or domicile (Art. 18 Code of Civil Procedure). Depending on the economic value of the claim, the case will be tried before the Justice of the Peace or the Ordinary Tribunal. Cases of conflict of competence or jurisdiction can be challenged by the parties or by court’s own motion at every stage of the trial proceedings (Art. 37 and 41 Code of Civil Procedure).

There are 20 TARs, seated in the 20 regions of Italy. In administrative proceedings, the general rule is that territorial jurisdiction is determined by the place where the PA (responsible for the contested decision, act or omission) operates (Art. 13 CAP). Conflicts of jurisdiction can be challenged by the parties or by the tribunal’s own motion during the first instance proceedings (Art. 9 CAP).

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

The Italian legal system does not provide for special judicial bodies or for special judicial proceedings in environmental matters. These are mainly dealt with by the administrative jurisdiction, which follows the general rules of the administrative procedure.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

Appeals against administrative acts fall within the exclusive competence of administrative judges. The administrative jurisdiction has a general competence over the legitimacy of acts issued by the Public Administration which are alleged to infringe upon “legitimate interests” (i.e. a violation of an individual’s interests caused by a decision of the PA). In this case the administrative tribunal can order the reversal of an administrative decision which has been found invalid due to lack of competence, a breach of the law, or abuse of power. When administrative judges quash an administrative decision, they can specify suitable measures to ensure implementation of the judgment (Art. 34.1 CAP). Since 2000,[9] an administrative judge can also order the PA to pay a compensation for damages suffered by an individual due to acts or omissions of the PA (Art. 30 CAP).

Furthermore, the administrative jurisdiction has a residual exclusive competence over some matters (Art. 133 CAP), for example:

- access to administrative documents;
- decisions of the PA regarding energy production;
- management of the waste cycle;
- decisions adopted in violation of environmental damage regulations.

The exclusive competence does not challenge a specific act issued by the PA, but it is used to enforce a right recognised by law. The administrative judge can order the PA to award damages, to do or give something, or to provide a specific service (so-called reintegrazione in forma specifica) (Art. 34 CAP).

As a general rule, a tribunal cannot on its own motion adjudge on claims which have not been brought before it and it must rule within the limits of the request. Once a proceeding has been initiated by the parties, judges have limited powers of own motion. By way of example, the judge can on his own motion:

- undertake preparatory enquiries or appoint a technical expert as a consultant (so-called Consultante Tecnico d’Ufficio - CTU) tasked with assessing the technical aspects of the decision under consideration (see question 1.5);
- seek clarifications and request further documents from the parties to substantiate the case during the inquiry phase of the proceedings (Art. 63);
- decide who has to bear certain costs of the judicial proceedings (Art. 26);
- declare an administrative act void in the cases prescribed by law (Art. 35);
- specify suitable measures to ensure implementation of the judgment.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

In the Italian national system, the administrative framework refers to the State, regional administrations, provinces, municipalities, and any bodies which perform public duties (Art. 41-43 Constitution). The MATTM has competence with regard to: permits for waste disposal in marine waters; measures concerning power lines with tension over 150 KV; environmental impact assessment (EIA), strategic environmental assessment (SEA) and integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC/IED) procedures for sites of particular significance.

Regions have planning and programming competences. Moreover, Regions are entrusted with the power to adopt specific administrative measures such as waste management permits, air emission permits, and EIA and IPPC procedures when not reserved to the State and not delegated to Provinces by the Regions.

As the Regions have the option to delegate administrative powers to municipalities, the precise nature of the powers of municipalities varies, although in general the competences conferred in environmental matters have been limited in scope.[10]

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Administrative environmental decisions can be appealed before the competent TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended). Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to a Tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). The decision of the TAR is appealable before the Council of State within 60 days from notification of the tribunal decision. In the national system, there is no time limit for the tribunal to deliver a judgment. Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Nevertheless, an average of three years is needed by the administrative tribunal to decide.[11] Furthermore, Art. 2.2 CAP requires the administrative judge and the parties to cooperate to achieve a reasonable duration of the trial.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

The Italian legal system does not provide for special judicial bodies or for special judicial proceedings in environmental matters. These are mainly dealt with by the administrative jurisdiction, which follows the general rules of the administrative procedure.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

Along with judicial remedies, the Italian legal system provides for non-judicial proceedings to challenge administrative acts (ricorsi amministrativi – Decree of the President of the Republic 1199/1971). These include:

- the typical hierarchical appeal: submitted to the superior organ of the PA that adopted the decision;
- the atypical hierarchical appeal: submitted to a different organ of the PA from the one that adopted the decision in absence of a hierarchical relationship;
- the opposition appeal: submitted to the same organ of the PA that adopted the decision.

Against administrative environmental decisions, individuals and NGOs can resort to both non-judicial and judicial remedies. In non-judicial remedies, the administrative organs before which the act has been appealed have to deliver the decisions within the time limit provided by law, which varies according to the different procedures involved. For example, the time limits can be 30, 60, 90 or 120 days from the submission of the request (Decree of the President of the Republic 1199/1971). The decision adopted by the administrative organ as result of the non-judicial remedy can be challenged before the TAR and the Council of State. These non-judicial proceedings review not only the legality, but also the merits – the appropriateness – of the decision and they are not a precondition for the judicial administrative appeal. On the other hand, these procedures do not preclude the possibility of going before the administrative tribunal (TAR) if the PA dismisses the appeal.
Administrative environmental decisions (EIA, SEA, IPPC) are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issues the decision (hierarchical appeal). The applicant has to file the appeal within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interests. This procedure has to be concluded by the PA within 90 days.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

The system of non-judicial proceedings provides for an extraordinary and residual means of appeal, so-called Appeal before the President of the Republic (Ricorso Straordinario al Presidente della Repubblica), through which only the legality (not the merits) of a definitive act of the PA can be challenged. Once this remedy is chosen, the judicial administrative appeal is precluded. An appeal before the President of the Republic can be filed within 120 days from notification of the contested decision and is decided according to the mandatory advice of the Council of State.

Furthermore, at every stage of the judicial proceedings, parties can ask the judge to submit a request for preliminary reference to the CJUE. As general rule, the judge has discretionary power on whether to refer the preliminary question. The obligation to refer arises when domestic judicial remedies are no longer available and an opinion on the application of EU law is needed in order to reach a decision. The reference also becomes mandatory even for a court of first instance when a question as to the validity of EU law is raised. This is because national courts have no jurisdiction to declare void measures taken by the EU institutions.[12]

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

In the Italian judicial system, alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, such as mediation and conciliation, are compulsory only in civil procedures and they concern only specific matters (Legislative Decree 28/2010). Therefore, alternative dispute resolution mechanisms are not available in the context of administrative judgments dealing with environmental matters.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson if applicable, public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

In Italy, Law 127/1997 introduced the Ombudsman at the regional level and in the autonomous Provinces, but there is no Ombudsperson at the national level. [13] They can assist the public in the preparation of an appeal (they cannot, however, bring the claim to court themselves) and can request the PA to review a contested action or omission (Art.16 Law 127/1997).

Private criminal prosecution is not available in the Italian legal system. Only the public prosecutor has the power – which is also an obligation – to initiate criminal proceedings (Art. 112 of the Constitution). However, natural and legal persons can lodge a complaint with the public prosecutor against criminal acts harmful to the environment and health.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

The EC defines the ‘concerned public’ as the public affected or likely to be affected by, or having an interest in, the environmental decision-making. NGOs promoting environmental protection and meeting the requirements under national law are considered by law to have an interest (Art. 5, letter v) EC).

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

For the above actors (within the meaning of the concerned public) there are no rules applicable in sectoral or procedural legislation such as EIA, IPPC. Legal standing is granted to any subject whose interest is affected by the decision of the PA (Art.7 CAP).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The Italian legal system provides members of the public having a legitimate interest in an administrative decision with the possibility to participate in the environmental decision-making process. This right is further enhanced by the possibility to challenge the final decision resulting from the decision-making process before an administrative or judicial body, provided that their right or legitimate interest might have been infringed.

As regards individuals, it has been noted that administrative case law on standing seems to rely on vague and flexible concepts like ‘vicinities’ (a stable and relevant link between the claimaint and the environmental area at stake, to be verified on a case-by-case basis).[14] For instance, being the owner (or living in the boarders) of a piece of land affected by environmentally harmful activities or a source of pollution may suffice to establish standing.[15] Moreover, the recognised environmental NGOs accredited with the Ministry of Environment under Article 13 of Law No 349/1986 are considered to have an interest in environmental decisions, acts or omissions. In order to be officially recognised by the Ministry of the Environment and to have legal standing, the associations need to fulfill certain requirements: they need to act across the whole Country or in at least 5 Regions; to have democratic internal rules; to pursue objectives of environmental protection; and to have continuity of action.

According to Italian administrative case-law, legal standing can also be conferred by the judge upon organisations and ad hoc groups representing an interest that could be impaired by the decision, once a concrete and stable connection with the territory is established. Standing of groups and associations can thus be granted, on a case-by-case basis, provided that the group or association is effectively and consistently involved in the protection of the environment and represents the local community affected by the measure challenged.[16]

According to Italian administrative case-law, legal standing can also be conferred by judges upon foreign NGOs representing an interest that could be prejudiced by the decision.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

As a general rule, judicial proceedings must be held in Italian (Art. 122 of the Italian Code of Civil Procedure). Nonetheless, the law provides for some exceptions with regard to Regions and autonomous Provinces. For example, in Trentino-Alto Adige, German has equal status with Italian with reference to specific acts in the proceedings. In Valle d’Aosta, French has equal status with Italian, and in Friuli-Venezia Giulia, specific rights are granted to the Slovenian-speaking minority. Outside these exceptions, when a non-Italian speaker has to be heard or when the judge needs to examine documents not written in Italian, an interpreter can be appointed. In criminal proceedings the defendant is granted free assistance from an interpreter (Art. 111 of the Constitution and Art. 143 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In administrative and civil proceedings, the judge decides which party has to pay the interpreter’s fee (Art. 53 of the rules implementing the civil procedure code). The Italian legal system applies the ‘losing party pays’ principle, so the loser must pay the costs of the interpreter. Nevertheless, the judge can limit the losing party’s liability for costs if he or she finds that the costs incurred by the winning party are excessive or unnecessary.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

The rules that apply to evidence in environmental cases derive from the civil, criminal and administrative codes of procedure. In particular, two basic principles regulate the collection of evidence: the burden of proof is on the applicant; and the collection of evidence follows the adversarial principle (contradittorio tra le parti).

It is the responsibility of the parties to provide to the judge the evidence that is available to them. Parties to a dispute can provide documentary submissions and request the judge to order the appointment of an expert, inspections of persons or things, exhibition of documents or other objects, or hearing of witnesses. The judge can uphold or dismiss these requests with a motivated decree.
Furthermore, some NGOs have opened the judge is usually interpreted to allow lawyers who are ethically or socially motivated to provide this service. No specific license is required by lawyers to and to

4) List of international NGOs, who are active in the Member State

The website of the Ministry of the Environment provides a in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The website of the Ministry of the Environment provides a list of environmental NGOs active in Italy.

4) List of international NGOs, who are active in the Member State
1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

Environmental administrative decisions (VIA, VAS and AIA) are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision (Hierarchical appeal – Art. 17 of Decree of the President of the Republic 1199/1971). The applicant has to file the appeal within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interests.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

The procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision which is appealable before the TAR and the Council of State (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). If, after 90 days from the appeal, the PA has not communicated the decision to the interested party, the appeal is considered to be rejected. The rejection can be appealed before the TAR and the Council of State.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

Environmental administrative decisions can also be appealed directly before the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended). Administrative remedies, therefore, do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to the administrative tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

In Italy, there is no deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment. However, Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Generally, an average of three years is needed by administrative tribunals to decide.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

Natural and legal persons can challenge environmental administrative decisions before the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decisions. All the allegations and requests from the parties must be submitted within the inquiry phase (fase istruttoria) otherwise they will be declared inadmissible by the judge. The parties can produce documents up to 40 days before the hearing, memos up to 30 days and replies to new documents and new briefs up to 20 days before the hearing. Late submission of briefs or documents may be exceptionally authorised by the judge at the request of a party (Art. 54 and Art. 73 CAP).

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

When challenging an administrative decision, neither the administrative appeal nor the application for judicial review have automatic suspensive effect. Under Art. 55 CAP, the applicant can ask the tribunal for suspension of the effects of the challenged decisions or for the adoption of any suitable interim measures. The administrative tribunal will annul the decision when the grounds raised by the applicant are well-founded. Execution of the administrative measure can also be suspended for serious reasons, and for the time strictly necessary, by the same body that issued the measure or by another body required by law. The suspension deadline is explicitly indicated in the act that orders the suspension and can be extended or deferred only once, or reduced if this is considered necessary by the PA (Art. 21-quarter of Law 241/1990).

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

As far as administrative proceedings are concerned, an injunction can be granted only at the request of the claimant and it has to be addressed to the competent tribunal. The decision on the granting of injunctive relief is challengeable before the Council of State within 30 days from notification of the measure or within 60 days from publication of the measure in the official law journal (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended). Administrative remedies, therefore, do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to the administrative tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

A request for injunctive relief in environmental matters can be introduced after the adoption of the final decision and has to be addressed to the competent tribunal.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Generally, the administrative decisions can be immediately executed irrespective of any appeal or an action submitted to the tribunal.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

When an administrative decision is challenged, neither the administrative appeal nor the application for judicial review have automatic suspensive effect. Claimants wishing to suspend an administrative decision need to address the request to the competent PA or to the administrative tribunal.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

The criteria for granting injunctive relief before the administrative judge are defined by the CAP: once the request is made, the judge has to decide on the matter during the first available hearing after notification of the request and after 10 days from lodging of the appeal. The parties are allowed to submit documents until two days before the decision on the request and are entitled to appear before the tribunal.

In order to take the decision, the judge has to verify whether execution of the contested act could do serious and irreparable damage to the claimant’s interests. Once this condition is verified, the judge can issue an order containing the reasons why the injunctive measure should be granted. The injunctive measure can then be enforced by the claimant and it may contain an order:

to suspend the contested decision;
to pay a sum of money.

It can also provide for other types of injunctive measures, such as judicial attachment or urgent actions.

If the decision on injunctive relief has irreversible effect, the judge may decide to grant it only upon payment of bail. Furthermore, if the decision on the injunction is not executed, wholly or in part, the interested party can request the tribunal (TAR) to take the appropriate enforcement measures. The decision on the granting of injunctive relief is challengeable before the Council of State within 30 days from notification of the measure or within 60 days from publication of the measure in the official law journal.

Several international NGOs are active on the national territory. Examples are:

- Greenpeace Italia
- WWF Italia
- Earth Council Italia
- Society for International Development Italy
- World Farmers’ Organization (WFO)
- Action Committee for the Three Global Conventions (CA3C)
- Friends of the Earth Italy
1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.?

The cost categories faced by an applicant when seeking access to justice in environmental matters are:

- the court fee (Contributo Unificato);
- the stamp duty (27 euros);
- the lawyers’ fees;
- the experts’ fees (when needed).

The court fees vary depending on the type of proceedings and on the value of the dispute declared by the applicant (Art.13 of Presidential Decree no 115 /2002 on judicial fees).[29] In administrative proceedings, the court fee might vary from a minimum of € 650 to a maximum of € 6,000. In case of appeal, it may vary from a minimum of € 925 to a maximum of € 9,000.

Few examples relevant to environmental administrative proceedings can be made:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Type of Administrative Appeal</th>
<th>Court Fee</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Proceedings concerning access to environmental information</td>
<td>Free</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Proceedings concerning access to administrative documents</td>
<td>300 euros</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Proceedings against the silence of the PA</td>
<td>300 euros</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Proceedings concerning the execution of judgments</td>
<td>300 euros</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appeal before TAR and Council of State</td>
<td>850 euros</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Extraordinary appeal before the President of the Republic</td>
<td>850 euros</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

If the claim is successful, the claimant is reimbursed by the losing party/ies, unless the judge rules that each party shall bear its own costs.

Under Art. 9.4 of Law 21/2012, all professionals, lawyers included, must give their clients an advance estimate of all the costs linked to the professional activity as well as an indication of the degree of complexity of the case.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

The court fee for injunctive relief/interim injunction follows above-mentioned rules but it is reduced of 50%, and stamp duties are mandatory. A deposit/cross-undertaking in damages can be offered by the applicant or ordered by the judge. As mentioned, if the decision on the injunctive relief has irreversible effect, the judge may decide to grant it only upon payment of bail.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

In the Italian system, financial assistance for indigents is a fundamental right enshrined in the Italian Constitution (Art. 24). Decree of the President of the Republic no 115/2002 therefore provides that legal aid must be granted by the State (patrocinio a spese dello Stato) to natural persons who have an annual income below € 11,493.82. This threshold is updated every two years by a decree of the Ministry of Justice, in line with inflation.

In civil, criminal, and administrative proceedings, a request filed on unstamped paper must be submitted to the competent bar association,[30] which might ask the applicant to produce further documents in order to prove his or her economic status. Within 10 days from the request the bar association has to uphold or dismiss the application. If the request is upheld the applicant can choose a lawyer from the list held by the bar association, and the court fee as well as the lawyers’ fees are paid by the State. If the request is rejected, the applicant can reapply directly to the judge who is presiding in the case.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Art. 119 of Decree of the President of the Republic no 115/2002 extends legal aid also to entities and associations, provided that they do not operate for profit; that they do not engage in economic activities (both criteria need to be met); and that they have an annual income not exceeding € 11,493.82. The request for legal aid by entities and associations follow the same rules provided for natural persons.[31]

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

While natural persons can only request legal aid or pro bono assistance from law firms, environmental associations in Italy can also rely on different channels for funding. For example, they can ask to be included in the list of non-profit entities to which citizens can devolve 5/1000 of their taxes due to the State. They can also draw on EU, State, regional and local special funds.[32]

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The Italian legal system applies the ‘loser party pays’ principle (Art. 91 of the Code of Civil Procedure). Nevertheless, judges can limit the losing party’s liability for costs at their own discretion if they find that the costs incurred by the winning party are excessive or unnecessary. In circumstances prescribed by law the judge can also rule that each party must bear its own costs. This applies, for instance, when one party won on one controversial point while the other party succeeded on another, or for other exceptional reasons set forth in the judgment (Art. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure).

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

In some matters the law provides for exemption from the court fees, considering the importance of the rights involved. By way of example, there are no court fees for:

- access to information cases;
- civil action in criminal proceedings when asking for generic compensation.

Furthermore, environmental protection associations recognised by the MATTM can enjoy exemption from payment of the court fees, provided that they act to protect common collective interests in environmental matters.[33]

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

Detailed information on access to justice is provided here.

The NGO Legambiente also provides practical information on instruments of access to justice, including templates for exercising the right of access to environmental documents and for reporting suspected violations of environmental law.[34] Furthermore, in 2003 the ISPRA Public Relations Office was set up to facilitate citizens’ access to environmental information at the national level.

The Italian legislator has also provided for other forms of structured dissemination:

- The National Environmental Information System - SINA (Sistema Informativo Ambientale) is the national system for the collection and monitoring of environmental information.
- The environmental assessment portal provides information about ongoing environmental assessments.
- Detailed information on inspections planned and performed under the Industrial Emissions Directive is made available by ISPRA.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?
Information on environmental administrative decisions is published on the website of the competent PA and made available in the national GU (Gazzetta Ufficiale della Repubblica Italiana) or regional BUR (Bollettino Ufficiale Regionale). Information on access to justice is provided in each administrative decision published by the PA.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

There are no sectoral rules applicable for EIA, IPPC procedures.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

Under Art. 3 and Art. 8 of Law 241/1990, every decision of the PA notified to its addressee must indicate the competent authority – together with the deadlines – before which it is possible to obtain judicial review. Furthermore, Art 8.2.d of Law 241/1990 (and Art. 40-41 and 64-bis of Legislative Decree no 82 /2005) provides for telematic means of access to environmental information and access to justice.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

As a general rule, judicial proceedings have to be conducted in Italian language (Art. 122 of the Italian Code of Civil Procedure). Nonetheless, the law provides for some exceptions with regard to Regions and autonomous Provinces. For example, in Trentino-Alto Adige German has equal status with Italian with respect to specific acts of the proceeding. In Valle d’Aosta French has equal status with Italian, and in Friuli-Venezia Giulia, specific rights are granted to the Slovenian-speaking minority. Outside these exceptions, when a non-Italian speaker has to be heard or when the judge needs to examine documents not written in Italian, an interpreter can be appointed. In criminal proceedings the defendant is granted the free assistance from an interpreter (Art. 111 of the Constitution and Art. 143 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In administrative and civil proceedings, the judge decides which party has to pay the interpreter’s fee (Art. 53 of the rules implementing the civil procedure code). The Italian legal system applies the ‘losing party pays’ principle, so the loser should pay the costs of the interpreter. Nevertheless, the judge can limit the losing party’s liability for costs if he or she finds that the costs incurred by the winning party are excessive or unnecessary.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned?)

The EIA (Valutazione di Impatto Ambientale - VIA) applies to construction projects with a potential adverse effect on the environment. The main legislative act covering the EIA procedure is the EC as modified by Law 128/2010 and Legislative Decree 104/2017, which implements EU Directive 2014/52/EU. In this procedure the PA determines the need for an environmental impact assessment (screening); defines the object of the environmental impact study (scoping); consults the applicant and the interested public; evaluates the results of the environmental impact assessment together with the results of the consultations; decides on release of the project authorisation; makes public the decision and monitors the environmental effects of the authorised activity (Art. 19 EC). As regards the screening procedure, this is the process of determining whether or not an EIA is required for a particular project. According to the general rules on public participation in decision-making process, natural and legal persons likely to be affected by the decision, as well as anybody having a private or public interest, including associations representing common interests, can participate in the screening procedure when such interests are likely to be affected. According to the rules on public participation set forth in the EC, the party proposing the activity shall send to the competent authority the preliminary environmental impact study. The preliminary study is then published on the website of the competent authority and the public concerned can submit comments within 45 days (Art. 19 EC). The competent authority adopts the final decision within the next 45 days. All documentation relating to the procedure and the final decision, including comments and opinions presented by the public, is published by the competent authority on its website. The final screening decisions on whether or not an EIA has to be carried out can be appealed before the administrative judge by natural and legal persons who have a legitimate interest, or whose rights might be infringed upon by the decision, within 60 days from the date of its publication according to the general rules of administrative judicial proceedings.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned?)

The scoping procedure is the process of identifying the content and extent of the environmental information to be submitted to the competent authority under the EIA. Members of the public with a legitimate interest or likely to be affected by the decision, including public interest groups such as NGOs, are entitled to participate in the scoping procedure. The party proposing the activity shall send to the competent authority the environmental impact study which is published on the website of the competent authority. The public concerned can provide written comments within 60 days from the day the documentation was published. The competent authority can also decide to organise consultations through public hearings which aim at further discussing with the public technical opinions and observations. The public hearing concludes with the preparation of a report which has to be taken into consideration for the final decision (Art. 24 bis EC). The final EIA scoping decisions (determining the object of the environmental impact study) can only be reviewed together with the final decision on the EIA procedure (Art. 21 and 27 EC).

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Usually, the public can challenge the environmental decision during the consultation phase which takes place after the first step of the environmental authorisation procedure (i.e. the screening phase). The EIA scoping decisions can only be reviewed together with the final decision on the EIA procedure (Art. 21 and Art. 27 EPC).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individuale, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

Natural and legal persons who have a legitimate interest (including foreign NGOs), or whose rights may be infringed by the decision, can always challenge the final authorisation according to the general rules on administrative procedure. This is appealable before the body hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interests. This procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision appealable before the TAR and the Council of State (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). Administrative decisions, acts or omissions can be appealed directly before the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision (Art. 2 and Art. 21 of Law 1034/1971, as subsequently amended).

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

Administrative tribunals review not only the procedural/legality of the administrative decisions but also their substantive legality. Under the first category, tribunals check whether the proper authority has taken the decision following the prescribed procedural steps. Under the second, tribunals check whether environmental laws were complied with. Administrative tribunals also look beyond the administrative decision and may involve a technical expert tasked with verifying the material and the project data, who will produce a report on which the final decision will be based (Art. 67 of Law 156/2010). Under both the procedural and the substantive legality check, the administrative tribunals can annul the decision of the PA and award damages (Art. 30 CAP). The tribunal may also order inspections, request tests or delegate a technical expert as a consultant to evaluate the material and the data concerning the environmental impact study (Art. 67 of Law 156/2010).

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?
Decisions, acts or omissions are challengeable after the adoption of the screening decision or the final decision authorising or rejecting the authorisation (Art. 21 and Art. 27 EPC).

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Court (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase of the EIA procedure. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? In the Italian system, administrative jurisdiction is informed by the adversarial principle, equal standing of the parties, and due process (Art. 2 CAP) in line with Art. 111 of the Constitution and the case law of the ECHR[38] and the CJEU. The parties to the trial, according to Art. 2 and Art. 111 of the Constitution, must be also put in a position of equality. When challenging an environmental administrative decision, parties can therefore ask the judge to appoint an expert, to inspect persons or things, to request the presentation of documents or other objects, or to hear witnesses.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Nevertheless, an average of three years is needed by the administrative tribunal to decide.[37]

While sanctions are not applied for administrative tribunals delivering delayed decisions, Law 89/2001 provides that anyone who has suffered material or moral damage from the breach of the right to a reasonable duration of the trial (as foreseen by Art. 6, para 1 of the ECHR) is entitled to go before the Appeal Court in order to claim damages. The reasonable duration of the trial must be assessed by the Appeal Court taking into account the complexity of the case and the behaviour of the parties and of the judge, as well as the conduct of any other authority that is called to contribute to the definition of the proceeding (Art. 2.2 of Law 89/2001).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions? The injunctive relief in EIA procedures is available according to the general rules set forth in section 1.7.2 and it can be applied to the final EIA decision. Furthermore, the PA that adopted the latter can decide to temporarily suspend the effects of the EIA decision for serious reasons. The suspension can be extended just once or reduced in case of subsequent suspensions (Art. 21quater, 2 of Law 244/1990).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

The integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) procedure was introduced in the EC through the adoption of Legislative Decree 128/2010 as modified by Legislative Decree 49/2014, Legislative Decree 127/2016 and Law 167/2017.[38] The IPPC is the procedure through which the competent authority adopts the AIA decision (Autorizzazione Integrale Ambientale) authorising the construction or the functioning of certain plants that are likely to produce environmental pollution.

According to the general rules on public participation in decision-making processes, natural and legal persons likely to be affected by the AIA decision, as well as anybody having a private or public interest, including associations representing common interests, can participate in the IPPC procedure when such interests are likely to be affected. IPPC legislation is complemented by sectoral provisions on public participation. Accordingly, during AIA procedures, the public concerned can submit observations within 30 days from publication of the request of the permit on the competent authority’s website.

There are no special rules related to access to justice for IPPC/IED procedures. The AIA decision can therefore be appealed according to the general rules of administrative judicial proceedings.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable? According to the general rule of administrative procedure, any natural or legal person whose rights or legitimate interest might be infringed by the administrative decision can appeal the decision granting or rejecting the permit before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision. Administrative decisions can also be appealed directly before the TAR.

Natural and legal persons, including foreign NGOs, which have a legitimate interest, or whose rights are infringed by the decision, can challenge the final decision according to the general rules of administrative procedure.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There is no per se screening in the IPPC procedure. However, when IPPC projects fall within the scope of the EIA, the EIA screening procedure is required. In this case the AIA can be released only after the competent authority has decided not to subject the projects to EIA. In these circumstances, the rules set forth in section 1.8.1 apply.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There is no per se scoping in the IPPC procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions? When IPPC projects fall within the scope of the EIA, natural and legal persons can challenge the EIA screening decision. Natural and legal persons can also challenge the final decision authorising or rejecting the permit. These decisions are challengeable before the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision. Decisions on environmental projects are also challengeable before the body hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interest. This procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision appealable before the TAR and the Council of State.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation? Natural and legal persons, including foreign NGOs, which have a legitimate interest, or whose rights are infringed by the decision, can always challenge the final authorisation according to the general rules on administrative procedure.

7) Scope of judicial review — control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

Administrative tribunals review not only the procedural legality of the administrative decisions but also their substantive legality. Under the first category, tribunals check whether the proper authority has taken the decision following the prescribed procedural steps. Under the second, tribunals check whether environmental laws were complied with. Administrative tribunals also look beyond the administrative decision and may involve a technical expert tasked with verifying the material and the project data, who will produce a report on which the final decision will be based (Art. 67 of Law 156/2010). Under both the procedural and the substantive legality check, administrative tribunals can annul the decision of the PA and award damages (Art. 30 CAP). The administrative tribunal may also order inspections, request tests or delegate a technical expert as a consultant to evaluate the material and the data concerning the environmental impact study (Art. 67 of Law 156/2010).

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
The public concerned can challenge the final administrative decision or the EIA screening decision when applicable (see in this respect 1.8.2.(5)).

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase of the IPPC procedure. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
In the Italian legal system, administrative jurisdiction is informed by the adversarial principle, equal standing of the parties, and due process (Art. 2 CAP), in line with Art. 111 of the Constitution and the case law of the ECHR[39] and the CJEU. Parties, according to Art. 2 and Art. 111 of the Constitution, must be in a position of equality. When challenging an environmental administrative decision, parties can therefore ask the judge to appoint an expert, to inspect persons or things, to request the presentation of documents or other objects, or to hear witnesses.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Nevertheless, an average of three years is needed by the administrative tribunal to decide. [40]
While sanctions are not applied for tribunals delivering delayed decisions, Law 89/2001 provides that anyone who has suffered material or moral damage from the breach of the right to a reasonable duration of the trial (as foreseen by Art. 6, para 1 of the ECHR) is entitled to go before the Appeal Court in order to claim damages. The reasonable duration of the trial must be assessed by the Appeal Court taking into account the complexity of the case and the behaviour of the parties and of the judge, as well as the conduct of any other authority that is called to contribute to the definition of the proceeding (Art. 2.2 of Law 89/2001).

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
The injunctive relief in IPPC procedures is available according to the general rules set forth in section 1.7.2. It refers to the final AIA decision. Furthermore, the PA that adopted the AIA decision can decide to suspend it temporarily for serious reasons. The suspension can be extended just once or reduced in case of subsequent needs (Art. 21quarter, 2 of Law 241/1990).

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
According to Art. 3 and Art. 8 of Law 241/1990 every decision of the PA notified to its addressee must indicate the competent authority - together with the deadlines – before which it is possible to obtain judicial review.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[41]
Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
In Italy, the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC has been transposed in Title III, part VI of the EC. Under Art. 309 of the EC, while citizens and recognised NGOs are not entitled to go to court autonomously in order to enforce environmental liability, they can submit to the METTM information, observations and documents concerning alleged environmental damage and request the METTM to act to remedy it. Recognised NGOs can also intervene in the environmental liability proceedings that the METTM may decide to start (Art.18 para 5 of Law 349/1986).
As regards standing to challenge the decision taken on environmental remediation, Art. 310 EC provides that any natural or legal persons who have a legitimate interest in participating in the proceeding related to the environmental remediation, or whose rights could be infringed by the environmental damage, can resort to both judicial and non-judicial remedies in order to:
- appeal the decisions that are in contrast with the environmental liability legislations;
- appeal the inactivity of the METTM in adopting precautionary, preventive or mitigating measures necessary to mitigate the environmental harm or in starting an environmental liability action against the party responsible for the damage;
- ask for compensation for the injury caused by the delay on the part of the METTM in adopting such measures.
Recognised environmental NGOs are considered by law to have a legitimate interest in participating in the environmental damage proceedings (Art. 309.2 EC). Furthermore, it is common judicial practice that environmental associations non-recognised by the METTM under Art. 13 of Law 349/1986, may also be entitled to take legal action if they: a) pursue effective and non-occasional actions in favour of environmental protection; and b) represent the local community impacted by the challenged decision. [42]

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
According to the general rules on administrative procedure (Art. 29 CAP), natural and legal persons can appeal the TAR within 60 days from notification or publication of the contested decision. Judicial remedy can be preceded by an opposition appeal (see section 1.3.4.) filed with the METTM. Claimants can also resort to extraordinary appeal to the President of the Republic.
Omission of the METTM must be filed within 30 days. Against the silence of or rejection from the METTM, it is always possible to appeal the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision rejecting the opposition, or 31 days after presentation of the opposition if no decision has been rendered (Art. 310 EC). The extraordinary appeal to the President of the Republic must be filed within 120 days from notification or publication of the contested decision.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
As regards the observations accompanying the request for action of the METTM under Art. 309, the EC does not provide for any formalities or specific requirements. Art. 309 only requires that observations are combined with documents and information concerning any case of environmental damage.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
The EC does not provide for specific requirements in this respect.

5) Is there a certain manner required and/or time limits set, if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
The EC does not provide a time limit for the competent authority to notify in writing, by post or by certified e-mail, the decision regarding the observations to the interested subjects. However, Art. 309 EC provides that the METTM shall act without delay. Against the silence of the METTM, claimants can appeal the TAR (Art. 310 EC).
6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

No extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority is foreseen in the EC in cases of imminent threat.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The METTM, on behalf of the State, is entitled to take legal action in environmental liability matters. The ministerial action usually takes place in collaboration with the Regions, the local authorities and any other public authority that is entitled to participate (Art. 299, paras 1-2 of the EC as amended by Legislative Decree 128/2010).

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

Administrative review procedures do not need to be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

If a project has an adverse impact on the environment in a transboundary context, the affected State and its population must be involved in the EIA or SEA procedure according to the rules set forth by the ESPOO Convention (implemented in Italy by Law 640/1994). For cross-border projects the METTM (Directorate for Environmental Protection) is responsible for issuing the notification to the affected State and providing the relevant documentation to its population. In Italy, there are no specific rules on access to justice for cross-border procedures. Therefore, national rules on access to justice apply. To this extent, the public concerned can challenge the environmental decision according to the rules set forth in sections 1.8.1 (EIA screening decision and EIA final decision) and 2.2 (SEA screening decision and SEA final decision).

2) Notion of public concerned?

In a transboundary context, the population living in the areas likely to be affected by the cross-border project represents the “public concerned”. Therefore, it includes citizens of the State of origin as well as those of the affected State who are to receive an equal treatment of information and participation (Art. 2, para 6 of the Espoo Convention).

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

If Italy breaches the participatory rights of the NGOs of an affected neighbouring State, it must grant those subjects the same rights conferred upon the citizens of the State of origin on the principle of non-discrimination (see e.g. Espoo Convention Art. 2 para 6).

A foreign NGO, although not officially recognised, could go before the Italian administrative judge in order to challenge the legitimacy of a proposed plan, programme, project or activity decision adopted by the Italian PA claiming that it has been excluded from the consultation phase. Legal standing, in fact, can be conferred by the Italian judge even on a case-by-case basis, irrespective of official recognition by the METTM.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

If Italy violates the participatory rights of citizens of an affected neighbouring State, it must grant those subjects the same rights conferred upon the citizens of the State of origin on the principle of non-discrimination (see e.g. Espoo Convention Art. 2 para 6).

A foreign citizen could go before the Italian administrative judge in order to challenge the legitimacy of a proposed plan, programme, project or activity decision adopted by the Italian PA claiming that it has been excluded from the consultation phase.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The public concerned is informed about the procedure from the consultation phase.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

When a proposed plan, programme, project or activity is likely to cause a significant adverse transboundary impact, the METTM notifies and sends all relevant documentation to any State Party which may be affected. The affected State can notify its interest to intervene, provide comments and request access to the administrative procedures and reports. The affected State can also appeal the decision to the national courts according to the legal procedures set forth in the EC (see e.g. Resolution n. 502/2009 of the METTM). If the appeal is successful, the Italian court can declare the decision null and void.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

The METTM has an obligation to send the State participating in the procedure the final administrative decision. The decision, according to Art.3 and Art. 8 of Law 241/1990, indicates the competent authority — together with the deadlines — before which it is possible to obtain judicial review.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

As a general rule, judicial proceedings only must be held in Italian (Art. 122 of the Italian Code of Civil Procedure). Nonetheless, the law provides for some exceptions with regard to Regions and autonomous Provinces. For example, in Trentino-Alto Adige, German has equal status with Italian with reference to specific acts of the proceeding. In Valle d’Aosta, French has equal status with Italian, and in Friuli-Venezia Giulia, specific rights are granted to the Slovenian-speaking minority. Outside these exceptions, when a non-Italian speaker has to be heard or when the judge needs to examine documents not written in Italian, an interpreter can be appointed. In criminal proceedings the defendant is granted free assistance from an interpreter (Art. 111 of the Constitution and Art. 143 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In administrative and civil proceedings, the judge decides which party has to pay the interpreter’s fee (Art. 53 of the rules implementing the civil procedure code). The Italian legal system applies the ‘losing party pays’ principle, so the loser must pay the costs of the interpreter. Nevertheless, the judge can limit the losing party’s liability for costs if he or she finds that the costs incurred by the winning party are excessive or unnecessary.

9) Are other relevant rules?

If a transboundary project causes damages to the population of a neighbouring State (be it Italy or one of its neighbouring States), individuals could go either before the court of their own State (where the harmful event has occurred) or before the courts of the neighbouring State where the harmful activity is located in order to be awarded damages (Council Regulation 44/2001 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters).

The page contains a study on the implementation of Articles 9.3 and 9.4 of the Aarhus Convention in Italy. It discusses the role of the Supreme Court, the Constitutional Court, and the Regional Administrators in environmental protection. The text highlights the importance of pro bono practices and the establishment of Pro Bono Italia, a non-profit association of lawyers, law firms, and forensic associations. The page also mentions the impact of EU directives on environmental law in Italy, including access to justice, compensation for damage, and the role of NGOs in court proceedings. The text concludes with references to judicial decisions and legislative changes in Italy.
1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

According to the case law of the CJEU,[2] access to justice must be granted also to challenge certain decisions related to specific activities and projects that do not fall within the scope of the EIA or IED Directives. For example, access to justice should be granted to challenge decisions adopted in violation of the Habitats Directive (Directive 92/43/CEE), the Water Framework Directive (Directive 2000/60/EC), or the Seveso III Directive (Directive 2012/18/EU).

According to the general rules set forth in section 1.4.2, in order to have standing, natural and legal persons need to prove that their rights or legitimate interests may be infringed by the decision, act, or omission. Recognised environmental NGOs are considered to have a legitimate interest. These administrative decisions are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interest, or directly before the TAR within 60 days.

As discussed in section 1.4.2, tribunals, on a case-by-case basis, can also grant standing to associations or ad hoc groups. As far as individuals are concerned, it has been noted that the case law of administrative law on standing seems to rely on the vague and flexible concept of ‘vicinitas’. To this extent, reports indicate that access to justice overall is effective enough to comply with the case law of the CJEU.[3] For example, in the case of a permit decision concerning an industrial activity not covered by the IED, participants have the right of access to related documents and may submit documents and briefs which must be considered when deciding on the application (Art. 10 of Law 24/1990).[4] The decision may be challenged before the hierarchically superior administrative body or administrative tribunals within 30 or 60 days from the moment the interested parties may be expected to have known that the permit had been granted. It must be noted, however, that given its inherent flexibility, the vicinitas concept allows for a case-by-case approach to standing for individuals, which at times may be considered somewhat restrictive by tribunals.[5]

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative appeal reviews not only the legality, but also the merits – the appropriateness – of the decision. The administrative tribunals may verify both the procedural and the substantive legality of the decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial phase.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In the Italian system, administrative jurisdiction is informed by the adversarial principle, equal standing of the parties, and due process (Art. 2 CAP.), in conformity with Art. 111 of the Constitution and the case law of the ECtHR[8] and CJEU. Parties, according to Art. 2 and Art. 111 of the Constitution, must be in a position of equality. When challenging an environmental administrative decision, parties can therefore ask the judge to appoint an expert, to inspect persons or things, to request the presentation of documents or other objects, or to hear witnesses.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Nevertheless, an average of three years is needed by the administrative tribunal to decide.[7]

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The injunctive relief is available according to the general rules set forth in section 1.7.2.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

In Italy, there is no statutory clause requiring the courts to avoid prohibitive costs. Nevertheless, Art. 1 and Art. 7 CAP refer to the principle of due process, which is interpreted the avoidance of prohibitive costs. Costs of access to justice in these areas can be estimated according to the rules set forth in 1.7.3. The Italian legal system applies the loser pays principle (Art. 91 of the Code of Civil Procedure). If it loses, the applicant will therefore bear the costs. Nevertheless, the judge can limit the losing party’s liability for costs if he or she finds that the costs incurred by the winning party are excessive or unnecessary. The judge can also rule that each party has to bear their own costs: when one party won on one controversial point whereas the other party succeeded on another, or for “other exceptional reasons set forth in the judgment” (Art. 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure).

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[9]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The SEA (Valutazione Azione Strategica - VAS) is a procedure through which the PA approves strategic plans and programmes in order to preserve the environment. This procedure includes: determining the need for an environmental impact assessment (screening); preparing an “environmental report”; consulting the applicant, the PA and the interested public; examining the “environmental report” and the results of the consultations; deciding on the release of the VAS authorisation; informing the public of the decision and monitoring the environmental effects of the authorised activity (Title II of the EC). This procedure applies, for example, to plans/programmes which are prepared for: agriculture, forestry, fisheries, energy, industry, transport, waste/ water management, telecommunications, tourism, town & country planning or land use and plans and programmes listed in Annex II, II-bis, III e IV (Art. 6(2)EC). According to the general rules on legal standing set forth in section 1.4.2, individuals and NGOs who have a legitimate interest, or whose rights may be infringed, can resort to both judicial and non-judicial remedies to challenge the decision, act or omission. The SEA screening decision can be challenged according to the general rules of administrative procedure. The SEA environmental report can only be reviewed together with the final decision on the SEA procedure. These administrative decisions are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interest. This procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision appealable before the TAR and the Council of State (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). Applicants can appeal directly to the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended). As discussed in section 1.4.2, recognised NGOs are considered to have a legitimate interest in environmental decisions. Administrative tribunals, on a case-by-case basis, can also grant standing to associations or ad hoc groups. As far as individuals are concerned, it has been noted that the case law of the administrative tribunals on standing seems to rely on the vague and flexible concepts, such as that of ‘vicinitas’. Access to justice to challenge SEA decisions is therefore flexible enough to comply with the case law of the CJEU.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The administrative appeal reviews not only the legality, but also the merits – the appropriateness – of the decision. The administrative tribunals may verify both the procedural and the substantive legality of the decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? The SEA procedure for public consultation is similar to the EIA procedure: the notice is published in the GU or BUR and the public has 60 days to comment. Comments from the public are taken into consideration for the final decision, which must be accompanied by a motivated opinion. To be an Italian citizen is not a prerequisite for participating in the consultation in accordance with the principle of non-discrimination.

In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals, it is however not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The injunctive relief is available according to the general rules set forth in 1.7.2.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Costs of access to justice in these areas can be estimated according to the rules set forth in 1.7.3.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[9]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Art. 7 of the Aarhus Convention requires public participation concerning plans, programmes and policies relating to the environment to the extent appropriate. In Italy, public participation to decision-making on plans and programmes is guaranteed mainly through the application of the SEA procedure. An important recent practice followed by public authorities is indeed to apply the SEA procedure, including public participation requirements, even in situations where discretion is still available.[10] Furthermore, in Italy public participation in plans and programmes has been developed with particular relevance at the local level even in situations where the SEA procedure is not applied. By way of example:

Local Agenda 21: the participatory Agenda 21 process follows two main steps: a) the creation of a dedicated 'local forum for Agenda 21' which provides for the involvement of local territorial stakeholders interested in pursuing a specific 'Agenda 21 local project'; b) the drawing up of an Agenda 21 Action Plan: a strategic document targeting all parties involved (Local Authorities, enterprises, organisations, associations, schools, media).

Law 394/1991 on natural protected areas (parks established at the national, regional or local level) provides for public participation in the plan to establish and manage parks.

Legislative Decree 287/2000 (on local administration) states that municipalities and provinces are obliged to promote public participation and access to information through their statutes.

Public participation is also envisaged in local decision-making on draft plans, e.g. on waste-water management, water protection plans (Piani di tutela delle acque) prevention of noise or air pollution, town planning, structural interventions, land-use, river-basin management and local/regional development. [11] In addition, it should be noted that Art. 7 of the Aarhus Convention can also encompass plans that, like the ones listed here, do not pass through a SEA procedure, but unlike these, are not (at least in principle) related to the environment. By way of example, the Italian Ministry of University and Research has recently opened a call for public consultation regarding the National Research Programmes 2021-2027 (NRP). With the NRP 2021-2027, the Ministry of University and Research intended to set in motion a participatory strategic planning process to contribute to the sustainable development of society and respond to emergency requests. [12]

As regards access to justice, the public with a legitimate interest in an administrative decision (individuals and associations) can not only participate in the decision-making but also challenge administrative tribunals in any unlawful decision adopted by a public authority (Law 1034/1971 and Law 241/1990). Only political acts cannot be challenged before the administrative judge. The public can also resort to administrative review (Decree of the President of the Republic no 1199/1971). Indeed, a decision can be considered to be unlawful when it is inconsistent with legal provisions regulating the way the discretionary power of the administration should be exercised, including those on public participation.[13] These administrative decisions are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interest. This procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision appealable before the TAR and the Council of State (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). Applicants can appeal directly to the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of the publication of the decision (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended).

It is difficult to establish with certainty with the resources allocated for this work whether or not access to justice is in this instance effective. Nevertheless, the requirements to be granted standing set forth in section 1.4.2. could be considered flexible enough as to comply with the case law of the CJEU. It must be noted, however, that given its inherent flexibility, the vicinitas concept allows for a case-by-case approach which at times may be considered somewhat restrictive by administrative tribunals.[14]

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The administrative appeal reviews not only the legality, but also the merits – the appropriateness – of the decision. The administrative tribunals may verify both the procedural and the substantive legality of the decision.
3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Tribunals (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The injunctive relief is available according to the general rules set forth in section 1.7.2.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? Are there safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Costs of access to justice in these areas can be estimated according to the rules set forth in 1.7.3.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[15]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Each person or group of persons, whose right or legitimate interest has been breached by a public authority’s decision act or omission concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation has legal standing to resort to both judicial and non-judicial remedies according with the general rules of administrative procedure. These administrative decisions are appealable before the body that is hierarchically superior to the one that issued the decision within 30 days from notification of the decision affecting his or her interest. This procedure has to be concluded within 90 days with the final adoption of a new administrative decision appealable before the TAR and the Council of State (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971). Applicants can appeal directly to the TAR within 60 days from notification of the decision to the affected party or from the date of publication of the decision (Art. 2 and 21 of Law 1034/1971 as subsequently amended).

As to whether or not access to justice is effective, the requirements to be granted standing set forth in section 1.4.2. should be flexible enough to comply with the case law of the CJEU. For example, if the competent authority for air quality legislation has failed to establish an air quality plan for a municipality in breach of EU air quality norms, a citizen or environmental NGO could submit a complaint to the Municipality (or to the local ombudsman where there is one). [16] If this is not effective, the concerned citizen or NGO can go before the TAR.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

The form in which the plan or programme is adopted can make a difference in terms of legal standing. If a certain plan or programme is issued in the form of a measure of a general nature, private individuals cannot access to justice except for the parts in which the measure is immediately harmful to their legitimate interests or rights. In this case, the generality of the prescriptions might make proof of standing more difficult.

If a certain plan or programme is issued in the form of a regulatory act, the recipients of these acts are easily recognisable, and the act can directly affect his/her subjective legal situation. For them, proof of standing can be easier.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative appeal reviews not only the legality, but also the merits – the appropriateness – of the decision. The administrative tribunals may verify both the procedural and the substantive legality of the decision.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Tribunal (Art. 20 of Law 1034/1971).

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision (Art. 7 CAP).

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In the Italian system, administrative jurisprudence is informed by the adversarial principle, equal standing of the parties, and due process (Art. 2 C.A.P), in conformity with Art. 111 of the Constitution and the case law of the ECHR[17] and the CJEU. Parties, according to Art. 2 and Art. 111 of the Constitution, must be in a position of equality. When challenging an environmental administrative decision, parties can therefore ask the judge to appoint an expert, to inspect persons or things, to request the presentation of documents or other objects, or to hear witnesses.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Art. 111 of the Constitution requires judicial proceedings to be completed within a reasonable time. Nevertheless, an average of three years is needed by the administrative tribunal to decide: [18]

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The injunctive relief is available according to the general rules set forth in 1.7.2.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Costs on access to justice in these areas can be estimated according to the rules set forth in 1.7.3.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[19]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

EU legislation is mainly transposed in Italy through:

Primary law (‘legge di rango ordinario’); e.g. Parliamentary law, Regional Law, D.lg, D.Lgs);
Secondary law: e.g. regional executive regulations.

It is important here to distinguish two different situations according to the kind of act used to transpose EU laws:

Primary law: natural and legal persons who have a legitimate interest, or whose rights might be infringed by an administrative decision taken on the basis of a primary law conflicting with EU Treaties, Regulations or self-executive laws law, can challenge the act and require the judge to disapply the administrative act in the specific case.

Primary laws conflicting with EU Treaties, Regulations or self-executive laws can also per se be challenged in courts of law. Natural and legal persons can require the judge to disapply the conflicting national law, to interpret the conflicting national law in conformity with EU law, or to refer the case to the Constitutional Court (the TAR, for instance, cannot disapply the conflicting Parliamentary law but can refer the case to the Constitutional Court). Applicants can also request the judge or the Constitutional Court to refer the case to the CJEU.

Secondary law: natural or legal persons who have a legitimate interest, or whose rights might be infringed from the measures, can challenge the secondary law according to the general principles of administrative procedure and request the judge to disapply the conflicting norm or to refer the case to the CJEU.

The administrative act adopted on the basis of the conflicting secondary law will be totally or partially annulled by the judge.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative tribunals may verify both the procedural and the substantive legality of the decision. The Constitutional Court may verify the constitutional legitimacy of the legislative or regulatory act used to implement or transpose the EU law.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Administrative remedies do not have to be exhausted before taking a case to Tribunals.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure -- to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the administrative tribunals it is not necessary to have participated in the public consultation phase. Legal standing is in fact granted to any party whose interest is affected by the decision.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Before the administrative judge, injunctive relief is available according to the general rules set forth in section 1.7.2. Before the Constitutional Court, the request for injunctive relief is precluded.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Costs of access to justice in these areas can be estimated according to the rules set forth in 1.7.3. Natural and legal persons do not have standing before the Constitutional Court, so they do not incur any costs.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[20]

A preliminary reference under Art. 267 TFEU is possible according to the rules set forth in 1.3.5

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[3] Institute for European Environmental Policy, Development of an assessment framework on environmental governance in the EU Member States.

[6] Please note, in this respect, that Italy has been found on several occasion to be in breach to Art 6.1 ECHR. See e.g. Cocchiarella v. Italy, application no 64886/01, judgment of 29/03/2006.

[7] See in this respect the 2018 EU Justice Scoreboard; see also CEPEJ Indicators on Efficiency.

[8] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

[9] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[12] For further information visit "Programma Nazionale per la Ricerca 2021-2027".

[13] Ibid.

[15] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janeczek and cases such as Boxsus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[17] Please note, in this respect, that Italy has been found on several occasion to be in breach to Art 6.1 ECHR. See e.g. Cocchiarella v. Italy, application no 64886/01, judgment of 29/03/2006.

[18] See in this respect the 2018 EU Justice Scoreboard; see also CEPEJ Indicators on Efficiency.

[19] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

[20] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

In the Italian system there are no sanctions against the PA delivering delayed decisions. However, the applicant can appeal the silence of the PA before the administrative tribunal (TAR) (Art. 31 and 117 CAP) and seek compensation for the damage caused by the delay (Art. 30 and 112 CAP).

Furthermore, in cases when the PA has failed to comply with a judgment, applicants can resort to the so-called giudizio di ottemperanza (Arts 112-115 CAP).

Following these proceedings, the judge can order the administration to comply within a specific time, as well as declare null and void any acts adopted in violation of the judgment. The tribunal can also replace the inert administration or appoint an ad acta commissioner.

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Cyprus

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level

3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 11/03/2024

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order — Sources of environmental law

As will be seen immediately below (1.1.2), the Cyprus Constitution of 1960 was promulgated before environmental rights became generally recognized, so it has not been a direct source of environmental legislation. Legislation was nevertheless introduced, either in colonial times or after independence, affecting aspects of the environment such as the protection of forests, rivers, and the foreshore.

Reference to the environment in legislation, as a holistic concept requiring protection came after Cyprus joined the EU in 2004, within the framework of the Nature Directives and other relevant provisions. So, it would be fair to say that the EU has provided our most important source of environmental legislation. The Aarhus Convention and the Convention on Human Rights are potential sources of environmental rights which have not been much utilized so far. Early attempts to introduce environmental protection in case law in the late 1990s came to a virtual halt for many years, for reasons that will be explained at para 1.1.2. below. Thus, case law as developed by Cypriot Courts has been a direct, but very limited, source of environmental law, and consequently the case law of the EUCJ on environmental matters has been rarely referred to or utilised.

1) General introduction to the system of protection of the environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order.

Environmental legislation places responsibility primarily on the state to protect the environment. Two independent officials, the Ombudsperson and the Commissioner for the Environment may be petitioned by the public (viz. any natural or legal person), but their decisions/opinions are not legally binding on the offending department. The highest level of protection is provided by the courts of law. However, natural or legal persons may only pursue protection of the environment through court action if they are personally affected by the situation. In other words, their right is based on the principle of personal interest or 'legal proximity'. Environmental NGOs can only pursue redress through the court in a limited set of circumstances outlined in sectoral law.

2) Constitution — main (content of and including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights.

As already mentioned, the Cyprus Constitution was drafted in the 1950s before environmental rights became popular. Consequently, there is no express provision in the Cyprus Constitution regarding protection of the environment, either as an obligation by the state or as a right towards nature or the individual. There is a right to life (Article 7) which has been interpreted by case law as a right of individuals, as represented by their local authority, to a healthy environment in their place of residence (Pyrga Community v. the Republic (1991) 4CLR). The importance of environment for a healthy life was re-affirmed in the appeal hearing in the above case (Cyprus v. Pyrga (1996) 3AAD 503), but its interpretation remained narrowly defined geographically to those within the area affected, and the court called upon the government to pass suitable legislation, a development which happened only after joining the EU and in a strictly limited way to accommodate certain directives, as will be seen further down. There is currently a proposal before the House of Representatives to amend Article 7(1) of the Constitution so as to recognize a right to health, environment and biodiversity.

Given that there is no environmental provision in the Constitution, the main provisions regarding access to justice on environmental matters are those that apply generally, and the Constitution's main provisions regarding access to justice are delineated in Articles 29, 30 and 146. Article 29 provides that every person (including non-Cypriots and legal persons) has a right individually or jointly with others to address any competent authority, to have their complaint apply generally, and the Constitution's main provisions regarding access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable)

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts.

The provisions for access to environmental justice were introduced when the Aarhus Convention was enacted into law (Law No 33(III)/2003), but without actively enhancing NGO rights, until the enactment of EU law made it imperative to do so. Even then, the focus was mainly on access to information (Access to Environmental Information Law, 119(I)/2004). When the EIA and the IPPC Directives were enacted, legal provision was made within those laws to grant limited rights to NGOs for standing (locus standi) before the courts. Similarly, with the Directive on Environmental Liability that followed.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases.
The Supreme Court has played both a positive and a negative role in furthering environmental rights. Following the Judgment of Pikis J. in Pyrga community v. the Republic (1991, see 1.1.2 above) it was accepted that citizens can invoke a right to life under the Constitution if threatened by an event with environmentally negative repercussions. It also highlighted the importance of the environment for the wellbeing of mankind, as well as the legitimate right - and indeed obligation - of a local authority to seek the protection of the law for the health of its residents, as against any other complainants, including local NGOs, who, despite geographical proximity, were deemed to have no legitimate interest under article 146 of the Constitution. The Pyrga case has made legal history by broadening the interpretation of the constitutional right to life and extending it to encompass environmental considerations, which in the late 1990s emboldened NGOs and the Cyprus Technical Chamber (a body enacted by law), to initiate recourses against planning permits in or near the Akamas Peninsula, a nature reserve under threat from development. Although the claims succeeded at first instance, they were overturned by the Supreme Court in plenary, which did not recognize a legitimate interest of the applicants. It was further held that to allow these recourses would amount to an actio popularis, which is not recognised as a cause of action in the Cypriot legal system.

These decisions are now under question in academic circles, on the ground that the court gave an extremely narrow interpretation of legitimate interest, but they have not yet been superseded. One could add that they were based on an incomplete understanding at the time of the significance of environment as a science, and the global effects of biodiversity loss. Given the inherent nature of environmental impacts to manifest in an indirect, long-term manner, affecting a large number of people, the narrow interpretation of an existing, personal, and legitimate interest by the Supreme Court fails to account for the unique nature of environmental considerations.

Be that as it may, the restrictive decision in Thanos Hotels of 2000 has weighed down on legal thinking for the past two decades, and consequently, until recently, no NGO has dared to initiate action in court against environmentally harmful administrative decisions or actions. Meanwhile, jurisdiction to hear administrative recourses has since 2015 been transferred to the Administrative Court, a court of first instance. Two environmental cases are known to be in process, No s 1929/2018 and 1768/2019) Friends of Akamas v. the Republic.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Parties to an administrative or judicial procedure can rely on international agreements only in so far as they have been transposed into Cyprus law. According to the Constitution, Article 169, legal rights derive from the Constitution or from legislation. International agreements which have been promulgated into law and published in the official gazette have primacy over national laws (but not over the Constitution)

1.2. Jurisdiction in the Courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Generally, a two-tier court system applies with proceedings starting in a court of first instance and if the court decision is appealed, it will be heard by the Supreme Court.

Courts of first instance are:

The District Courts which have civil and criminal jurisdiction.

There are six District Courts, one in each of the six towns of the island. Two of them (the Famagusta and the Kyrenia District Courts) have ceased to function since the Turkish military occupation in 1974, and their jurisdiction has been taken over by the Nicosia and Larnaca Courts. Each District Court has jurisdiction to hear and determine all civil actions, where the cause of action has arisen wholly or in part within the limits of that district, or where the defendant at the time of filing the action resides or carries on business within the limits of the Court. A criminal offence may be tried by a President of the District Court, a Senior District Judge or a District Judge sitting alone or by an Assize Court. The case normally goes to an Assize Court if it carries a penalty of imprisonment over five years and/or a fine over €50,000.

The Assize Courts

An Assize Court (there are now four Assize Courts based at Nicosia, Limassol, Larnaca and Paphos) is composed of three judges and has jurisdiction to try all criminal offences punishable by the Criminal Code or any other law, carrying penalties higher than the ones imposed by the District Courts.

The Family Courts

There are three Family Courts, one for Nicosia and Kyrenia, one for Limassol and Paphos and one for Larnaca and Famagusta. There is also one Family Court for Religious Groups, based in Nicosia. The Family Court has jurisdiction to take up petitions concerning the dissolution of marriage as well as matters which relate to parental support, maintenance, adoption and property relations between spouses provided that the parties are residing in the Republic.

The Industrial Disputes Court

The Industrial Tribunal (there are now three Industrial Tribunals based at Nicosia, Limassol and Larnaca) has jurisdiction to entertain applications by employees for unjustified dismissal and redundancy payments. It is composed of a President (who is a judicial officer) and two lay members representing the employers and employees.

The Rent Control Tribunal

The Rent Control Tribunal (there are now three, in Nicosia, Limassol, and Paphos) has jurisdiction to try all the disputes which arise from the application of the Rent Control Laws, which include amongst other matters, the rent payable and recovery of possession. A Rent Control Tribunal is composed of a President (who is a judicial officer) and two lay members representing the tenants and the landlords.

The Military Court

The Military Court has jurisdiction to try military offences under the Criminal Code and any other crimes committed by members of the armed forces. It is composed of a President (who is a judicial officer) and two assessors who are appointed by the Supreme Council of Judicature from a list of military officers.

The Administrative Court

Sitting only in Nicosia, it adjudicates on any recourse filed against a decision, act, or omission of any organ of state, any authority or person exercising executive or administrative authority. Recourses are made on the ground that such decision, action, or omission violates the provisions of the Constitution or of any law or is in excess or in abuse of any power vested in such organ, authority, or person.

There are no special courts for environmental issues, so an action against any organ of state, authority or person exercising administrative or executive authority, will be brought before the Administrative Court.

In addition to the above-mentioned courts of first instance, the Supreme Court sits as a court of first instance when acting as an Admiralty Court or an Electoral Court.

Appellate Jurisdiction

The Supreme Court hears appeals from all courts of first instance and also has exclusive jurisdiction to issue the prerogative orders of habeas corpus (to release someone from detention) and orders instructing a party to do something or refrain from doing something or to correct a decision.

The Supreme Court sitting as a Constitutional Court, has jurisdiction to hear cases when the constitutionality of a law passed by Parliament is challenged by the President of the Republic (Article 140(1)), and may also adjudicate on whether there is a conflict of power or issue of competence between state organs or authorities (Article 139). This Court hears appeals against decisions of the Administrative Court, and under Article 144 examines the constitutionality of any law if raised at any time by an affected party during a legal process. Moreover, under Article 146, it will examine the claim of any legal or natural person with a legitimate interest, that he/she has been affected by an administrative act/decision which is incompatible with the Constitution.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The jurisdiction of first instance courts is sufficiently clear to determine which court has jurisdiction. In some circumstances a party may decide whether to bring an action e.g. in the District Court or in the Industrial Disputes Court depending on the level of damages sought (higher in the District Court though a much lengthier process), but normally proceedings should start in the right court and the right city. In relation to damages caused, as a result of violation of environmental legislation, an action by an individual affected can be filed in the District Court where the damage was caused. A criminal case may also be filed by the Attorney General based on a specific environmental law (e.g. protection of nature) or under the more recently enacted law for crimes against the environment, Law 22((I)2012, in the court which has jurisdiction for the area involved.

There is no distinction between ordinary and extraordinary remedies before a court. Panels of three Judges decide finally on civil and criminal appeals in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court may uphold, vary, set aside, or order the retrial of a case as they may think fit. It is, nevertheless, possible for the Attorney General to promote an extraordinary remedy such as a nolle prosequi which is an order to stop proceedings on grounds of public interest, or to make a recommendation for clemency.

A citizen wishing to challenge an administrative act, decision, or omission in Court, must apply to the Administrative Court in Nicosia, irrespective of where the offending act takes place. The Administrative Court will review the legality of the challenged act or decision, based on the information presented in the case file, but does not extend to the merits of the case (unless the recourse relates to tax or asylum). The Court may quash an administrative action in part of in full and remand the case to the authority issuing the decision. The authority is bound by the Court decision.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are none and there are no expert judges. Recourse to the Administrative Court will be heard under the same conditions as any other recourse. Nevertheless, some environmental issues are decided under criminal or civil jurisdiction, e.g., the Law for Crimes against the Environment No 22((I)2012 and the Law on Environmental Liability, No 189(1)2007. In criminal procedures, everyone is entitled to report criminal acts (e.g., misuse of power by certain authorities) to the prosecutor. They can participate and bear witness at the proceedings. Remedies against court decisions are normally restricted to the prosecutor and the accused (although victims in crimes now have rights against perpetrators and failure to prosecute). In order to seek a judicial remedy, the complainant must have a legitimate interest as defined in Article 146 of the Constitution. This right must be exercised within 75 days of becoming aware of the event complained of.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

In proceedings before the Administrative Court, the Court can, of its own motion, examine matters of general interest such as time limit, executory nature of the act, competence of the organ, legitimate interest of the complainant. The Court cannot examine of its own motion constitutional issues and violation of fundamental rights. These constitutionality issues must be specifically pleaded. The presiding judge decides on such matters as the timing of the hearing, whether additional evidence can be admitted, or whether to grant injunctive relief, if raised by the applicant.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Where the act or omission is committed by an administrative organ or authority, there are courses of action available at the judicial and non-judicial level. Parties must distinguish between hierarchical/administrative and judicial recourses. Hierarchical control is exercised by a supervisor or a director over subordinates. In specific legislation there is provision for review of executive acts by higher administrative authorities (hierarchical recourses), if requested by an affected party, i.e., a party that has legitimate interest, (which could be an NGO, if the act complained of relates to legislation that specifically grants rights to NGOs). For example, the Law on Access to Environmental Information 119(1)2004, art. 10, provides that if the info requested by any citizen (including an NGO) is refused, or is incomplete, a hierarchical recourse may be made to the responsible Minister. Such recourse procedure, however, is not final or conclusive and does not bar the filing of a recourse to the Administrative Court. A hierarchical recourse has the advantages that a) the higher authority will examine issues both of procedure and substance, and b) the 75-day period for challenging the omission or action will be ‘frozen’, if so provided in the legislation or agreed by the parties, while the review process is being conducted.

In addition to hierarchical recourses mentioned above, other non-judicial remedies available in environmental matters include applications to either the Ombudsman or the Environment Commissioner, though neither have executive power, so applying to either, even if they produce a favourable statement, might not produce a remedy. The range of non-judicial remedies includes:

Complaints to the Ombudsman: The office of the Ombudsman was established in 1992 to protect citizens’ rights when affected by public administration decisions which are contrary to the law, or not in accordance with the proper exercise of administrative authority, without requiring the time and expense of going to court. A complaint is made by letter attaching copies of any necessary documents. The Ombudsman’s decision is not binding, but will carry weight if the party later goes to court. The Ombudsman, however, cannot consider a complaint if there is a case pending before the courts. When the institution of Ombudsman was introduced it was an inexpensive and speedy procedure. It is still inexpensive, but no longer speedy and could well take over a year to receive a reply.

Complaints to the Environment Commissioner who is appointed by, and reports to, the President of the Republic. The Commissioner may submit proposals and recommendations to the relevant Ministries for the implementation of environmental guidelines and may ask that a report be submitted. All citizens including NGOs can address the Commissioner, even though his/her recommendations are not binding, and the most one can expect is to secure the moral weight of the Commissioner’s support.

Complaints to the Minister: Article 29 of the Constitution regarding the right to petition official authorities, enshrines this right. The Minister has overview responsibility for an offending action/decision by any of his departments and he/she should be addressed by letter, either in the mode of a formal hierarchical appeal or less formally. The Minister will examine the procedural and substantive context of the complaint.

Complaints to the local authority: Any person, including non-Cypriots, residing in the Republic, may make a complaint as above, by letter sent individually or through a lawyer. If there is no response, and depending on the issue, it may be challengeable in the Administrative Court, in which case the 75-day rule applies for initiating a recourse.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Since there are no Environmental courts, appeals will be made to the Administrative Court in the same way that any other administrative decision would be challenged, and the process will take as long as any other recourse, viz. probably at least two years, more like four years. The requirements of Article 146 of the Constitution must be met concerning the legitimate interest of the applicant. In other words, the applicant, whether a natural or legal person, must have a personal, direct, existing, and legitimate interest which has been affected. This does not extend to interest groups, but in the case of an environmental NGO, legitimate interest, and consequently legal standing in a limited set of circumstances, may be recognised under laws that have been introduced as a result of transposing European directives.
They are:
The EIA law, as amended, No 127 (I)/2018, article 48; the IPPC law, now replaced by the Industrial Emissions Law, No 184(I)/2013, article 42, and the Environmental Liability Law, No 189 (I)/2007, article 14 (I). Details are given in the appropriate sections below, see para 1.4.2. Additionally, the Freedom of Access to Information Law, 125(I)/2000, provides the right of any person, including NGOs to challenge an omission or refusal by an authority to provide information within its competence.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence
There is no special environmental court, hence the applicant will follow the procedure described above, viz. unless otherwise provided, redress will be sought through the Administrative Court.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)
Appeals against environmental decisions are governed by the situation described at 1.3.2) above. Appeals against court orders would be made to the Supreme Court if the order was made by a court of first instance. Therefore, under Article 146 of the Constitution, an appeal against the Administrative Court’s decision would be made to the Supreme Court and the deadline is 42 days. Appeals against intermediary decisions may only be allowed if they are considered decisive to the rights of the parties, and only within 15 days.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references
Rule 1/2008 of the Supreme Court applies for seeking guidance from the European Court of Justice on the interpretation of EU provisions through the preliminary ruling procedure (πρόκληση της τορπομητή). The application may be made at any time during the proceedings by the parties or on the Court’s own motion. The final decision as to whether a case will be referred to the CJEU remains with the national court. It is not frequently used in practice, and as already explained, there have not yet been instances of its use concerning environmental issues.

There are no extraordinary ways of appeal.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?
No formal solutions such as mediation exist. However, NGOs which consider legal action too costly or too cumbersome, might consider it more effective to raise the issue with the responsible Minister, or to bring it to the attention of the Parliamentary Committee for the Environment (where the issue will be aired, but not necessarily solved), or to make a formal complaint to DG Environment, Brussels. If successful in the latter, DG Environment will start a review procedure against the state, which may result in an infringement procedure under Article 258 TFEU. Also, NGOs can always raise cases at the Bern Convention for the Protection of Wildlife (Council of Europe) and if successful, a file is opened against the offending state which has a certain nuisance value, although penalties cannot be imposed.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?
As already mentioned above, complaints can be made to the Ombudsperson or to the Commissioner for the Environment, but their published position would not be binding on the authorities. Their position would however carry a certain weight, especially if the case goes before the court. Appealing to the Attorney General would not normally happen because the Attorney General’s remit is to advise the government and defend the Government in court cases. The Attorney General would take action, however, at the initiative of the appropriate government department under the Law for Crimes against the Environment, No 22(I)/2012. In recent years, environmental NGOs have been known to bring instances of maladministration to the attention of the Auditor General who, if he considers that public money is being wrongly spent, would make a relevant public statement and include it in his annual report.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?
1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?
Any administrative decision, whether environmental or otherwise, can be challenged by any natural or legal person affected by the decision according to Article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution. Specifically, the decision must affect a complainant’s direct, existing (i.e. current) legal interest, which is interpreted to mean that a legitimate interest is personal and refers to one’s property, person, or occupation. This interpretation precludes NGOs or ‘interested parties’ on the ground that if a person would have no right individually because neither his property nor his person nor his health are directly affected, the decision in question does not become actionable simply because a number of persons seeks to question it. In other words, the courts have repeatedly ruled that the concept of actio popularis by concerned parties is not admissible and thus, a challenge by an NGO group falls into this category. In order to overcome this situation and to comply with the EU Directives regarding Integrated Pollution Prevention Control and Environmental Impact Assessment, laws were introduced in 2003 and 2005 respectively which partially address the locus standi of environmental NGOs (see question 1.4.2) below). Although these laws, and especially the EIA law, have given rise to recourses by individuals, recent cases by ENGOs relying on these rights have not yet been decided.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?
Differences refer to rights given to NGOs incorporated as a legal entity. These limited rights arise from the EIA Law, the IPPC Law, and the Law on Environmental Liability, No 189(I)/2007. They are ‘new’ rights so to speak, which NGOs would not have otherwise enjoyed, and recognise that under certain circumstances, environmental NGOs ‘have legitimate interests’ as defined in the Constitution.

EIA Law No 140(I)/2005 article 25(1), as amended by law No 127(I)/2018 article 48 (although these articles present some substantial differences between them). Article 25(I) of the 2005 law states that any NGO whose main purpose, according to its statutes, is the protection of the environment, is deemed to have a legitimate interest that could be affected by a planning permission issued by the Town Planning authority, an approval granted by the Environment authority, a decision of the Council of Ministers or other authority approving public works. In such case the NGO is deemed to have a direct legitimate interest and is therefore entitled to file a recourse to the Administrative Court on the basis Article 146 of the Constitution. It should be noted however, that when revised by article 48 of the amending EIA Law in 2018, the enabling provision for NGOs was restricted to challenging only the Environmental Authority responsible for granting environmental approvals, and only in specific cases: regarding the granting of an approval; against a negative screening decision (viz. concluding that no EIA study is necessary); for any decision or omission to hold a public consultation, or for preventing an interested party from participating. Under article 2 of the same law, the ‘Environmental Authority’ is the Director of the Environment Department.

IPPC Law No 56(I)/2003 as replaced by the Industrial Emissions Law 184(I)/2013, which under article 42 provides access to information and consultation and the right of environmental NGOs to judicial recourse if the stipulations regarding provision of information and public participation, are not respected. The Environmental Liability Law No 189(I)/2007, article 14(I) enables any natural or legal person who is affected or could be affected by environmental damage, to make a recourse to justice. The term ‘legal person’ includes any company or association whose main objective, according to its statutes includes environmental protection.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)
The following table explains who has legal standing and when. Basically, any person, whether natural or legal, whether a Cypriot or foreign, has the same right to ask for an administrative review, complain to the Ombudsperson, or go to court, if they are personally and directly affected in a legitimate right. NGOs have only the limited rights prescribed by the sectoral laws, already described above.

| Legal Standing |
Legal Standing | Administrative Procedure (κρατική προσφυγή) | Judicial Procedure (Διοικητική Προσφυγή) | Complaint to Ombudsman or Environment Commissioner
--- | --- | --- | ---
Individuals | Only against decision addressed to them. | Need to show a legitimate interest as stated in Article 146 of the Constitution or under sectoral laws, whether or not a citizen of the Republic. | Any person with an interest that has been affected whether or not a citizen of the Republic. |
NGOs | Normally need to show a public interest | Need to show legal standing which will be recognized on grounds of proximity under the Constitution, or if provided by law, viz. the EIA Law of 2018, the IPPC Law as amended by 184(I)/2013 or the Environmental Liability Law 189(I)/2007 | Needs to show either a public service or a local authority mishandling, even if only loosely connected to the NGO. |
Other legal entities | Local authorities directly affected or claiming a public interest for their inhabitants. | Local authorities and possibly other legally recognised entities (e.g. Parents Association, Church council) claiming a public interest under article 146 of the Constitution as interpreted by case law. | As above. |
Ad hoc groups | E.g. citizens groups. Need to show a justifiable interest. | No standing as a group, but members of the group as individuals would have standing if they satisfied the requirements of article 146 of the Constitution. | Need to show either a public service or a local authority mishandling affecting them. |
Foreign NGOs | No specific provision. Probably accepted if NGO demonstrates either a global interest in the subject matter or if the impacts go beyond Cyprus. | The better view is that although no specific provision is made for foreign NGOs, they would not be excluded under the sectoral (EIA, IPPC, ELD) laws, if they were registered entities in their country, aiming at protection of the environment, and could demonstrate sufficient proximity. | No reason why they could not complain against a Cypriot administrative act that affected their subject of interest. |

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?
Translation of legal documents is not provided by the courts and will be done at the party’s expense. Interpretation of proceedings is provided in all criminal cases and in other cases by application to the court if a party does not speak one of the country’s official languages (Greek and Turkish), on payment of the translator. When parties are legally represented, their lawyers are assumed to speak Greek. Pleadings (i.e. the formal documents used for the court process) can only be submitted in the official languages. A foreigner may make a sworn declaration (affidavit) in his/her language, accompanied by an approved translation.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures
Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?
In a recourse to the Administrative Court, the case is conducted on the basis of written submissions, including sworn affidavits by any party if necessary. The administrative department against which the recourse is made must provide the full file(s) relating to the case for examination by the Court. The file(s) provide the main evidence. The Court may review the legality of the challenged act or omission but does not extend to the scientific or other merits of the case. It will, however, extend to whether the department in question examined the impacts of its decision as fully as it should have done. On its own motion, the court can examine matters of general concern such as time limits, the executory nature of an act, the competence of an organ and the legal interest of the complainant. Constitutional issues or violation of fundamental rights need to be pleaded. The applicant must prove his/her case, and the weight of evidence is, as in civil proceedings, on the balance of probabilities.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
New evidence cannot normally be introduced since the contents of the case files are deemed to contain all relevant material. There are exceptions only if the Court deems there is ‘good reason’ to do so, as established by case law, and then only if it relates to a period before the impugned decision. See case 651 /2019CLR, The Church of Ayios Nicolaos, Pano Delfera v. the Republic (2019).

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts
With the exception of faculty lists produced by universities (referred to elsewhere in this text), there are no published lists of experts at present. Since expert opinion would usually relate to material facts and the Administrative Court does not examine issues of substance, the use of expert evidence is limited. If expert opinion were necessary to support a claim for annulment or to claim damages in the Civil Court, the lawyer handling the case would normally advise the client and suggest an expert. The Court’s permission would be a prerequisite to adding expert opinion.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
In line with the normal practice of the Administrative Court, as per 1.5.3. above, experts would not be called, but if they were, exceptionally, their evidence would not be binding. It is up to the Court to assess its weight and credibility.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
Since Cyprus follows the adversarial system, the court would not call upon experts.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
As mentioned, expert evidence is not normally admitted in administrative cases, except as stated at 1.5.3. The general court rules as to expert testimony apply.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
Not applicable.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field
Legal Representation:
Representation by legal counsel is not compulsory for individuals. An applicant may present his/her case in person, but, given that administrative law is complex and dependent on case law, this is unlikely. In Cyprus, lawyers are entitled to deal with any legal matter and do not have formal specialisations, although several lawyers choose particular types of cases, or choose not to undertake pleading in court. The list of registered practicing lawyers is placed on the site of the Cyprus Bar Association and is updated regularly. There are no law firms specializing in environmental matters and according to the general code of conduct it is not allowed to advertise. Consequently, and until this rule changes, there could not be a published list. A person wishing to initiate proceedings on an environmental issue would be well advised to seek a lawyer with experience in Constitutional /Administrative law since the proceedings will most likely be conducted on the basis of Article 146 of the Constitution. Given that Cyprus is a small place, information travels by recommendation. Legal entities such as NGOs, can only go to court if represented by counsel.

There are no NGOs giving public consultation on environmental/legal matters.

1.1) Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is no practice of pro bono assistance since it is prohibited under the Advocates Law. There may have been instances when a lawyer has waived his/her fee. — not in environmental cases so far, since they have not appeared before the courts — but this would be done entirely privately.

1.2) If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

Not applicable.

1.3) Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

Not applicable.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

The University of Cyprus provides a list of experts which is in effect, a list of its faculty staff and their specializations (see ucy.ac.cy/list of experts). It has been known, in non-environmental cases, e.g. in a recent extradition case tried in the District Court, for the defence lawyers to call upon experts from this UCy list. Other universities issue similar staff lists.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible.

A public registry of environmental NGOs is available here.

NGOs who have taken legal action in the past are the Friends of Akamas and the Laona Foundation for the Conservation and Regeneration of the Cypriot Countryside. Friends of Akamas has renewed its efforts with a recent recourse, still before the court. Two other NGOs interested in legal issues are Terra Cypria-the Cyprus Conservation Foundation and the Πρωτοβουλία για τη διάσωση των φυσικών ακτών (Cyprus Initiative For The Protection of the Natural Coastline), but they have not been involved in actions so far.

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State.

International NGOs with branches in Cyprus (but which have not started legal recourses so far) are Friends of the Earth-Cyprus and Birdlife Cyprus (a member of Birdlife International).

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

In general, (if not taking the matter to court), a non-judicial administrative decision, whether environmental or otherwise, may be challenged by making a written complaint to the minister responsible or to a relevant superior official. There is no specific time limit, it depends on the case and circumstances. In the case of a formal hierarchical recourse to a minister, specifically provided in legislation, the relevant law will also specify the time limit within which the recourse should be made.

If the law provides that the decision or act must be published in the official gazette the time limit starts from the date of publication.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

Under Article 29 of the Cyprus Constitution any person addressing a public authority should receive a response within 30 days. The response, however, is often no more than an acknowledgement informing the claimant that further time will be necessary in order to reply fully. A claimant could go to Court, if the reply would lead to an executory act, challengeable under Article 146 of the Constitution.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

It is possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court, a recourse to justice would be made, provided the complainant met the prerequisites of Article 146 of the Constitution, including the time limit of 75 days.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

An environmental court case would be treated as any other and the duration is on average 12-16 months for a first instance liaising and at least two years for completion, possibly four. An appeal could last much longer. According to the Procedural Rules 11/1986 judgments from first instance courts must be delivered within six months of hearing final arguments. There is no deadline for the Supreme Court. In practice all types of procedure take a very long time except in rent tribunals and in family courts concerning the interests of minors. If a judgment in the lower courts is not delivered within six months of closing arguments, explanations may need to be given and the parties can seek redress from the Supreme Court. There have been instances of recourse to the European Court of Human Rights against the Cyprus Republic because of court delays, and it was found that such delays are in themselves a denial of justice. Law N.2(1)/2010, based on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, provides a cause of action to seek compensation for an unreasonably delayed court decision. A Supreme Court decision of 2019, M.D. Cyprus Soya v Attorney General, case no. 1/2018, suggests that it would also apply to delays in adjudication on appeal.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The time limits may be found in the Procedural rule 6/2005 (in Greek) which also contains the forms to be filled in by the applicant and the respondent, including individuals appearing without a lawyer. Very briefly within 45 days from receiving notice of the recourse, the respondent must file a reply, and an interested party must do so within 21 days. Exchange of pleadings in writing with arguments in ‘skeleton form’ must be done within 30 days. This process and the dates are specified by the judge hearing the case and it is usual for extensions to be given and for this process to take much longer.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

There is no suspensive effect of a judicial recourse or appeal, nor is it possible to simply seek an injunction. An injunction would be part of the recourse against the validity of the decision or action. Regarding an administrative appeal to a higher non-judicial authority, please see 1.7.2.2 below.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

In an administrative/hierarchical appeal to a superior authority, it is normal for the administrative act/decision to be suspended while the review is taking place and, if the review finds in favour of the complainant, the process will be discontinued. If the review confirms the action/decision taken, it will be implemented and appealing to the court will not automatically arrest the process.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

Unless provided in sectoral laws, there is no general provision for granting injunctions in environmental matters. The normal judicial procedure would need to be followed and satisfied. Requests coming from individuals or groups are very rarely granted and often with considerable financial undertakings as to cross-damages. Such conditions apply so that injunctions are more easily granted to a government department seeking to prevent an illegal act (e.g. to stop an individual from demolishing a building under preservation order). There is an appeal against a decision to refuse an injunction which is made to the Supreme Court.
4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Normally there is an immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced, unless a deadline is provided for responses by the affected party. If an administrative appeal is made to a higher authority (ιεραρχική προσφυγή), i.e. to the relevant minister, execution would be suspended, pending his/her decision, as mentioned at 1.7.2.2) above. This presupposes that the offending department has also been kept informed by copy of the complaint made.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

It is not automatically suspended. See answer 1.7.2.1) and 1.7.2.3) above.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

There is a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief under very strict criteria, and the amount sought is often too high for an ordinary citizen or an NGO to meet. See answer to 1.7.2.1) and 3) above. However, in the recent case of the Church of Ayios Nicolaos v. the Republic 651/2019CLR, injunctive relief without demanding a financial deposit was granted against the construction of a gas station less than 200 m from a church, which is the accepted Town Planning limit for protection of the vicinity. It was raised within the recourse itself and only granted as it was clear that the complainants, which was a church council and nine other residents of the vicinity, were shown to have locus standi. In the recent case of Demetrou v Limassol Municipality, no 746/2019, the Admin Court denied an injunction against the builders of a skyscraper in a residential neighbourhood, re-iterating the established principles that injunctions are granted with considerable caution and only where there is either flagrant illegality or threat of irretrievable damage. In this case the builders were deemed to be carrying out only preliminary work, and it was held that the issues raised by the complainant, which included references to EU law and the Aarhus Convention, would be better addressed in the recourse itself.

An appeal against a refusal to issue an injunction would be made to the Supreme Court.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.

An outline of costs can be offered by practicing lawyers. The main cost in any judicial action would be lawyers' fees. Additionally, stamps would be affixed to the action filed (court fees). In civil cases the court fees depend on the amount of damages claimed. In recourses to the Administrative court the average lawyer's fees granted by the court are €1,500 for first instance cases and the stamp plus service amounts to €300. For revisional appeals the cost for stamps and service amount to approximately €450 whereas in civil appeals the stamp depends on the amount claimed. Expert fees for a report could be anything from €500 upwards depending on the report to be prepared, plus a fee for the number of days spent by the expert in court, but as mentioned elsewhere, expert witness would not normally be introduced in the Administrative Court. If there is no agreement between the lawyer and the client, then the minimum fees apply, and the cost calculation should also include the costs of the other party if the complainant loses the case. However, these costs would be calculated according to the court schedule, which does not necessarily cover actual legal costs.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

A deposit is not obligatory, and the Court has a wide discretion on this matter. There have been cases when the deposit payable ran into thousands of euros, depending on the amount which the other side claims they will lose by not being allowed to proceed (e.g., if a construction is stopped, the estimation will include the days when the labour force will be off the site, the compensation if the work does not finish on time, etc.). But see also the case quoted at para 1.7.2.6.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Legal aid is not available to complainants in the Administrative Court, except in the case of asylum seekers.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Legal aid is only available to natural persons, as above.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

There are no other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance.

6) Does the 'loser pays principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The loser pays principle is prevalent, although the Court has the discretion not to allow all costs or to order each party to bear its own costs, but this will not be known in advance.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

The court cannot provide exemptions from the procedural costs of the applicant whatever their legal status. Yet, as stated immediately above, it can decide not to order the loser to pay the legal costs of the other side. This might be done in particular if the loser is a not-for-profit organisation appealing a government decision, and the decision is a matter of public interest. However, the case will first have to be heard, and the Court will use its discretion, it will not be known in advance.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC.

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

Access to information is provided under the Freedom of Access to Environmental Information Law, No 119(I)/2004. Its provisions are available in English and Greek. Article 12 of the Law provides that every public authority must organise environmental information within its competence in a way that is accessible to the public. For details, please see the para immediately below. Information concerning access to environmental justice is published on the website of the Department of Environment, with reference to the specific (and limited) legislation that grants legal rights to NGOs. There is no specific site accessible to the public. For details, please see the para immediately below. Information concerning access to environmental justice is published on the website of the Department of Environment, with reference to the specific (and limited) legislation that grants legal rights to NGOs. There is no specific site where national rules on access to justice are available.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided?

Under Article 3 of the Access to Environmental Information Law No 119(I)/2004, any person can apply to the relevant Ministry/Department by letter, either to the officer responsible for the information required, to his/her Head of Department or to the Director General of the Ministry and does not need to show cause or 'proximity' for the information requested, provided the question is clear and specific. If a large number of documents is requested, there may be a charge for supplying them. Environmental information should also appear on a Ministry's or Department's website, as per article 12 of the Law.

A hierarchical appeal may be made (by letter) within 30 days to the Minister of a department which has failed to respond or responded inadequately. This does not preclude the claimant from exercising his/her rights under the Constitution (Article 146) or from applying to the Ombudsperson for a statement of opinion. Refusal of requests for information must be justified and in writing (Article 8(8) of the Law) and must include information regarding the hierarchical or judicial review procedures provided for in Articles 10 and 11, respectively.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?
The above-mentioned sectoral laws all require that information be published on applications made for projects or plans. The detailed provisions are those mentioned at para 1.4.2 above, and can be found on the website of the Environment Department, in English and Greek. The full text of the Aarhus Convention as transposed into Cyprus law can be found here in the English version.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? The administrative decision will carry a standard statement saying that if a party is not satisfied, they may initiate a recourse within the time prescribed.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? It is not usual, should translations be necessary, they will be charged.

Article 30 of the Cyprus Constitution provides that any person can go to court and is entitled to interpretation if unable to follow the language of the proceedings, but this applies to criminal and similar offences and only to individuals. In an administrative review, the department would probably concede to using English. Pleadings and hearings before the Administrative Court will be conducted in Greek. If the applicant requires translation or interpretation, this will be arranged privately and paid by the applicant. Since an NGO is a legal person, and can only be represented by an advocate, it will presumably be represented by an advocate who speaks the local language.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules relating to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The EIA directive has been transposed by the Environmental Impact Assessment of Certain Projects Law, as amended, No. 127(I)2018, and makes provision for screening under articles 22 to 24. According to these provisions, following an application for directions from the operator of the project, the Director of the Environment Department decides whether an EIA is mandatory according to Annex I of the law, or will undergo a screening process as per Annexes II an IV, and the Director will issue a justified conclusion which will appear on the department’s website. A decision by the Director may be challenged by a party with a legitimate right under Article 146 of the Constitution. In a case against the Town Planning Department, no 46/2017CLR, Taramounta and Stephanou v. the Republic (decided in 2019), a permit for a petrol station was quashed on the ground that the Town Planning Dept had not sought an EIA from the Environment Department, nor was there any justification in the file for not doing so. This was a recourse by two individual residents in the vicinity. It remains to be seen if an NGO could raise a similar challenge.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned).

Under article 25(4), the director of the Environment Department decides with the party responsible for the project or installation about the scope of the EIA.

There are no particular provisions in the law for judicial or other review of screening decisions which, in any case, would form part of the process, not a final decision. As preparatory acts, both screening and scoping cannot normally be challenged separately, but can be reviewed as part of a final decision. Nevertheless, it would be possible for any member of the public, including an NGO, to raise a scoping issue at the public consultation stage, article 26, which must take place before the EIA is formally submitted, and it is incumbent on the Director to take into account comments made within 30 days of publication of the process, and if justified to order that the EIA be amended. An amendment is currently under review to strengthen the consultation process (see para immediately below).

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Preparatory and intermediary acts cannot normally be challenged, until the decision is completed and published, and must be challenged within 75 days thereof. However, Article 48(c) provides the possibility for a recourse in matters concerning (an unsatisfactory) public participation, which procedurally precedes the final decision and could be regarded by the Court as a ‘preparatory action’. In the recent case of Demetriou v. Limassol Municipality, 746/2019 seeking an injunction, issues of proper public participation were raised, and the decision of the Administrative Court referred to them but without taking a position on them. It is unlikely, that one would go directly to court on the strength of Article 48(c) alone (i.e., if it were not part of a number of supporting arguments) without first filing a complaint to the Department or to the Minister, bearing in mind that redress through the court could take too long to be effective. Nevertheless, following EU criticism, an amendment to article 48 has been drafted (but not yet enacted at the time of writing), specifically to strengthen the consultation process in favour of individuals and NGOs. The right of appeal as per Article 146 of the Constitution for individuals and NGOs is re-iterated. The other two instances in which an environmental NGO would be deemed to have a legitimate interest to appeal with reference to Article 146 of the Constitution would be under Article 48 (a) or (b) of the Law, if challenging the environmental permit granted by the Environmental Authority, or the Environmental Authority’s conclusion that an EIA is not necessary.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

An affected individual can challenge the final authorisation if he/she meets the requirements of Article 146 of the Constitution of having a direct, existing and legitimate interest. This can include a duly registered environmental NGO acting under Article 48 of the EIA Law, if the authorization emanates from the Environment Department. It is uncertain, given the restricted wording of article 48 of the amended EIA Law (compared to article 25 (I) of the previous Law), whether an authorisation which emanates from a department or authority other than the Environment Department, could be challenged by an NGO. There is no provision extending this right to foreign NGOs, nor does the article specifically exclude them. If a foreign NGO could demonstrate “proximity”, i.e. the likelihood to be affected by the authorisation, in, for example, a cross-border situation, it is probable that such NGO could file a challenge under the provisions of article 146 of the Constitution.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

As already explained elsewhere, the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court in Cyprus is nullifying (or confirmatory). It considers whether the procedures have been correctly followed and interpreted by the offending administrative organ either to confirm the decision/action in whole or in part, or to cancel it in whole or in part, or in the case of an omission, to order that it should be performed. The grounds on which annulment may be justified include lack of competence, error or misconception of law or fact, lack of proper enquiry, lack of due reasoning, failure to comply with the rules of natural justice and good administration (see Sigma Radio v. Cyprus, ECHR, 21.02.11). If the court finds in favour of the applicant, it cannot go into the merits of the case and substitute its own decision, nor can the court invite a scientific expert, since it does not examine the substance of a case, although it could allow a party to present scientific evidence if it concerned a claim for annulment. If the court finds in favour of the applicant, the matter is automatically remitted to the administrative authority or organ for re-examination.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

Decisions are challengeable when they are published. Acts or omissions which are not published may be challenged as soon as they become apparent to the affected party.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures, unless specifically provided by law.
8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Participation is not a prerequisite for legal standing. Such standing derives from the legitimate interest of the party, as per Article 146 of the Constitution.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Both the Constitution and the Court Procedural Rules confirm that anyone can go to court. They are entitled to a fair trial and to interpretation if unable to understand the language of the court. Article 30 of the Constitution is the equivalent of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and is interpreted in much the same way. Article 30 applies to all types of cases, civil, criminal and administrative. Although there is no specific reference to 'equality of arms' as such in the Constitution, it is encapsulated in the concept of fair trial, and there is considerable case law on the matter, often with reference to ECHR decisions. The principles have been recently restated in a decision relating to a criminal appeal case delivered in 2020: Republic v. Stavrinou, no 266 /2018. The concept is based on the principle that neither party should be put at a disadvantage, and that this should be determined not by particular incidents during the trial or hearing, but by an overall assessment thereof. Nevertheless, in the case of Marangos v. Cyprus, 4.12.08, which related to an administrative appeal, the ECHR found that the complainant's rights had not been affected by a denial of legal assistance by the Cyprus government, nevertheless, three ECHR judges issued a concurrent decision expressing the view that limiting legal assistance to civil and criminal cases and excluding administrative cases amounts to a lack of equality of arms. Since that time, financial assistance has become available in administrative recourses filed by asylum seekers.

10) How is the notion of 'timely' implemented by the national legislation?

Timeliness with reference to the applicant means challenging a decision/act/omission within 75 days of its publication/authorisation or of becoming apparent. Timeliness also refers to the duration of a court case. If a hearing is completed and a decision is not delivered within six months, questions will be asked and the interested party may complain to the Supreme Court. In practice, all types of procedure take a very long time (except in Rent Tribunals and Family Courts concerning the interests of minors). There have been instances of recourse to the ECHR against the Cyprus Republic because of court delays, and it was held that such delays are in themselves a denial of justice and fines were imposed. Law N.2(1)/2010, based on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, provides a cause of action to seek compensation for an unreasonably delayed court decision. A Supreme Court decision of 2019, M.D. Cyprus Soya v Attorney General, case no. 1/2018, suggests that it would also apply to delays in adjudication on appeal.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Article 46(2)(a) of the Law provides that an application for an interim order may be made in case of major threat to human health or the environment. This includes an ex parte application made by one party (usually the government) in the District Court where the danger is taking place. The application is governed by the Civil Procedure Rules, and it has already been explained elsewhere that financial guarantees could normally be required of an individual applicant and that injunctive remedies are granted with considerable caution on the basis of long-established case law. For further information, please see par 2.1.8.

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

The IPPC/IED Directives have been transposed to Cyprus Legislation by Law No 184(1)2013 as amended by 131(1)2016.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengable?

An affected citizen can legally challenge a license issued under the IPPC/IE Law when it is published. Under article 42, environmental NGOs can challenge the application of provisions on public consultation and access to information, but no other aspects of the decision. Foreign NGOs are not referred to but would have no more rights than a local NGO.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no specific provisions on screening under this law, unless, as provided by article 32(4) issuance of a license for an installation fell within the ambit of the EIA Law, in which case articles 12, 13, 17, 21, 23, 24 and 27 of that law would apply.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no particular provisions in the law for scoping.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

Normally preparatory and intermediary acts cannot be challenged, but only when the decision is completed and published and within 75 days thereof. However, Article 42 provides the possibility for a recourse in matters concerning public participation, which procedurally precedes the final decision and could be seen as a 'preparatory action' by the court. It is unlikely nevertheless, that one would go directly to court on the strength of Article 42 alone, without first filing a hierarchical complaint to the Department or to the Minister, bearing in mind that redress through the court might take too long to be effective. It should be noted that whereas the right of a party directly affected by a decision/action/omission may touch upon all aspects of legality, as long as the requirements of Article 146 of the Constitution are met, the wording of article 42 of the Law regarding environmental NGOs seems to recognise their legitimate right to challenge a decision/action/omission only with regard to public participation, articles 36-41, and not with reference to the license as such.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

An affected individual can challenge the final authorisation if he/she meets the requirements of Article 146 of the Constitution of having a direct, present and legitimate interest. So can an environmental NGO, acting under Article 42 of the IPPC/IE Law, only with regard to articles 36-41 of the Law, as mentioned at 1.8.2.3) above. There is no provision extending this right to foreign NGOs, but it is unlikely that they could be excluded if the foreign NGO was acting within the framework of a cross-border interest.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

As already explained elsewhere, the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court in Cyprus is nullifying (or confirmatory). It considers whether the procedures have been correctly followed and interpreted by the offending administrative organ either to confirm the decision/action in whole or in part, or to cancel it in whole or in part, or, in the case of an omission, to order that it should be performed. The grounds on which annulment may be justified include lack of competence, error or misconception of law or fact, lack of proper enquiry, lack of due reasoning, failure to comply with the rules of natural justice and good administration (see Sigma Radio v. Cyprus, ECHR, 21.02.11). If the court finds in favour of the applicant, it cannot go into the merits of the case and substitute its own decision, nor can the court invite a scientific expert (since it does not review the substance). If the applicant succeeds, the administrative decision/action is considered null and void, and the matter is automatically remitted to the administrative authority or organ for re-examination.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?

Decisions are challengeable when they have been notified or published. Acts or omissions which are not published may be challenged as soon as they become apparent to the affected party.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures (unless a hierarchical review is specifically provided for).

10) In order to have standing before the national courts it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Participation is not a prerequisite for legal standing. Legal standing derives from the legitimate interest of the party, as per Article 146 of the Constitution.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Both the Constitution and the Court Procedural Rules confirm that anyone can go to court. They are entitled to a fair trial and to interpretation if unable to understand the language of the court. Article 30 of the Constitution is the equivalent of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and is interpreted in much the same way. Article 30 applies to all types of cases, civil, criminal and administrative. Although there is no specific reference to 'equality of arms' as such in the Constitution, it is encapsulated in the concept of fair trial, and there is considerable case law on the matter, often with reference to ECHR decisions. The principles have been recently restated in a decision relating to a criminal appeal case delivered in 2020: Republic v. Stavrinou, no 266 /2018. The concept is based on the principle that neither party should be put at a disadvantage, and that this should be determined not by particular incidents during the trial or hearing, but by an overall assessment thereof. Nevertheless, in the case of Marangos v. Cyprus, 4.12.08, which related to an administrative appeal, the ECHR found that the complainant's rights had not been affected by a denial of legal assistance by the Cyprus government, nevertheless, three ECHR judges issued a concurrent decision expressing the view that limiting legal assistance to civil and criminal cases and excluding administrative cases amounts to a lack of equality of arms. Since that time, financial assistance has become available in administrative recourses filed by asylum seekers.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

Timeliness with reference to the applicant means challenging a decision/act/omission within 75 days of its publication/authorisation or of becoming apparent. Timeliness also refers to the duration of a court case. If a hearing is completed and a decision is not delivered within six months, questions will be asked, and the interested party may complain to the Supreme Court. In practice, all types of procedure take a very long time (except in Rent Tribunals and Family Courts concerning the interests of minors). There have been instances of recourse to the ECHR against the Cyprus Republic because of court delays, and it was held that such delays are in themselves a denial of justice and fines were imposed. Law N.2(1)/2010, based on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, provides a cause of action to seek compensation for an unreasonably delayed court decision. A Supreme Court decision of 2019, M.D. Cyprus Soya v Attorney General, case no. 1/2018, suggests that it would also apply to delays in adjudication on appeal.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Under article 88 of the Law, injunctive relief through an interim order is available against any licensee who disobeys the license conditions. An application for such order will be applied for by the Attorney-General or the local authority to the appropriate District Court. There is no specific provision for affected parties to seek injunctive relief, but presumably the Civil Procedure Rules apply. For further details, please see par 2.1.8.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

The most comprehensive guidance is offered on the website of the Environment Department, quoted above, see 1.7.4.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

County-specific rules relating to Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

The ELD was transposed into Cyprus law by the Environmental Liability concerning Prevention and Remediation of Damage Law No 189/(1)2007. Article 14 (1) of the Law provides that any natural or legal person affected or likely to be affected by environmental damage, or having a legitimate interest in the decisions to prevent damage may notify the Environment Department or other competent authority, of the damage, in writing and outlining the pertinent details. The term ‘legal person’ includes any (registered) company or association whose objective, according to its statutes, is the protection of the environment. Article 17 specifies in unusually broad terms that the natural or legal persons mentioned in article 14(1) of the Law (see above) who are affected by any decision of the responsible authority may initiate a recourse to justice under Article 146 of the Constitution. Article 146 requires that any applicant must have a direct, existing and legitimate interest and, as already mentioned, article 14(1) of the Law recognizes such an interest in environmental NGOs.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

The deadline is 75 days as with all recourses to the Administrative Court.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

Article 14(2) of the Law requires that the request for action must be accompanied by all information that justifies the claim made, and article 14(5) states that the provisions of this Law do not apply to impending damage but only to environmental damage which has occurred. There is no specification regarding the scientific evidence that has to be supplied.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding plausibility for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

Article 2 of the Law defines damage as quantifiable. Appendix II gives a list of criteria that would be considered in quantifying damage. This list is intended more as a guide to the Department for assessment of damage (and the action to be taken), but presumably could assist a complainant in preparing a claim for action.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

There is no precise manner or time limit. Under article 14(3), the law provides that the competent authority must notify the operator responsible for the damage allowing a period of not more than 30 days for the operator to respond. Having assessed the response, the competent authority must assess within a maximum of 30 days what the course of action should be, and the complaining party must be notified as soon as possible thereafter. This would imply that the entitled person might not have a formal notification for two months or so.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

The provisions of article 14 regarding a request for action do not apply in cases of imminent environmental damage (article 14(5)).

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

In principle the Department of Environment is the competent authority, unless the Minister of Agriculture and Environment appoints another authority.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

The MS does not require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
As a general comment, it should be borne in mind that Cyprus is an island state separated from its nearest European neighbour (the island of Rhodes) by about 300 km. So, the likelihood of transboundary environmental damage emanating from acts or omissions is limited and although relevant provisions exist in the laws implementing EIA, SEA, IPPC and ELD, there has only been one case of transboundary damage (involving Greece).

The EIA Law No 104(1)2005 as amended by 127(1)2018 under article 21; the SEA Law No 105(1)2005 under articles 19 and 22, and the IPPC Law No 184 (1)2013 under article 43, all provide that prior to issuing a permit/license/decision, if the competent authority becomes aware that the action in question may impact on the environment of a member state (MS) or if a MS makes such a claim to the Cyprus Government, then the MS must be provided with all relevant information no later than when the public of Cyprus is informed. Also, sufficient time must be allowed for the relevant information to be published by the state concerned and to receive comments from the public of that country. These must be taken into account by the competent Cypriot authority together with locally made observations in reaching a decision. It is incumbent on the Cypriot competent authority to publish the decision reached, with all justifying explanations, on its website and to communicate the same to the MS which will in turn notify its own public.

2) Notion of public concerned?
The definition is the same as for local public viz. one or more persons who are, or may be, affected by the decision/permit/license.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

With the caveat that this is, as yet, an untried procedure, one could assume that if the NGO has legal standing in its own country it might fall within the definition of those parties with a legitimate interest under the Cyprus Constitution. The recourse would be made either for an administrative review to the department responsible for the decision, or to the Administrative Court in the case of a legal challenge, within 75 days of publication of the decision. The provisions would be the same as for a local applicant, viz. no legal aid, no pro bono, and injunctive relief only in the face of flagrant illegality or major irreversible damage, possibly on payment of a substantial financial guarantee.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

An individual would only have rights under the same conditions as apply to a Cypriot individual, viz. if a direct, existing, personal right were affected. The provisions for aid, injunctive relief, etc., would be as stated above, in 1.8.4.3), the only difference would be that an individual could appear in person before a court, whereas a legal entity cannot.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

At the same time as it is publicised in Cyprus.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

The time frame for the public in an affected country to respond/make observations on the proposed permit/license, etc., during the public consultation procedure is agreed between Cyprus and the affected country and published in the notice to concerned public. The time frame for a recourse to justice is 75 days.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

The relevant articles in each of the three Laws do not specify this information, but presumably it would be included in the information sent to the affected MS, since there is a responsibility on the Director of the Environment Department to ensure that relevant information reaches the affected public.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

It is not usual, should translations be necessary, they will be charged.

Article 30 of the Cyprus Constitution provides that any person can go to court and is entitled to interpretation if unable to follow the language of the proceedings, but this applies to criminal and similar offences and only to individuals. In an administrative review, the department would probably concede to using English. Pleadings and hearings before the Administrative Court will be conducted in Greek. If the applicant requires translation or interpretation, this will be arranged privately and paid by the applicant. Since an NGO is a legal person, and can only be represented by an advocate, it will presumably be represented by an advocate who speaks the local language.

9) Any other relevant rules?

There are no other relevant rules.

[1] See also case C-529/15.

Last update: 11/03/2024

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation, but outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

As already explained in Part 1, the legal rights of natural or legal persons to obtain an administrative or judicial review for an act/decision/omission are the same for an environmental issue as for any other claim. Access to justice is delineated in Articles 29 and 146 of the Constitution. Article 29 provides that every person (including non-Cypriots and legal persons) has a right individually or jointly with others to address any competent authority, to have their complaint attended to expeditiously and to receive a response within 30 days. (This refers to complaints addressed to civil service departments or other public authorities). Article 146 provides who may apply to the Court against a decision, act or omission of a public authority and this would, therefore, apply with respect to environmental issues. For such right to arise, the complainant must have an existing, personal and legitimate interest which has been directly affected by a decision, act or omission exercised by a public authority in a manner which is contrary to the Constitution or to any other law, or represents an abuse of power, and must be exercised within 75 days of the event being publicised.
Under current legislation and Cypriot case law, unless the interpretation were broadened, ENGOs would have no legal standing outside the provisions of the EIA, IPPC/IED and ELD Laws. So in effect, NGOs or individuals who do not live or own property in the vicinity of the offending act would have difficulty in challenging environmental decisions, even though this goes against ACCC guidance and the case law of the CJEU which requires national courts to interpret national procedural rules in light of the Aarhus Convention and in light of Article 47 of the EU Charter in order to grant wide access to justice. The CJEU case law on environmental issues is not known to have been quoted or referred to in court decisions, since, as already stated in Part 1 (1.1.), NGOs have seldom made judicial recourses after it was held by the Supreme Court in 1999 that they had no legal standing. Therefore, it could be said that CJEU decisions have not had a substantial effect. It has to be added that it is not just the absence of legal provisions or case law which has contributed to the cautionary approach of NGOs in utilizing legal measures. The lack of funding support, the uncertainty arising from the conservative court interpretation, and the consequent lack of experienced lawyers in this field of law, have all discouraged NGOs.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

An administrative review would cover all aspects of the issue under review. A recourse to the Administrative Court would normally review the procedural legality, unless there were an issue of error in law or violation of constitutional rights, in which case the substantive legality would also be reviewed.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures in cases where an administrative review is specifically required in the legislation. In such cases the 75-day time-limit for going to court will be suspended during the review.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure. Legal standing derives from having a legitimate right of recourse under the Constitution.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

The Administrative Court will base its decision on the files of the case regarding the decision/act/omission, which must be presented to the Court in full. Any factual matters other than those in the file cannot be introduced, unless in exceptional circumstances and with the leave of the court. See also response to 1.5.1

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to 'equity of arms' in the national jurisdiction?

Both the Constitution and the Court Procedural Rules confirm that anyone can go to court. They are entitled to a fair trial and to interpretation if unable to understand the language of the court. Article 30 of the Constitution is the equivalent of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and is interpreted in much the same way. Article 30 applies to all types of cases, civil, criminal and administrative. Although there is no specific reference to 'equity of arms' as such in the Constitution, it is encapsulated in the concept of fair trial, and there is considerable case law on the matter, often with reference to ECHR decisions. The principles have been recently restated in a decision relating to a criminal appeal case delivered in 2020: Republic v. Stavrinou, no 266 /2018. The concept is based on the principle that neither party should be put at a disadvantage, and that this should be determined not by particular incidents during the trial or hearing, but by an overall assessment thereof. Nevertheless, in the case of Marangos v. Cyprus, 4.12.08, which related to an administrative appeal, the ECHR found that the complainant's rights had not been affected by a denial of legal assistance by the Cyprus government, nevertheless, three ECHR judges issued a concurrent decision expressing the view that limiting legal assistance to civil and criminal cases and excluding administrative cases amounted to a lack of equality of arms. Since that time, financial assistance has become available in administrative recourses filed by asylum seekers.

7) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

Timeliness also refers to the duration of a court case. If a hearing is completed and a decision is not delivered within six months, questions will be asked and the interested party may complain to the Supreme Court. In practice, all types of procedure take a very long time (except in Rent Tribunals and Family Courts concerning the interests of minors). There have been instances of recourse to the ECHR against the Cyprus Republic because of court delays, and it was held that such delays are in themselves a denial of justice and fines were imposed. Law N.2(1)/2010, based on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, provides a cause of action to seek compensation for an unreasonably delayed court decision. A Supreme Court decision of 2019, M.D. Cyprus Soya v Attorney General, case no. 1/2018, suggests that it would also apply to delays in adjudication on appeal.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Unless provided in sectoral laws, there is no particular provision for granting injunctions in environmental matters. The normal judicial procedure would need to be followed and satisfied. In administrative recourses an application may be made for an interim judgment suspending the effect of the administrative decision. This may be granted only under exceptional circumstances, if there is flagrant illegality or irreparable damage. In general, such conditions apply that injunctions are more easily granted to a government department seeking to prevent an illegal act (e.g. to stop an individual from demolishing a building under preservation order). See also para 1.7.2.6 regarding guarantees.

There is an appeal against a decision to refuse an injunction which is made to the Supreme Court.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The costs are principally the lawyer's fees and would be the same as for any other recourse to justice, around €1,500 plus stamps depending on the complexity. While there are no specific safeguards against prohibitive costs, the issue does not actually arise, because the costs awarded by the court against a party are determined on the basis of the established judicial scales and do not necessarily represent the full fee paid by the party to his/her lawyer. They represent what the courts consider appropriate, and quite often this is less than what has been agreed between a party and his/her lawyer. The losing side will normally be ordered to pay the costs of the other side according to the scales, or such part of them as the Court decides. In cases involving a private person or a non-profit organisation suing the state, Courts have decided that each side should pay its own costs. So, it is largely up to the court and will not be known in advance.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The SEA directive has been transposed to Cyprus law under Law No 102(1)2005. It makes no specific provision concerning rights of individuals or legal persons to challenge decisions/acts/omissions within the ambit of their constitutional rights (see 2.1.1. above re Article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution).
Whether such rights exist in law will depend on the form in which the plans have been adopted, and if such rights exist there is no need for them to be reiterated in sectoral laws. Therefore, any legal or natural person whose legitimate rights are affected can, within 75 days of publication of the offending event, request an administrative review or file a recourse to justice. As case law stands at present, however, this will not apply to NGOs unless a law specifically grants them the right to be included in the ambit of Article 146 of the Constitution (as applies with respect to the EIA, IPPC and ELD Laws). The recognition given to environmental NGOs in the SEA Law concerns the right to be invited to participate in a public consultation. The definition of ‘public’ at article 2 of the Law is a broad one involving natural or legal persons, organisations or groups, and article 15(b) specifies environmental NGOs amongst them. What has been known to happen is that ENGOs have gone directly to Brussels, to DG Environment, to express their disagreement with decisions taken at an SEA, or to call attention to the fact that an SEA process has not been implemented.

CJEU case law on environmental issues is not known to have received judicial notice in any deliberations before the court. So at this point it would be fair to say that it has had little effect. It should be clarified that although Common Law applies in Cyprus, in matters of Administrative and Constitutional Law we follow the theory and practice of Greece, so Greek case law is often quoted in administrative cases, even though it has only an advisory effect.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
An administrative review is not specifically provided for, but should it be granted it will examine both the procedural and substantive legality of a decision/act /omission. A judicial review in the Administrative Court will normally consider matters of procedural legality and competence of the offending executory organ, but also of substantive legality if the question refers to error in law, violation of the constitution etc., or to errors within the files.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures under the SEA Law.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure, the legal standing of an applicant is derived from meeting the Constitutional provisions.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no special rules, see comments under 2.1.8.

6) What are the costs rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
The costs are principally the lawyer’s fees and would be the same as for any other recourse to justice, around €1,500 plus stamps depending on the complexity. While there are no specifically expressed safeguards against prohibitive costs, the issue does not actually arise because the costs awarded by the court against a party are determined on the basis of the established judicial scales and do not necessarily represent the actual costs paid by the party to his/her lawyer. The loser pays principle generally applies, but the losing side will pay the costs of the other side according to the scales, or such part of them as the Court decides. Nevertheless, in cases involving a private person or a non-profit organisation suing the state, Courts have decided that each side should pay its own costs. So, it is largely up to the court and will not be known in advance.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment Directive 2001/42/EC[2]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
Cyprus has adopted Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention by including a regulatory framework for public participation in a number of environmentally related laws dealing, e.g., with water pollution, wastes, industrial emissions, atmospheric waste, etc. The relevant provisions are quite similar and define the ‘public’ to be consulted or invited to comment as ‘natural or legal persons affected, or likely to be affected’ by the act or license issued, including environmental NGOs. If the legitimate rights of legal or natural persons are affected, the remedies are as stipulated under Article 29 of the Constitution concerning complaints to public authorities, in cases where the specific legislation does not provide for an administrative review. In cases of a legal challenge by recourse to justice the provisions of Article 146 of the Constitution apply. So far, defects in a consultation procedure have been raised by individuals with a legitimate interest to have a decision nullified. Whether an NGO would be legitimized to challenge the legitimacy of an action on the grounds of an improper participation procedure has not been tested. The government is currently taking measures to strengthen public participation, but the initiative concerns only consultations carried out under the EIA Law.
2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
An administrative review, if granted, will examine both the procedural and substantive legality of a decision/act/omission, and while the review is in process the 75-day deadline will be suspended, if so provided, or may be suspended by agreement between the parties. A judicial review in the Administrative Court will, as in all cases, consider matters of procedural legality and competence of the offending executory organ, but also of substantive legality if the question refers to error in law, violation of the constitution, etc.
3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures, unless the right for an administrative review is specifically provided in the legislation.
4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure. Legal standing derives from having a legitimate right of recourse under the Constitution.
5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Unless provided in sectoral laws, there is no general provision for granting injunctions in environmental matters. The normal judicial procedure would need to be followed and satisfied. In administrative recourses, an application may be made for an interim judgment suspending the effect of the administrative decision. This may be granted only in exceptional circumstances, if there is flagrant illegality or irreparable damage. Concerning guarantees please see para 2.1.8.
There is an appeal against a decision to refuse an injunction which is made to the Supreme Court.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The costs are principally the lawyer’s fees and would be the same as for any other recourse to justice, around €1,500 upwards (plus stamps) depending on the complexity. While there are no specifically expressed safeguards against prohibitive costs, the issue does not actually arise, because the costs awarded by the court against a party are determined on the basis of the established judicial scales and do not necessarily represent the actual costs paid by the party to his/her lawyer. Thus, the losing side, according to the loser pays principle, will normally pay the costs of the other side according to the scales, or such part of them as the Court decides. Nevertheless, in cases involving a private person or a non-profit organisation suing the state, Courts have decided that each side should pay its own costs. So, it is largely up to the court and will not be known in advance.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There are no specific rules for challenging plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU legislation, so the general rules of standing would apply as described under the provisions for the SEA Law. The strongest position of any applicant would concern a denial of access to information or a denial to facilitate public participation in the process, since both of these rights are enshrined in a generally applicable legislation (concerning the right to environmental information) and in specific sectoral laws (concerning the right to participation), so they do not depend on demonstrating the existence of constitutional rights.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?
The form in which the plan or programme is adopted makes a difference in terms of legal standing, it can only be challenged if it is an administrative act.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

An administrative review would cover all aspects of the issue under review. A recourse to the Administrative Court would normally review the procedural legality, unless there were an issue of error in law or violation of constitutional rights, in which case the substantive legality would also be reviewed.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Only if specified in the legislation concerned.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before the national courts it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure.

6) Are there any grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
The Administrative Court will base its decision on the files of the case regarding the decision/act/omission, which must be presented to the Court in full. Any factual matters other than those in the file cannot be introduced, unless in exceptional circumstances and with the leave of the court.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Both the Constitution and the Court Procedural Rules confirm that anyone can go to court. They are entitled to a fair trial and to interpretation if unable to understand the language of the court. Article 30 of the Constitution is the equivalent of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and is interpreted in much the same way. Article 30 applies to all types of cases, civil, criminal and administrative. Although there is no specific reference to ‘equality of arms’ as such in the Constitution, it is encapsulated in the concept of fair trial, and there is considerable case law on the matter, often with reference to ECHR decisions. The principles have been recently restated in a decision relating to a criminal appeal case delivered in 2020: Republic v. Stavriniou, no 266/2018. The concept is based on the principle that neither party should be put at a disadvantage, and that this should be determined not by particular incidents during the trial or hearing, but by an overall assessment thereof. Nevertheless, in the case of Marangos v. Cyprus, 4.12.08, which related to an administrative appeal, the ECHR found that the complainant’s rights had not been affected by a denial of legal assistance by the Cyprus government, nevertheless, three ECHR judges issued a concurrent decision expressing the view that limiting legal assistance to civil and criminal cases and excluding administrative cases amounts to a lack of equality of arms. Since that time, financial assistance has become available in administrative recourses filed by asylum seekers.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Timeliness with reference to the applicant means challenging a decision/act/omission within 75 days of its publication/authorisation or of becoming apparent. Timeliness also refers to the duration of a court case. If a hearing is completed and a decision is not delivered within six months, questions will be asked and the interested party may complain to the Supreme Court. In practice, all types of procedure take a very long time (except in Rent Tribunals and Family Courts concerning the interests of minors). There have been instances of recourse to the ECHR against the Cyprus Republic because of court delays, and it was held that such delays are in themselves a denial of justice and fines were imposed. Law N.2(1)/2010, based on Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, provides a cause of action to seek compensation for an unreasonably delayed court decisions. A Supreme Court decision of 2019, M.D. Cyprus Soya v Attorney General, case no. 1/2018, suggests that it would also apply to delays in adjudication on appeal.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes, what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

General national rules would apply and an injunction is granted only in very exceptional circumstances (see 2.1.8).

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The costs are principally the lawyer’s fees and would be the same as for any other recourse to justice, around €1,500 depending on the complexity. While there are no specific safeguards against prohibitive costs, the issue does not actually arise, because the costs awarded by the court against a party are determined on the basis of the established judicial scales and do not necessarily represent the actual costs paid by the party to his/her lawyer. So the losing side will normally pay the costs of the other side according to the scales, or such part of them as the Court decides. In cases involving a private person or a non-profit organisation suing the state, Courts have decided that each side should pay its own costs. So, it is largely up to the court and will not be known in advance.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[4]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Although the Aarhus Convention has been transposed into law, no specific piece of legislation has been passed regarding public participation, as has been the case with access to information. The practice of involving the public in law-making by enabling the participation of interest groups/NGOs in parliamentary discussion or at the administrative level of preparing legislation or regulations is less formal. There is a published guide on good public participation practice which is used by government departments, but it is not a legal document so it would not give rise to rights unless specifically provided by enabling legislation.

It could be argued that since the Aarhus Convention is part of the Cypriot legislation, the relevant articles concerning participation apply ipso facto. This position was argued by the complainants' lawyer in case no 746/2019 Demetriou et al v. Limassol municipality. However, the Administrative court considered the evidence conflicting and did not base its decision on this issue.

[1] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[2] See findings under ACC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[3] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[4] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
Since actions affecting the environment are usually controlled and authorized by administrative decisions, the main and most common instrument for environmental protection used by the public is gaining information about forthcoming or adopted administrative decisions, taking part in decision-making (usually during public participation), and submitting an appeal to the administrative authority and then a court if necessary. These possibilities are prescribed by the Environmental Protection Law setting a framework for environmental protection, and also in specific laws and regulations regarding particular areas of law related to environmental issues. The public may also apply to respective controlling authorities if other persons infringe norms protecting the environment, and to access administrative court subsequently, if necessary. [3]

In addition, the public has a right to access environmental information and be informed about the environmental conditions and to protect this right at the court.

A system of constitutional control and constitutional review exists in Latvia. This means that the Constitutional Court may evaluate whether the legal norms of lower legal rank (laws of the Parliament, Cabinet regulations, municipal regulations) contradict the Constitution or binding international norms, recognise them as incompatible, and invalidate them. The right to apply to the Constitutional Court is granted, among others, to general courts reviewing individual cases, and to individual persons to protect their fundamental rights if they have exhausted “ordinary” legal remedies, as well as to an Ombudsman, including in cases when legally binding norms might contradict the right to live in a benevolent environment as protected by the Constitution. [4] Courts of general jurisdiction, when reviewing an individual case, must evaluate possible contradictions of legal norms and apply norms of lower legal rank consistently with norms of superior legal rank, and, under certain conditions, apply to the Constitutional Court.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) Including procedural rights

According to Art.115 of the Constitution, the state protects the right of everyone to live in a benevolent environment by providing information about environmental conditions and by promoting the preservation and improvement of the environment. This constitutional right includes:

the substantial aspect: a right to live in a benevolent environment and a corresponding obligation of the state to establish a system of environmental protection [5];
the procedural aspect as an integral part of the right to live in a benevolent environment: a right of the public to access environmental information, to participate in decision-making in environmental matters, to access the court in environmental matters. [6]

According to the case-law of the Constitutional Court, Art.115, as other human rights provisions of the Constitution, is a directly and immediately applicable norm. [7]

According to Art.111 of the Constitution, the state protects human health. The Constitutional Court found that the right to health also comprises the right to healthy environmental conditions [8]. This may include noise and other environmental pollution that influences the quality of environment in which a person resides.

Both aforementioned constitutional provisions (right to a benevolent environment and right to health protection) can be applied separately or in connection with each other.

Art.92 of the Constitution provides for the right of everyone to defend his or her rights and legal interests in a fair court, and the right to the assistance of counsel.

Constitutional provisions can be applied directly both in administrative procedures and at the court. Citizens can invoke the provisions at any stage in administrative or judicial procedures.

According to the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court (Satversmes tesa), human rights enshrined in the Constitution should be applied and interpreted consistently with the binding international agreements, including on human rights. [9] This means that, for example, the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights can be used when arguing the case in administrative authority or at the court.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

The framework law regarding environmental protection is the Environmental Protection Law. It defines the main concepts of environmental law (Sect.1), such as the environment, environmental information, states the principles of environmental protection (the “polluter pays” principle, the precautionary principle, the prevention principle and the assessment principle) (Sect.3), and sets out the rights of the public in the environmental field.

The latter includes:
the right to environmental information (Sect. 7), the right to participate in the decision-making, including during the authorization procedures of developments that might affect the environment, as well as in the preparation of planning documents affecting the environment (Sect. 8), and also the right to access the competent administrative authorities and the administrative court (a) in the event that the aforementioned rights are not observed, or
(b) to appeal the administrative act or actual measures of the public authority or local government if it does not comply with the environmental law or creates threats to environment, or
(c) if any other private person breaks legal provisions regarding environment (Sect. 9). Sect. 30 specifically provides for the right to address the State Environmental Service or other competent authority (and this administrative stage may be followed by appeal to the administrative court) with a request to perform the necessary activities if the public gets to know about the environmental damage or imminent threat of damage.

The concept of “the public” includes any private person, and also associations, organisations and groups of persons (Sect.6(1)).

As confirmed by the Supreme Court, these provisions of the Environmental Protection Law establish an exemption from the general rules on legal standing. [10] In contrast to the latter, the EPL does not require any “individualized” nexus authorizing members of the public to initiate a case against a public authority that may have breached environmental law.

In further sections, the Environmental Protection Law details the aforementioned rights and corresponding responsibilities of administrative authorities, in addition making it mandatory for the respective authorities to involve the public in the preparation and discussion of the laws and regulations regarding the environment, at as early a stage as possible (Sect.13).

The act Environmental Impact Assessment sets the principles and outlines the procedure of the initial environmental assessment (screening procedure) and the environmental impact assessment of the intended activities that might affect the environment. [11] Sect.3 provides for the right of the public to obtain the information and to participate in the decision-making on the EIA. More detailed rules on public participation and decision-making, including in transboundary cases, are contained in other sections of the law. During the environmental impact assessment procedure, any person has a right to complain to the competent administrative authority [12] if his/her rights to information or to participation have been infringed or ignored (Sect.26(2), 26(3)).

The final decision to accept the intended activity may be contested in the competent administrative authority and appealed to the administrative court, if the rights of the public to information or participation have been infringed or ignored (Sect.26(4)).

The act Pollution stipulates the procedures for permitting and controlling polluting activities and the allocation of greenhouse gas emission permits [13]. Sect.27 of the law prescribes the availability of information on submissions for permits for polluting activities, information on issued permits for polluting activities, the conditions of the issued permits, and the information regarding monitoring and control results, as well as the participation in decision-making on permitting polluting activities. Sect.32.7 provides details on the right to the public to be informed about plans and decisions on allocation of greenhouse gas emission allowances, including the right to comment on planned allocations. The section also includes the obligations of the public authorities to provide information on plans and decisions allocating emission allowances (permits).

In Sect.50, there are more detailed rules on contesting administrative decisions and appealing them to the administrative court. According to these rules: persons may contest decisions in relation to A and B category permits for polluting activities, submit a complaint if the right to public participation and the right to environmental information have been ignored, contest conditions of a permit at any time while the relevant permit is in effect if the respective polluting activity may have a substantial negative impact on human health or the environment, or the environmental quality objectives specified in the law, contest decisions concerning a research on or remediation of polluted or potentially polluted site if the health, security, or property of a natural or legal person may be affected, a person that might be affected by a greenhouse gas emission permit may contest the permit. According to Sect.51(5), the final administrative decision can be appealed to the administrative court.

The Waste Management Law prescribes the procedures for waste management, including procedures for issuing waste management permits. According to Sect.13 of the law, a decision in relation to a waste management permit may be disputed in the Environment State Bureau (ESB), and a decision of the Bureau may be appealed to the administrative court. In addition, it is possible to dispute the conditions of such a permit throughout the period the permit is in effect if the polluting activities may cause significant negative impact on the environment or endanger human life or health.

The Water Management Law, Sect.26, includes provisions on administrative and judicial appeal of administrative decisions concerning permits specified in this law or conditions of such permits.

One of the instruments to implement environmental law and to ensure its effect is territorial (spatial) planning. In Latvia, the framework law regulating the spatial planning system is the Spatial Development Planning Law. Sect.4 of the law imposes the obligation to involve the public in the planning procedures. Sect.27 provides for the possibility to contest a spatial plan or local plan of the local government. The competent authority for reviewing such submissions is the ministry responsible for spatial development planning. After this administrative pre-trial stage, persons can submit a constitutional complaint (i.e., to the Constitutional Court) regarding the conformity of the local government binding regulations (approving a spatial plan or a local plan) with the norms of superior legal force. Sect.30, in its turn, provides for the possibility to appeal a detailed plan, which is an administrative act, to the administrative court.

The Construction Law sets out the framework for issuing construction permits which usually involves, among other things, considering the environmental impact of the intended construction. However, the procedures on the EIA and construction permits are not integrated into one but are regulated as two subsequent procedures. At the same time, rights on public participation are provided only in cases when: 1) neither the EIA has been applied nor a detailed plan elaborated (both require public participation) and 2) if the construction is proposed next to a residential or public building and may cause significant impact (smell, noise, vibration or pollution of another kind) (Sect.14(5)). Thus, if the EIA has been carried out or there is a detailed plan, no public participation is required during permission construction.

A municipality is authorized to extend the requirements on public participation requesting it on other occasions (for example, set in their legally binding norms type of activities when a public participation needs to be organized on construction permission, notwithstanding whether the EIA has been carried out. (Sec. 14(5)).

The decision regarding the proposed construction must be made public on a Construction Information System, and there are rules on informative measures regarding public discussions and submissions to change the initially proposed building design. In cases regulated by the Cabinet regulations, it is a responsibility of a developer to place a construction board on the respective plot of land. The law states that a developer also “may provide information to owners of immovable properties adjacent to the respective plot of land”. Sect.14 contains rules on contesting and appealing the decisions of the competent authority (usually to the construction board of the local government and then to the administrative court). It is specifically regulated in Sect.14(5) that the superior authority or the court must consider the violations of the right to public participation in decision-making.

Sect.6.1 of the Construction Law defines the competence of the State Construction Control Office. According to Sect.6.1(1)8, it lies within the competence of the Office to examine complaints on substantial violations of laws and regulations in the construction process or also in cases when a structure has caused or may cause danger or substantial harm to human life, health, property or the environment. It must be noted that the Office is an authority of general state control, and not a pre-trial administrative authority for administrative acts regarding the construction, for example, constructions permits.

4) Example of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The administrative courts have developed wide-ranging case-law regarding the rights of the public to access the court in environmental matters. Decisions of the administrative courts are available on the national portal of the court decisions. The Supreme Court (Senāts) as the cassation instance court interprets legal norms and is responsible for the unified application of law. This includes unified application of norms providing for the access to the court. On the website of the Supreme Court, there is an additional selection of the rulings of the Supreme Court. The search options in English make it possible to obtain a chronological overview, while the Latvian version of the database also provides quick access to subject-matter classified rulings, including chapters devoted to the environmental issues and building issues, as well systematization according to legal norms applied or interpreted by the Supreme Court. Moreover, the national database of legal acts has been complemented with additional indications and direct links to current case-law of the Supreme Court and the Constitutional Court on the norm associated with the case.

(i) Recognizing an actio popularis approach in environmental cases

The Senate has interpreted Sect. 9(3) of Environmental Protection Law giving a broad approach to legal standing in environmental matters admitting it as an actio popularis: if the person in his or her appeal to the court indicates a possible infringement of environmental law or damage to environment caused by construction, this person as a member of the public in the meaning of Environmental Protection Law has a right to contest the construction permit. In such a case, there is no need for an evaluation of any infringement (or potential infringement) of his/her individual rights or legal interests. Any appeal of any person showing reasons which form the basis to identify the respective application as submitted in accordance with Sect.9(3) of the Environmental Protection Law is permissible as an actio popularis appeal against administrative act or actual measures of the state or the local government. An actio popularis is the exception provided by environmental law from the dominant approach established by the Administrative Procedural Law where the legal standing rules are based on a “right-based” doctrine requiring proof of the infringement of an applicant’s (subjective) rights or legal interest to be entitled to sue.

(ii) Limitations on the actio popularis rule

The Supreme Court has established margins on the notion of “environmental interests”, thus, limiting the possibilities to sue aimed at eliminating dishonest and trivial applications. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has stated that a reference to the necessity of the protection of the environment and to the rights of the public in environmental law need not be formal. Sect.9(2) and Sect.9(3) of Environmental Protection Law are to be interpreted as precluding the right to appeal to the court if it is established that the reference to the alleged denial of the participation in decision-making or to the infringements of environmental law only serves as an instrument for achieving other goals not related to environmental protection. [16]

The Supreme Court confirmed the limitation on admissibility of a case to avoid accepting applications based on an actio popularis where concerns about a threat to the environment are insignificant and formal, and arguments in the application do not indicate any considerable threat to the environment.

Otherwise, according to the Supreme Court, the possibilities of initiating a case would be open to “trivial” cases where there are no serious concerns on the threat to the environment. [17] Therefore, in deciding whether the application is admissible, the court has to assess “conditions that the applicant indicates to substantiate the infringement of the public interests in environmental protection.” [18]

Consequently, there are two limitations established by the Supreme Court with respect to admissibility of the case and thus, affecting the decision on accepting a case from a private person claiming a breach of environmental law. 1) limitation based on the theory of “trivial case;” [19] 2) limitation based on the “honesty test.” [20]

(iii) The right to information, public participation and access to justice in EIA cases

The Supreme Court has explained that the mandatory rules on informing the public about the public participation procedures (law On Environmental Impact Assessment, Sect.15(1) and Sect.17(1)) are not an-end-in-itself. The aim of those rules is to ensure that the information about the arrangements of the public participation reaches the public as far and wide as possible, thus encouraging the involvement of the public in decision-making. Taking into account this aim, the observance of those rules should not be considered formally. It should be evaluated whether the informative measures taking place have achieved their aim. [21]

“Environment” and cultural and historical heritage

According to the decision of the Supreme Court (23.04.2018., case No. SKA-989/2018, ECLI:LV:AT:2018:0423.SKA089818.S.L, the notion of environment also includes cultural and historical heritage. Any person may lodge an application before the court to protect environmental interests regarding cultural and historical heritage according to the Art.19(3) of the Environmental Protection Law.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transpose legislation be referred to?

Officially ratified international law, including the Aarhus Convention On Access To Information, Public Participation In Decision-Making And Access To Justice In Environmental Matters, can also be applied directly by administrative bodies and by the court; [22] If a conflict between a legal norm of international law and a norm of Latvian law of the same legal force is identified, the legal norm of international law must be applied.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

There is a three-level court system in Latvia.

The first level consists of 9 district courts of general jurisdiction for civil and criminal cases and one administrative district court, consisting of 5 courthouses in different cities and covering entire territory of Latvia, for administrative cases.

The second level consists of 5 regional courts of general jurisdiction for civil and criminal cases and one regional administrative court for administrative cases. The regional courts are courts of appeal for civil, criminal and administrative cases that have already been heard in district courts. The Administrative regional court has a jurisdiction as first-instance court in certain categories of cases mentioned in laws governing certain fields (for example, competition law).

The Supreme Court or the Senate is the third-level court. The Senate is divided in three departments and functions as a cassation instance for civil, criminal and administrative cases, respectively.

As a general rule, civil, criminal and administrative cases may be reviewed in all three court instances. However, only two court instances are allowed for certain categories of civil and administrative cases. Those exemptions are set out in Civil Procedure Law for small civil claims, as well as in several special laws determining administrative procedure, for example, concerning citizens’ information requests or public procurement. There are several types of issues dealt in only one instance (for example, cases of asylum seekers).

Under Latvian law, procedures concerning administrative offences (violations) exist. If a person commits a petty offence listed in a certain law or regulation, the Administrative Liability Law applies and a penalty is imposed by an administrative authority. The penalty imposed by administrative authority can be appealed to a superior administrative authority as a pre-trial institution and to the district (city) court – i.e., common court for civil and criminal cases. Cases adjudicated by the district (city) courts can be appealed to regional courts. The judgments of regional courts are final and cannot be appealed.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

Before an initiating a court case, the court in administrative and civil procedure evaluates the admissibility of the lodged application or the civil action brought. If the court comes to a conclusion that the application or the action does not lie in its jurisdiction (administrative or civil), it makes a written decision of non-admissibility which can be appealed to a higher instance court. If the question of the jurisdiction is especially complex, the court may ask the Supreme Court (the Senate) for its opinion on jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the court is then decided by the Chief justice and chairpersons of all departments of the Senate. If the court, during initiated and ongoing court proceedings, comes to the conclusion that the case is initiated contrary to the rules of the jurisdiction, it terminates the proceedings. Such a decision can be appealed to a superior instance court.

There is no possibility that the court of civil or administrative jurisdiction would hand over the application directly to the competent judicial branch: it is the responsibility of the applicant or plaintiff to apply to the respective court in accordance with procedural rules. In exceptional cases, the Supreme Court (i.e., the Chief justice and the chairpersons of the departments) has decided that particular proceedings may continue despite the wrongly determined jurisdiction, but it is then justified by individual circumstances, mainly very long ongoing proceedings and a possible negative consequences due to the change of the jurisdiction.

The court also decides on the competence of the given court among other courts of the same jurisdiction and may refuse to accept the application or the civil action if other court of the same jurisdiction is competent. In civil matters, the court refuses to initiate the proceedings if other court of first instance is competent (for example, the respective court is not the court of the defendant’s declared place of residence). In administrative matters, there is only one district court consisting of five courthouses; applications submitted to a particular courthouse may be transferred to the competent one if the applicant has erred in identifying the right courthouse. If the application lies in jurisdiction of different administrative court (i.e., when special rules state the Administrative regional court or the Supreme court as the first instance court), the court refuses to accept the application. In criminal matters, the court may transfer the case to the competent court if the case is submitted contrary to the rules defining the competence of the courts. Disputes between courts are forbidden.

There are no rules regulating conflicts of jurisdiction of different states. The general rules on accepting the application or the action apply.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There is no specialized court or quasi-court dealing with environmental matters.
If a person considers that an administrative decision or action, or omission, violates the law protecting the environment and nature, or could create the threat of damage or damage to the environment, he/she can apply to the administrative court. Since environmental issues on most occasions are settled by administrative decisions (building permits, water use permits, permits for polluting activities, etc.), those disputes are mostly reviewed by the administrative court. Exercising the right to apply to the court may not cause, in itself, any unfavourable consequences, including those falling under the private law, to the applicant. [23]

There are no expert judges dealing with environmental or technical issues. In the official case distribution plans of the administrative courts, some of the judges are specialized in environmental, spatial planning or construction cases, which reflects their expertise in the respective fields of law. In civil procedure, a citizen can seek damages caused by anyone, if this person has infringed, among other things, regulations concerning environmental issues and thus caused damage to the plaintiff. Public authorities, acting on behalf of the State, can claim damage caused to the environment. Citizens possessing information about criminal offences possibly causing damage to environment should inform any official or institution who is authorised to perform criminal proceedings (the police, the prosecutor’s office).

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

In administrative cases, the court has full jurisdiction over both factual and legal issues. This means that the court may review any question of facts or law. The exemption exists only where the administrative authority has a discretionary power (for example, where the authority decides on the means and scale of penalty) or has some scope for professional evaluation of facts (for example, the evaluation of the results in exams) or risk assessment, but the court must nevertheless check whether all relevant facts have been taken into account and whether all the legal considerations have been properly made by the administrative authority. If the court lacks technical or scientific knowledge, the assessment of facts can be done with the support of forensic expertise. In environmental cases initiated by an applicant based on an actio popularis approach (in order to defend public interests in environmental protection) the scope of a court review has been limited by the Supreme Court in its judgment delivered in 2018. The Court stated that when assessing a complaint that has been submitted to protect the environment, the legality of a decision (construction permit) must be assessed focusing only on the existence of a threat to the environment or a possible breach of the requirements of environmental legislation that might be directly linked to the development under the dispute, rather than any facts or illegality a claimant might refer to. [24] Accordingly, this statement of the Supreme Court indicates that the scope of review for appeals based on environmental exception clause might be restricted to the infringement of legal provisions that are related to the environment. This applies to both procedural and substantive issues.

The administrative procedure is conducted in accordance with the inquisitorial principle or the principle of investigation, i.e., the court may gather evidence and make relevant legal considerations on its own motion. But it is the responsibility of the applicant to identify the contested administrative decision and to state reasons for challenging this decision. The administrative court examines the case strictly within the boundaries set by the applicant. The court may not alter the claim or examine decisions not appealed in written form by the applicant on its own motion. Also, the applicant must submit all the relevant evidence he or she has in his/her possession.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Administrative decisions (administrative acts) are issued by different state or local governments’ authorities according to their competence. The procedures and deadlines of appeal must be stated in the administrative act, otherwise the addressee of the decision enjoys longer terms for the appeal, i.e. one year instead of one month general deadline.

Generally, it is not possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before the court. As a general rule, an administrative act, actual measures or omission are subject to appeal to a superior administrative authority, which is a mandatory pre-trial stage. Exemptions exist only where there is no superior authority or the superior authority is the Cabinet of Ministers, then a person has the option of appealing the decision to the same administrative authority or to submit the application directly to the administrative court.

If the person contests the administrative act/measure/omission to a superior administrative authority, the complaint must be submitted to the same authority which issued the first decision, and it is the responsibility of this authority to transfer the complaint to a superior authority. Administrative procedures at the administrative authority are free of charge, including in environmental cases. Exemptions however are provided by law, e.g., in public procurement cases). A person can submit his/her complaint to the administrative authority both in written and in oral form. Oral complaints will be immediately written down by the civil servant of the institution. Written complaints and appeals, signed electronically, can be sent also by e-mail.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

If a person is not satisfied with the decision of a superior administrative authority, he or she may submit an application to the administrative court within terms stated in the decision. The general time limit for lodging the appeal before the court is one month according to Sect. 188 of the Administrative Procedure Law. If the administrative authority has not explained the procedure of appeal (including time limits) in the written administrative decision, the deadline for appeal extends to one year.

A court fee must be paid. The applicant must formulate his/her pleading (what he or she wants to be done, i.e., to annul the decision, to make the authority to do something), to state main facts of the case, to identify the contested decision/measure/omission and to state the reasons for the contesting the decision/measure/omission. The applicant must attach all the relevant evidence and/or point to particular evidence that he/she wants the court to obtain from other sources. In environmental cases, an applicant must “appreciably substantiate” a claim demonstrating that there are well-founded concerns about a breach of environmental law in order to acquire standing based on the environmental exception clause (on an actio popularis rule).

The Administrative district court (consisting of five courthouses) is the first instance court. The exemptions are set out in law, for example, decisions of the Competition Council or the Financial and Capital Market Commission have to be appealed to the Administrative regional court.

Before initiating the court case, the judge will scrutinise the application to make certain the application lies within the jurisdiction of the court and there are no obstacles to initiating the proceedings.

If the judge accepts the application, the procedure at the Administrative district court usually lasts 6–9 months [25], in complex cases the procedure may last longer. The procedure in the first instance administrative court, as a default, is written, but the applicant has a right to ask for oral procedure. If the judgment or the decision of the Administrative district court is appealed to the Administrative regional court, the appeal proceedings may last approximately the same time as at the district court, 6–9 months except in complex cases. A state fee must be paid for the appeal. The proceedings are conducted in written procedure. The applicant – an applicant in the administrative case – may ask the court to hold an oral hearing if he or she can state reasons for the need of it. The decision on providing the oral or written procedure is left to the court’s discretion.

If a party to a case appeals the judgment of the Administrative regional court to the Supreme Court, a deposit must be paid for the cassation appeal. The cassation procedure at the Supreme Court will last about two years if the cassation complaint is admitted to the cassation proceedings. The Supreme Court may decide to refuse the initiation of the cassation proceedings if the appeal is ill-founded or if the judgment of the regional court is consistent with the judicature of the Supreme Court, or if there are no grounds to believe that the judgment of the regional court is wrong. There is written procedure at the Supreme Court, except in cases where the Court, using its own discretion, decides to hold an oral hearing. Oral hearings are rarely held at the Supreme Court.

If the court of the first instance or the appellate instance decides procedural questions (on the admissibility of the application, pleadings, on injunctive relief or interim measures etc.) during the court proceedings, decisions may be appealed separately with an ancillary complaint to a higher instance court if Administrative Procedure Law provides for such ancillary appeal, and in a procedure according to this law. According to Sect.316 of Administrative Procedure Law, a time limit for lodging an ancillary appeal is 14 days starting from the day the court has issued the decision. Only in particular cases mentioned in Administrative Procedure Law will the term be counted starting from the moment the addressee of the decision has received the decision, usually it is when the addressee has not previously been informed about the date for the review of the issue.

The higher instance court will verify this procedural decision of the lower instance court.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There is no specialized court or quasi-court dealing with environmental matters.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

The same general procedural rules apply for administrative and judicial procedures in environmental matters, as in other types of administrative cases (see 1.3.2).

At the administrative level, there should be at least one appeal level to a superior administrative authority as a mandatory pre-trial stage, except where there is no superior administrative authority or where the Cabinet of Ministers is the only superior authority to the given lower authority. Special laws may provide for more appeal levels. Taking into account that there are different administrative authorities issuing administrative decisions both in local and state level, it is not possible to give precise instructions as to which administrative authority is a superior administrative authority. It depends on the institutional structure of local and state administration. The administrative authority issuing the decision must state the appeal procedures in the same decision. The complaint must be submitted to the same, i.e., lower, administrative authority which will then itself forward the complaint to the respective, institutionally or functionally superior, administrative authority.

After the final administrative decision is issued, it can be appealed to the administrative court.

The court system provides for three possible levels of court proceedings: the Administrative district court and, consequently, the Administrative regional court will decide the matter on its merits and issue a judgment on the merits, while the Supreme Court (the Senate), as a cassation instance court, will decide on questions of law only. An exemption exists in relation to disputes regarding information requests: the case will be reviewed on two levels only, the Administrative district court and the Supreme Court.

The general time limit for lodging the appeal before the Administrative district court is one month according to Sect.188 of Administrative Procedure Law. If the administrative authority has not explained the procedure of appeal (including time limits) in the written administrative decision, the deadline for appeal extends to one year.

A court fee must be paid in the amount of 30 EUR. The applicant must formulate his/her pleading (what he or she wants to be done, i.e., to annul the decision, to make the authority to do something), state main facts of the case, identify the contested decision/measure/omission and state the reasons for the contesting the decision/measure/omission. The applicant must attach all the relevant evidence and/or point to particular evidence that he/she wants the court to obtain from other sources.

An appeal on the merits must be lodged before the Administrative regional court within one month after a full judgment of the Administrative district court has been issued. The court fee in the amount of 60 EUR applies to the appeal to the Administrative regional court. The applicant must clearly state the scope of the appeal, and it must not go beyond the initial scope of the appeal to the Administrative district court. Also, the merits of the appeal must be stated. If the appellant wants to attach new evidence or to ask the appellate court to gather new evidence, he/she must explain why such evidence was not submitted to the first instance court.

After the case is reviewed at the appellate instance court and the judgment of the Administrative regional court is issued, a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is allowed regarding the points of law only. A cassation complaint must be lodged within one month after the issue of the judgment of the Administrative regional court, and a 70 EUR deposit must be paid. The Supreme Court, at first, will verify the content of the cassation complaint and decide whether to accept the complaint for the review on its merits. Cassation complaints lacking legal argumentation on the points of law will not be accepted to the cassation procedure. If such is the case, The Supreme Court will issue reasoned decision on the rejection of the complaint.

If the cassation complaint is accepted to the cassation procedure, the Supreme Court will not examine evidence. The judgment will include the arguments only regarding points of law, i.e., whether the appellate court has applied the law correctly. If the cassation complaint has been accepted to be reviewed on its merits and, afterwards, is successful and the case has been returned to the Administrative regional court for a new review, the complainant will recover the deposit.

Some more important procedural decisions (clearly mentioned in the Administrative Procedure Law) of the court may be appealed with ancillary appeals (for example, the decision not to accept the application to the court, or the decision on injunctive relief). Procedural decisions are reviewed on one appeal level only. If the procedural decision is subject to an appeal, an ancillary complaint must be lodged before a higher instance court within 14 days starting from the day the court issued the decision (Sect.316 of Administrative Procedure Law). Only in particular cases mentioned in Administrative Procedure Law will the term be counted starting from the moment the addressee of the decision received the decision, usually it is when the addressee has not been previously informed about the date for the review of the issue.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

The law On Pollution, Sect.50, provides for a possibility to contest conditions of an A or B category permit for polluting activities at any time while the relevant permit is in effect. An appeal is allowed if the respective polluting activity could have a substantial negative impact on human health or the environment, or the environmental quality objectives specified in the law.

If the administrative court (any level of it) deciding the case acknowledges that a legal norm does not conform to the Constitution (Satversme) or international law, it has a competence to suspend court proceedings and to send an application to the Constitutional Court to annul the legal norm (Sect.104 of Administrative Procedure Law). Parties to the case may argue on the need to apply to the Constitutional Court. After the decision of the Constitutional Court, the administrative court proceedings will be renewed and the administrative court will base its decision or judgment upon the view of the Constitutional Court.

The administrative court (any level of it) may refer a question of EU law to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) for a preliminary ruling if it needs the interpretation or a decision on the validity of EU law to decide the case before it. The function of the preliminary reference procedure is to ensure uniform interpretation and validity of EU law across all the Member States. The administrative court will suspend the administrative court proceedings and send an application to the CJEU. Parties to the case may argue before the administrative court on the need for such a preliminary reference and give their views on how to draft the question.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?
There are no specific rules for mediation in administrative procedure. The possibility to come to a settlement is left to the free will of the parties to the case. A person and an administrative authority can enter into an administrative agreement both during administrative procedure at the authority or during the court proceedings. The court or the judge does not in any way formally interfere with the conclusion of such an agreement and does not approve it by a court decision. The only way the court may influence the parties is to explain the possibility of entering an agreement and to make proposals for the conditions of the agreement. If the parties have started negotiations, the court may adjourn the hearing or postpone taking the final decision in the case.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsman (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

Apart from the administrative and judicial review of decisions or omissions of administrative institutions, there are other means of remedies available in environmental matters.

The protection of human rights, including the right to live in a benevolent environment, falls under the competence of the Ombudsman Law (Tiesībsargs).

According to the Ombudsman Law the Ombudsman may:
- examine complaints and proposals of private individuals, investigate the circumstances;
- request that institutions clarify the necessary circumstances of the matter and inform the Ombudsman thereof;
- upon or after the examination, provide the institution with recommendations and opinions regarding the lawfulness and effectiveness of their activities, as well as the compliance with the principle of good administration;
- within the framework of law, resolve disputes between private individuals and institutions, as well as disputes in respect of human rights between private individuals;
- facilitate conciliation between the parties to the dispute;
- in resolving disputes, provide opinions and recommendations to private individuals regarding the prevention of human rights violations;
- provide the Parliament, the Cabinet, local governments or other institutions with recommendations on the issuance of or amendments to the legislation;
- provide persons with consultations regarding human rights issues;
- conduct research and analyse the situation in the field of human rights, as well as provide opinions regarding the topical human rights issues.

The prosecutor’s office is vested with a supervisory power, i.e., a prosecutor has a duty to take measures required to protect the rights and lawful interests of persons and the State. This may include environmental protection interests, too. A prosecutor may initiate a criminal investigation, as well as to take other actions. According to the Law on Prosecutor’s Office, the prosecutor may:
- issue a warning to the persons if their actions show the possibility of a violation of law;
- issue a protest to the Cabinet, ministries and other administrative institutions, local government institutions, inspections and state services, undertakings, institutions, organisations and officials, if their decisions do not comply with law; the particular institution or official must inform the prosecutor of the result of the protest within a 10-day period. The prosecutor may apply to the court if his protest is denied without basis or no reply to it is provided;
- submit a written submission to the relevant undertaking, authority, organisation, official, or person, if it is necessary to discontinue an illegal activity, rectify the consequences of such activity or to prevent a violation; if the requirements expressed in a submission are not complied with or no reply to it is provided, the prosecutor is entitled to submit to a court or any other competent institution an application requiring respective liability measures.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

The so-called actio popularis (a right of access to justice in public interests) exists in environmental matters. This means that persons have access to administrative authorities and court not only to protect their own individual interests, but also to protect general interests of environmental protection. According to the Environmental Protection Law and the case-law of the Supreme Court, those rights are recognised for both natural and legal persons, and even interest groups (unregistered associations of persons). Legal persons may include any kind of non-governmental organization, commercial entities and even political parties. There are no specific conditions for non-governmental organizations to have a right to go to the administrative court.

The Supreme Court has established margins on the notion of “environmental interests”, thus limiting the possibilities to sue aimed at eliminating dishonest and trivial applications. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has stated that a reference to the necessity of the protection of the environment and to the rights of the public in environmental law need not be formal. Sect.9(2) and Sect.9(3) of Environmental Protection Law should be interpreted as precluding the right to appeal to the court if it is established that the reference to the alleged denial of the participation in decision-making or to the infringements of environmental law only serves as an instrument to achieve other goals not related to environmental protection. [26]

The Supreme Court confirmed the limitation of admissibility of a case to avoid accepting applications based on an actio popularis where concerns about a threat to the environment are insignificant and formal, and arguments in the application do not indicate any considerable threat to the environment. Otherwise, according to the Supreme Court, the possibilities of initiating a case would be open to “trivial” cases where there are no serious concerns on the threat to the environment. [27] Therefore, in deciding whether the application is admissible, the court has to assess “conditions that the applicant indicates to substantiate the infringement of the public interests in environmental protection.” [28]

Consequently, there are two limitations established by the Supreme Court with respect to admissibility of the case and thus, affecting the decision on acceptable case from a private person claiming a breach of environmental law. 1) limitation based on the theory of “trivial case;” [29] 2) limitation based on the “honesty test.” [30]

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

The same broad interpretation of legal standing for access to administrative and judicial appeal is recognized in all branches of environmental law.

According to the Environmental Protection Law stipulates the procedures for permitting and controlling polluting activities and the allocation of greenhouse gas emission permits. Sect.50 of this law contains detailed rules on contesting administrative decisions and appealing them to the administrative court. Among other decisions and omissions, a person may contest decisions concerning research on or remediation of a polluted or potentially polluted site if the health, security, or property of a certain natural or legal person may be affected. Also, a person may contest the issuing of a greenhouse gas emission permit, if a certain person may be affected by this decision (however, any person may appeal such decision if the right to an environmental information, right to participate in the decision-making and to have public’s opinions considered has been ignored or infringed). But there are no such conditions (to identify an individual infringement) to contest decisions in relation to Category A or B permits for the performance of polluting activities, to submit a complaint if the right of public participation and the right to environmental information have been ignored, or to contest the conditions of the permit during the entire period the permit is in effect.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and Individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

See above 1.4.1. regarding actio popularis.
There are no specific rules for foreign non-governmental organizations or individuals, they enjoy the same access to the court in environmental interests if the contested decision or omission falls within the jurisdiction of Latvia. According to Art.91 of the Constitution and Sect.4 of Law on Judicial Power, all persons are equal before the law and the court. Cases are adjudicated irrespective of, among other things, the origin, nationality, language or place of residence of a person.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?
The language of the courts is Latvian. Participants lacking fluency in the official language can participate in proceedings with the aid of an interpreter. The court provides an interpreter, paid by the government, for natural persons or their representatives in order to get acquainted with documents of the case, and for the participation in the hearings. The court, at its own discretion, may also provide an interpreter for a legal person.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure.

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request an expert on its own motion?
When a person submits his/her appeal on a particular administrative decision or omission to the court, all the evidence available to the applicants and justifying the applicant’s objections should be attached to the written appeal. The administrative institution (the defendant) will, in turn, attach to its explanations all the evidence necessary to justify the institution’s decision. Participants to the procedure may ask the court to gather other evidence, including oral testimonies and expert opinions. The court is free to request evidence on its own motion since the court is bound by the principle of objective investigation (inquisitorial principle) and it is a duty of the court to evaluate the legality of the contested administrative decision. Participants to the procedure may also introduce new evidence from the court proceedings at the first instance court or even at the appellate court. The cassation instance court (the Supreme Court) does not accept new evidence since its task is to examine points of law only.

The administrative court may accept and evaluate all kind of evidence: testimonies of witnesses, documentary evidence (including written documents, audio, video and digital material), material evidence, expert opinions (usually produced during the court proceedings by experts selected by the court). As a specific means of acquiring information, the court may listen to the opinion of amicus curiae (“the friend of the court”): any association considered as representing the interests in a particular field and able to provide a competent opinion may ask the court to allow expressing its view on the factual or legal circumstances.

The court may refuse to accept evidence not relevant to the case. Assessing the accepted and lawful evidence, the court will make its conclusions in accordance with its own convictions which must be based comprehensively, completely and objectively on verified evidence, and in accordance with judicial consciousness based on laws of logic, findings of science and principles of justice.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
Participants to the procedure may also introduce new evidence during the court proceedings at the first instance court or even at the appellate court. The cassation instance court (the Supreme Court) does not accept new evidence since its task is to examine points of law only.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.
If the participants to the court procedure have reasonable doubts about the facts on which the disputed administrative decision is based, they may ask the court to order an expert opinion, or the court may appoint an expert witness on its own motion. If the court is convinced of the necessity of the expert report, it will select one or more experts, taking into account the views of the participants to the procedure. The participants have a right to propose questions which, in their opinion, require the opinion of an expert, but questions will be finally determined by the court.

According to the Law on Forensic Experts, state forensic experts and private forensic experts are entitled to perform forensic expert examinations. Only in special circumstances may other persons having necessary knowledge perform expert examinations. The list of forensic experts may be found in the public Register of Forensic Experts.

Parties to the case may submit expert opinions to the court acquired on their own initiative. However, such expert opinions do not qualify as expert opinions in the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Law. The court may evaluate their credibility in the same way as a credibility of any other written evidence. According to the Law on the Conservation of Species and Biotopes, there exists a register of experts providing opinions on protected species and biotopes. An administrative authority, an individual person or a court may seek for opinions of experts in environmental administrative cases. More information and the register of experts: the Register of Forensic Experts.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
The court will evaluate expert opinions in the same way as other evidence: the court is not bound by the opinion of the expert, but will make its own final conclusions after the evaluating the credibility of the opinion. In the judgment, the court is obliged to set out reasons why preference has been given to certain evidence in comparison with other, and why certain facts have been recognised as proven while other facts as not proven.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
A person selected as an expert is obliged to attend the court when he or she is summoned. An expert has the right to become acquainted with the materials of the case file, to put questions to participants in the administrative proceeding and to witnesses, and to request the court to require additional materials. An expert must give an objective opinion in his or her own name and is personally liable for the opinion.
If the material provided for the expert’s investigation is not sufficient or if the questions asked are beyond the scope of expert’s knowledge, the expert must inform the court.
An expert may be held criminally liable for refusal to perform his or her duties without justified reason or for knowingly giving a false opinion.

The law provides for the possibility of withdrawal or removal of an expert if there is a reason to believe that he or she is biased.
An expert opinion has to be reasoned and substantiated. If the opinions of the experts conflict, each expert writes a separate opinion.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
There is no possibility for parties to call their own experts to the court (see above). If the participants have obtained and submitted expert-opinions on their own initiative, the court may evaluate such opinions as any other written evidence.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
No procedural fees are to be paid at the administrative court.
The State budget will cover the remuneration paid to experts assigned by the court’s decision. The parties to the proceedings do not have to pay any fees or cover any expenses. However, in both administrative and court procedures, the person has to cover payments to experts if that person has involved any on his/her own initiative.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures
1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

As a rule, any person can go to the administrative institution or to the court personally, without a mandatory legal counsel. Taking into account that the administrative court is bound to the principle of objective investigation (inquisitorial principle), the court may also on its own motion clarify any possible ambiguities in the written appeal, or ask participants and other persons to submit the necessary evidence. This is a great advantage for persons defending their rights or environmental interests at the administrative court. Nevertheless, a person may involve another person, lawyer or any other person as his/her representative and/or legal counsel at the administrative or judicial procedures. There are no rules on mandatory legal counsel for judicial proceedings at the administrative court, not even at the Supreme Court.

Expenses related to legal aid or expert examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.

The person in need of legal counsel may contact members of the Advocacy (sworn advocates) as well as other lawyers. They can provide legal consultations, prepare legal documents and perform other legal activities.

The list of sworn advocates
There is no list of specialized lawyers in the environmental field.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance
It is sometimes possible, on an individual basis, to receive pro bono legal assistance in administrative matters. For example, if the outcome of the case or the interpretation of the legal provisions could be significant, the lawyers are sometimes ready to provide legal advice free of charge. Law firms and lawyers can be contacted individually.

The legal clinic functioning at the University of Latvia is ready to provide legal advice to persons with a low income. Legal advice provided by law students usually covers such branches as employment, rent of dwelling premises, or maintenance allowance for children.

The Latvian branch of the Transparency International Delna provides legal aid for citizens in building and land use matters. Delna are prepared to handle the case in situations when the case is of public importance, i.e., when a substantial damage is caused or may be caused to environment, or when the case could serve as a precedent and contribute to the improvement of law or legal practice.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?
See above 1.1.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?
See above 1.1.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

Register of Forensic experts (forensic expertise ordered by the court)

The list of sworn advocates
According to the Law on the Conservation of Species and Biotopes, there is a register of experts providing opinions on protected species and biotopes. An administrative authority, an individual person or a court may seek the opinions of experts in environmental administrative cases. More information and the register of experts: the Nature Protection Agency website.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

Baltic Environmental Forum (Baltijas Vides forums)
The Environmental Protection Club (Vides aizsardzības klubs) Participating in court proceedings.
Latvian Green Movement (Latvijas Zaļā kustība)
Society „Green Liberty“ (Biedrība „Zaļā brīvība“)
Society for protection of Jurmala (Jūrmalas aizsardzības biedrība) promotes civic involvement in decision-making in Jūrmala city, including environmental matters. This often involves spatial planning, land-use and construction in Jūrmala, impact on the Baltic Sea Coastal Protection Zone. Participating in court proceedings.
The Ornithology Society The main organization dealing with the birds’ protection. It has been both initiating administrative justice procedures and participating in court proceedings.
Society of Botanists
Society „Baltic Coasts“ (Biedrība „Baltijas krasti“)

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

WWF Latvian Branch
Transparency International Latvian Branch Delna Participating in court proceedings.
Foundation for Environmental Education Latvian Branch

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
If the person is not satisfied with the environmental administrative decision of the competent administrative authority, he/she can appeal it to a superior administrative authority within one month after the decision comes into effect. The procedures and time limits for appeal must be stated in the administrative decision, otherwise the addressee of the decision enjoys longer terms (one year) for the appeal. An administrative decision comes into effect at the moment the addressee is notified of it, except when the decision or the law regulates otherwise. The Law on Notification contains detailed rules regarding notifying the addressee in different manners (mail, electronic mail etc.) and rules about when the document is deemed to have been notified.

Persons who are not the direct addressees of the administrative decision but whose rights or legal interests are affected by that decision may dispute the decision within a one-month period from the day when this person become informed of it, but no later than within a one-year period from the day the decision comes into effect. The same rule applies to persons contesting a decision in environmental interests (environmental claims) even if they are not individually affected by the respective decision.

Important special rules exist regarding construction permits. According to Sect.15(4) of the Construction Law, a decision on a construction permit must enter into effect from the moment it has been notified to the addressee, and at this moment the time limit for contesting the construction permit begins also for other persons (third parties), regardless of the moment those third parties acknowledged the existence of the permit. Only if the mandatory rules on informative measures have not been observed properly may the third parties rely on the time limits counting from the moment those persons become informed of the fact that the permit has been issued. The informative measures include making public the decision on a Construction Information System, and there are also rules on informative measures regarding public discussions and submissions to change the initially proposed building design. In cases regulated by the Cabinet regulations, it is a responsibility of the initiator of the construction to place a construction board on the respective plot of land; a developer may provide an information to owners of immovable properties adjacent to the respective plot of land.

Some normative acts concerning environment issues prescribe specific rules for appealing particular environmental decisions. For example, persons can contest the conditions of the permit for polluting activities during the entire period of its validity, which significantly differs from the general rule to contest any decision within one month from the day of its coming into effect (Sect.50(3) of the law On Pollution). The administrative appeal should be submitted to the authority that issued (or had an obligation to issue) the decision concerning the original complaint. The appeal will then be forwarded for examination to a superior administrative institution.

A person can submit his/her complaint to the administrative authority both in written and in oral form. Oral complaints will be immediately written down by the civil servant of the institution. Written complaints and appeals, signed electronically, can also be sent by e-mail.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

Administrative authorities, including superior authorities when reviewing a complaint on the decisions of lower authorities, must deliver their decisions within one month from the day the person has lodged his/her application or complaint. In urgent cases, the person may request the authority to issue the decision immediately.

Due to objective reasons, the authority may extend the time limit for a period not exceeding four months. If there are objective difficulties in clarifying factual circumstances, the time limits may be extended for up to one year, with prior permission from a superior administrative authority. The decision of the authority to extend the time limit may be appealed to a superior administrative authority or, subsequently, to the court.

If there is a delay in delivering the decision of the superior authority, there are no immediate sanctions possible against the authority. However, the person is then allowed to lodge his/her appeal in the main matter immediately to the administrative court without waiting for a written response from the administrative authority.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

Generally, it is not possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court. As a general rule, an administrative act, actual measures or omission are subject to appeal to a superior administrative authority, which is a mandatory pre-trial stage. Exemptions exist only where there is no superior authority or the sole superior authority is the Cabinet of Ministers, then a person has a choice to appeal the decision to the same administrative authority or to submit the application directly to the administrative court.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

There is no deadline set for the court to hear a case and to decide on the merits. The judge (the court) examines cases in the order of the waiting list, but the duration of the proceedings depends on the complexity of the case and the procedural choices made by parties. The Law on Judicial Power allows a Chief judge of the court to ask a judge for an explanation for the work organisation, to issue orders related to work organisation and to take appropriate measures to ensure the examination of the case within a reasonable time period. For example, the law allows the Chief judge to assign the judge to determine a time period for performing necessary actions or to re-allocate the cases according to the allocation plan of the court-cases.

After the case is heard (or examined in written procedure) on its merits at the district court of the regional court, the court must deliver its written judgment within 21 days. This term may be extended to two additional months. At the Supreme Court, the court must deliver its written judgment within one month after the oral or written review of the case, and this term may be extended to two additional months.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The general time limit for appealing the administrative decision of a superior administrative authority before the administrative court is one month. If the superior administrative authority has failed to clarify the procedure for appealing its decision, the time limit extends to one year. Also, if the superior administrative authority has not issued its decision at all after the person has filed the complaint regarding a decision or an omission of a lower administrative authority, the person may file his/her appeal to the administrative court within one year after addressing the superior administrative authority.

The time limit for filing appeals against court judgments is one month. The general time limit for filing ancillary complaints against procedural decisions of the court (for example, decision not to accept the application to the court due to the lack of jurisdiction, or decision on injunctive relief) is 14 days.

During the stage of the preparation of the case for review, the judge sets time limits for submitting arguments, evidence and procedural pleas and petitions.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Submitting a complaint against an administrative decision, generally, suspends its effect from the moment the complaint is received at the administrative authority. Sectoral law may provide for exemptions, for example, the law On Pollution, Sect.50(4) states that contesting amendments to an existing permit does not suspend the effect of that existing permit. For more detailed information on exemptions see 1.7.2.4.

The suspensive effect lasts until the day the time limit for appealing the decision of a superior administrative authority ends and no appeal has been lodged before the administrative court.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

There is no possibility to ask for injunctive relief during the administrative appeal, the only provisional protection is the suspensive effect of administrative decisions.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

See above 1.7.2.2.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

The Administrative Procedure Law, Sect.80 and Sect.360, provides for exemptions when there is no suspensive effect during administrative appeal procedure:

when special law requires immediate enforcement (execution) of the decision (for example, appeal against a construction permit for structures of national interest does not have suspensive effect);

when the administrative authority itself has specifically provided for immediate enforcement of the given decision; when the administrative decision is issued orally, or disregarding other formal requirements, in the event of an emergency, or in accordance with special legal norms, or in some trivial matters;

if administrative decisions of the police, the border guards or the fire service are issued to prevent immediately threats to national security, public order, the environment, the life and health, and property of individuals, those decisions are to be enforced immediately and there is no suspensive effect;

if the contested administrative decision is favourable to the addressee, and this addressee asks for more favourable decision;

if the contested administrative decision is of general nature, i.e., it concerns many persons not mentioned as addressees but who it is possible to identify taking into account their relation to the situation (for example, if the decision is addressed to the users of some particular facility, or some other specific group of persons not directly identified in the decision).
5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

When an administrative decision is appealed to the administrative court, the action submitted to the court generally has a suspensive effect, i.e., the operation of the administrative act is suspended from the day the application is submitted. For example, if a person submits an action against a building permit, the construction of the disputed building is not allowed.

However, Administrative Procedure Law, Sect.185(4), like during the administrative appeal, sets out several exemptions when the contested administrative decision may be executed notwithstanding the appeal to the court. The main exemptions are as follows:

- the administrative act imposes a duty to pay tax, duties or another payment to the State or a local government budget, except penalties;
- it is provided for by other laws, for example, if a person has submitted an appeal against the conditions of the permit for polluting activities after the general deadline of one month for appealing administrative decisions, the appeal will not suspend the operation of the permit;
- the institution, setting out grounds for urgency of execution in respect of the specific matter, has specifically provided in the administrative act that it must be executed immediately; or
- an administrative act of the police, border guard, national guard, fire-fighting service and other officials authorised by law is issued to prevent direct threats to national security, public order, or the life, health or property of individuals;
- the contested administrative decision establishes, amends or terminates an institution's legal relations with a civil servant;
- the contested administrative decision is favourable to the addressee, and this addressee asks for a more favourable decision;
- the contested decision is of a general nature, for example, is addressed to users of some particular facility, or restricts the use of a municipal road;
- the contested administrative act annuls or suspends a licence or other special permit.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

The participants to the court procedure may ask the court for the provisional protection (injunctive relief):

- if the appeal has had a suspensive effect, the addressee of the contested decision may ask the court to resume the enforcement (the execution) of the decision, for example, to allow to begin the construction works or the operation of the power plant;
- if the appeal has not had a suspensive effect, the person submitting an action against the decision may ask the court to suspend the operation of the contested decision.

In either of the above-mentioned cases, the court will decide the provisional protection, considering both the lawfulness of the decision (in a rapid manner, without any prejudice to the final judgment) and possible damage to the interests involved.

If there is a reason to believe that the contested administrative decision or consequences of the non-issue of an administrative decision (omission) might cause significant harm or damage, the prevention or compensation of which would be considerably encumbered or would require incommensurate resources, and if examination of information at the disposal of the court reveals that the contested decision is _prima facie_ illegal, the court may, pursuant to the reasoned request of an applicant, take a decision on injunctive relief. As a means of injunctive relief, the court may issue:

- a court decision which, pending judgment of the court, substitutes the requested administrative decision or actual measures of the institution, a court decision which imposes a duty on the relevant institution to carry out a specific action within a specified time period or prohibits a specific action, a court decision which assigns the Land Register to register restrictions on the owner's right of disposal with real property.

The participants to the proceedings may request injunctive relief at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance, when they consider the provisional protection urgently needed. No formal deadlines are applied. The exercising of the rights to request a provisional protection may not, in itself, cause any unfavourable consequences, including those falling under the private law. This means that the person will not be liable for financial loss caused to another person by the court's decision.

The participant to the proceedings requesting provisional protection (injunctive relief) must pay a deposit payment to the State budget in the amount of 15 EUR defined by law. A natural person may ask the court to relieve him/her from paying the deposit fully or partially. The deposit payment is returned if the request for provisional protection is successful.

The court's decision regarding injunctive relief can be appealed. Also, the participant to the proceedings may request to replace or to revoke the imposed injunctive relief.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Administrative procedures in administrative institutions are free of charge.

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he/she should take account of state fees. Both in administrative and court procedures the person to have to cover his/her own expenses:

- remuneration to a representative or legal advisor (if the person has involved any); if the administrative institution (or the court subsequently) finds that the person (addressee of the decision, natural person only) is in a difficult financial situation and that the particular administrative matter is complicated, it may decide that remuneration to a representative of this person, within regulated frameworks, will be paid from the State budget.
- payment to private experts (if the person has involved any on his/her own initiative); the State budget will cover the remuneration paid only to experts assigned by the court's decision; the participant to the proceedings also bears his/her own expenses related to obtaining or producing any of other evidence (copying, requesting from institutions etc.) if obtained by the participant himself/herself.
- State fees. When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a state fee in the amount of 30 EUR. The state fee for the appeal of the first court instance's judgment is 60 EUR. A deposit payment for submitting a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is 70 EUR. The deposit payment for requesting injunctive relief or to ancillary complaints on procedural decisions is 15 EUR. The deposit payment for matters de novo in connection with newly-discovered facts is 15 EUR.

The amount of the state fee is the same for all categories of administrative cases. An exemption exists for asylum seeker cases which are free of charge.

The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of the fee or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the fee.

Administrative Procedure Law does not prescribe any other fees or deposit payments.

Expenses related to legal aid or expert examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.

In the judgment, the court will order a reimbursement of the state fee: if the appeal against the administrative decision or omission has been fully or partially successful, the court will order the defendant (the State or municipality thereof) to reimburse the state fee to the claimant; if the appeal is not successful, the claimant will not recover the state fee paid. The same principle applies to deposit payments: the claimant will get back the deposit payment if his/her cassation complaint (or request for injunctive relief, ancillary complaint or de novo review) is successful.
The court’s decision on the reimbursement of expenses does not cover other kinds of expenses. Thus, any other expenses, except state fees and deposit payments, incurred to the participants, are not recovered. But, if the appeal against the administrative decision is successful, the claimant may subsequently claim to recover all damages caused by the unlawful decision from the defendant, and this may include previous payments to legal advisors or experts.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?
Only a deposit payment of 15 EUR applies and must be paid to the State budget. It is reimbursed if the request for interim measures/injunctive relief is successful and the court has decided in favour or the participant requesting the measures.

There is no system applied for financial deposits as guarantees for other participants to the proceedings for any losses incurred due to the provisional measures.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
A natural person contesting an administrative decision to a superior administrative authority may ask the administrative authority to pay the remuneration to his/her representative. If the authority finds that the person (addressee of the decision, natural person only) is in a difficult financial situation and that the particular administrative matter is complicated, it may decide that remuneration to a representative of this person, within regulated frameworks, should be paid from the budget of this administrative authority.

If a natural person lodges an appeal to the administrative court, he/she may ask:
for a decrease in the amount of the state fee or exemption from the obligation to pay the fee. The court will take into account this person’s financial situation; for state legal aid to be arranged. The court may decide to grant state legal aid to a natural person in difficult financial situation if the particular administrative matter is complicated. The practical arrangements (assignment of the particular lawyer, amounts and kinds of legal aid, remuneration) are administered by Court Administration.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?
No state legal aid is available for legal persons.
It is sometimes possible, on an individual basis, to receive pro bono legal assistance in administrative matters. For example, if the outcome of the case or the interpretation of the legal provisions could be significant, the lawyers are sometimes ready to provide legal advice free of charge. Law firms and lawyers can be contacted individually (see also above 1.6.1.1.).

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
There is no financial mechanism provided by the state on regular or systemic basis but there has been support available on a project basis, for example, the Environmental Protection Fund [31] and the Society Integration Foundation. [32] In recent years, however, the former has not been available to address environmental cases through legal remedies.

6) Does the “loser pays” principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?
The “loser pays” principle only partially applies. In the judgment, the court will order a reimbursement of the state fee in successful applications of the applicant: if the appeal against the administrative decision or omission is fully or partially successful, the court will order the defendant (the State or municipality thereof) to reimburse state fee to the claimant; if the appeal is not successful, the claimant will not need to reimburse the state fee paid. The same principle applies to deposit payments: the claimant will get back the deposit payment if his/her cassation complaint (or request for injunctive relief, ancillary complaint or de novo review) is successful.
The court’s decision on the reimbursement of expenses does not cover other kinds of expenses. Thus, any other expenses, except state fees and deposit payments, incurred to the participants, are not recovered. But, if the appeal against the administrative decision is successful, the claimant may subsequently claim to recover all damages caused by the unlawful decision from the defendant, and this may include previous payments to legal advisor or experts.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?
The court may decrease the amount of the state fee or exempt a natural person from the obligation to pay the fee. The court will take into account this person’s financial situation. The participant to the proceedings must bear his/her own other procedural expenses (for obtaining evidence, obtaining private expert opinions etc. according to his/her own willingness to submit such evidence).

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?
The Internet site of the State Environmental Bureau provides general information about EIA procedure, as well as detailed information on all on-going and past EIA procedures. However, there is no information about access to justice rules.
The Internet portal to the judiciary provides information on administrative and civil litigation and criminal procedure.

A free online database of national legislation is available here. However, there is no specific information disseminated through official webpages of the authorities that reflects the rules on environmental access to justice.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?
There are no particular rules on providing information about access to justice in environmental procedures. Every written administrative decisions and court decisions or judgments must include a precise indication of a procedure of appeal to a superior administrative authority or to the court.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?
Regarding IPPC/IED procedure, Cabinet Regulation No. 1082 (30.11.2010), Sect.71.6 provides for the obligation of the operator to include information on contesting the permit for polluting activities in the notice to the public.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?
Every written administrative decision and court decision or judgment must include a precise indication of a procedure of appeal to a superior administrative authority or to the court. The deadline for appealing an administrative decision extends from one month to one year if this rule is not observed.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
The language of administrative authorities and courts is Latvian.
Administrative authorities accept documents in Latvian, with the exemption of documents received from foreign countries. In all other occasions, documents in foreign languages must be translated into Latvian to submit them to administrative authorities. Persons may address authorities in foreign language in the event of an emergency (police, medical emergency etc.).

Participants to court proceedings lacking fluency in the official language can participate in proceedings with the aid of an interpreter. The court provides an interpreter, paid by the government, for natural persons or their representatives in order to get acquainted with documents of the case and for the participation in the hearings. The court, at its own discretion, may provide an interpreter also for a legal person.
Procedures of environmental impact assessment (EIA) are regulated by the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment and by Cabinet regulations issued in accordance with this law.

An EIA screening decision declaring that an EIA is necessary can be contested to a superior administrative authority and, subsequently, appealed to the court by the person planning to perform the intended activity. The general time limits for administrative and judicial appeal apply (one month).

An EIA screening decision declaring than an EIA is unnecessary cannot be contested to a superior administrative authority or appealed immediately to the court, but may be examined within the reviewing of the final decision authorizing the intended project (for example, the construction permit). [33] In this case, any person alleging an infringement of the rights to environmental information or to the rights to participate in environmental decision-making, or alleging an infringement of the environmental law, may contest and appeal the decision. This means that actio popularis (the right to access the court for the protection of general environmental interests) applies. For example, if a person argues that because of the lack of the EIA the public was unjustifiably precluded from participating, or substantial environmental norms are allegedly broken, this person may contest the construction permit for a municipality road.

During the environmental impact assessment (EIA) procedure, any person may submit a complaint to a competent administrative authority (Environmental State Bureau) against the person planning to undertake the intended activity if this person ignores or infringes the right of the public to environmental information or public participation. If the decision of the competent authority does not satisfy the person, he/she may submit a complaint to the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development.

EIA scoping decisions and the competent authority's reasoned opinion regarding an EIA report cannot be contested to a superior administrative authority or appealed to the court directly and immediately. The final authorization (accepts) of the development may be appealed and, within this framework, a court is free to examine objections against the EIA procedure, report and competent authority's statement on the EIA report.

The public can challenge final decisions authorizing the intended activity. As a final authorization is taken by a municipality (in some cases by the Government), and there is no superior authority, it can be appealed to the administrative court. The time limit for judicial appeal is one month from the notification. If a person is not an addressee of the decision and has not been involved in administrative procedure, the time limit for this person is either one month from the notification of the addressee (in the case of construction permits) or one month from the moment a person obtained the information about the authorization but no later than one year after the act came into force. The procedure and time limits must be clarified in the decision.

A person can challenge the final authorization of the intended activity, and complain also about all procedural and material infringements, including EIA screening and scoping decisions, and final EIA decision. Actio popularis applies, this means any person (natural or legal) may lodge a complaint. For procedure, see 1.8.1.3.

The court will revise both procedural and substantive legality of EIA decisions:

- whether the essential procedural rules are followed in relation to persons affected and persons having an interest in environmental issues, with special emphasis on the access to the environmental information and rights to participate in the decision-making, including the possibility to submit information, to express views and proposals, and sufficiently serious attitude of the institution towards those views and proposals;
- whether EIA has been conducted in a way which provides a sufficient possibility to gather all the relevant information on the possible impact of the intended activity to the environment;
- whether the final EIA decision is based on correct findings and whether it lays down sufficient and clear written reasons. Expert opinions may be used as an evidence to clarify scientific and technical issues.

In administrative cases, the court has full jurisdiction over factual and legal issues. This means that the court may review any question of facts or law. The court cannot decide and declare its own statements about the impact of the intended activity instead of the administrative institution; however, the court can find factual errors and consideration errors which have led, or may have led, to an erroneous final decision. Such findings may lead to an annulment of the final authorization of the intended activity.

In environmental cases initiated by an applicant based on an actio popularis approach (in order to defend public interests in environmental protection) the scope of a court review has been limited by the Supreme Court in its judgment delivered in 2018. The Court stated that for assessing a complaint that has been submitted to protect the environment, the legality of a decision (construction permit) must be assessed focusing only on the existence of a threat to the environment or a possible breach of the requirements of environmental legislation that might be directly linked to the development under the dispute, rather than any facts or illegality a claimant might refer to. [34] Accordingly, this statement of the Supreme Court indicates that the scope of review for appeals based on environmental exception clause might be restricted to the infringement of legal provisions that are related to the environment. This applies to both procedural and substantive issues.

The administrative procedure is conducted in accordance with the inquisitorial principle or the principle of investigation, i.e., the court may gather evidence and make relevant legal considerations on its own motion. But it is the responsibility of the applicant to identify the contested administrative decision and to state reasons for challenging this decision. The administrative court examines the case strictly within the boundaries set by the applicant. The court may not alter the claim or examine decisions not appealed in written form by the applicant on its own motion.

If an EIA has been carried out: the public can challenge the final decision authorizing the intended activity. See 1.8.1.3. for procedure. The procedure and time limits must be clarified in the decision.

If an EIA has not been required: a final administrative decision allowing the activity can be contested according to the general rules, taking into account which authority has given the permit and whether there is a superior administrative authority (see 1.3.4. for more detailed information).

When lodging an administrative complaint or a judicial appeal to the court, a person may contest any procedural or material infringements of law, including any omissions during EIA procedure and issuing of the final authorization.

Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

A person must exhaust an administrative review procedure lodging his/her complaint to a superior administrative authority if one exists (pre-trial stage). The administrative appeal is mandatory before appealing to the court.

If the final authorization has been made by a local authority, i.e., the council of local government, there is usually no superior administrative authority and the appeal must be lodged directly before the Administrative district court. The same applies where the final authorization is given by the Cabinet of Ministers. In other cases, a superior administrative authority exists and a mandatory pre-trial appeal must be made to a superior administrative authority.
It is not a prerequisite for a court action in administrative court. [35]

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
The principle of procedural fairness is recognised as a general principle of law and a prerequisite of fair trial. It is mentioned, inter alia, as one of the general principles applied in administrative authorities and administrative courts according to the Administrative Procedure Law. As explained in Art.14.1 of the Administrative Procedure Law, an administrative authority and the court issuing decisions are impartial and must give proper opportunities to every participant to proceedings to explain their opinion and to submit evidence.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
As in other administrative law sectors, every administrative authority must observe time limits set in the law for taking decisions, unless otherwise regulated in special norms.
The Law on Environmental Impact Assessment does not provide for different time limits for administrative review procedure if persons have contested a decision authorizing the intended activity. This means that a superior administrative authority must deliver a decision within one month from receiving the administrative appeal from the person. In urgent cases, the person may request the institution to issue the decision immediately. Due to objective reasons, the authority may extend the time limit for a period not exceeding four months. If there are objective difficulties in clarifying factual circumstances, the time limits may be extended for up to one year. The decision of the superior authority to extend the time limit may be appealed to the court.
If there is a delay in delivering the decision of the superior authority, there are no immediate sanctions possible against the authority. However, the person is then allowed to lodge his/her appeal in the main matter immediately to the administrative court without waiting for a written response from the administrative authority.
There are no time limits set for hearing the case at the court. Cases are administered according to the case load of the specific court. Environmental matters and, specifically, EIA matters are not an exceptional category and are reviewed in consecutive order. Injunctive relief is decided according to the urgency, but no later than within a month after a proper application has been received at the court.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
As a general rule, when an appeal is submitted to a superior administrative institution or to the administrative court, it has a suspensive effect on the appealed decision. I.e., it is forbidden to begin operation of the intended activity, to begin construction works, or to issue new decisions based on the contested one. The law On Environmental Impact Assessment does not provide any exemptions to this. A person who wants to begin the intended (now suspended) activity has a right to ask the court for a summary of the operational force of the decision. The court will decide the provisional protection, considering both the lawfulness of the decision (in a rapid manner, without any prejudice to the final judgment) and possible damage to the interests involved, including environmental. [36] The participants to the proceedings may request injunctive relief at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance, if they consider that provisional protection is urgently needed. No formal deadlines are applied. The exercising of the rights to request provisional protection may not cause, in itself, any unfavourable consequences, including those falling under the private law. This means that the person will not be liable for financial loss caused to another person by the court’s decision.
The participant to the proceedings requesting provisional protection (injunctive relief) must pay a deposit payment to the State budget, in the amount of 15 EUR defined by law. A natural person may ask the court to relieve him/her from paying the deposit fully or partially. The deposit payment is returned if the request for provisional protection is successful.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
Procedures for granting permits for pollutants activities, or for substantial changes in the conditions of those polluting activities, are regulated by the law On Pollution and Cabinet regulations issued in accordance with this law.
Procedures for granting permits for pollutants activities are regulated and conducted separately from the environmental impact assessment (EIA). If the EIA is necessary for the intended polluting activities, the operator must itself initiate the EIA procedure and submit the findings of the EIA to the administrative authority competent for issuing permits for polluting activities, the State Environmental Service. Requirements for informing and involving the public are integrated into both EIA procedure and decision-making on environmental permits.
The Law on Pollution regulates publication of information about intended polluting activities (initiated procedures), the involvement of the public in the decision-making, and publication of the information about granted permits. Information is publicly available on the Internet site of the State Environmental Service.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
The law On Pollution provides rules for contesting administrative decisions and appealing them to the administrative court. According to those rules, persons may contest decisions regarding Category A or B permits for polluting activities, or decisions to change conditions of the polluting activities; submit a complaint if the right to public participation and the right to environmental information have been ignored; in cases of possible substantially negative impact, contest the conditions of the permit during all the period while the permit is in effect. The final administrative decision can be appealed to the administrative court.
Actio popularis (a right of access to justice in public interests) exists in environmental matters, and this also includes sectoral regulation of permits for polluting activities, if not regulated otherwise in specific occasions. This means that persons have access to administrative authorities and the court not only to protect their own individual interests, but also to protect general interests of environmental protection. According to Environmental Protection Law and the case-law of the Supreme Court, those rights are recognised both to natural and legal persons, and even interest groups (unregistered associations of persons). Legal persons may include any kind of non-governmental organization, commercial entities and even political parties. There are no specific conditions for non-governmental organizations to have a right to go to the court.
There is no requirement to identify an individual infringement to contest the decisions in relation to Category A or B permits for polluting activities, to submit a complaint if the right to public participation and the right to environmental information have been ignored, or to contest the conditions of the permit during all the period while the permit is in effect. This means, the contesting can be based on public interests of environmental protection.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There is no screening decision phase during the procedure for granting a permit for polluting activities since EIA is a separate procedure.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There is no scoping decision phase during the procedure for granting a permit for polluting activities since EIA is a separate procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
The law On Pollution provides rules for contesting administrative decisions to a functionally superior administrative authority, the Environmental State Bureau, and appealing them to the administrative court.
According to those rules, during the permit procedure, persons may submit a complaint if the right to public participation and the right to environmental information have been ignored. This is an immediate measure to rectify errors in public participation or dissemination of information. Persons may contest final decisions regarding Category A or B permits for polluting activities, or decisions to change conditions of the polluting activities. In this case, a complaint to a functionally superior administrative authority, the Environmental State Bureau, must be submitted within a month from the notification.

A specific mechanism exists for persons to contest conditions of the permit even beyond the regular appeal measures against a permit. If the permit allows for polluting activities which might have substantially negative impact on human health or the environment, or the environmental quality objectives, persons may contest the conditions of the permit during all the period while the permit is in effect. If a person is not satisfied with the decision of the superior administrative authority, he/she may appeal the decision to the administrative court within a month from the notification.

Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
Yes, see above 1.8.2.5.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
The court will revise both the procedural and substantive legality of a permit granted for polluting activities:
whether the essential procedural rules are followed in relation to persons affected and persons having an interest in environmental issues, with special emphasis on the access to the environmental information and rights to participate in the decision-making, including the possibility to submit information, to express views and proposals, and sufficiently serious attitude of the administrative authority towards those views and proposals, whether the permit procedure has been conducted in a way which provides a sufficient possibility to gather all the relevant information for assessment of the intended polluting activity and necessary conditions, whether the final decision on granting the permit is based on correct findings and whether it lays down sufficient and clear written reasons. Expert opinions may be used as evidence to clarify scientific and technical issues.

In administrative cases, the court has full jurisdiction over factual and legal issues. This means that the court may review any question of facts or law. The court is free to verify the facts justifying the issuance of the permit, for example, the court may verify data on the planned industrial activity, characteristics of the facilities, and data on existing environmental conditions. The court cannot decide and declare its own statements about the impact of the intended activity instead of the administrative institution; however, the court can find factual errors and consider errors which have led, or may have led, to an erroneous final decision. Such findings may lead to an annulment of the final authorization of the intended activity.

In environmental cases initiated by an applicant based on an actio popularis approach (in order to defend public interests in environmental protection), the scope of a court review has been limited by the Supreme Court in its judgment delivered in 2018. The Court has stated that to assess a complaint that has been submitted to protect the environment, the legality of a decision (construction permit) must be assessed focusing only on the existence of a threat to the environment or a possible breach of the requirements of environmental legislation that might be directly linked to the development under the dispute, rather than any facts or illegality a claimant might refer to. Accordingly, this statement of the Supreme Court indicates that the scope of review for appeals based on environmental exception clause might be restricted to the infringement of legal provisions that are related to the environment. This applies to both procedural and substantive issues.

It is worth noting that the stage of the environmental permit is viewed as a separate procedure rather than an integral part of EIA and a final decision – acceptance of a development – within it. Thus, if one has missed or lost a lawsuit on the effects of a project assessed during the EIA, it will not be reconsidered during the dispute on environmental permit (which usually take place after an installation/plant/farm/other structure has been built). In accordance with the recent practice of the administrative court, the same would be true with respect to the stage of a construction permit, if there is a court decision on the competent authority’s decision to accept a development following the EIA procedure.

The administrative procedure is conducted in accordance with the inquisitorial principle or the principle of investigation, i.e., the court may gather evidence (including expert opinions) and make relevant legal considerations on its own motion. But it is the responsibility of the applicant to identify the contested administrative decision and to state reasons for challenging this decision. The administrative court examines the case strictly within the boundaries set by the applicant. The court may not alter the claim or examine decisions not appealed in written form by the applicant on its own motion.

At what stage are these challengeable?
As a general rule, the administrative court will review final decisions of any particular procedure. This means that all the alleged procedural or substantial violations of law will be reviewed within the proceedings regarding this final decision. Since EIA is a separate procedure and is followed by separate final authorization, the review of the final decision of IPPC/EID (permit) does not involve the review of EIA and its respective decision. However, as is explained above in 1.8.2.5., the sectoral regulation on permit procedures for polluting activities provides also for the possibility to contest and, subsequently, to appeal to the court conditions of the permit during the entire period while the permit is in effect. Such recourse to a superior administrative authority and the court is allowed if the permit allows for polluting activities which might have a substantially negative impact on human health or the environment, or environmental quality objectives etc.

Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
There is a mandatory pre-trial appeal to the Environmental State Bureau.

In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
It is not a prerequisite for a court action in the administrative court.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
The principle of procedural fairness is recognised as a general principle of law and a prerequisite of a fair trial. It is mentioned, inter alia, as one of the general principles applied in administrative authorities and administrative courts according to the Administrative Procedure Law. As explained in Art.14.1 of the Administrative Procedure Law, an administrative authority and the court issuing decisions are impartial and give proper opportunities to every participant to a proceedings to explain their opinion and to submit evidence.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
As in other administrative law sectors, administrative authorities must observe time limits set in the law for taking decisions, i.e. one month as a general term. The law On Pollution does not provide for different time limits. In the case of an administrative appeal against a permit for polluting activities, a superior administrative authority must deliver its decision within one month from the receiving of the appeal of the person. In urgent cases, the person may request the institution to issue the decision immediately. According to Administrative Procedure Law, due to objective reasons, the authority may extend the time limit for a period not exceeding four months. If there are objective difficulties in clarifying factual circumstances, the time limits may be extended for up to one year. The decision of the superior authority to extend the time limit may be appealed to the court.
If there is a delay in delivering the decision of the superior authority, there are no immediate sanctions possible against the authority. However, the person is then allowed to lodge his/her appeal in the main matter immediately to the administrative court without waiting for a written response from the administrative authority.

There are no time limits set for hearing the case at the court. Cases are administered according to the case load of the specific court. Environmental matters are not an exceptional category and are reviewed in consecutive order. Injunctive relief is decided according to the urgency, but no later than within a month after a proper application has been received at the court.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

As a general rule, when an appeal is submitted to a superior administrative institution or to the administrative court, it has a suspensive effect on the appealed decision. I.e., it is forbidden to begin operation of the intended activity, to begin construction works, or to issue new decisions based on the contested one.

The law On Pollution provides for a possibility for the Environmental State Bureau to decide not to suspend the operation of the permit if the suspension could cause a substantively negative effect on the environment.

Also, there is an exemption regarding polluting activities requiring a category A or B permit. According to the Law on Pollution, any person can submit an appeal regarding the conditions of the permit at any time while the relevant permit is in effect. This kind of appeal is allowed when the polluting activity may substantially negatively affect human health or the environment, or the environmental quality objectives specified in environmental law, or other requirements of normative acts. In this case, the appeal of the decision will not suspend the on-going operation of the permit.

Regarding the suspensive effect of an appeal to the court, the law On Pollution states that the appeal does not have a suspensive effect on the decision of a superior authority, the State Environmental Bureau.

Persons appealing the permit to the court may ask the court to suspend the operational effect of the decision if there has been no suspensive effect on its operation. On the other hand, the operator may ask the court for an injunctive relief if the operation of the activity has not been granted or fully granted by the decision of the superior administrative authority. The court will decide the provisional protection, considering both the lawfulness of the decision (in a rapid manner, without any prejudice to the final judgment) and possible damage to the interests involved, including environmental.

The participants to the proceedings may request the injunctive relief at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance, when they consider the provisional protection urgently needed. No formal deadlines are applied. Exercising the rights to request a provisional protection may not, in itself, cause any unfavourable consequences, including those falling under the private law. This means that the person will not be liable for financial loss caused to another person by the court’s decision.

The participant to the proceedings requesting provisional protection (injunctive relief) must pay a deposit payment to the State budget, in the amount of 15 EUR defined by law. A natural person may ask the court to relieve him/her from paying the deposit fully or partially. The deposit payment is returned if the request for provisional protection is successful.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

The Internet site of the State Environmental Bureau provides general information about the procedure of issuing permits for polluting activities, as well as detailed information on all issued A and B category permits.

The Internet portal to the judiciary provides information on administrative and civil litigation and criminal procedure. A free online database of national legislation is available here.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

If a person considers that any other private individual or legal person causes environmental damage or an imminent threat of such damage, she/he can act in the following ways:

- if the respective activity causing environmental damage or imminent threat of damage is carried out in accordance with the decision of an administrative authority, the person can appeal the decision to a superior administrative authority and, subsequently, to the administrative court, or,
- submit an application to the administrative authority competent to protect the environment and to enforce appropriate actions to interrupt damage to the environment. If the competent administrative authority refuses to act, its decisions or omissions can be appealed to a superior administrative authority and, subsequently, to the administrative court.

In this case, the person may require the court to oblige the competent administrative authority to take a decision aimed at the protection of environment. For example, if an individual has unlawfully, without a prior permit, built a road in the protected natural area, the person may require the competent administrative authority to oblige the person responsible to tear down the construction, to restore the previous situation and to compensate material damage caused to the environment.

A person can submit his/her complaint to the administrative authority both in written and in oral form. Oral complaints will be immediately written down by the civil servant of the institution. Written complaints and appeals, signed electronically, can be sent also by e-mail.

If the person is not satisfied with the decision or omission of the competent institution, he/she can appeal it to a superior administrative authority. Generally, the decisions of regional environmental boards can be appealed to a superior administrative authority, which is the State Environmental Bureau. The appeal should be submitted to the authority that has issued (or had an obligation to issue) the decision concerning the original complaint. The appeal will be forwarded for examination to a superior authority. An appeal to a superior administrative authority is mandatory before going to the administrative court.

If the appeal to the administrative court is justified with environmental interest, it is sufficient to have standing in the court. (see 1.4.1. for more detailed information on legal standing). The written appeal stating the objections should be submitted to the Administrative district court, with all available evidence attached.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

General deadlines apply: one month for each administrative and judicial appeal.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

According to Sect.30(2) of the Environmental Protection Law, the application or appeal should include information, as precise as possible, on the alleged environmental damage.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no special legal requirements regarding “plausibility” of the allegations. Any evidence and data will increase the possibility to scrutinize the facts.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
General time limits for responding to any administrative appeal apply, i.e., one month; although the competent authority must respond or take respective measures as fast as possible according to the Sect.30(3) of the Environmental Protection Law.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
The Environmental Protection Law entitles persons in both cases, environmental damage and imminent threat of damage, to submit an application to a competent administrative authority and an appeal to the court.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The State Environmental Service (SES) is the competent authority carrying out the state control of the environment protection and natural resources use. It exercises its duties through 7 territorially situated regional environmental boards and the Radiation Safety Centre. The decisions of the SES can be appealed to functionally higher administrative authority, which is the Environmental State Bureau.

Other administrative authorities are competent within limits of their field or operation, for example local governments are generally responsible for construction permits, which means they are also competent administrative authorities if persons allege environmental damage caused by construction permits.

The State Plant Protection Service (SPPS) is the only competent authority controlling the activities that fall under Annex III of the ELD covering: “Manufacture, use, storage, processing, filling, release into the environment and onsite transport of... plant protection products as defined in Article 2(1) of Council Directive 91/414/EEC of 15 July 1991 concerning the placing of plant protection products on the market.” (Annex III (7) (c)).

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
Pre-trial administrative appeal is mandatory if there is any superior administrative authority except the Cabinet of Ministers.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
According to Law on Judicial Power all persons are equal before the law and the court. Cases are adjudicated irrespective of, among other things, the origin, nationality, language or place of residence of a person. This means that administrative authorities and courts apply the same rules to all persons irrespective of their nationality or place of residence.

Taking into account the existence of cross-border impact of some environmental decisions and some activities having an environmental impact, environmental law provides for pro-active measures aimed at involving foreign states and citizens. Latvia is a participant in the Espoo Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment, and respective obligations are embodied in environmental law.

In the EIA procedure, other countries are notified about the intended activity if the screening decision has identified possible cross-border impact. Notifying takes place before the intended activity is announced to the public in Latvia. Following the notification procedure, foreign citizens and other institutions are given a possibility to submit their opinions if the respective government has announced its intention to participate in the EIA. All procedures are coordinated between competent authorities of the countries involved, with a help of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Competent authorities of the respective foreign countries are consulted during the EIA. The administrative authority deciding on final authorization must consider opinions received from foreign citizens and institutions, as well as the results of inter-institutional consulting.

The procedure for granting permits for polluting activities also contains specific a regulation regarding the cross-border impact of polluting activities. If the information in the application for a permit gives reason to conclude that there will be a cross-border impact, or if the respective foreign country requests information regarding the intended activity, the operator must prepare and submit a translated application and necessary information about the activity to the competent administrative authority which forwards it to the country concerned. It is then the decision of the country concerned whether to organise a public participation procedure regarding the intended activity. The competent administrative authority deciding on the granting of the permit must consider opinions received from the competent authorities and public of the other countries. The competent authority of the country concerned also receives information on granted permits.

The sectoral regulation does not provide for specific rules for the contesting and appealing of environmental decisions involving cross-border issues. General rules for the contesting and appealing decisions apply.

2) Notion of public concerned?
Environmental law does not differentiate between Latvian and other public. It might be concluded that the same broad notion of actio popularis (see above 1.4.1.) applies in both cases. This means that persons have access to administrative authorities and the court to protect general environmental interests. Those rights are recognised both to natural and legal persons, and even interest groups (unregistered associations of persons). Legal persons may include any kind of non-governmental organization, commercial entities and even political parties. To date, there is no confirming case law on this.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Any person, including NGOs, has equal standing to apply to administrative authorities and the court in environmental matters.

General rules to administrative and judicial appeal apply (see above 1.7.1.1. and 1.7.1.5.).

After the mandatory pre-trial appeal to a superior administrative authority, the person may lodge their appeal before the Administrative District Court.

Pro bono assistance is available only when the NGO has arranged it individually on its own initiative. Law firms and lawyers can be contacted individually.

The Latvian branch of the Transparency International Delna provides legal aid for citizens in building and land use matters. Delna are prepared to handle the case in situations when the case is of public importance, i.e., when a substantial damage is caused or may be caused to environment, or when the case could serve as a precedent and contribute to the improvement of law or legal practice.

Foreign NGOs are entitled to the same procedural guarantees as other participants to the administrative and court proceedings, including provisional protection (injunctive relief) (see above 1.7.2.).

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Individuals of the affected country may contest an administrative decision to a superior administrative authority and appeal to the court according to the same provisions as individuals residing in Latvia.

The same procedural rules apply to natural persons as to NGOs (see above 1.8.4.3.).

In addition, there are mechanisms of legal aid for natural persons, although there is no known case law on granting legal aid to foreign nationals in environmental matters. Generally, a natural person contesting an administrative decision to a superior administrative authority may ask the administrative authority for the remuneration to his/her representative. If the authority finds that the person (addressee of the decision, natural person only) is in a difficult financial situation and that the particular administrative matter is complicated, it may decide that remuneration to a representative of this person, within regulated frameworks, should be paid from the budget of this administrative authority.

If a natural person lodges an appeal to the administrative court, he/she may ask:

- for a decrease in the amount of the state fee or exemption from the obligation to pay the fee. The court will take into account this person’s financial situation; for state legal aid to be arranged. The court may decide to grant state legal aid to a natural person in a difficult financial situation if the particular administrative matter is complicated. The practical arrangements (assignment of the particular lawyer, amounts and kinds of legal aid, remuneration) are administered by Court Administration.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
In the EIA procedure, other countries are notified about the intended activity if the screening decision has identified possible cross-border impact. Notification takes place before the intended activity is announced to the public in Latvia. Following the notification procedure, foreign citizens and other institutions are given a possibility to submit their opinions if the respective government has announced its intention to participate in the EIA. The administrative authority deciding on the final authorization must consider opinions received from foreign citizens and institutions.
During the procedure for granting permits for polluting activities, if the information in the application for a permit gives reason to conclude that there will be a cross-border impact, or if the respective foreign country requests information regarding the intended activity, the operator must prepare and submit a translated application and necessary information about the activity to the competent administrative authority which forwards it to the country concerned. The competent authority of the country concerned must be informed at least two months before the final decision is delivered. It is then the decision of the country concerned whether to organise a public participation procedure regarding the intended activity. The competent administrative authority deciding on granting the permit must consider opinions received from the competent authorities and public of the other countries.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
Only the law On Environmental Impact Assessment contains special provisions regarding the duration of public involvement in other countries concerned: the deadline for submitting opinions should be at least 30 days from the day the notification is sent to the competent authority of the country concerned.
If foreign nationals and NGOs participate in administrative and judicial appeal they must meet the same time limits for submitting complaints and appeals, which is generally one month from the notification of the addressee of the decision. For more detailed information see above 1.7.1.5.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
Every written administrative decision and court decision or judgment must include precise indication of a procedure of appeal to a superior administrative authority or to the court.
The Internet site of the Environmental State Bureau provides general information about procedure of issuing permits for polluting activities, as well as detailed information on all issued A and B category permits.
The Internet portal to the judiciary provides information on administrative and civil litigation and criminal procedure. A free online database of national legislation is available here.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
There are no provisions providing for particular language assistance for foreign participants to administrative or court procedures. Both in administrative and judicial appeal procedure, the official language is Latvian. Administrative authorities accept documents in Latvian, with an exemption from documents received from foreign countries. In all other occasions, documents in foreign languages must be translated to Latvian to submit them to administrative authorities. Persons may address authorities in foreign language in the event of an emergency (police, medical emergency etc.). The official language of the court is Latvian, and all the documentation must be submitted in Latvian. Generally, legal persons are not entitled to court interpreters paid by the government. The court, at its own discretion, may provide an interpreter also for a legal person.

9) Any other relevant rules?

[2] E.g. Supreme Court, decision of the of 31.03.2010, case No. SKA-325/2010 (A42938509) applying the notion of „any person" to a political party.
[3] See: Sect.9(4) of the Environmental Protection Law, entitling "any person" and requiring the submission of „substantiated information.”
[4] See seminal case in this respect: Constitutional Court of Latvia, judgment of 19.12.2017, case No. 2017-02-03, against the Regulation of the Cabinet of Ministers to increase the permissible noise level that the Constitutional Court ruled as contradicting the right to a healthy and benevolent environment.
[5] Constitutional Court, judgment of 19.12.2017, case No. 2017-02-03, para. 16. In addition, according to the Constitutional Court (see judgment of 14.02.2003, case No. 2002-14-04, para. 1; judgment of 08.02.2007, case No. 2006-09-03, para. 11) other normative acts detail the right to a benevolent environment embodied in Art.115 of the Constitution: accordingly, a review of the contested legal norms to substantial provisions contained in other normative acts such as Environmental Protection Law, Law on Protective Zones etc., as well as to principles of environmental law. See e.g.: Constitutional Court, judgment of 08.02.2007, case No. 2006-09-03, para. 11 for a reference to Law on Protective Zones and a restriction to construct buildings within protective zones of lakes.
[10] Supreme Court, judgment of 05.03.2015, case No. SKA-22/2015.
[11] See: Sect. 4 on the conditions for a mandatory EIA; Sect.32 on the requirements for a screening procedure.
[13] It is the implementing legislation of ex-IPPC Directive and now IED, thus covering these activities, as well as regulation on greenhouse gas emissions.
[17] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).
[18] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).
[19] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).
[20] Supreme Court, decision of 25.10.2016, case No. SKA-824/2016 (A420241114), taken in joint meeting of all judges (full panel).
[22] Constitutional Court, judgment of 29.11.2007, case No. 2007-10-0102, para. 75.2; judgment of 17.01.2008, case No. 2007-11-03, para. 12, directly applying the Aarhus Convention in assessing legal standing of environmental NGO.
[23] Taking into account the principle embedded in Art. 3(8) of the Aarhus Convention, the Administrative Procedure Law establishes the norm aimed at protecting applicants exercising their rights including environmental procedural rights (See: Sect.4(4) of the Administrative Procedure Law).

[24] Supreme Court, decision of 25.03.2019, case No. SKA-796/2019 (A420358914) referring as well to the judgment of the Supreme Court of 27.06.2018. in case No. SKA-306/2018 (A4201811715).

[25] An approximate assumption, taking into account the situation in 2020. There are no precise terms for reviewing the case; mostly it depends on the complexity of the case and the workload of the court.

[27] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).

[28] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).

[29] Supreme Court, decision of 18.06.2015, case No. SKA-912/2015 (A420237615).

[31] See information: project initiative supporting NGOs

[32] See information on project initiative supporting NGOs

[33] Supreme Court, judgment in case No.SKA-139/2012.

[34] Supreme Court, decision of 25.03.2019, case No. SKA-796/2019 (A420358914) referring as well to the judgment of the Supreme Court of 27.06.2018. in case No. SKA-306/2018 (A4201811715).

[36] For example, Supreme Court, decision of 30.09.2013., case No. SKA-984/13 (A420374412), where environmental interests (threat to environment) was among considerations taken into account.

[37] Supreme Court, decision of 25.03.2019, case No. SKA-796/2019 (A420358914) referring as well to the judgment of the Supreme Court of 27.06.2018. in case No. SKA-306/2018 (A4201811715).

[38] Judgment of the Regional administrative court of 26.06.2018 in case No A420358914, confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of 25.03.2019. in case No SKA-796/2019 (A420358914), para. 5.

[40] See also case C-529/15

[41] Administrative District Court, judgment of 01.07.2014., case No. A42689508. The case was incited by the NGO requesting the action from the competent authority to issue an administrative act to ensure that illegally deposited waste is removed. The Court confirmed this request as well as entitlement of the NGO to request the action.

Last update: 18/12/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD Directives [1]

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives [1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Administrative environmental decisions falling outside the scope of the EIA [2] and IED [3] directives are subject to general administrative procedure rules included in the [Administrative Procedure Law], except where special sectoral rules provide for different regulations.

Regarding standing, as in other environmental law sectors, actio popularis applies. This means that persons have access to administrative authorities and courts not only to protect their own individual interests, but also to protect general environmental interests. According to Environmental Protection Law and the case-law of the Supreme Court, those rights are recognised both to natural and legal persons, and even interest groups (unregistered associations of persons). Legal persons may include any kind of non-governmental organization, commercial entities and even political parties. There are no specific conditions for non-governmental organizations to have a right to go to the court. The only prerequisite for standing is a genuine environmental interest (see 1.4.1. for more detailed information on legal standing).

If the person is not satisfied with the environmental administrative decision of the competent administrative authority, he/she can appeal it to a superior administrative authority within one month after this decision comes into effect. The procedures and time limits for appeal must be stated in the administrative decision, otherwise the addressee of the decision enjoys longer terms (one year) for the appeal. An administrative decision comes into effect at the moment the addressee is notified of it, except when the decision or the law regulates otherwise. The Law on Notification contains detailed rules regarding notifying the addressee in different manners (mail, electronic mail etc.) and rules about when the document is deemed to have been notified.

Persons who are not the direct addressees of the administrative decision but whose rights or legal interests are affected by that decision, may dispute the decision within a one-month period from the day when this person becomes informed of it, but not later than within a one-year period from the day the decision comes into effect.

Important special rules exist regarding construction permits. According to Sect.15(4) of the Construction Law a decision on a construction permit must enter into effect from the moment it has been notified to the addressee, and at this moment the time limit for contesting the construction permit begins, also for other persons, regardless of the moment those third parties acknowledged the existence of the permit. Only if the mandatory rules on informative measures have not been observed properly may the third parties rely on the time limits counting from the moment those persons become informed of the fact that the permit has been issued. The informative measures include making public the decision on a [Construction Information System], and there are also rules on informative measures regarding public discussions and submissions to change the initially proposed building design. In cases regulated by the Cabinet regulations, it is a responsibility of the initiator of the construction to place a construction board on the respective plot of land and to provide information to owners of immovable properties adjacent to the respective plot of land.

The general time limit for appealing administrative decision of a superior administrative authority before the administrative court is one month. If the superior administrative authority has failed to clarify the procedure for appealing its decision, the time limit extends to one year. Also, if the superior administrative authority has not issued its decision at all after the person has filed the complaint regarding a decision or an omission of a lower administrative authority, the person may file his/her appeal before the administrative court within one year after the addressing the superior administrative authority.
2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

A superior administrative authority is entitled to perform a full review of the contested administrative decision including the efficiency of the decision using the discretionary power of administration. The only exemption exists in cases where a superior administrative authority carries out a supervision in a form which includes the review of the legality but does not include a right to review the discretionary decisions on efficiency. The court will revise both procedural and substantive legality of administrative decisions:

whether the essential procedural rules are followed in relation to persons affected and persons having an interest in environmental issues, with special emphasis on the access to the environmental information and rights to participate in the decision-making, including the possibility to submit information, to express views and proposals, and sufficiently serious attitude of the institution towards those views and proposals, whether the administrative procedure has been conducted in a way which provides a sufficient possibility to gather all the relevant information, whether the decision is based on correct findings and whether it lays down sufficient and clear written reasons. Expert opinions may be used as evidence to clarify scientific and technical issues.

In administrative cases, the court has full jurisdiction over factual and legal issues. This means that the court may review any question of facts or law. An exemption exists only where the administrative authority has a discretionary power (for example, where the authority decides on the means and scale of penalty) or has some space for professional evaluation of facts (for example, the evaluation of the results in exams) or risk assessment, but the court must nevertheless check whether all relevant facts have been taken into account and whether all the legal considerations have been properly made by the administrative authority. If the court lacks technical or scientific knowledge, the fact assessment can be done by the support of forensic expertise.

The court cannot replace the decision of an administrative authority or issue a decision itself; however, the court can find factual errors and consideration errors which have led, or may have led, to an erroneous final decision, and to annul unlawful decisions. Also, the court can impose an obligation on the respective administrative authority to issue a decision with a certain operative part or pointing to certain considerations to be taken into account. The court can impose an obligation on the respective administrative authority to carry out certain actual measures or to stop any ongoing activities and measures.

In environmental cases initiated by an applicant based on an actio popularis approach (in order to defend public interests in environmental protection) the scope of a court review has been limited by the Supreme Court in its judgment delivered in 2018. The Court stated that to assess a complaint that has been submitted to protect the environment, the legality of a decision (construction permit) must be assessed focusing only on the existence of a threat to the environment or a possible breach of the requirements of environmental legislation that might be directly linked to the development under the dispute, rather than any facts or illegality a claimant might refer to.[4] Accordingly, this statement of the Supreme Court indicates that the scope of review for appeals based on environmental exception clause might be restricted to the infringement of legal provisions that are related to the environment. This applies to both procedural and substantive issues.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Generally, it is not possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court. As a general rule, an administrative act, actual measures or omission are subject to appeal to a superior administrative authority, which is a mandatory pre-trial stage. Exemptions exist only where there is no superior authority or the superior authority is the Cabinet of Ministers, then a person has a choice to appeal the decision to the same administrative authority or to submit the application directly to the administrative court.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

It is not a prerequisite for a court action in the administrative court. [5]

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

As is explained in 2.1.2., an exemption to a full review only exists where the administrative authority has a discretionary power (for example, where the authority decides on the means and scale of the penalty) or has some scope for professional evaluation of facts (for example, the evaluation of the results in exams) or risk assessment, but the court must nevertheless check whether all relevant facts have been taken into account and whether all the legal considerations have been properly made by the administrative authority, as far as it concerns environmental interests.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

The principle of procedural fairness is recognised as a general principle of law and a prerequisite of fair trial. It is mentioned, inter alia, as one of the general principles applied in administrative authorities and administrative courts according to the Administrative Procedure Law. As explained in Art.14.1 of the Administrative Procedure Law, an administrative authority and the court issuing decisions are impartial and give proper opportunities to every participant to proceedings to explain their opinion and to submit evidence.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

As in other administrative law sectors, administrative authorities must observe time limits set in the law for taking decisions, i.e. one month as a general term. Specific provisions may exist in sectoral regulations.

In case of an administrative appeal against environmental decision, a superior administrative authority must deliver its decision within one month from the receipt of the appeal of the person. In urgent cases, the person may request the institution to issue the decision immediately. According to Administrative Procedure Law, due to objective reasons, the authority may extend the time limit for a period not exceeding four months. If there are objective difficulties in clarifying factual circumstances, the time limits may be extended for up to one year. The decision of the superior authority to extend the time limit may be appealed to the court.

If there is a delay in delivering the decision of the superior authority, there are no immediate sanctions possible against the authority. However, the person is then allowed to lodge his/her appeal in the main matter immediately to the administrative court without waiting for a written response from the administrative authority.

There are no time limits set for hearing the case at the court. Cases are administered according to the case load of a specific court. Environmental matters are not an exceptional category and are reviewed in consecutive order. Injunctive relief is decided according to the urgency, but no later than within a month after a proper application has been received at the court.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

As a general rule, when an appeal is submitted to a superior administrative institution or to the administrative court against any administrative decision, it has a suspensive effect on the appealed decision. I.e., it is forbidden to begin operation of the intended activity, to begin construction works, or to issue new decisions based on the contested one.

The same general rule applies to the appeal to the court (see above 1.7.2. for more detailed explanation of suspensive effect and exemptions to this).

Persons appealing an administrative decision to the court may ask the court to suspend the operational effect of the decision if there has been no suspensive effect on its operation. On the other hand, the addressee of the decision (for example, a person carrying out environmentally hazardous activity) may ask the court for an injunctive relief if the operation of the decision has not been granted or fully granted by the decision of the superior administrative authority. The court will decide the provisional protection, considering both the lawfulness of the decision (in a rapid manner, without any prejudice to the final judgment) and possible damage to the interests involved, including environmental.

The participants to the proceedings may request the provisional protection at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance, when they consider that provisional protection is urgently needed. No formal deadlines are applied. The exercising of the rights to request provisional protection may not cause, in itself, any unfavourable consequences, including those falling under the private law. This means that the person will not be liable for financial loss caused to another person by the court's decision.

The participant to the proceedings requesting provisional protection (injunctive relief) must pay a deposit payment to the State budget, the amount 15 EUR defined by law. A natural person may ask the court to relieve him/her from the paying of deposit fully or partially. The deposit payment is returned if the request for provisional protection is successful.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of administrative appeal procedures apply.

Administrative procedures in administrative institutions are free of charge.

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he/she should take account of state fees.

If submitting an appeal to the first instance in administrative court, the applicant should pay a state fee in the amount of 30 EUR. The state fee for the appeal of the first court instance’s judgment is 60 EUR. A deposit payment for submitting a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is 70 EUR. The deposit payment for requesting injunctive relief or to ancillary complaints on procedural decisions is 15 EUR. The deposit payment for matters de novo in connection with newly-discovered facts is 15 EUR. The amount of the state fee is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of the fee or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the fee.

Administrative Procedure Law does not prescribe any other fees or deposit payments.

Both in administrative and court procedures, the person has to cover his/her own expenses: remuneration to a representative or legal advisor (if the person has involved any); payment to private experts (if the person has involved any on his/her own initiative) and his/her own expenses related to obtaining or producing of any other evidence (copying, requesting from institutions etc.) if obtained by the participant himself/herself. Expenses related to legal aid or private expert examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.

In the judgment, the court will order a reimbursement of the state fee: if the appeal against the administrative decision or omission is fully or partially successful, the court will order the defendant (the State or municipality thereof) to reimburse the state fee to the claimant; if the appeal is not successful, the claimant will not recover the state fee paid. The same principle applies to deposit payments: the claimant will get back the deposit payment if his/her cassation complaint (or request for injunctive relief, ancillary complaint or de novo review) is successful.

The court’s decision on the reimbursement of expenses does not cover other kinds of expenses. Thus, any other expenses, except state fees and deposit payments, incurred to the participants, are not recovered. But, if the appeal against the administrative decision is successful, the claimant may subsequently claim to recover all damages caused by the unlawful decision from the defendant, and this may include previous payments to legal advisor or experts. Accordingly, the overall process at both levels (public authority and administrative court) is not expensive with respect to state fees and other statutory payments. The principle protecting an applicant from paying other party expenses (state or municipality) functions as a safeguard against excessive costs. The legislation does not include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[8]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The law [8] on Environmental Impact Assessment stipulates for strategic environmental assessment (SEA) of planning documents concerning the environment if the expected impact of the proposed plan on the environment is substantial. The expected impact of the planning document is considered to be substantial if it is mentioned as such in the Cabinet Regulation (Regulation No. 157 of 23.03.2004.) or is considered to be substantial on an individual basis by the Environmental State Bureau.

The law on Environmental Impact Assessment includes a regulation on involving the public in the decision-making, the obligation to take into account the opinions expressed, and also on informing measures regarding the final decision. Sectoral regulation (for example, the Spatial Development Planning Law) contains specific rules regarding the procedures where final planning, normative or administrative decisions are taken according to the results of the SEA procedure.

The possibilities of contesting and appealing any final plan and decision which is based (or should be based) on the SEA depends on the type of document and its legal status. As a rule, planning documents lacking individual legal settlement are not considered to be administrative acts, and there is no possibility to contest such documents in the administrative court. Planning documents embodied in normative legal acts (regulations, and this is the case also for spatial plans of local government) may be contested in the Constitutional Court only (see 2.5.1. on constitutional complaint for further information). Only decisions having direct legal consequences to individual persons (or individual objects) may be considered to be administrative acts contestable in the administrative court. Detailed spatial plans are the most common planning documents having legal status of a general administrative act and as such involving a possibility to lodge an appeal against it before the administrative court.

If the appeal to the administrative court is allowed, the same rules apply as with other environmental decisions. This means, actio popularis (a right of access to justice in public interests) is applied regarding the standing of a person. This means that persons have access to administrative authorities and court not only to protect their own individual interests, but also to protect general environmental interests.

The same general procedural rules apply to administrative and judicial procedures as in other types of administrative cases (see above 1.3.2). A general one-month time limit applies to both administrative and judicial appeal. The time limit for appealing a detailed spatial plan of the local government is one month from a public notification about the final decision on the adoption of the plan.

In addition, there is a special mechanism, an immediate measure to rectify errors in public participation or dissemination of information during any SEA procedure regardless of the form of the final decision (Sect.26(2) of the law on Environmental Assessment). During the SEA procedure, any person may submit a complaint to a competent administrative authority (Environmental State Bureau) against the person developing the plan, if this person ignores or infringes the right of public to environmental information or public participation. If the decision of the competent authority does not satisfy the person, he/she may submit a complaint to the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development.

The courts apply EU law and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Participants to the procedure can argue their case with references to both the EU law and the CJEU case law, as well as international law (Aarhus Convention, for example). The court is free to use EU law and the CJEU case law as much as it seems possible also on its own motion. Participants can also plead for reference for a preliminary ruling to be submitted to the CJEU.

Taking into account the existence of actio popularis and its broad application in Latvian courts, and also the wide application of the EU law and thorough review of the administrative decisions, the Latvian court system provides for rather effective access to the court in environmental matters. Still, the overall length of court proceedings, especially in the cassation instance court, could be improved.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative court reviewing the lawfulness of the appealed final administrative planning decision will revise both procedural and substantive legality of the final decision involving the SEA:

- whether the essential procedural rules are followed in relation to persons affected and persons having an interest in environmental issues, with special emphasis on the access to the environmental information and rights to participate in the decision-making, including the possibility to submit information, to express views and proposals, and sufficiently serious attitude of the institution towards those views and proposals;
- whether the SEA has been conducted in a way which provides a sufficient possibility to gather all the relevant information on the possible impact of the intended activity to the environment,
- whether the final decision is based on correct findings and whether it lays down sufficient and clear written reasons.

If the planning decision is embodied in a normative act, the Constitutional Court is also competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of the normative act.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Procedures regarding spatial plans.

Sect.27 of the Spatial Development Planning Law specifically addresses the procedure for contesting spatial plans or local plans of the local government. Since such plans are adopted as local governments regulations (normative acts), the competent court in this case is the Constitutional Court. Before lodging a constitutional complaint, a person must address the competent administrative authority, i.e., the ministry responsible for spatial development planning (at the moment – the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development). The appeal must be submitted within two months after the respective regulation comes into effect. After this administrative pre-trial stage, a person can submit a constitutional complaint (i.e., to the Constitutional Court) regarding the conformity of the local government regulations with the norms of superior legal force. A constitutional complaint must be lodged before the Constitutional Court within six months after the respective regulation comes into effect (Sect.19.3(2) of the Constitutional Court Law).

Detailed spatial plans are adopted as administrative acts according to Sect.30 of the Spatial Development Planning Law. In this case, the respective detailed plan may be appealed to the administrative court. Since there is no superior administrative authority for local government, an appeal must be lodged before Administrative district court, and the time limit is one month after the local government has published a notice on the adoption of the plan. The appeal to the administrative court suspends the effect of the detailed plan, but the operative effect can be renewed by injunctive relief. Procedures for contesting plans adopted are as for other normative acts. A person may contest normative acts (other than spatial plans and local plants) in the Constitutional Court. See 2.5.1. for a detailed information on the procedure.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

It is not a prerequisite for a court action in administrative court. In the case of a constitutional complaint, it is worth mentioning that the Constitutional Court has developed autonomous criteria for legal standing, involving a prerequisite of being a participant to planning procedure (see 2.5.1. for a detailed information).

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

In the case of detailed plans: the appeal to the administrative court suspends the effect of the detailed plan, but the operative effect can be renewed by injunctive relief (Sect.30 of Spatial Development Planning Law). A request for injunctive relief may be submitted at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance. No formal deadlines are applied. In case of planning documents adopted in the form of normative acts, for spatial and local plans, the competent ministry receiving administrative appeals (see 2.2.3.a) will decide on the possibility to give operational effect on all or part of the plan according to the appeals received; the operational effect will be renewed if the appeals continue to be considered unfounded (Sect.27 of Spatial Development Planning Law).

no provisional protection exists in the procedure of the Constitutional Court, and this applies to any plan (normative act) contested in the Constitutional Court.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of administrative appeal procedures apply.

Administrative procedures in administrative institutions are free of charge.

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he/she should take account of state fees.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a state fee in the amount of 30 EUR. The state fee for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 60 EUR. A deposit payment for submitting a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is 70 EUR. The deposit payment for requesting injunctive relief or to ancillary complaints on procedural decisions is 15 EUR. The deposit payment for matters de novo in connection with newly-discovered facts is 15 EUR.

The amount of the state fee is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of the fee or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the fee.

The Administrative Procedure Law does not prescribe any other fees or deposit payments.

Both in administrative and court procedures the person has to cover his/her own expenses: remuneration to a representative or legal advisor (if the person has involved any), payment to private experts (if the person has involved any on his/her own initiative) and his/her own expenses related to obtaining or producing of any other evidence (copying, requesting from institutions etc.) if obtained by the participant himself/herself.

Expenses related to the legal aid or private expert examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.
In the case of a constitutional complaint, it is worth mentioning that the Constitutional administrative decision, it has a suspensive effect on the appealed decision (see above 1.7.2. for more detailed explanation of suspensive effect and suspension). As a general rule in administrative procedure, when an appeal is submitted to a superior administrative institution or to the administrative court against any normative act (laws, regulations), the Constitutional Court is competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of the respective sectoral regulation. For example, according to the Spatial Development Planning Law and the respective Cabinet regulations, a detailed spatial plan of the local government might include the proposed development having a substantial impact on the environment, but still relates to the environment; the drafting of the planning document or programme must follow procedural rules incorporated in the respective sectoral regulation. In case of spatial plans involving a possibility to lodge an appeal against it before the administrative court.

In cases where the planning decision is embodied in a normative act, the Constitutional Court is also competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of the normative act (see 2.5.1. for information). Planning documents embodied in normative legal acts (laws, regulations) may be contested in the Constitutional Court only (see 2.5.1 for more detailed information about the procedure). Only decisions having a direct legal effect on individual persons (or individual objects) may be considered to be administrative acts contestable at the administrative court. Detailed spatial plans are the most common planning documents having legal status of a general administrative act and as such involving a possibility to lodge an appeal against it before the administrative court.

If the appeal to the administrative court were allowed, the same rules would apply as with other environmental decisions. This means, actio popularis (a right of access to justice in public interests) is applied regarding the standing of a person, and the same general procedural rules apply for administrative and judicial procedures as in other types of administrative cases (see above 1.3.2). Administrative courts apply EU law and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Participants to the procedure can argue their case with references to both the EU law and the CJEU case law, as well as international law (Aarhus Convention, for example). The court is free to use EU law and the CJEU case law as much as it deems possible also on its own motion. Participants can also plead for a reference for a preliminary ruling to be submitted to the CJEU.

If a plan is adopted in the form of a normative act, the scope of the administrative review is the same as in other administrative cases. The court would revise both procedural and substantive legality of the final decision confirming the planning document. If the planning decision is embodied in a normative act, the Constitutional Court is also competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of the normative act (see 2.5.1. for information).

In general, there should be at least one level appeal to a superior administrative authority as a mandatory pre-trial stage in case of an administrative decision, except where there is no superior administrative authority or where the Cabinet of Ministers is the only superior authority to the given lower authority. Since, usually, the local government would be the authority adopting the plan as an administrative decision (detailed spatial plans), there is no superior administrative authority and an appeal must be submitted directly to administrative court. The administrative authority issuing the decision must state the appeal procedures in the same decision.

In cases where the planning document is adopted as a normative act, a person must exhaust general remedies before the submitting a constitutional complaint. In cases where there are any (for example, contesting an administrative act based on the respective normative act, if this was the case). In case of spatial plans and local plans, a person must address the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development before submitting a constitutional complaint. A constitutional complaint must be lodged before the Constitutional Court within six months after the respective regulation comes into effect.

A constitutional complaint has developed autonomous criteria for legal standing, involving a prerequisite of being a participant to planning procedure (see above 1.7.2. for more detailed explanation of suspensive effect and suspension).
4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The participants to the proceedings may request the provisional protection at any stage of the procedure, also in the appellate court instance and cassation court instance. No formal deadlines are applied.

There is no provisional protection in the Constitutional Court procedure.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

There is no provisional protection in the Constitutional Court procedure.

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of administrative appeal procedures apply if the decision adopting a plan is an administrative act and thus subject to the jurisdiction of administrative courts.

Administrative procedures in administrative institutions are free of charge.

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he/she should take account of state fees.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a state fee in the amount of 30 EUR. The state fee for the appeal of the first court instance’s judgment is 60 EUR. A deposit payment for submitting a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is 70 EUR. The deposit payment for requesting injunctive relief or to ancillary complaints on procedural decisions is 15 EUR. The deposit payment for matters de novo in connection with newly-discovered facts is 15 EUR.

The amount of the state fee is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of the fee or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the fee.

The Administrative Procedure Law does not prescribe any other fees or deposit payments.

Both in administrative and court procedures the person has to cover his/her own expenses: remuneration to a representative or legal advisor (if the has person involved any); payment to private experts (if the person has involved any on his/her own initiative) and his/her own expenses related to obtaining or producing of any other evidence (copying, requesting from institutions etc.) if obtained by the participant himself/herself.

Expenses related to the legal aid or private expert-examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.

In the judgment, the court will order a reimbursement of the state fee: if the appeal against the administrative decision or omission is fully or partially successful, the court will order the defendant (the State or municipality thereof) to reimburse the state fee to the claimant; if the appeal is not successful, the claimant will not recover the state fee paid. The same principle applies to deposit payments: the claimant will get back the deposit payment if his/her cassation complaint (or request for injunctive relief, ancillary complaint or de novo review) is successful.

The court’s decision on the reimbursement of expenses does not cover other kinds of expenses. Thus, any other expenses, except state fees and deposit payments, incurred to the participants, are not recovered. But, if the appeal against the administrative decision is successful, the claimant may subsequently claim to recover all damages caused by the unlawful decision from the defendant, and this may include previous payments to legal advisor or experts.

Regarding the procedure of constitutional complaint, it does not involve state fees.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The possibilities of contesting and appealing any plan or programme having an impact on the environment depend on the type of the planning document and its legal status.

The possibilities of contesting and appealing any final plan and decision having an impact on the environment depend on the type of the planning document and its legal status. As a rule, planning documents lacking individual legal settlement regarding individual person or object (direct effect on a person or an object) are not considered administrative acts, and there is no possibility to contest such documents at the administrative court. Usually, a plan as such will not have such binding nature (direct effect) on any individual. In this case, it is not contestable in any court.[11]

Planning documents embodied in normative legal acts (laws, regulations) may be contested in the Constitutional Court only (see 2.5.1. for a detailed information about the procedure).

Only decisions having direct legal effect on individual persons (or individual objects) may be considered to be administrative acts contestable in the administrative court. Detailed spatial plans are the most common planning documents having legal status of a general administrative act and as such involving a possibility to lodge an appeal against it before the administrative court.

If the appeal to the administrative court were allowed, the same rules would apply as with other environmental decisions. This means, actio popularis (a right of access to justice in public interests) is applied regarding the standing of a person, and the same general procedural rules apply for administrative and judicial procedures as in other types of administrative cases (see above 1.3.2).

Administrative courts apply EU law and the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Participants to the procedure can argue their case with references to both the EU law and the CJEU case law, as well as international law (Aarhus Convention, for example). The court is free to use EU law and the CJEU case law as much as it seems possible also on its own motion. Participants can also plead for the reference for a preliminary ruling to be submitted to the CJEU.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

As explained in 2.4.2., only planning decisions embodied in administrative decisions directly effecting individuals, or into normative acts, are possible to contest in the administrative or the Constitutional Court. Plans and programs lacking direct legal effect (individual or normative) are not possible to challenge in the court.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

If a plan is adopted in the form of an administrative act, the scope of the administrative review is the same as in other administrative cases. The court would revise both procedural and substantive legality of the final decision confirming the planning document.

If the planning decision is embodied in a normative act, the Constitutional Court is also competent to review both the procedural and substantive legality of the normative act (see 2.5.1. for a detailed information).

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
In the case of a constitutional complaint, it is worth mentioning that the Constitutional Court has developed autonomous criteria for legal standing, involving a prerequisite of being a participant to planning procedure (see 2.5.1. for a detailed information).

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

In administrative procedure, an exemption to a full judicial review exists only where the administrative authority has a discretionary power or has some scope for professional evaluation of facts (for example, the evaluation of the results in exams) or risk assessment, but the court must nevertheless check whether all relevant facts have been taken into account and whether all the legal considerations have been properly made by the administrative authority.

It is not clear how far the Constitutional Court will look into considerations of the legislator. As it can be inferred from the judgments of the Constitutional Court, there is a margin of appreciation reserved for the legislator. The Constitutional Court uses opinions of professionals to have an insight into planning considerations.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In the administrative court, the principle of procedural fairness is recognised as a general principle of law and a prerequisite of a fair trial. It is mentioned, inter alia, as one of the general principles applied in administrative fairness and administrative courts according to the Administrative Procedure Law. As explained in Art.14.1 of the Administrative Procedure Law, an administrative authority and the court issuing decisions are impartial and give proper opportunities to every participant to a proceedings to explain their opinion and to submit evidence.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Regarding administrative procedure, administrative authorities must observe time limits set in the law for taking decisions, i.e. one month as a general term.
Specific provisions may exist in sectoral regulations.

In the case of an administrative appeal against an environmental decision, a superior administrative authority must deliver its decision within one month from receiving the appeal of the person. In urgent cases, the person may request the institution to issue the decision immediately. According to Administrative Procedure Law, due to objective reasons, the authority may extend the time limit for a period not exceeding four months. If there are objective difficulties in clarifying factual circumstances, the time limits may be extended for up to one year. The decision of the superior authority to extend the time limit may be appealed to the court.

If there is a delay in delivering the decision of the superior authority, there are no immediate sanctions possible against the authority. However, the person is then allowed to lodge his/her appeal in the main matter immediately to the administrative court without waiting for a written response from the administrative authority.

There are no time limits set for hearing the case at the court. Cases are administered according to the case load of a specific court. Environmental matters are not an exceptional category and are reviewed in consecutive order. Injunctive relief is decided according to the urgency, but no later than within a month after a proper application has been received at the court.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector
apart from the general national provisions?

As a general rule, when an appeal is submitted to a superior administrative institution or to the administrative court against any administrative decision, it has a suspensive effect on the appealed decision (see above 1.7.2. for more detailed explanation of suspensive effect and exemptions to this). Persons appealing an administrative decision to the court may ask the court to suspend the operational effect of the decision in case there has been no suspensive effect on its operation. The court will decide the provisional protection, considering both the lawfulness of the decision and possible damage to the interests involved, including environmental.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

In the case of administrative procedure, general rules of administrative appeal procedures apply.

Administrative procedures in administrative institutions are free of charge.

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he/she should take account of state fees.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a state fee in the amount of 30 EUR. The state fee for the appeal of the first court instance’s judgment is 60 EUR. A deposit payment for submitting a cassation complaint to the Supreme Court is 70 EUR. The deposit payment for requesting injunctive relief or to ancillary complaints on procedural decisions is 15 EUR. The deposit payment for matters de novo in connection with newly-discovered facts is 15 EUR.

The amount of the state fee is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of the fee or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the fee.

Administrative Procedure Law does not prescribe any other fees or deposit payments.

Both in administrative and court procedures the person has to cover his/her own expenses: remuneration to a representative or legal advisor (if the person has involved any); payment to private experts (if the person has involved any on his/her own initiative) and his/her own expenses related to obtaining or producing of any other evidence (copying, requesting from institutions etc.) if obtained by the participant himself/herself.

Expenses related to legal aid or private expert examinations are not regulated and will be dependent mainly on the market situation, the complexity of the case or the factual circumstances examined by experts.

In the judgment, the court will order a reimbursement of the state fee: if the appeal against the administrative decision or omission is fully or partially successful, the court will order the defendant (the State or municipality thereof) to reimburse the state fee to the claimant; if the appeal is not successful, the claimant will not recover the state fee paid. The same principle applies to deposit payments: the claimant will get back the deposit payment if his/her cassation complaint (or request for injunctive relief, ancillary complaint or de novo review) is successful.
The court's decision on the reimbursement of expenses does not cover other kinds of expenses. Thus, any other expenses, except state fees and deposit payments, incurred to the participants, are not recovered. But, if the appeal against the administrative decision is successful, the claimant may subsequently claim to recover all damages caused by the unlawful decision from the defendant, and this may include previous payments to legal advisor or experts.

A constitutional complaint procedure does not involve state fees.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[13]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Normative legal acts or legislative acts (legislation) implementing EU environmental legislation usually take the form of laws enacted by the Parliament (the Saeima) or Cabinet regulations. On the basis of laws and Cabinet regulations, local government regulations also include rules according to the EU law.

There are two ways in which individuals can manage to verify if the national legislative acts are consistent with the Constitution or the EU law:

- Direct application to the Constitutional Court strictly on the condition that it is allowed by the Constitutional Court Law and according to the provisions of this law;
- Submitting arguments and plea to the administrative or general jurisdiction court reviewing a certain case to submit an application to the Constitutional Court or to make a referral for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice of the European Union (the CJEU).

A constitutional complaint (application) may be submitted to the Constitutional Court by any person who considers his/her fundamental rights infringed by norms of law, Cabinet regulations or regulations of local government. The Constitutional Court has maintained an approach under which an alleged infringement of rights guaranteed by the Constitution is a prerequisite to have legal standing in the court, including in environmental matters. On the other hand, since Art.115 of the Constitution guarantees a right to a benevolent environment, and this right is quite broadly characterized by the Constitutional Court[14], it does not preclude individuals and environmental NGOs from bringing actions in environmental interests. The case law of the Constitutional Court shows that applications protecting general environmental interests are allowed from NGOs and also from individuals (see, for example, the judgment of 06.10.2017. in case No. 2016-24-03 as an example of challenging spatial plan in environmental interests).

However, this approach, unlike that taken by administrative courts, has led to setting criteria for legal persons to have a legal standing. To conclude that the right to a benevolent environment of a certain legal person has been infringed it must be seen that (a) the objective of the legal person's activities is environmental protection, (b) the legal person is founded according to the law,[15] (c) the legal person has participated in the development and adopting of the contested normative act as far as such participation has been granted by law and has been practically feasible.[16]

A constitutional complaint is allowed only after ordinary legal remedies are exhausted (recourse to the competent administrative authorities, courts of general jurisdiction or the administrative court). For example, if an administrative decision is based on the respective normative act, a person should at first appeal the administrative decision to the administrative court where the court may consider the constitutionality of the legal norm and submit an application to the Constitutional Court. If a person has exhausted ordinary legal remedies, or there are no such remedies available, the constitutional complaint must be lodged before the Constitutional Court within six months after the last decision in the case has come into effect. Only in exceptional individual cases may the recourse to ordinary legal remedies be skipped, i.e., if the reviewing of the constitutional complaint is generally important or if the ordinary legal remedies cannot prevent substantial damage to the complainant.

However, special procedural rules exist for contesting spatial plans and local spatial plans of local governments (as they are enacted in the form of local government's regulations). An application to the Constitutional Court has to be submitted within six months after the respective regulation of the local government has come into effect. In addition, a person must exhaust the specific administrative review procedure: to submit an appeal to the Ministry of local jurisdiction or the administrative court). For example, if an administrative decision is based on the respective normative act, a person should at first appeal the administrative decision to the administrative court where the court may consider the constitutionality of the legal norm and submit an application to the Constitutional Court.

There are two ways in which individuals can manage to verify if the national legislative acts are consistent with the Constitution or the EU law:

- Direct application to the Constitutional Court strictly on the condition that it is allowed by the Constitutional Court Law and according to the provisions of this law;
- Submitting arguments and plea to the administrative or general jurisdiction court reviewing a certain case to submit an application to the Constitutional Court or to make a referral for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice of the European Union (the CJEU).

If a person has exhausted ordinary legal remedies, or there are no such remedies available, the constitutional complaint must be lodged before the Constitutional Court within six months after the last decision in the case has come into effect. Only in exceptional individual cases may the recourse to ordinary legal remedies be skipped, i.e., if the reviewing of the constitutional complaint is generally important or if the ordinary legal remedies cannot prevent substantial damage to the complainant.

The Constitutional Court reviews the complaints taking into account EU law and ratified international law. This means the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union is also relevant. Participants to the procedure can argue their case with references to both the EU law and the CJEU case law, as well as international law (Aarhus Convention, for example). Participants can also plead for a reference for a preliminary ruling to be submitted to the CJEU.

Taking into account the broad legal standing of natural and legal persons in environmental matters, stemming from the rather broad scope of Art.115 of the Constitution, and also the approach of the Constitutional Court to interpret the Constitution in tune with international and EU law, the recourse to the Constitutional Court can be regarded as an effective legal remedy. The judgment is usually delivered in about one year after the complaint is submitted to the Court.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantively legality?

Administrative review (applicable if the spatial plans or local spatial plans of local governments are contested) and constitutional review cover both procedural and substantive legality of the contested legal act:

- If, in the given case, there is a specific procedure involving public consultations, the competent administrative authority and, subsequently, the Constitutional Court will verify whether the essential procedural rules are followed in relation to persons affected and persons having an interest in environmental issues, with special emphasis on the access to the environmental information and rights to participate in the decision-making (if applicable in the given situation), including the possibility to submit information, to express views and proposals, and sufficiently serious attitude of the administrative authority towards those views and proposals;
- Whether the procedure has been conducted in a way that guarantees sound legislative decisions;
- Whether the legislative act is based on correct fact-findings.

The Constitutional Court may request expert opinions.

The Constitutional Court will always scrutinise the contested legal norms in the light of their conformity with the Constitution, EU law and international law, taking into account the borders of claim set in the constitutional complaint.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

As explained in 2.5.1., a constitutional complaint is allowed only after ordinary legal remedies are exhausted (recourse to the competent administrative courts, courts of general jurisdiction or the administrative court). The application (complaint) must be lodged before the Constitutional Court within six months after the last decision in the case has come into effect. Only in exceptional individual cases may the recourse to ordinary legal remedies be skipped, i.e., if the reviewing of the constitutional complaint is generally important or if the ordinary legal remedies cannot prevent substantial damage to the complainant.

However, special procedural rules exist for contesting spatial plans and local spatial plans of local governments (if they are enacted in the form of local government's regulations). An application to the Constitutional Court has to be submitted within six months after the respective regulation of the local government has come into effect. Besides, a person must exhaust specific administrative review procedure: to submit an appeal to the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development within two months after the spatial plan or local spatial plan of the local government has come into effect. An administrative appeal is a mandatory pre-trial stage in this case.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? The Constitutional Court has set criteria for legal persons to have legal standing. To conclude that the right to a benevolent environment of a certain legal person has been infringed, it must be seen that, inter alia, that the legal person has participated in the development and adopting of the contested normative act as far as such participation has been granted by law and has been practically feasible. [17]

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The procedure of constitutional review does not provide for suspensive effect of the constitutional complaint. The Constitutional Court Law allows the Court to decide to suspend the effect of the judgment of the general (or administrative) jurisdiction court if the constitutional complaint is related to one. According to the case law of the Constitutional Court, the legislator has not allowed other measures of provisional protection in the case of constitutional complaint (the 8th decision of the Constitutional Court of 04.02.2015 in case No. 2015-03-01). The only occasion when administrative review exists, i.e., if the spatial plan or local spatial plan of the local government is contested to the Ministry of Environmental Protection and Regional Development, the Ministry has discretionary power to impose restrictions for execution of the contested plan until the final administrative decision is delivered. No other means of provisional protections exist against legislative acts.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? Administrative appeal against spatial plans or local plans of local governments is free of charge. There is no state fee for submitting a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court. The participants to the procedure bear their own expenses, including hiring of an interpreter if one is needed at the court. The Constitutional Court does not decide on the reimbursement of those costs. A natural person may ask for legal aid financed from the state budget according to the State Increased Legal Aid Law. The court administrator will grant and administer legal aid if the Constitutional Court has already refused to accept a person’s complaint due to manifestly insufficient legal grounds as the sole reason. Within the time limits set for submitting the constitutional complaint, the person may then again apply to the Constitutional Court with the aid of state financed lawyer.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how? In the same way as it is possible to plead for a referral for a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of EU law. There are no obstacles to raise the issue of the validity of acts of the institutions of the EU, as is provided in Art.267 of the TFEU, and to request a preliminary ruling of the CJEU. To date, the Constitutional Court has not exercised this possibility and has requested preliminary rulings only on the interpretation of EU law.

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[6] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[8] See, for example, the order of the Cabinet of 16.04.2020 No. 197 „On the plan of the decreasing of the air pollution for 2020-2030“.
[10] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[11] See, for example, the order of the Cabinet of 16.04.2020 No. 197 „On the plan of the decreasing of the air pollution for 2020-2030“.
[13] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekscheaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
[14] The infringement of the right to a benevolent environment is to be broadly interpreted so as to include activities actually taking place and creating an imminent threat to human health or to the environment, as well as activities expected to take place in the future.* The Constitutional Court, judgment of 17.01.2008. in case No. 2007-11-03, para. 13.1.
[16] Ibid, para. 13.2.
[17] Ibid, para. 13.2.
[18] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekscheaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Last update: 18/12/2023
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Besides the appeal against administrative environmental decisions, there are other legal remedies.

Remedies against the silence of the administration (the administrative passivity).

Aarhus Convention on Access to Information, Public Participation in Decision-Making and Access to Justice in Environmental Matters provides for each party (state) to ensure that members of the public have access to administrative or judicial procedures to challenge, inter alia, omissions by public authorities which contravene provisions of its national law relating to the environment. According to the case law of the Supreme Court, Aarhus Convention and Art.115 of the Constitution grant a right to the public to demand from the competent state authorities to really carry out measures lying within the competence of those authorities and a right to request it at the court. Such omissions may include the silence of the institution (for example, failure to take decision when such decision would be expected), but also insufficiently effective measures, for example, a failure to properly enforce any decision already delivered before[1].

This is the only measure that can be used also if an individual aims to prevent or to rectify damage to the environment made by other private individuals or entities, i.e., a person may request the competent supervising administrative authority to issue an administrative decision against another private person, to bring an action before the administrative court if the competent authority does not issue any decision or the decision is not effective, and to ask for real enforcement of any issued decision. To the extent that complaints are grounded in environmental law and allege a damage or imminent threat to the environment in the case of a further lack of action, any natural or legal person has standing at the competent administrative authority and at the court since actio popularis applies in environmental law (see above 1.4.1. about actio popularis).

If the competent authority does not respond to a submitted application for effective measures, a person has a possibility to appeal to a superior administrative authority and to the administrative court. General rules of administrative procedure apply (see above 1.3.1.–1.3.4. for more information about the system of administrative and judicial appeals, and 1.7.1. for information about applicable time limits).

If the appeal is accepted by the court, a person may ask for injunctive relief within the boundaries of the appeal. For example, an applicant may plead for immediate measures to prevent possible harm to the environment.

Measures for effective enforcement of administrative and judicial environmental decisions.

Administrative Procedure Law provides for measures that could be used to achieve full enforcement of administrative decisions, and decisions or judgments of the court, i.e., the rules on compulsory execution. The law regulates both the compulsory measures used by administrative authorities and by bailiffs, as well as by the police.

There are different compulsory measures used by administrative authorities (Sect. 367, 368 of the Administrative Procedure Law): executive orders, replacing measures carried out by the institution at the addressee’s expense, pecuniary penalties (applied repeatedly if needed), direct force. The court may impose pecuniary penalties to the officials responsible for the enforcement of the court’s decision, and those pecuniary penalties also may be applied repeatedly (Sect. 374 of the Administrative Procedure Law).

If, taking into account the content of the decision, a court bailiff can execute the decision, all the usual measures may be used according to the Civil Procedure Law.

A person in whose interests the administrative decision or judicial decision has been delivered has a right to appeal against omissions or inaccuracies regarding the execution. Also, a person against whom the administrative or judicial decision has been delivered has a right to appeal against inaccuracies regarding the execution.

Criminal liability may be applied in the event of severe environmental offences, and also for avoidance of enforcement of judicial decisions requiring certain actions.

During the court proceedings, the administrative court may also impose procedural sanctions to succeed in guaranteeing fair procedure and fair decisions. Such measures include warning, expulsion from the courtroom, pecuniary penalties, and forced conveyance. Pecuniary penalties may be applied (also repeatedly), for example, against state officials not complying with a court’s requests for information, and to any party to the case not complying with requests for evidence.

---

Last update: 18/12/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

---

Access to justice in environmental matters - Lithuania

Constitutional Foundations

Judiciary

#II

Access to Information Cases

Access to Justice in Public Participation

Access to Justice against Acts or Omissions

Other Means of Access to Justice

Legal Standing

Legal Representation

Evidence

Injunctive Relief

Costs

Financial Assistance Mechanisms

Timeliness

Other Issues

Being a Foreigner
Transboundary Cases

I. Constitutional Foundations

There is no right to a clean, healthy, favorable, etc. environment directly enshrined in the Constitution. But this right can be derived from other Articles of the Constitutions. The concept of environmental protection is mentioned in several Articles of the Constitution: "The State and each individual must protect the environment from harmful influence" (Article 53 (3)); "The State shall concern itself with the protection of the natural environment, its fauna and flora, separate objects of nature and particularly valuable districts, and shall supervise the moderate utilization of natural resources, as well as their restoration and augmentation. The exhaustion of land and elements of the earth, water and air pollution, the production of radiation, as well as the impoverishment of fauna and flora, shall be prohibited by law" (Article 54). The Constitution guarantees access to justice: "Any person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to appeal to court" (Article 30 (1)). Citizens can initiate administrative or judicial procedures because of the environmental violations. But they cannot directly invoke the constitutional right to environment. The international treaties ratified by the Parliament (Seimas) are a constituent part of the legal system (Article 138 (3)). In the case of conflict, international agreements have primacy over national law (Article 11 (2) of the Law on International Treaties). Parties can rely directly on international law. The Aarhus Convention is effective without any additional national legislation. Administrative bodies and courts have to implement this treaty.

II. Judiciary

Lithuania has a dual judicial system with ordinary courts of general jurisdiction and administrative courts of special jurisdiction. The courts of general jurisdiction, dealing with civil and criminal matters, are the Supreme Court of Lithuania (1), the Court of Appeal of Lithuania (1), and, at the first instance level, the regional courts (5) and the district courts (54). District courts also hear some cases of administrative offenses from within their jurisdiction by law. The regional courts, the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Lithuania have a civil division and a criminal division. The Supreme Court of Lithuania is the court reviewing judgments, decisions, rulings and orders of the other courts of general jurisdiction. It develops a uniform court practice in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. The Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania (1) and the regional administrative courts (5) are courts of special jurisdiction hearing disputes arising between citizens and administrative bodies from administrative legal relations. The Supreme Administrative Court is a first and final instance court for administrative cases assigned to its jurisdiction by law. It is an appeal instance court for cases concerning decisions, rulings and orders taken by regional administrative courts, as well as for cases involving administrative offenses decided by district courts. The Supreme Administrative Court is also an instance Court for hearing, in cases specified by law, petitions on the reopening of completed administrative cases, including administrative offences. The Supreme Administrative Court develops a uniform practice of administrative courts in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. There are no specialized courts competent to hear specific types of administrative disputes. Some specialization exists only at the level of pre-trial investigation institutions (e.g. the Commission on Tax Disputes). The special pre-trial investigation institutions are the municipal administrative disputes commissions (savivaldybių visuomeninės administracinių ginčų komisijos) and the Chief administrative disputes commission (Vniausioji administracinų ginčų komisija). Applications to Administrative dispute commissions or to the Commission on tax disputes prior to bringing a case to an administrative court is not compulsory, save for the matters provided by laws. There are no special courts, tribunals, or environmental boards in Lithuania. Administrative dispute commissions and administrative courts carry out full review of all administrative acts including acts in environmental matters. District courts of general jurisdiction are dealing with environmental damage cases. Some state institutions under the authority of the Ministry of Environment can act as a pre-trial investigation institution in environmental matters in cases foreseen by the law (e.g. the State Inspectorate for Territorial Planning and Construction, and the State Service for Protected Areas). Only administrative courts can hear administrative disputes in environmental matters. There is no possibility to apply to another court. There is only the possibility to apply to an administrative dispute commission prior bringing the case to an administrative court. There is no general rule, that administrative acts must be challenged before a higher administrative authority or an independent dispute body before applying to a court. The internal control of administrative acts/omission is compulsory only in certain kinds of administrative disputes (e.g. in social security disputes, or tax disputes). Applications to Administrative dispute commissions or to the Commission on tax disputes prior bringing a case to an administrative court can be selected on a voluntary basis. Only in the matters provided by laws this special pre-trial procedure is compulsory. Every interested person can apply to a court for the protection of his/her own infringed or contested right or interest protected under law (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings (LAP)). Every applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only an application to an administrative court as an individual in order to protect his/her own infringed or contested right or interest is admissible (Article 5 LAP). It is possible to bring a complaint to protect the State or other public interest laid down for the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organizations or natural persons, but only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 56 LAP). A complaint/petition may be filed with the administrative court, within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law, or any other legal act for the compliance with the demand. If the public or internal administration entity delays the consideration of a certain issue and fails to resolve it within the due date, a complaint about the failure to act (in such delay) may be lodged within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for the settlement of the issue. No time limits shall be set for the filing of petitions for the review of the lawfulness of administrative legal acts by the administrative courts. The decision taken by an administrative disputes commission or any other institution for preliminary extrajudicial investigation of disputes, adopted after investigating an administrative dispute in accordance with the extrajudicial procedure, may be appealed to an administrative court within 20 days after the receipt of the decision (Article 33 LAP).

If it is recognized that the time limit for filing a complaint has not been observed for a good reason, at the claimant's request, the administrative court may grant restoration of the status quo ante. The petition for the restoration of the status quo ante shall indicate the reasons of failure to observe the time limit and present the evidence confirming the reasons of failure to observe the time limit. There are no special screening procedures before administrative courts. Only the compliance of the complaint with the formal requirements and the time limits for lodging a complaint are verified in order to decide whether a complaint is acceptable. The Article 23 of the LAP sets minimal standards of the complaint to administrative courts. Except for cases provided for by law, complaints /petitions shall be received and heard by the administrative courts only after the payment of the stamp duty. The assistance of a lawyer is not compulsory in administrative courts. The parties to the proceedings can defend their interests in court themselves or through their representatives. The administrative court can quash the contested administrative act (sometimes part thereof). The court can also obligate the appropriate entity of administration to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 LAP). The administrative court can't change the administrative act but it can obligate the state institution to elaborate (pass) a new administrative act. The decision of the court may contain this new administrative act. There are no special rules in the Law on Administrative Proceedings about cases in environmental matters. There is a possibility of petition for the protection of the State or other public interests, including environmental matters. The right to bring a case to a court in environmental matters is enshrined by the Aarhus Convention. There is no limitation for natural or legal persons to bring a case before an administrative court. There is a possibility to bring a complaint in order to protect state or another public interest laid down for the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organizations or natural persons, but only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 56 LAP). And that is also possible in the field of environmental matters. Administrative courts can also decide cases relating to disputes between public administrations, which are not subordinated to one another, concerning competence or breaches of laws, except for civil litigation cases assigned to the courts of general jurisdiction. Public entities are not entitled to challenge their own administrative acts before administrative courts. If an unlawfulness of an administrative act violates public interest, only the prosecutor or other persons, in the cases prescribed by law, may bring this case before a court. Normally judges do not have the right to initiate a case. But if a judge has information about a criminal action, he has the obligation to inform the prosecutor (Article 109 LAP). Once the case is ongoing, the court can „actively” participate in the proceeding by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc.

III. Access to Information Cases

An applicant who considers that his request for environmental information has been ignored, wrongfully refused or inadequately answered has access to a review procedure before an administrative disputes commission. The commission may be appealed within a month after the receipt of the information or within a month from the date of the information has been made available. The decision of the commission may be appealed to the administrative court within 20 days after the day of the receipt of the decision. In the case of refusal, the public administration entity must adopt an individual administrative act, which must contain, clearly formulated, all rights and duties and the specific appeal procedure (Article 6 and 8 of the Law on Public Administration). The reasons for a refusal should be provided to the applicant within 14 days after the receipt of this demand by the public authority (Article 19 Order on Public Access to Environmental Information, Approved by Government Resolution Number 1175). The request can be written or oral. The information can be given oral if the applicant doesn’t ask for a written answer. The requirements for the written request are:

- the name,
- the contact data,
- the requested information,
- the form of giving the information.

The applicant doesn’t have to state an interest. When an applicant requests to make information available in a specific form (including in the form of copies), the public authority shall make it so available (there are some exceptions foreseen in the Article 9 of the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information). The information shall be made available to an applicant within 14 calendar days after the receipt by the public authority. This term can be extended to at least 14 calendar days. An Application to an administrative dispute commissions prior to applying to an administrative court is compulsory in this case. All information must be provided to the court if the court requests it. This information can influence the court decision. One of the types of judgments in administrative courts is to meet the complaint (grant the application) and rescind the contested act (or a part thereof), or to obligate the appropriate entity of administration to rectify the committed violation or to comply with any other order of the court (Article 88 (2) LAP). Courts can order information to be disclosed.

IV. Access to Justice in Public Participation

The administrative procedure is regulated by the Law on Public Administration for all matters of administrative law including environmental matters. The main law in environmental matters is the Law on Environmental Protection. Other laws and legislative acts regulating the environmental protection are adopted on the basis of this law. The Law on Environmental Protection foresees the main principal for the economic activities – the permit. There are a lot of kinds of permits (construction permit, EIA permit, IPPC permit and others) which are regulated in special laws and other legislative acts (in these acts are written the requirements for such permit, the institutions who are responsible for that, sometimes specific rules concerning the procedure) but the basic rules for the administrative procedures are written in the Law on Public Administration. The appeal to a superior administrative authority against an administrative decision can be an obligation (only if the cases foreseen in the law) or an alternative (the person can choose between the appeal to an authority or to the court). There is a possibility to apply to an administrative dispute commission prior to bringing the case to an administrative court. First instance administrative decision can be taken by a court directly. Applications to administrative dispute commissions prior to bringing a case to an administrative court is not compulsory, save for the matters provided by laws. In the absence of specific rules provided by law about the necessity of an administrative claim prior to bringing a case to an administrative court, administrative decisions can be brought to an administrative court directly. The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered belonging to the decision. The legality of administrative planning is controlled by the administrative courts. The conditions regarding legal standing, rules of evidence, rules on hearing or extent of review by the court are not specific for the cases in environmental matters. Natural or legal persons have the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an administrative act when their rights have been infringed upon. In the cases prescribed by law it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the state or another public interest (including environmental interest). Agencies, organizations, and groups may lodge an appeal against the measures affecting their own interests (existence, estate, activity, operating conditions) as well as asking for damages for the material and moral damage they suffer. But they also may go to court to defend the public interest of those they represent, insofar as the regulatory or individual disputed measure harms this public interest. In administrative litigation, as in private legal proceedings, the burden of proof bears on the plaintiff. However, this principle sees mitigation in administrative litigation, notably when the elements of proof are in the hands of the administration or, in the case of liability, in the hypothesis of presumptions exempting the petitioner from establishing the fault he/she alleges and obliging the administration to prove that it committed no error. Considering the inquisitorial nature of the proceeding, the administrative judge, who has significant investigatory powers, actually contributes significantly in establishing the facts. If need be, he/she may impose the communication of documents or proceed by him/herself to certain investigations by directly examining acts or documents, by visiting locations, by attending hearings or expert assessments. Judges must actively participate in the collection of evidence. Article 8 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings enshrines the principle that proceedings shall be held in a public hearing. The administrative judge has full control of an administrative act. An administrative act (part thereof) must be rescinded if it is:

- illegal per se, i.e., contradicts by its contents the legal acts of higher order;
- illegal by reason of having been adopted by an incompetent entity of administration;
- illegal because it was adopted in violation of the principal established procedures, especially in breach of the rules intended to ensure an objective evaluation of all circumstances and the validity of the decision. A contested act (part thereof) may also be rescinded on other grounds recognized as material by the administrative court (Article 89 LAP).

The EIA screening and scoping decisions are administrative decisions and can be reviewed by courts. The conditions regarding legal standing, rules of evidence, rules on hearing or extent of review by the court are not specific for these cases. The EIA final decision is also an administrative decision and can be reviewed by courts. The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. The Environmental Impact Study is controlled because it is the main aspect of the procedural legality. The requirement of a necessary interest to have the power to act is at the very head of the conditions for an appeal’s admissibility. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the EIA procedure or to make comments to have a standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an EIA administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 15 of Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity). There are no special rules applicable to EIA procedures. The injunction relief is available in administrative cases in all matters. According to the Article 71 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may, upon a motivated petition of the participants in the proceedings or upon his/its own initiative, take measures with a view to securing a claim. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may impede the enforcement of the court decision or render the decision unenforceable. There are no special rules applicable to EIA procedures. All administrative decisions can be reviewed by administrative courts. IPPC decisions and other decisions concerning authorizations can be reviewed by administrative courts too. The conditions regarding legal standing, rules of evidence, rules on hearing or extent of review by the court are not specific for these cases. The administrative courts review the procedural legality and the substantive legality of IPPC decisions as well as the legality of all administrative decisions. They have also to study the material, technical findings, calculations and the IPPC Documentation if these elements are considered to belong to the decision. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the IPPC procedure or to make comments to have a standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an IPPC administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 87 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation on IPPC permits, Approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania Order Number 80 in 2002). According to the Article 71 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may take measures with a view to securing a claim. There are no special rules applicable to IPPC procedures.

V. Access to Justice against Acts or Omissions
According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before courts and:

- to insist upon the punishment of persons guilty of endangering the environment, and of officers, whose decisions have infringed their rights or interests;
- to take the appropriate action to avoid or minimize environmental damage or to restore the original state of the environment.

Legal and natural persons who cause damage to the environment must compensate all losses, and, if possible, must restore the environmental state (Article 32 Law on Environmental Protection). The right to make claims for damages belongs to:

- legal and natural persons whose health, property or interests have been damaged;
- officers of the Ministry of Environment or other officers when damage has been done against the interests of the state (Article 33 (1) Law on Environmental Protection).

Legal entities are subject to civil liability, regardless of their guilt, for any environmental damage or actual threat thereof, resulting from their economic activities (Article 34 (2) Law on Environmental Protection). Claims for the protection of the environment can be submitted directly to the administrative courts against decisions or omissions of public bodies (the state or local public authorities). The administrative court can revoke the contested administrative act (part thereof), or obligate the public body to remedy the committed violation, or carry out other orders of the court. The administrative court can satisfy the complaint (the application) and an order for damages caused by illegal actions from public bodies. The state administration of environmental protection shall be carried out by the Government of the Republic, the Ministry of Environment, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Regional Environmental Protection Departments, other special state authorities (e.g. State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, General Forest Enterprise, State Protected Areas Service, National Parks Directorates) and the local governments. The administrative procedure is regulated by the Law on Public Administration for all matters of administrative law. There are no specific rules for environmental matters. The administrative procedure shall be completed and the decision on the administrative procedure shall be adopted within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. This term can be extended for a period not longer than 10 working days (Article 31 Law on Public Administration). A person shall have the right to appeal against a decision on the administrative procedure adopted by an entity of public administration, at his own choice, either to an administrative disputes commission or to an administrative court in accordance with the procedure set forth by laws (Article 36 Law on Public Administration). The administrative court can revoke the decisions made by competent authorities (part thereof) or obligate the competent authority to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 LAP). There are no specific rules concerning environmental liability matters for the procedure before administrative courts. The ordinary courts are dealing with cases concerning the environmental liability. The possibility to claim for compensation of damage is foreseen in the article 32-34 of the Law on Environmental Protection. There are several possibilities to enforce the environmental liability. Each possibility is based on specific conditions. The person can ask the competent authority to act if the environment is damaged. The decision made by competent authority can be appealed before the administrative court. Legal and natural persons whose health, property or interests have been damaged can make direct claims for damages before ordinary courts. Competent officers can make such claims when damage has been done against the interests of the State.

VI. Other Means of Access to Justice
All general court proceedings, administrative, civil or criminal are likely to be applied in environmental matters. There are no specific rules in this area. The Seimas of the Republic appoints the Seimas Ombudsman, a state official who protects human rights and freedoms, investigates the complainants’ complaints about abuse of office by or bureaucracy of officials and seeks to upgrade public administration. The complainant has the right to file a complaint with the Seimas Ombudsman about the abuse of office by bureaucracy of officials if s/he believes that his rights and freedoms have been violated thereby (Article 5, 13 (1) Law on the Seimas Ombudsman). Having completed the investigation the Seimas Ombudsman shall decide to:

- recognize or declare the complaint as justified;
- dismiss the complaint;
- discontinue the complaint investigation (Article 22 (1) Law on the Seimas Ombudsman).

The institution and agency or official, to whom this proposal (recommendation) is addressed must investigate the proposal (recommendation) of the Seimas Ombudsman and inform the Seimas Ombudsman about the results of the investigation (Article 20 (3) Law on the Seimas Ombudsman). According to the Law on the Prosecutor, the public prosecutor's office is a state institution headed by the Prosecutor General. The public prosecutor's office is comprised of the Prosecutor General's Office and territorial prosecutor's offices (regional prosecutor's offices and district prosecutor's offices). All prosecutors' offices shall defend the public interest, including environmental matters. Article 19 of the Law on the Prosecutor comprehensively regulates the defense of the public interest. The state institutions responsible for the environmental protection including the Ministry of Environment, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Regional Environmental Protection Departments, and other special state authorities (e.g. State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, General Forest Enterprise, State Protected Areas Service, National Parks Directorates and the local governments) can initiate the case in the administrative court for the defense of public interest. Some territorial police bodies have special departments for the environmental violations (e.g. in the capital in Vilnius). Other territorial police bodies have police officers responsible for investigating environmental violations. They have competence for criminal matters and administrative violations. The Code of Criminal Procedure provides cases under the Criminal Code of Republic of Lithuania, when criminal proceedings can be initiated, when there is a complaint of the victim or his legitimate representative (Article 407 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In these cases pre-trial investigation is not conducted. There are no example cases in environmental matters. There are several possibilities of claims before the administrative courts in cases of administrative inaction or inappropriate action:

- for annulment against an unlawful administrative decision;
- for damages against a public authority when it is shown that this inaction or inappropriate action caused a damage.
There is a possibility to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest laid down for the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organizations or natural persons, but only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 56 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

VII. Legal Standing
According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings every interested person can apply to a court for protection of his/her infringed right, contested right, or interest protected under law. Every applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only applications to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right to an administrative court is admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). These main rules are applicable for different types of procedures and different actors. However, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest. The actors for this possibility include the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organizations or natural persons. But this possibility can be used only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 56 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). E.g. according to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before courts. So if there was a complaint in order to protect the public interest connected with the protection of environment this complaint should be admissible because it is prescribed by Law on Environmental Protection. This rule is used for all matters (not only for environmental matters). Sometimes additional rules of law provide whom and in which cases there is access to the court e.g. cases concerning EIA and IPPC. Article 15 of Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity provides the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before courts in the case of EIA. Article 87 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation on IPPC permits, Approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number 80 in 2002 provides the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before courts in the case of IPPC. There are additional rules regarding the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before courts in the case of EIA (Article 15 of Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity) and IPPC (Article 87 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation on IPPC permits, Approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number 80 in 2002). There is no “actio popularis” in Lithuania. The Ombudsman cannot bring a claim before the administrative court against the individual administrative decision. But he can apply to the administrative court with a request to investigate the legality of the legal statutes adopted by the entities of state administration or municipal administration. He can recommend that the prosecutor apply to the court according to the procedure prescribed by law for the protection of public interest. The public prosecutors can defend the public interest before administrative courts. Other state institutions have legal standing to act against administrative courts either when it is in their own interest to claim or to defend, or when they defend the public interest. There are additional rules for legal standing of individuals/NGOs and access to justice for environmental matters in the fields of EIA and IPPC procedures.

VIII. Legal Representation
Parties can represent their interests in administrative courts themselves or through representatives. In administrative courts, the participation of lawyer is compulsory in judicial procedures (including in environmental matters). A lawyer is also compulsory before the cassation court (Supreme Court of Lithuania) (e.g. in the cases of environmental damage or in the criminal cases). Parties and/or their representatives must have a degree in law before the Court of Appeal. Generally, compulsory participation is required in criminal proceedings in all courts of general jurisdiction. There are specialized law offices in environmental matters (usually the biggest law offices). It is possible to find the lists of the lawyers in the following websites:

- http://www.advoco.lt/
- http://www.infolex.lt/

There are several NGOs whose aim is to defend the public interest in environmental matters, such as the Lithuanian Fund For Nature and Lithuanian Green Movement. The Lithuanian Environmental Coalition was established in 2004. There are 9 members in this Coalition at the moment.

IX. Evidence
Parties and other persons present the evidence for the proceedings. The parties must prove the circumstances on which they base their claims and responses. In administrative and civil proceedings the evidence includes: explanations of the parties and third parties (given directly or through representatives), witness evidence, written evidence, real evidence, statements of examination, expert evidence. The parties and other participants submit evidence to the court. If necessary, the court can allow those persons to submit additional evidence on the person's request or, on its own initiative, may demand the necessary documents, or request submissions from the officials. In civil proceedings the court has the right to collect evidence on its own initiative only in exceptional cases prescribed by the law, such as in family cases and labor cases. The court may also demand and obtain evidence from the other party or third parties at another party’s request. No evidence before the Courts has a predetermined value. The court evaluates the evidence according to its own inner criterion based on a thorough, comprehensive, and objective examination of the facts in accordance with the law, as well as justice and reasonableness criteria. In administrative proceeding parties can introduce new evidence until the end of the hearing on merits. Judges must actively participate in the collection of evidence, in the establishment of all significant circumstances of the case, and must make a comprehensive and objective examination thereof. In civil proceedings parties can introduce new evidence until the end of the preparation for hearing on the merits. In civil proceedings the court has the right to collect evidence on its own initiative only in exceptional cases prescribed by the law, such as in family cases or labor cases. Parties can submit expert opinions with other evidence to the court. Specialist explanations, opinions or conclusions gathered by the parties to the proceedings on their own initiative are not admitted as expert evidence. They are regarded as pieces of written evidence. The court decides either on its own initiative or at the request of the parties whether to order an expert examination in the proceedings. Usually an expert is ordered to examine certain issues arising in the case when the Court needs special scientific, medical, artistic, technical or professional knowledge. Expert opinions, as other evidence, do not have a predetermined value for the court. They are not binding on judges.

X. Injunctive Relief
The appeal or the action submitted to the court against the administrative decision does not have a suspensive effect. Only the court might suspend the administrative decision in the way of applying interim measures. Usually administrative decisions can be immediately executed after their adoption (enforcement), irrespective of an appeal. Only the court can apply interim measures. When the administrative decision in the form of the legislative act was adopted by the government or the municipality the enforcement is connected with the publication in the official journal or other date which can be foreseen in the legislative act. There are no specific rules for the injunctive relief in judicial procedures in environmental matters. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may:

a) impede the enforcement of the court decision; or
b) render the decision unenforceable.

The request for the interim measures must be filed prior to the commencement of the hearing of the case on the merits. According to the practice of the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania, the court, while deciding on the interim measures (in Lithuanian administrative process they are called “measures securing the claim”), must preliminarily take into account the nature of the claim (that is requested to be secured), the indicated factual basis for the claim, the rights, granted by the contested act, and actual realization of these rights. Only then the court can decide whether the requirement for interim measures under the circumstances of the application would be adequate to the purpose and whether the principle of proportionality and the balance of the interests of the parties and the public interest wouldn't be violated. According to the principle of fairness, when considering the requirement of interim measures, the court has to answer the question whether interim measure would actually help to restore the previous legal position if the main claim would be satisfied. The petition for securing the claim might be accepted only if the main complaint is accepted. There is no possibility of asking for interim measures, without asking for challenging the administrative act or omission. There is no cross-undertaking in damages prior to granting interim relief. There is the appeal against the decision of the court regarding injunction possible. But it has not the suspensive effect and the court can continue the proceeding (Article 71 (5) LAP).

XI. Costs

In administrative courts, the applicant should pay a court fee. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include:

- costs paid to witnesses, experts, and expert organizations;
- costs relating to the publication of hearing time and place in the press;
- transport costs;
- costs for the rental accommodation in the place of the court;
- other necessary and reasonable expenses.

In civil courts applicants have to pay a court fee. There are exemptions in the cases concerning compensation for material and moral damage in relation to a physical personal injury, death, in the cases concerning the defense of the public interest under the claim of the prosecutor, public institutions or other persons. Other litigation-related costs include:

- costs paid to witnesses, experts, authorities and expertise of interpreters and the costs associated with on-site inspections;
- costs for the searching for the defendant;
- costs associated with the service of delivery of documents;
- costs related to enforcement of judgments;
- costs related to the salary of the curator;
- costs for the lawyers or lawyer’s assistants;
- costs associated with the application for interim relief;
- other necessary and reasonable expenses.

Under the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each complaint (application) in administrative court is subject to a stamp duty in the amount of LTL 100 (excluding the exceptions). An appeal for the review of a court judgment must be subject to a stamp duty at the 50% rate payable upon the lodging of the complaint (application) with the first instance court. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, stamp-duties in pecuniary disputes are as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Amount of the claim</th>
<th>Stamp-duty</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>for claims up to LTL 100 000</td>
<td>3% of claimed amount + indexation (The minimum stamp-duty - LTL 50)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>for claims up to LTL 300,000</td>
<td>LTL 3,000 plus 2% of claimed amount exceeding LTL 100,000 + indexation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>for claims over LTL 300,000</td>
<td>LTL 7,000 plus 1% of claimed amount exceeding LTL 300,000 + indexation (The maximum stamp-duty - LTL 30,000)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

For appeals, cassation appeal, and applications for renewal of the proceedings shall be paid the same amount of stamp duty. An estimation of expert fees and other litigation-related fees, except from lawyer fees and costs, associated with the application for interim relief are regulated by Government Resolution Number 344 from 2002. There is a recommendation from Minister of Justice and the Chairman of Bar concerning lawyer fees (Ministry of Justice Order Number 1R-85 from 2004). Recommended maximum remuneration sizes are calculated using the coefficients which are based on the Lithuanian Government approved the minimum monthly salary. The minimum monthly salary (MMS) from 1st August 2012 is LTL 850. E.g. the coefficient for one hour for representation in court is 0.15. An estimation of lawyer fees in the case of the legal aid is regulated by Government Resolution Number 60 from 2001. The remuneration for lawyers constantly providing secondary legal aid is 8.18 MMS per month. Working hour salary for lawyers who are not constantly providing secondary legal aid equal to 0.05 MMS. There are differences between administrative and civil proceedings. In the administrative proceedings, in the case of an injunctive relief or interim measure a deposit (cross-undertaking in damages) is not needed (it is not foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

In the civil proceeding the request for application of interim measure shall be taxable only when it is claimed before filing a lawsuit. In this case the applicant must pay half of the stamp-duty payable for this prospective claim. The Code of Civil Procedure establishes the court’s right to require a deposit for applying the interim measures from the applicant. The deposit is intended to secure the defendant against losses of the interim measures applied to him. The deposit could also be the bank guarantee. The amount of the deposit depends on the case and it is quite difficult to evaluate it generally. The general rule is that the losing party has to bear all costs, including stamp duties and costs related to initial court proceedings. The party shall be also obliged to reward the costs of the winning party. The stamp-duty, expenses for correspondence, expert costs, and other costs usually are paid in full. But the legal costs for legal representation during the court proceeding are reduced as recommended by the Minister of Justice and the Chairman of Bar. However these amounts are only recommended and depend on the complexity of the court proceeding, case material, and other factors. Nevertheless, in the absolute majority of civil and administrative cases, state courts reduce parties’ requested legal expenses for their legal assistance according to the recommended amounts and reasonableness.

XII. Financial Assistance Mechanisms

There are no specific rules concerning litigation costs of proceedings in environmental matters. Complaints/petitions shall be received and heard by the administrative courts only after the payment of the stamp duty prescribed by the law. Several exemptions from the stamp duty are foreseen in Article 40 of Law on Administrative Proceedings:

- complaints/petitions relating to the delay by the entities of public administration to perform the actions assigned within the remit of their competence, awarding of or refusal to award pensions,
- violations of election laws and the Law on Referendum,
- petitions by state servants and municipal employees when they concern legal relations in the Office,
- compensation for damage inflicted upon a natural person or organization by unlawful acts/omission in the sphere of public administration, and
- complaints relating to the protection of public interests and some other complaints/petitions.

There is a legal aid available in Lithuania. The current legal aid scheme is governed by the Law on Legal Aid. Legal aid is divided into primary and secondary legal aid. Primary legal aid includes legal information and legal consultations outside the judicial procedure and is accessible to all citizens, EU citizens, and foreigners, irrespective of their financial resources. Secondary legal aid includes preparation of procedural documents, representation in courts, waiver of the stamp duty and other procedural costs. Access to secondary legal aid depends on the level of estate and income and covers 50 or 100 percent of all procedural costs. Some groups of persons (i.e. recipients of social allowance) can receive legal aid independent of their income. Legal aid is granted through special services, which are accountable to the Ministry of Justice. The refusal to grant legal aid is subject to appeal before administrative courts. Legal aid is also available in environmental matters without any specific rules. Legal aid is subject to requirements as to resources, nationality, residence and admissibility. You are entitled to primary or secondary legal aid if you are a Lithuanian national, a citizen of the EU, or a foreigner who is lawfully residing in Lithuania or in another EU state. Legal aid is given if the action is not manifestly inadmissible or devoid of substance. The additional condition for secondary legal aid is that the party’s property value and annual income does not exceed the property value and income levels set by the Government of the Republic of Lithuania. Legal aid for NGOs is not foreseen. Law firms do not provide pro bono legal assistance in Lithuania. All legal clinics deal with environmental cases. There are no specific environmental legal clinics. These legal clinics are:

Legal clinic of Vilnius University: http://www.teisesklinika.lt
Legal clinic of Mykolas Romeris University: http://www.mruni.eu/lit/universitetas/fakultetai/teises_fakultetas/teisines_pagalbos_centras/apie_centra/

The legal clinics are responsible for primary legal aid. The primary legal aid is also given by the municipalities and by Ministry of Justice Information Bureaus in several cities (Kaunas, Klaipėda, Šiauliai, Druskininkai and other).

The secondary legal aid is granted through 5 special services (in Vilnius, Kaunas, Klaipėda, Panevėžys and Šiauliai), which are accountable to the Ministry of Justice. There are environmental organizations responsible for the defense of the environment in Lithuania. They are available for the public. There are some other organizations that give free legal advice via internet. There are no specific environmental lawyers who would be available for the public for free.

XIII. Timeliness

An administrative organ shall complete the administrative procedure and adopt the decision of the administrative procedure within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. The public entity initiating the administrative procedure may extend the period up to 10 extra working days where, due to objective reasons, the administrative procedure cannot be completed within the set time limit. A person shall be notified about the extension of the time limit for the administrative procedure in writing or by e-mail (where the complaint has been received by e-mail) and the reasons for the extension (Article 31 of the Law on Public Administration). An administrative court may initiate responsibility of a public authority when the administrative organ does not adopt the decision during the time limit and it has resulted in damage to the claimant. In several fields, the law established a regime of tacit acceptance. The silence of the administration causes the appearance of a tacit acceptance within the period fixed by law. There are no special time limits set by law for judicial procedures in environmental matters. The general rules apply. Usually, the preparation of administrative cases before the court must be completed no later than one month after the date of the complaint (application). The proceedings before the administrative court must be completed and a decision made in the first instance no later than two months after the order for the case to the court hearing date, if the law doesn’t provide shorter duration.

Where appropriate, the trial period may be extended up to one month. In cases concerning the legality of normative acts of the administration the time period may be extended up to three months. The judgment shall be drawn up and communicated to the public generally on the same day after hearing the case. Judgments relating to the legality of administrative acts and other complex cases may be passed and announced later than but not more than 10 days upon the completion of the hearing of the case (in the practice, it’s used in almost all cases). When the right to a judicial decision within a reasonable time has caused damage, the person can obtain compensation for the damage. This possibility is foreseen in the Law on Compensation of Damage caused by Public Authorities.

XIV. Other issues

Every applicant who challenges an administrative act must demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of the act. An action for the annulment of an administrative act shall only be admissible if it produces legal effects – when it infringes the rights and obligations of applicant. A writ that only occurs in the context of a procedure for developing a subsequent main decision or simple information does not create rights or obligations for the person and cannot be challenged before an administrative court. All these general rules are applicable in environmental matters. The right of access to environmental information is ruled by general principle issued by the Law on Environmental Protection and the implementing Order on Public Access to Environmental Information, Approved by Government Resolution Number 1175 from 1999. Alternative Dispute Resolution currently is not prevalent in administrative litigation in Lithuania. But the newest jurisprudence of the administrative courts indicates an intention to use the peace treaty to settle disputes (also in environmental matters). Mediation is not really used in the practice; but, this idea is slowly getting value in Lithuania.

XV. Being a Foreigner

Article 29 of the Lithuanian Constitution proclaims the principle of equality before the law for all citizens regardless of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, belief, convictions, or views. Many laws have extended this article of the Constitution. Article 6 of Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that justice in administrative cases is implemented only by the courts, according to equality before the law and the court, regardless of gender, race, nationality, language, origin, social status, religion, beliefs or attitudes, activities and nature, residence and other circumstances. Only the Lithuanian language should be used in the courts. Article 9 of Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that in the process of administrative cases, decisions are made and published in the Lithuanian language. All documents submitted to the court must be translated into Lithuanian. Persons who do not speak Lithuanian shall be guaranteed the right to use the services of an interpreter. The interpreter is paid from the state budget (Article 9 of Law on Administrative Proceedings).

XVI. Transboundary Cases

Article 32 Law on Environmental Protection provides that disputes between legal and natural persons of the Republic of Lithuania and foreign states shall be settled in the manner established by law of the Republic of Lithuania, unless international agreements of the Republic of Lithuania provide otherwise. The admissibility of an action before a Lithuanian court is possible under conditions in Law on Administrative Proceedings or in Civil Proceedings Code. The concept of public interest is not specific in a transboundary context. The general rules are applicable (especially about the admissibility of requests through the concept of legal interest). The Lithuanian administrative law recognizes equal access to administrative courts for persons or NGO's residing abroad on the same basis that the applicants residing in Lithuania use. An EU citizen or a foreigner who is lawfully residing in Lithuania or in other state of the EU can get legal aid. A jurisdiction clause is possible in civil matters. It takes the form of a contractual provision whereby the parties agree to entrust the settlement of a dispute to a court which does not normally have jurisdiction. This may concern the subject matter jurisdiction or territorial jurisdiction. This clause may relate only to disputes arising from the contract. But, this mechanism is not used for administrative law litigations before administrative courts. The possibility to choose between courts could be possible in an international agreement.

Related Links
http://www.glis.lt
http://www.aplinkosauga.lt/
http://www.zalieji.lt%29/
http://www.teisinepagalba.lt/http://www.teisescentras.lt/forumas/
http://www.jusuteise.lt/
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

   1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

   Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution and the Law on Environmental Protection set out basic requirements which must be fulfilled. The purpose of the Law on Environmental Protection is to regulate public relations in the field of environmental protection, establish the principal rights and duties of legal and natural persons in preserving the biodiversity, ecological systems and landscape characteristic of the Republic of Lithuania, ensuring a healthy and clean environment, rational utilisation of natural resources in the Republic of Lithuania, the territorial waters, continental shelf and economic zone thereof (Article 2 of the Law on Environmental Protection). Environmental protection is a public interest (Constitutional Court’s rulings of 29 October 2003, of 9 May 2014, of 5 March 2015).

   A person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to a court (Article 30 (1) of the Constitution). One or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned have the right to file, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect to the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons, or the interests protected under the law be punished; as well as to refer, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, to court where they believe that their application filed in accordance with the procedure laid down by the legal acts regulating the right to obtain information on the environment has been unlawfully dismissed, has been provided with a partially or completely inappropriate response or has not been given proper regard in compliance with the legal acts regulating the right to obtain information on the environment (Article 7 (1) of the Law on Environmental Protection). The public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources (Article 7 (2) of the Law on Environmental Protection).

   The state administration of environmental protection shall be carried out by the Government of the Republic, the Ministry of Environment and other institutions under the Ministry of Environment (e.g. the Department of Environmental Protection, the Environmental Protection Agency, the State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, the General Forest Enterprise, the State Protected Areas Service), other special state authorities (e.g. National Parks Directorates) and institutions of local self-government.

   2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

   There is no right to a clean, healthy, favourable, etc. environment directly enshrined in the Constitution. But this right can be derived from other Articles of the Constitution[2]. The concept of environmental protection is mentioned in several Articles of the Constitution: "The State and each individual must protect the environment from harmful influence" (Article 53 (3)); "The State shall concern itself with the protection of the natural environment, its fauna and flora, separate objects of nature and particularly valuable districts, and shall supervise the moderate utilization of natural resources, as well as their restoration and augmentation. The exhaustion of land and elements of the earth, water and air pollution, the production of radiation, as well as the impoverishment of fauna and flora, shall be prohibited by law" (Article 54). The Constitution guarantees access to justice: "Any person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to appeal to court" (Article 30 (1)).

   Text of the Constitution (English and Lithuanian)

   3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

   According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person can apply to a court for protection of their infringed right, contested right or interest protected under law. Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only applications to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right to an administrative court are admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). These main rules are applicable for different types of procedures and different actors. However, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest. The actors for this possibility include the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons. But this possibility can be used only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). E.g., according to the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before the courts, and in addition the public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources. So if there were a complaint in order to protect the public interest connected with the protection of the environment, this complaint should be admissible because it is prescribed by the Law on Environmental Protection. This rule is used for all matters (not only environmental matters). According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned have the right to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect to the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

   There are specific rules regarding the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before the courts in the case of environmental impact assessment (Article 15 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity), integrated pollution prevention and control permits (Article 124 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by the Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number D1-528 in 2013), as well as territory planning (Article 49 of the Law on Territory Planning).

   4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

   The Supreme Administrative Court develops uniform practice of administrative courts in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. The Supreme Court, as a court of cassation, ensures uniform court practice of courts of general jurisdiction.

   There is a distinction between cases about protection of the private interest and the public interest respectively. The protection of the private interest is guaranteed under the Constitution (Article 30). The protection of the public interest is possible only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings) (Supreme Administrative Court’s judgment of 23 September 2013 in case no. A520 - 211/2013). The Law on Environmental Protection...
Protection foresees the possibility to protect the public interest in environmental matters (Article 7). The Supreme Administrative Court applies the Aarhus Convention directly and decides about the legal status of the person according to the Aarhus Convention (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 29 May 2013 in case no. A602-186/2013). The Supreme Administrative Court decided about the requirements for NGOs: they should be active in the area of environment and environmental protection and should fulfill other requirements under the national law (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 23 September 2013 in case no. A520-211/2013). The status of "public concerned" can be qualified according to the Law on Environmental Protection and other laws, for example according to the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 29 May 2013 in case no. A602-186/2013).

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

The international treaties ratified by the Parliament (Seimas) are a constituent part of the legal system (Article 138 (3) of the Constitution). In cases of dispute, international agreements have primacy over national law (Article 11 (2) of the Law on International Treaties). Parties can rely directly on international law. The Aarhus Convention is effective without any additional national legislation. Administrative bodies and courts have to implement this treaty. The Aarhus Convention is implemented in national legislation.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

Lithuania has a dual judicial system with ordinary courts of general jurisdiction and administrative courts of special jurisdiction. The courts of general jurisdiction, dealing with civil and criminal matters, are the Supreme Court of Lithuania (1), the Court of Appeal of Lithuania (1) and, at first instance level, the regional courts (5) and the district courts (12). District courts also hear some cases of administrative offences from within their jurisdiction by law. The regional courts, the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Lithuania have a civil division and a criminal division. The Supreme Court of Lithuania is the court reviewing judgments, decisions, rulings and orders of the other courts of general jurisdiction. It develops uniform court practice in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. The Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania (1) and the regional administrative courts (2) are courts of special jurisdiction hearing disputes arising between citizens and administrative bodies from administrative legal relations. The Supreme Administrative Court is a first and final instance court for administrative cases assigned to its jurisdiction by law. It is an appeal instance court for cases concerning decisions, rulings and orders taken by regional administrative courts, as well as for cases involving administrative offences decided by district courts. The Supreme Administrative Court is also an instance Court for hearing, in cases specified by law, petitions on the reopening of completed administrative cases, including administrative offences. The Supreme Administrative Court develops uniform practice of administrative courts in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. There are no specialised courts competent to hear specific types of administrative disputes.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no special court rules in the environmental sector. The Administrative Dispute Commission of Lithuania and the administrative courts carry out full review of all administrative acts, including acts in environmental matters. The courts of general jurisdiction deal with environmental damage cases.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

The administrative court can quash the contested administrative act (sometimes part thereof). The court can also obligate the appropriate entity of administration to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The administrative court cannot change the administrative act, but it can obligate the state institution to elaborate (pass) a new administrative act. The decision of the court may contain this new administrative act. There are no special rules in the Law on Administrative Proceedings about cases in environmental matters. There is a possibility of petition for the protection of the State or other public interests, including environmental matters. (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

With regard to the preparation for the hearing of the case in the court, the judge shall issue the orders necessary for preparing the hearing without notifying the participants in the proceedings (asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, etc.), except when deciding the issue of ordering the expert examination (Article 67 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). In a court hearing, the judge can “actively” participate in the proceeding too by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court can apply to the Constitutional Court requesting that it determine whether the law or other legal act adopted by the Seimas applicable in the case is in conformity with the Constitution, and whether the acts adopted by the President of the Republic or the Government applicable in the case are in compliance with the Constitution and laws. The court can also apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union on its own motion.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The state administration of environmental protection shall be carried out by the Government of the Republic, the Ministry of Environment and other institutions under the Ministry of Environment (e.g. the Department of Environmental Protection, the Environmental Protection Agency, the State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, the General Forest Enterprise, the State Protected Areas Service), other special state authorities (e.g. the National Parks Directorates) and institutions of local self-government. The administrative procedure is regulated by the Law on Public Administration for all matters of administrative law. There are no specific rules for environmental matters. The administrative procedure shall be completed and the decision on the administrative procedure shall be adopted within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. This term can be extended for a period not longer than 10 working days (Article 10 (4) of the Law on Public Administration).

The Lithuanian legal system provides for both mandatory and optional prelitigation procedures. According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, before application is made to the administrative court individual legal acts adopted by public administration entities provided for by law, as well as their acts/omission may be, and in the cases established by the law must be, contested by applying to the institution for preliminary extrajudicial investigation of disputes (Article 26 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). In cases of mandatory prelitigation procedures, a certain body of pretrial investigation generally belongs to the internal organisational system of particular institutions of public administration and the examination of administrative disputes is one of its functions. In cases of optional prelitigation procedures, the individual is given the freedom of choice. An appeal may be lodged before the body for preliminary extrajudicial investigation or directly before the administrative court. The key authority of such pretrial investigation is the Lithuanian Administrative Disputes Commission. The Lithuanian Administrative Disputes Commission is composed by the Government of the Republic of Lithuania for the period of 4 years. This commission consists of members having higher legal education (Article 3 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure).

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?
A person shall have the right to appeal against a decision on the administrative procedure adopted by an entity of public administration, at his own choice, either to an administrative disputes commission or to an administrative court in accordance with the procedure set out in law (Article 14 of the Law on Public Administration).

The administrative court can revoke the decisions made by competent authorities (or part thereof) or oblige the competent authority to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no specific rules concerning environmental matters for the procedure before administrative courts.

The ordinary courts deal with cases concerning environmental liability. The possibility to claim compensation for damage is foreseen in Articles 32-34 of the Law on Environmental Protection. There are several possibilities for enforcing environmental liability. Each possibility is based on specific conditions.

The person can ask the competent authority to act if the environment is damaged. The decision made by the competent authority can be appealed before the administrative court.

Legal and natural persons whose health, property or interests have been damaged can make direct claims for damages before ordinary courts. Competent officers can make such claims when damage has been done to the interests of the State.

Complaints (applications) lodged with the administrative disputes commission must be considered and a decision thereon must be taken within 20 working days after receipt thereof (this term can be extended for a period not longer than 10 working days) (Article 12 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure). The decision should be taken within 3 working days upon completion of the hearing of the case (Article 19 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure).

The decision of the court shall be drawn up and announced, as a rule, on the same day after the hearing of the case (Article 84 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). After hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 working days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of a regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month. In the case of important reasons, at the reasoned request of the judge hearing the case or the member(s) of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or their appointed judge may extend such time limits by a reasoned ruling for no more than ten working days. In the event of illness of the judge hearing the case or all members of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or a judge appointed by them, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, or in the event of illness of one or several members of the chamber of judges examining the case, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, the remaining (participating) member(s) of the chamber of judges may extend this time limit by means of a ruling until the objective reason no longer applies (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no regulation in the law of how much time it should take between lodging a complaint and its hearing. There are several terms foreseen for the preparation of the case and of the hearing (as a rule the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the ruling to assign the case to be examined in the court hearing usually has to be adopted no later than one month before the day of the court meeting (Article 64 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special courts, tribunals or environmental boards in Lithuania. The Administrative Dispute Commission of Lithuania and the administrative courts carry out full review of all administrative acts, including acts in environmental matters.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person can challenge an administrative act before a regional administrative court. Applications to an administrative court to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right (Article 5) are admissible, as are applications to protect the state or other public interest (Article 55).

The decisions of regional administrative courts, adopted when hearing the cases in the first instance, may be appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania within 30 days from the pronouncement of the decision (Article 143 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

All court proceedings are likely to be applied in all matters. There are no specific rules in the environmental area.

The court shall suspend the hearing of the case when it applies to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the preliminary ruling on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union (Article 100 (1)(b) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The ruling to suspend the hearing of the case regarding the application to a competent judicial authority of the European Union cannot be appealed (Article 100 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

There is a possibility to settle administrative disputes (including environmental disputes) by judicial mediation. The court asks the parties for their opinion regarding the intention and possibilities to resolve the dispute by judicial mediation (Article 71 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsman cannot bring a claim before the administrative court against the individual administrative decision. But he can apply to the administrative court with a request to investigate conformity of an administrative regulatory enactment (or part thereof) with the law or Government resolution (Article 19 (10)) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsmen. He can recommend that the prosecutor apply to the court according to the procedure prescribed by law for the protection of public interest (Article 19 (116)) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsmen. The public prosecutor can defend the public interest before administrative courts (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Other state institutions have legal standing to act before administrative courts either when it is in their own interest to claim or to defend, or when they are defending the public interest.

The protection of public interest by the public prosecutor

1.4. Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only application to an administrative court as an individual in order to protect their own infringed or contested right or interest is admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). It is possible to bring a complaint to protect the State or other public interest laid down for the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons, but only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). A complaint/petition may be filed with the administrative court within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand. If the public or internal administration entity delays consideration of a certain issue and fails to resolve it by the due date, a complaint about the failure to act (in such delay) may be lodged within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for the settlement of the issue. No time limits shall be set for the filing of petitions for the review of the lawfulness of administrative legal acts by the administrative courts (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). NGOs can bring a complaint in order to protect their own and their members’ infringed or contested rights or interests, or to protect the State or other public interest in the cases prescribed by law. The public concerned, as defined is Article 7 (2) of the Law on Environmental Protection, has the right to bring a complaint to protect the State or other public interest.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, ELA, IPPC/EED, etc.)? There are additional rules regarding the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before courts in the case of environmental impact assessment (Article 15 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity) and integrated pollution prevention and control permits (Article 124 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by the Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number D1-528 in 2013), as well as territory planning (Article 49 of the Law on Territory Planning).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.) According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person (individuals, NGOs) can apply to a court for protection of their infringed right, contested right or interest protected under law. Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only applications to an administrative court to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right are admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). These main rules are applicable for different types of procedure (first instance, appeal instance) and different actors (individuals, NGOs). However, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest. The actors for this possibility include the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons. But this possibility can be used only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). E.g., according to the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before the courts, and in addition the public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources. So if there were a complaint in order to protect the public interest connected with the protection of the environment, this complaint should be admissible because it is prescribed by the Law on Environmental Protection. This rule is used for all matters (not only environmental matters).

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved? Article 9 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that, in the process of administrative cases, decisions should be made and published in the Lithuanian language. All documents submitted to the court must be translated into Lithuanian. Where the participant in the proceedings to whom the procedural documents shall be served in a foreign state does not know the Lithuanian language, the administrative court shall be presented with translations of such documents into the language they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served, or, in the event that said country has several official languages, into one of the official language used at the place of delivery. Where the judicial procedural documents have to be sent to the participant in the proceedings who does not know the Lithuanian language and resides in a foreign state, the court shall translate them into one of the languages they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served. Upon the resolution of the judge who is preparing the case for hearing or of the court hearing the case, a document drawn up in another language may be translated at the court session by a translator. Persons who have no command of the Lithuanian language shall be guaranteed the right to have the assistance of an interpreter. The services provided by the interpreter at the court session shall be paid for from the State budget. Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion? Parties and other persons present the evidence for the proceedings. The parties must prove the circumstances on which they base their claims and responses. In administrative and civil proceedings, the evidence includes: explanations of the parties and third parties (given directly or through representatives), witness evidence, written evidence, real evidence, statements of examination, expert evidence. The parties and other participants submit evidence to the court. If necessary, the court can allow those persons to submit additional evidence at the person’s request or may, on its own initiative, demand the necessary documents or request submissions from the officials. In civil proceedings, the court has the right to collect evidence on its own initiative only in exceptional cases prescribed by the law, such as in family cases and labour cases. The court may also demand and obtain evidence from the other party or third parties at another party’s request.

In no evidence before the courts has a predetermined value. The court evaluates the evidence according to its own inner conviction based on a thorough, comprehensive and objective examination of the facts in accordance with the law, as well as justice and reasonableness criteria. Judges must actively participate in the collection of evidence, in the establishment of all significant circumstances of the case, and must make a comprehensive and objective examination thereof.

In the administrative review procedure, the entity of public administration may demand only such documents and information as is not available in the state registers and other state or municipal information systems, except for cases where such documents and information must be provided under laws. The deadline must be set for the provision of the documents and information. It shall be allowed to make a repeated demand for documents and information from the persons in respect of whom the administrative procedure has been initiated only in exceptional cases and with proper substantiation of the necessity for such documents and information. An entity of public administration may request the assistance of another entity of public administration in adopting the decision on the administrative procedure. Where institutional assistance can be rendered by several entities of public administration, the entity of public administration of the lower level shall first be addressed. Institutional assistance rendered by one entity of public administration to another entity of public administration shall be free of charge (Article 12 of the Law on Public Administration).

2) Can one introduce new evidence? In administrative proceedings, parties can introduce new evidence up to the end of the hearing on merits. In civil proceedings, parties can introduce new evidence up to the end of the preparation for the hearing on the merits.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts
3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

Parties can submit expert opinions with other evidence to the court. Specialist explanations, opinions or conclusions gathered by the parties to the proceedings on their own initiative are not admitted as expert evidence. They are regarded as pieces of written evidence. The court decides either on its own initiative or at the request of the parties whether to order an expert examination in the proceedings. Usually an expert is ordered to examine certain issues arising in the case when the court needs special scientific, medical, artistic, technical or professional knowledge.

There is publicly available list of experts.

Expert opinions, like other evidence, do not have a predetermined value for the court. They are not binding on judges.

The amounts payable to experts and organisations of experts shall be paid in advance by the party which made a request for experts (Article 39 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). If the request has been made by both parties, or if the experts are summoned or the examination is carried out on the initiative of the court, the required amounts shall be paid in by the parties to the proceedings in equal amounts. The specified amounts shall be paid into a special bank account of the court. Having regard to the property status of the natural person or group of natural persons, the administrative court may fully or in part exempt them from payment into the special court account of the amounts specified in this Article. The request for exemption from payment into the account of the said amounts must be justified and substantiated by relevant evidence. The aggrieved party may also be exempted from payment into the account of the amounts indicated in this Article.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

The Forensic Science Centre of Lithuania (FSCL) is a governmental institution of public administration whose main task is to carry out forensic examinations required by courts and other pre-trial investigation institutions. The fees are regulated by the normative acts of this institution.

The fees of private experts are not regulated. No procedural fees exist.

The amounts payable to witnesses, specialists, experts and organisations of experts shall be paid in advance by the party which made a request to summon witnesses, specialists or experts (Article 39 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). If the requests have been made by both parties, or if the witnesses, specialists and experts are summoned or the examination is carried out on the initiative of the court, the required amounts shall be paid in by the parties to the proceedings in equal amounts (Article 39 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Parties can represent their interests in administrative courts themselves or through representatives. In administrative courts, the participation of lawyers is not compulsory in judicial procedures (including in environmental matters). A lawyer is compulsory before the cassation court (the Supreme Court of Lithuania) (e.g. in cases of environmental damage or in criminal cases). Generally, compulsory participation is required in criminal proceedings in all courts of general jurisdiction.

Lists of lawyers can be found on the following websites:

https://www.advokatura.lt/savitama
https://www.advokatura.lt/irasai/advokatu-paieska
https://www.infolex.lt

A list of lawyers specialising in environmental matters can be found here.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

An advocate can provide legal services free of charge, i.e. as legal aid (Article 4 (5) of the Law on the Bar). An advocate decides if they will provide legal services free of charge. This service is pro bono assistance and not necessarily legal aid.

All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are eligible for primary legal aid (Article 11 (1) of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid). The secondary legal aid is foreseen only for natural persons who prove their right to receive secondary state-guaranteed legal aid (Articles 11 (2) and 12 of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid). The following persons are eligible for secondary legal aid:

- citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union whose property and annual income do not exceed the property and income levels established by the Government of the Republic of Lithuania for the provision of legal aid;
- citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union as specified in Article 12 of this Law; these persons are eligible for secondary legal aid regardless of property and income levels;
- other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

The procedure for pro bono assistance provided by an advocate is not regulated. There are several advocates who declare on their websites that they provide pro bono assistance.

The procedure for receiving state-guaranteed legal aid is regulated by the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid.

The costs of primary legal aid shall comprise the costs related to legal information, legal advice and drafting of the documents to be submitted to state and municipal institutions, drafting of procedural documents specified in paragraph 7 of Article 15 of this Law, as well as the costs related to advice on the out-of-court settlement of disputes and to actions for the amicable settlement of a dispute and drafting of a settlement agreement. The State shall guarantee and cover 100 per cent of the costs of primary legal aid and the costs of conciliation mediation (Article 14 (1)(6) of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid).

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

There is a list of civil servants of the municipal administrations who provide primary legal aid:

Information about primary legal aid is provided by the State-guaranteed Legal Aid Service.

Vilnius University Legal Clinic is a non-governmental organisation that provides free legal aid. Legal consultations are provided by law students of Vilnius University.
2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There is a publicly available list of experts.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The list of NGOs who declare themselves to be environmental NGOs (NGOs do not have an obligation to be entered on this list, which is therefore not exhaustive) is found here.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

The general timeframe for challenging an administrative decision is one month. There are several kinds of environmental decision which have to be challenged by the administrative body within 10 working days after receipt thereof (e.g. a mandatory instruction according to Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection).

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

An administrative body shall complete the administrative procedure and adopt the decision of the administrative procedure within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. The public entity initiating the administrative procedure may extend the period by up to 10 working days where, for objective reasons, the administrative procedure cannot be completed within the set time limit. A person shall be notified about the extension of the time limit for the administrative procedure in writing or by e-mail (where the complaint has been received by e-mail) and the reasons for the extension (Article 10 (4) of the Law on Public Administration).

Special rules apply regarding complaints challenging a mandatory instruction. A complaint regarding a mandatory instruction submitted to the head of the state environmental control institution or a person authorised by them shall be examined within 10 working days (Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection).

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

According to Article 26 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, before application is made to the administrative court, individual legal acts adopted by public administration entities, as well as their acts/omission, may be, and in cases established by law must be, contested by applying to the institution for preliminary extrajudicial investigation of disputes. There is no general rule in Lithuania that administrative acts must be challenged before a higher administrative authority or an independent dispute body before applying to the court. However, in certain kinds of administrative disputes the internal control of administrative acts/omission is compulsory (e.g. social security disputes, tax disputes). There are several kinds of environmental decision where internal control is compulsory (e.g. mandatory instructions). In other cases, the applicant, as a general rule, is entitled to have recourse to the court directly.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

The decision of the court shall be drawn up and announced, as a rule, on the same day after the hearing of the case (Article 84 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). After hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 working days, and after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of a regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month. In the case of important reasons, at the reasoned request of the judge hearing the case or the member(s) of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or their appointed judge may extend such time limits by means of a reasoned ruling for no more than ten working days. In the event of illness of the judge hearing the case or all members of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or a judge appointed by them, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, or in the event of illness of one or several members of the chamber of judges examining the case, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, the remaining (participating) member(s) of the chamber of judges may extend this time limit by means of a ruling until the objective reason no longer applies (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The procedural actions in the court shall be performed within the time limits set by the Law on Administrative Proceedings. Where the time limits have not been set by law, they shall be set by the court. The court may grant an extension of the time limits it has set (Article 64 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The main time limits according the Law on Administrative Proceedings are:

- the claimant has a right to specify, change the basis of complaint/application/petition or the subject matter within fourteen calendar days from the day of receipt of the replies from the parties to the proceedings (Article 50 (3));
- the respondent and the third interested person have to present to the court their opinions within the specified time limit, which is usually at least fourteen calendar days from the day of receipt of a transcript (digital copy) of complaint/application/petition (Article 67 (1)(3) and Article 71);
- the decisions of regional administrative courts, adopted when hearing cases in the first instance, may be appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania within thirty days from pronouncement of the decision (Article 132 (1));
- the parties have to submit their detailed replies to the appeal within fourteen calendar days from receipt of a transcript of the appeal and annexes thereto (Article 139 (2));

A petition for renewal of the proceedings may be filed within three months from the day when the entity who filed it learned or should have learned of the circumstances furnishing grounds for renewal of the proceedings (Article 159 (1));

the parties have a right to submit a response to the petition on the renewal of proceedings within fourteen calendar days from the day of receipt of a copy of petition on the renewal of proceedings (Article 161 (2));

if an appeal has been filed against an order made in the manner prescribed by law when hearing a case in the absence of the parties, a separate appeal may be filed within seven days after delivery of a transcript (copy) of the order (Article 152 (3)).

The procedural actions for the administrative review before the competent authority shall be performed within the time limits set by the competent authority (Article 12 (3) of the Law on Public Administration).

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

The appeal or action submitted to the court against the administrative decision does not have a suspensive effect except in respect of certain decisions (e.g. tax decisions, decision on deportations or returns). Only the court can suspend the administrative decision by means of applying interim measures. Usually, administrative decisions can be immediately executed after their adoption (enforcement), irrespective of an appeal.

In certain kinds of administrative dispute, the internal control of administrative acts/omission is compulsory (e.g. social security disputes). In these cases, an administrative decision of the first competent authority is not implemented before the decision of the second authority.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

Only the court can apply interim measures. The authority shall suspend execution of the decision until any errors are corrected where such errors may have a significant influence on the execution of the decision (Article 15 (2) of the Law on Public Administration).

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures might lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. Provisional measures may also be applied in cases where temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

It is not regulated under what conditions an administrative decision can be immediately executed.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

The administrative decision is not suspended, but in practice a lot of challenged decisions are not executed.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

Appeal against rulings of the court regarding interim measures is possible. Only in civil cases does the court have a right to require a deposit from the applicant for applying for interim measures (Article 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure). The deposit is intended to protect the defendant against losses incurred as a result of the interim measures applied to them. The deposit could also be the bank guarantee.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

In administrative courts, the applicant should pay a court fee (30 EUR in the first instance administrative court and 15 EUR in the appeal instance). There are exemptions, however, in cases of complaint in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include:

- costs paid to witnesses, interpreters, specialists, experts and organisations of experts;
- costs for payment of legal services of the lawyer or assistant lawyer (costs of consultations of the lawyer and assistant lawyer, assistance with the preparation and submission of procedural documents and participation in the court proceedings);
- other necessary and reasonable expenses.

In civil courts, applicants have to pay a court fee. There are exemptions in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damage in relation to a physical personal injury or death, in cases concerning the defence of the public interest under the claim of the prosecutor, public institutions or other persons. Other litigation-related costs include:

- costs paid to witnesses, experts, authorities and interpreters, and costs associated with on-site inspections;
- costs of searching for the defendant;
- costs associated with the service of delivery of documents;
- costs related to enforcement of judgments;
- costs related to the salary of the curator;
- costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants;
- costs associated with the application for interim relief;
- other necessary and reasonable expenses.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

There are differences between administrative and civil proceedings. In administrative proceedings, in the case of an injunctive relief or interim measure a deposit (cross-undertaking in damages) is not needed (it is not foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The Code of Civil Procedure establishes the court’s right to require a deposit from the applicant for applying for interim measures (Article 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure). The deposit is intended to protect the defendant against losses incurred as a result of the interim measures applied to them. The deposit could also be the bank guarantee. The amount of the deposit depends on the case and is quite difficult to evaluate generally.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania shall be eligible for legal aid (Article 11 of Law on State-Guaranteed Legal Aid).

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

State-guaranteed legal aid is not foreseen for associations, legal persons and NGOs. Pro bono assistance is possible for all persons (including legal persons and NGOs). The procedure of pro bono assistance is not regulated by law. It is a voluntary decision of the advocate. Primary legal aid for NGOs is available from the Vilnius University Legal Clinic.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

There are no other financial mechanisms available.

6) Does the 'loser party pays' principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The general rule is that the losing party has to bear all costs, including stamp duties and costs related to initial court proceedings. The party shall also be obliged to remunerate the costs of the winning party. Stamp duty, expert costs and other costs are usually paid in full, but the costs for legal representation are reduced as recommended by the Minister of Justice and the Chairman of the Bar. However, these amounts are only recommended and depend on the complexity of the court proceedings, case material and other factors. Nevertheless, in the absolute majority of civil and administrative cases state courts reduce parties’ requested legal expenses for their legal assistance according to the recommended amounts and reasonableness.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

Complaints/petitions shall be received and heard by the administrative courts only after payment of the stamp duty prescribed by the law. Several exemptions from the stamp duty are foreseen in Article 36 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, e.g.:

- complaints/petitions relating to delay by entities of public administration in performing actions assigned within the remit of their competence, awarding of or refusal to award pensions, violations of election laws and the Law on Referendum, petitions by state servants and municipal employees where such concern legal relations in the Office, compensation for damage inflicted upon a natural person or organisation by unlawful acts/omissions in the sphere of public administration, and complaints relating to the protection of public interests and some other complaints/petitions.

Having regard to the property status of a natural person or group of natural persons, the administrative court may grant full or partial exemption from stamp duty. The petition for exempting the natural person from stamp duty must be justified and substantiated by appropriate evidence (Article 37 of Law on Administrative Proceedings).
1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

Information about access to environmental information is provided on the website of the Ministry of Environment.

The procedure for access to information is regulated by the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information, approved by Government Resolution Number 1175 of 1999, with subsequent amendments.

The request can be made in writing or verbally. The information can be given verbally only if the applicant does not ask for a written answer. The requirements for the written request are: name, contact details, requested information, form of giving the information.

The applicant does not have to state an interest. If an applicant requests that information be made available in a specific form (including in the form of copies), the public authority shall make it so available (there are some exceptions foreseen in Articles 16 and 18 of the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information). The information shall be made available to an applicant within 14 calendar days after receipt of the request by the public authority. This term can be extended to at least 14 calendar days.

An applicant who considers that their request for environmental information has been ignored, wrongly refused or inadequately answered has access to a review procedure before an administrative disputes commission or an administrative court. Alongside the establishment of administrative courts, the general procedure of pre-litigation of complaints (applications) contesting the adopted individual administrative acts in the sphere of public administration was established by the Law on Pre-Trial Resolution of Administrative Disputes. The law provides for the establishment of the Lithuanian Administrative Dispute Commission.

The Order on Public Access to Environmental Information is applicable for all state institutions, other persons performing the functions of public administration, and other persons who are controlled by the state institutions whose activity has an impact on the environment.

The Order on Public Access to Environmental Information is not applicable to information about the air, water and waste management plans and programmes.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

Taking into consideration that the procedure on access to environmental information set out in the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information essentially does not differ from the general procedure on access to information from public administration entities, general regulations apply.

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before courts.

The applicant should request information from any public administration entity. Different environmental procedures set obligations event for the private actors to provide information for the public (e.g. EIA procedure).

A general provision applies that the appeal (access to justice) procedure should be described in every written answer provided by the public administration entity where the written request to provide information is rejected or partly rejected.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

These are the sectoral rules regarding the access to information:

- regarding EIA: in the course of a screening for environmental impact assessment and an environmental impact assessment, the public concerned shall have the right to obtain information on the potential environmental impact of the proposed economic activity from other participants in the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment (Article 13 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity (EIA)).

- regarding IPPC/IED: the Environmental Protection Agency is responsible for providing the information and is obliged to ensure the availability of information on access to justice (Article 69 and 125 of the Rules on Issuance, Renewal and Cancellation of IPPC Permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania Order Number D1-628 in 2013; Article 3.2.4 and 57 of the Rules on Issuance, Renewal and Cancellation of Pollution Permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania Order Number D1-259 in 2016).

- regarding territorial planning documents: the publicity of territorial planning is ensured by the organiser of planning (Article 31 of the Law on Territorial Planning; Article 8.3 of the Rules on Strategic Impact Assessment of Plans and Programmes, approved by Government Order Number 967 of 2004). The general and simplified procedure for territorial planning document publicity procedures is based on the type and level of territorial planning documents, as established in the Regulations on the Provision of Information to the Public, Public Consultation and Participation in Adopting Decisions Relating to Territorial Planning approved by Government Order Number 1079 of 1996);

- regarding air protection: according to Article 16 of the Law on Ambient Air Protection, persons have the right to obtain correct information from state administration and self-government institutions concerning the condition of ambient air, normative standards of allowable pollution and the effect of planned economic activities;

- regarding water protection: according to Article 27 of the Law on Water, the Ministry of the Environment and other institutions and persons who have information about river basins are obliged to provide this information to the public; according to Article 4 of the Law on Drinking Water, the municipal institutions are responsible for providing information about the quality of drinking water.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, an individual administrative act must contain clearly formulated established or granted rights and duties, and specify the appeal procedure.

According to Article 87 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the appeal procedure and timeline for appeal should be provided in the judgment.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

EIA screening decisions are administrative decisions and can be reviewed by administrative courts. The conditions regarding legal standing, rules of evidence, rules on hearing or extent of review by the court are not specific for these cases.

According to Article 15 of the Law on EIA, the public has the right to refer to court if it considers that its application filed in accordance with the procedure laid down by the legal acts governing the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment has been unlawfully dismissed, has been provided with a partially or completely inappropriate response or has not been given proper regard in accordance with the legal acts governing the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment. The public concerned has the right to refer to court disputing the substantive or procedural legitimacy of decisions, acts or omissions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment.

Natural or legal persons have the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an administrative act if their rights have been infringed upon. In the cases prescribed by law, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the state or another public interest (including environmental interest). Agencies, organisations and groups may lodge an appeal against measures affecting their own interests (existence, estate, activity, operating conditions) as well as asking for damages for the material and moral damage they suffer. But they may also go to court to defend the public interest of those they represent insofar as the regulatory or individual disputed measure harms this public interest.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The public concerned has the right to refer to court disputing all decisions, acts or omissions in the areas of environmental impact assessment. The scoping decisions are included.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

A complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

All decisions in the area of environmental impact assessment, including the final EIA decision, can be challenged. A foreign NGO has the same rights to lodge a complaint concerning a final EIA decision as a national NGO.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged to "actively" participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

All decisions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment can be challenged directly before the court.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

The requirement of a necessary interest to have the power to act is at the very head of the conditions for an appeal's admissibility. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the EIA procedure or to make comments to have standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an EIA administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 15 of the Law on EIA).

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure.

10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

The Law on EIA sets out the terms for particular actions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment, e.g.: a screening conclusion on whether an environmental impact assessment is obligatory shall be submitted in writing to the organiser (developer) of the proposed economic activity within 20 working days from receipt of the screening information (Article 7 (7)); the competent authority shall, within 10 working days from receipt of the programme, approve the programme or submit reasoned requests to the drafter of environmental impact assessment documents to supplement or revise the programme (Article 8 (9)); the public concerned has the right to submit to the competent authority, within 10 working days from publication of the notice, written proposals on the environmental impact assessment of the proposed economic activity and the report (Article 10 (9)); the competent authority shall, within 25 working days from receipt of the report, adopt a decision regarding the environmental impact of the proposed economic activity (Article 11 (1)).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in administrative cases in all matters. According to Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may, upon a motivated petition of the participants in the proceedings or upon their own initiative, take measures with a view to securing a claim. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. There are no special rules applicable to EIA procedures.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

The public concerned and NGOs have the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an administrative act in the area of the IPPC (Article 124 of the Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania Order Number D1-528 in 2013 (IPPC rules)).

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

A complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand.

The public concerned has the right to receive information about the application for a permit, to submit proposals regarding the application and permit, and to receive an answer regarding their proposals from the competent authority.

The public concerned and NGOs have the right to challenge a final IPPC decision. A foreign NGO has the same rights to lodge a complaint concerning an IPPC decision as a national NGO.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no screening and scoping phases in the IPPC procedure. The IPPC procedure has two stages: approval of the application for a permit and adoption of the final IPPC decision. The EIA procedure is considered as a separate procedure. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning a final administrative act in the area of the IPPC.
4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no screening and scoping phases in the IPPC procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
In Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the area of IPPC.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
According to Article 124 of the IPPC rules, the public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning a final administrative act in the area of the IPPC. According Article 92 of the Rules on Issuance, Renewal and Cancellation on Emissions Permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania, Order No D1-259 in 2014 (EP rules) the decisions in the area of the emissions permits can be challenged alternatively before the administrative dispute commission or before the administrative court. According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings and the Law on Environmental Protection, the public has the right to challenge the final emissions permit decision.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. All information related to the application for a permit can be controlled by the court. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the area of the IPPC.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
There is no requirement for exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedure. Decisions in the area of IPPC can be challenged before the administrative court (Article 124 of the IPPC rules). Decisions in the area of emissions permits can be challenged before the administrative dispute commission or before the administrative court (Article 92 of the EP rules).

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
The requirement of a necessary interest to have the power to act is at the very head of the conditions for an appeal’s admissibility. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the IPPC or EP procedure or to make comments to have standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an IPPC administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 124 of the IPPC rules).

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
The IPPC rules and the EP rules set out the terms for particular actions in the areas of IPPC permit procedure and EP procedure, e.g.: the authority shall, within 30 working days from receipt of the application, take a decision accepting or rejecting the application (Article 36-2 of the IPPC rules); the authority shall, within 20 working days from accepting the application, take a permit decision (Article 83 of the IPPC rules); the operator has a right to receive a draft of the permit decision and to comment on it no later than 5 working days before the competent authority reaches a decision (Article 87 of the IPPC rules); the competent authority shall, within 20 working days from accepting the application, adopt a permit decision (Article 85 of the EP rules).

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief is available in administrative cases in all matters. According to Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may, upon a motivated petition of the participants in the proceedings or upon their own initiative, take measures with a view to securing a claim. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. There are no special rules applicable to IPPC and EP procedures.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, an individual administrative act must contain clearly formulated established or granted rights and duties, and specify the appeal procedure. According to Article 125 of the IPPC rules, the authority is obliged to ensure the availability of information on access to justice.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[3]
Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned have the right to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and demanding that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished. According to Article 4 (1) of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection, natural and legal persons have a right to challenge the decisions or acts/failure to act of officials and environmental authorities. The common requirements are set out in the Law on Administrative Proceedings. There are no special requirements regarding decisions on environmental remediation.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are several kinds of environmental decision which have to be challenged by the administrative body within 10 working days after receipt thereof (e.g. a mandatory instruction according Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection). Only the person against whom the decision has been taken has the right to challenge such decisions.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
If the applicant demands that the competent authority take action to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, there is no requirement regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
There are no special requirements regarding decisions in the area of environmental damage. A person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall, within 3 working days, be notified about the adopted decision on the administrative procedure, the factual circumstances determined during the consideration of the complaint, the legal acts based on which the decision on the administrative procedure has been adopted, as well as the procedure for appealing the decision. The decision on the administrative procedure shall be delivered or sent to the person with respect to whom the procedure is initiated (Article 13 of the Law on Public Administration).

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
In the presence of an imminent threat of environmental damage, an economic entity must, without delay, take all necessary preventive measures. Where, despite the preventive measures taken by the economic entity, the imminent threat of environmental damage is not dispelled, the economic entity must immediately inform the Ministry of Environment or an institution authorised by it (Article 32-1 of the Law on Environmental Protection).

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The competent authority is the Environmental Protection Department under the Ministry of Environment.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
There is no requirement in environmental damage cases concerning the prior administrative review procedure.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Article 34 of the Law on Environmental Protection provides that disputes between legal and natural persons of the Republic of Lithuania and foreign states shall be settled in the manner established by the law of the Republic of Lithuania, unless international agreements of the Republic of Lithuania provide otherwise. The admissibility of an action before a court is possible under the general conditions set out in the Law on Administrative Proceedings or in the Code of Civil Procedure. There are no specific rules regarding EIA, IPPC, etc.

2) Notion of public concerned?
The concept of public concerned is not specific in a transboundary context. The general rules are applicable (especially concerning the admissibility of requests through the concept of legal interest).

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
Lithuanian administrative law recognises equal access to administrative courts for NGOs residing abroad on the same basis as applicants residing in Lithuania. There is no difference regarding the procedural rights of national NGOs and NGOs residing abroad. There is no secondary legal aid for NGOs in Lithuania.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
Lithuanian administrative law recognises equal access to administrative courts for persons residing abroad on the same basis as applicants residing in Lithuania. There is no difference regarding the procedural rights of the parties. Citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania shall be eligible for primary and secondary legal aid (Article 11 of the Law on State-Guaranteed Legal Aid). There are no legal requirements regarding pro bono assistance provided by advocates.

6) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
Regarding EIA:
Where the proposed economic activity is subject to procedures of transboundary environmental impact assessment, a competent institution shall inform the drafter of environmental impact assessment documents requesting that they prepare and submit to the competent authority a summary of the screening information or a programme which must include information on the proposed economic activity and its potential significant transboundary impact in a bilateral agreement, if available, in the specified language, or in other cases in English and, where requested by an affected state, also in its national language (Article 9 (2) of the Law on EIA). An institution shall dispatch a notice to an affected state accompanied by a description of the proposed economic activity, the available information on the potential significant transboundary impact of the proposed economic activity on the environment, the information on the nature of possible solutions, specify a time period (not less than 25 working days) for submission of a notice of the willingness of the affected state to participate in the process of transboundary environmental impact assessment, and request that the affected state inform the competent authorities and the public of the state (Article 9 (3) of the Law on EIA). A competent institution shall, upon receiving a reply from an affected state concerning its participation in the process of the transboundary environmental impact assessment of the proposed economic activity, inform the organiser (developer) of the proposed economic activity and the drafter of environmental impact assessment documents, who shall be instructed to submit a report, a summary of the relevant information about the proposed economic activity and its potential significant transboundary environmental impact in a bilateral agreement, if available, in the specified language, or in other cases in English and, where requested by the affected state, also in its national language (Article 9 (5) of the Law on EIA).

Regarding IPPC:

If the operation of the installation may have significant impact on the environment of another EU Member State, the drafter of documents should prepare and submit to the competent institution the documents regarding the application for a permit in English (Article 78 of the IPPC rules). The competent institution shall provide the documents to an affected state at the same time as the documents are provided to the public concerned and request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 40 working days from receipt of such information within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institution (Article 9 (6) of the Law on EIA). The appeal against a decision may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no special rules for an affected state to appeal against a decision.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

Regarding EIA:

A competent institution provides the documentation of an environmental impact assessment to an affected state together with information on the environmental impact assessment procedures, the proposed transboundary consultations and the duration thereof, and a request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 30 working days from the date of dispatch within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institution (Article 9 (6) of the Law on EIA). The appeal against a decision may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no special rules for an affected state to appeal against a decision.

Regarding IPPC:

The competent institution shall provide the documents to an affected state at the same time as the documents are provided to the public concerned and request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 40 working days from receipt of such information within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institution (Article 9 (6) of the Law on IPPC). The appeal against a decision may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no special rules for an affected state to appeal against a decision.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Regarding EIA:

Where the proposed economic activity has been subject to transboundary environmental impact assessment procedures, the competent authority shall provide information on the EIA decision to an affected state participating in the process of transboundary environmental impact assessment (Article 11 (12) of the Law on EIA). According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, the EIA decision should specify the appeal procedure.

Regarding IPPC:

There is no special regulation. According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, the IPPC decision should specify the appeal procedure.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Article 9 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that, in the process of administrative cases, decisions are made and published in the Lithuanian language. All documents submitted to the court must be translated into Lithuanian. Where the participant in the proceedings to whom the procedural documents shall be served in a foreign state does not know the Lithuanian language, the administrative court shall be presented with translations of such documents into the language the participant understands or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served, or, in the event that said country has several official languages, into one of the official languages used at the place of delivery. Where the judicial procedural documents have to be sent to the participant in the proceedings who does not know the Lithuanian language and resides in a foreign state, the court shall translate them into one of the languages they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served. Upon the resolution of the judge who is preparing the case for hearing or of the court hearing the case, a document drawn up in another language may be translated at the court session by a translator. Persons who have no command of the Lithuanian language shall be guaranteed the right to have the assistance of an interpreter. The services provided by the interpreter at the court session shall be paid for from the State budget.

Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

9) Any other relevant rules?

No additional information.

[1] The Law on Environmental Protection defines public concerned as one or more natural or legal persons affected or likely to be affected by, or having an interest in, the taking of decisions, acts or omissions in the field of the environment and protection thereof as well as utilisation of natural resources. For the purposes of this definition, the associations and other public legal persons (with the exception of the legal persons established by the State or a municipality or institutions thereof) established in accordance with the procedure laid down by legal acts and promoting environmental protection shall in any case be deemed the public concerned.

[2] See for example, the ruling of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania of 1 June, 1998.

[3] See also case C-529/15.

Last update: 14/09/2016
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content? In particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

All administrative decisions in the environmental area can be challenged before administrative courts according to the general rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings (any interested person can apply to a court for protection of their infringed right, contested right or interest protected under law; the appeal may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission)). Special sectoral legislation can provide special rules on standing.

Administrative procedure law does not include a general rule for an administrative review. But several special legal acts (e.g. the Law on Territorial Planning, the rules regarding informing and participating of the public in decision-making in the preparation of plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management) prescribe such an administrative review as a requirement for a court action. According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, the public has a lot of possibilities for challenging decisions in the area of the environment. In light of the national case-law, access to courts in environmental matters can be considered effective.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The authoritative authority and the court can review both procedural and substantive legality.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

As a general rule, administrative review is not compulsory. Only in the cases prescribed by law is the exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures a requirement of the court action. The largest area of such decisions is decisions concerning territorial planning documents.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

As a general rule, participation in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure is not compulsory. Only in the cases prescribed by law is participation in the public consultation a requirement of the administrative procedure.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

According to Article 3 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the administrative court shall settle disputes over issues of law in public administration. The court shall not offer assessment of the disputed legal acts and actions (omissions) from the point of view of political or economic expediency and shall only establish whether or not, in a particular case, there has been violation of a law or any other legal act, whether or not the entity of public administration has acted within the limits of its discretion, and whether or not the legal act or action (omission) complies with the objectives and tasks for which purpose the institution has been set up and vested with powers.

The administrative court is not bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceeding. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure. The court must explain to the parties their procedural rights and duties, warn them of the consequences of the performance of or non-performance of procedural actions, and assist said persons in exercising their procedural rights (Article 12 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Administrative courts have an obligation to give guidance to the parties in order to ensure that all parties have equal opportunities to present their arguments and submit evidence.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are several categories of case which should be resolved within the time limit set by special laws (e.g. cases about the refusal to issue permits for residence and work in Lithuania or withdrawal of such permits, refusal or cancellation of asylum, cases about dismissal of a public or municipal servant). Environmental cases are not assigned to urgent cases.

The Law on Administrative Proceedings sets out the time limits for the court and for the parties, e.g.: after the court has received a complaint/application/petition, the president or the judge of the administrative court shall, within 7 business days, decide on the issue of acceptance thereof (Article 33 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); as a rule, the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the judge or the court shall hear the petition for securing the claim within no more than 3 business days from receipt thereof, without notifying the respondent and other participants in the proceedings (Article 70 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); after hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 business days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the claimant shall have the right to specify, change the basis of complaint/application/petition or the subject matter within 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of the replies from the parties to the proceedings (Article 50 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the respondent has to present to the court their opinions within the specified time limit, which is usually at least 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of a transcript (digital copy) of the complaint/application/petition (Article 67 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). etc.

The Law on Territorial Planning and other implementing legal acts set out terms for the actions of the organiser of the particular plan, for the institutions and for the public participating in the planning procedure.

6) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in cases of need of temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).
9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he should pay a stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in the electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum of stamp duty) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 15 EUR.

The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

The prevailing party to the proceedings shall be entitled to recover costs from the non-prevailing adverse party (Article 40 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a recommendation from Minister of Justice and the Chairman of Bar concerning lawyer fees (Ministry of Justice Order No. 1R-85 from 2004). Recommended maximum remuneration sizes are calculated using the coefficients which are based on the Lithuanian Government approved the minimum monthly salary. An estimation of lawyer fees in the case of the legal aid is regulated by Order of the Ministry of Justice No 1R-332 from 2020.

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The procedure of the SEA is regulated by the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania On Approval of the Procedure for Strategic Assessment of Environmental Impact of Plans and Programmes (approved by Resolution No. 967 of the Government from 2004) (SEA Resolution). Article 44 of the SEA Resolution sets the common rule that disputes in the area of SEA shall be examined in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws. There are no special rules on standing for individuals and NGOs. The common rules on access to justice of the Law on Administrative Proceedings shall be applied (e.g. one month term, protection of the infringed right or interest protected under law). The special standing rules are foreseen in the special legal acts, e.g. in the Law on the Territorial Planning.

According to Article 6 of the SEA Resolution, the SEA is performed in the cases of:

- preparation of a plan or programme (or amendment to the plan or programme) intended for the development of industry, energy, transport, telecommunications, tourism, agriculture, forestry, fishery, aquaculture, waste management, preparation of a special territorial planning document, detailed plan or land management project which sets the framework for the development of the economic activities listed in Annexes 1 and 2 of the Law on EIA and which is prepared for an area of more than 10 square kilometres; preparation or amendment of a general plan;
- implementation of a plan or programme related to the Natura 2000 sites and the State Service for Protected Areas determines that implementation of such a plan or programme (separately or together with other plans or programmes) may have significant consequences on the Natura 2000 sites;
- during the screening, a decision is made that SEA of a plan or programme is required.

The participation of the individuals and NGOs on decision-making in territorial planning procedure is regulated by the Law on Territorial Planning and the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public information, Consultation and Participation on Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government from 1996). There are special rules regarding access to justice:

According to Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, representatives of the public concerned, other natural and legal persons concerned shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where:

- they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act to these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights;
- due to reasons recognised by the court as serious, they could not have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by the entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act to these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document.

According to Article 49 (6) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the period of limitation for entities defending the public interest to make a claim in relation to contesting the approved territorial planning documents, their solutions or administrative acts approving them shall be 20 working days from the date of issuance of a document permitting construction based on the territorial planning document sought to be contested, but not later than two years from the date of entry into force of the approved territorial planning document. A limitation period of two years provided for in this paragraph shall be definitive.

There are different rules of standing regarding the individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts (plans and programmes fall into one of these categories). According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court with an application for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (part thereof) with a law or a regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, ombudsperson of the Seimas, children rights protection ombudsperson, equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the laws to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation when a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

The public concerned does not have standing for the review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (decision relating to general plan or to special territorial planning document).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged “actively” participate in the proceeding by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limited control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision. Annex 1 of the SEA Resolution sets the criteria for the determination of significance of the impact of plans and programmes. Annex 2 of the SEA Resolution determines information which shall be involved in the report on the SEA. These criteria and information can be controlled by the court.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? According to Article 33 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court shall by virtue of an order declare the complaint not receivable if the claimant has not complied with the procedure for extrajudicial consideration of the case established by the law for the cases of the said category. There is no common rule for all plans and programmes.

Having proof or legal basis for believing that the public interest specified in Article 8(1) of the Law on Territorial Planning has been violated, the public concerned shall have the right to defend the public interest in territorial planning and to apply to the institution protecting the public interest in the field in which the violation of the public interest has been committed or to the prosecutor requesting an investigation of the possible cases of violation of the public interest (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning). So the defence of the public interest in territorial planning is possible before the institution protecting the public interest or the prosecutor.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document representatives of the public concerned, other natural and legal persons concerned shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act of these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, the proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the organiser of planning in writing. The reply provided by the organiser of planning may, within 10 working days, be appealed against to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in the event that temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a special regulation regarding territorial planning documents for projects of importance to the State in Article 23 of the Law on Territorial Planning. No later than within 10 working days from the date of submission by the organiser of planning of the reply to the complaint, the court shall, by its ruling, resolve the issue of whether further procedures of preparation, coordination and approval of the territorial planning document of the project of importance to the State need to be suspended due to the complaint lodged (Article 23 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases concerning complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers' assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses. When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court's judgment is 15 EUR. The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative case. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The prevailing party to the proceedings shall be entitled to recover costs from the non-prevailing adverse party (Article 40 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a recommendation from the Minister of Justice and the Chairman of the Bar concerning lawyers' fees (Ministry of Justice Order No. 1R-85 from 2004). Recommended maximum remuneration sizes are calculated using coefficients based on the Lithuanian Government’s approved minimum monthly salary. An estimation of lawyers’ fees in the case of legal aid is regulated by Order of the Ministry of Justice No. 1R-332 from 2020. There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

Directive 2001/42/EC

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Representatives of the public concerned and other natural and legal persons may be actively involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning. These procedures should be guaranteed for all territorial planning documents which do not fall under the regulation of the SEA Resolution but under the regulation of the Law on Territorial Planning. The participation of individuals and NGOs in decision-making in territorial planning procedure is regulated by the Law on Territorial Planning and the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public Information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996). There are special rules regarding access to justice.
According to Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where:

- they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights;
- for reasons recognised by the court as serious, they could not have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by the entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document.

According to Article 49 (6) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the period of limitation for entities defending the public interest to make a claim in relation to contesting the approved territorial planning documents, their solutions or administrative acts approving them shall be 20 working days from the date of issuance of a document permitting construction based on the territorial planning document sought to be contested, but not later than two years from the date of entry into force of the approved territorial planning document. A limitation period of two years provided for in this paragraph shall be definitive.

There are different rules of standing regarding the individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsman of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsman, the equal opportunities ombudsman, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions. Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There are other plans and programmes which are not territorial planning documents, e.g. land holding projects (land use planning projects for land reform; projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels; projects for taking land for public needs; land consolidation projects) (Article 37 of the Law on Land); plans on protection zones etc.

According to Article 44 of the Law on Land, disputes regarding decisions taken by state and municipal institutions related to land management shall be investigated in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Law on Administrative Proceedings. The land owner or another user may apply for compensation for damage incurred due to the actions of a state or municipal institution when drafting and implementing the land use planning documents to the institution that has taken the decision to approve the land use planning document, or shall have the right to claim damages in the court proceedings. A person must apply to the institution that has taken the decision to approve the land use planning documents not later than within one month after the day they found out about the occurrence of the damage. Disputes regarding the amount of and compensation for damage shall be settled in court in the manner prescribed by law.

There are several special legal acts regulating the participation of the public. E.g., according to Articles 58-61 of the Rules of the Projects of Formation and Rearrangement of Land Parcels, approved by Order of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Environment No. 3D-452/D1-51 of 2004, proposals of representatives of the public regarding projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels shall be submitted to the project organiser in writing. The reply provided by the project organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the National Land Service. A decision of the National Land Service shall be revoked by the court.

In light of the national case-law, access to national courts can be considered effective.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations where they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to Article 33 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court shall, by means of an order, declare the complaint not receivable if the claimant has not complied with the procedure for extrajudicial consideration of the case established by the law for cases of the said category. There is no common rule for all plans and programmes. Having proof or legal basis for believing that the public interest specified in Article 8(1) of the Law on Territorial Planning has been violated, the public concerned shall have the right to defend the public interest in territorial planning and to apply to the institution protecting the public interest in the field in which the violation of the public interest has been committed, or to the prosecutor requesting an investigation of possible cases of violation of the public interest (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

There are several other legal acts which set a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. E.g., proposals of representatives of the public regarding projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels shall be submitted to the project organiser in writing. The reply provided by the project organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the National Land Service. A decision of the National Land Service shall be revoked by the court. According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the planning organiser in writing. The reply provided by the planning organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

4) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There are different rules of standing regarding individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned shall have the right to file, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

The persons have a right to file a complaint regarding the protection of the environment and to ask the court to initiate the review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act.

If there is a special territorial planning document or detailed plan, the information, consultation and participation procedure is regulated by the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996). There is a special legal act which sets out the rules regarding the informing and participation of the public in decision-making in the preparation of plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management (approved by Order of the Minister of Environment No. D-381 from 2005). According to Article 8 of this Order, representatives of the public have a right to submit proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme. According to Articles 12 and 13 of the Order, the institution shall, on its website, provide persons who have submitted proposals with a reasoned reply and shall inform the public about the adoption of the plan or programme and about the reasons.

No other special legal standing rules foreseen in the aforementioned acts.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are different rules of standing regarding individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material technical findings and calculations where they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omissions in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 15 EUR.

The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The procedure of preparing plans and programmes does not depend on whether the basis for the preparation of such plans and programmes comes from the EU, international or national law. The possibility of administrative review or legal challenge before the national courts depends on the type of document and its legal status.

If there is a special territorial planning document or detailed plan, the information, consultation and participation procedure is regulated by the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996). There is a special legal act which sets out the rules regarding the informing and participation of the public in decision-making in the preparation of plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management (approved by Order of the Minister of Environment No. D-381 from 2005). According to Article 8 of this Order, representatives of the public have a right to submit proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme. According to Articles 12 and 13 of the Order, the institution shall, on its website, provide persons who have submitted proposals with a reasoned reply and shall inform the public about the adoption of the plan or programme and about the reasons.

There are no other special legal standing rules foreseen in the aforementioned acts.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are different rules of standing regarding individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned shall have the right to file, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

The persons have a right to file a complaint regarding the protection of the environment and to ask the court to initiate the review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act.

If there is a special territorial planning document or detailed plan, the information, consultation and participation procedure is regulated by the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996).

There is a special legal act which sets out the rules regarding the informing and participation of the public in decision-making in the preparation of plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management (approved by Order of the Minister of Environment No. D-381 from 2005). According to Article 8 of this Order, representatives of the public have a right to submit proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme. According to Articles 12 and 13 of the Order, the institution shall, on its website, provide persons who have submitted proposals with a reasoned reply and shall inform the public about the adoption of the plan or programme and about the reasons.

There are no other special legal standing rules foreseen in the aforementioned acts.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are different rules of standing regarding individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.
There is no general rule that administrative review is necessary prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. The requirement of exhaustion of administrative review shall be foreseen in the special legal acts.

If there is a territorial planning document, Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning sets out the requirement for participation in the publicity procedures of territorial planning, including administrative review.

If there are plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management which fall under the regulation of Order of the Minister of Environment No. D1-381, the submission of the proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme is a requirement for the judicial review.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

According to Article 3 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the administrative court shall settle disputes over issues of law in public administration. The court shall not offer assessment of the disputed legal acts and actions (omissions) from the point of view of political or economic expediency and shall only establish whether or not, in a particular case, there has been violation of a law or any other legal act, whether or not the entity of public administration has acted within the limits of its discretion, and whether or not the legal act or action (omission) complies with the objectives and tasks for which purpose the institution has been set up and vested with powers.

The administrative court is not bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceeding. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure. The court must explain to the parties to the proceedings their procedural rights and duties, warn them of the consequences of the performance or non-performance of procedural actions, and assist said persons in exercising their procedural rights (Article 12 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Administrative courts have an obligation to give guidance to the parties in order to ensure that all parties have equal opportunities to present their arguments and submit evidence.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are several categories of case which should be resolved within the time limit set by special laws (e.g. cases about the refusal to issue permits for residence and work in Lithuania or withdrawal of such permits, refusal or cancellation of asylum, cases about dismissal of a public or municipal servant). Environmental cases are not assigned to urgent cases.

The Law on Administrative Proceedings sets out the time limits for the actions of the court and for the parties, e.g.: after the court has received a complaint/application/petition, the president or the judge of the administrative court shall, within 7 business days, decide on the issue of acceptance thereof (Article 33 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); as a rule, the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the judge or the court shall hear the petition for securing the claim within not more than 3 business days from receipt thereof, without notifying the respondent and other participants in the proceedings (Article 70 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); after hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 business days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the complaint shall have the right to specify, change the basis of complaint/application/petition or the subject matter within 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of the replies from the parties to the proceedings (Article 50 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the respondent has to present to the court their opinions within the specified time limit, which is usually at least 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of a transcript (digital copy) of the complaint/application/petition (Article 67 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings) etc.

The Law on Territorial Planning and other implementing legal acts set out terms for the actions of the organiser of the particular plan, for the institutions and for the public participating in the planning procedure. E.g., according to Article 25 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, prior to commencing the preparation of a document of complex territorial planning, the planning organiser, or a person authorised by them, shall apply in writing to the institutions specified in the Rules for the Preparation of Documents of Complex Territorial Planning requesting that they issue planning conditions within 15 working days (in the case of documents of municipal-level and local-level territorial planning, within ten working days) from the date of receipt of the application. If the planning conditions have not been issued within the set time limit and the planning organiser has not been informed of the reasons for refusal, the planning organiser shall have the right to commence the preparation of the document of complex territorial planning; according to Article 37 (2) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the reply provided by the planning organiser may, within ten working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning, etc.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in the event that temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a special regulation regarding territorial planning documents of projects of importance to the State in Article 23 of the Law on Territorial Planning. Not later than within 10 working days from the date of submission by the planning organiser of the reply to the complaint, the court shall, by its ruling, resolve the issue of whether further procedures of preparation, coordination and approval of the territorial planning document of the project of importance to the State need to be suspended due to the complaint lodged (Article 23 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omissions in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases, 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgement is 15 EUR.
The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative case. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The EU regulatory acts in the environmental area are implemented through laws, resolutions and decisions of the Government, regulatory acts of ministers, heads of Government bodies and other state institutions and bodies and collegial institutions, regulatory acts of municipal institutions. These are normative (regulatory) legal acts. Only subjects foreseen in the Constitution and in the Law on Administrative Proceedings have a right to challenge normative (regulatory) legal acts before courts.

According to Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court shall consider and adopt a decision whether the laws of the Republic of Lithuania and other acts adopted by the Seimas are not in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. The Constitutional Court shall also consider if the following are not in conflict with the Constitution and laws:

acts of the President of the Republic;

acts of the Government of the Republic.

The President of the Republic, the Government, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas and the courts shall have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court. The right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of all above-mentioned legal acts is also granted to any person who believes that a decision adopted on the basis of such a legal act has violated their constitutional rights or freedoms and the person has exhausted all legal remedies. Such a person may apply to the Constitutional Court only where, in the case concerning the decision violating their constitutional rights or freedoms, the final and non-appealable decision on the merits of the case or on rejecting the complaint is adopted by a court of general competence or an administrative court, i.e. such a decision of a court is adopted that precludes any further defence of the violated rights or freedoms of the person before the courts of general competence or the administrative courts. A petition concerning the violated constitutional rights or freedoms may be filed with the Constitutional Court not later than within 4 months of the day that the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force.

According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court with an application for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsman of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsman, the equal opportunities ombudsman, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions. The right to apply to the administrative court with a petition for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act issued by the entity of municipal administration with a law or Government regulation shall also be vested in the Government representatives supervising the activities of municipalities (Article 112 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court. The right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of laws of the Republic of Lithuania and other acts adopted by the Seimas, the Government or the President of the Republic is also granted to any person who believes that a decision adopted on the basis of such a legal act has violated their constitutional rights or freedoms and the person has exhausted all legal remedies.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The competence of the courts regarding review of normative (regulatory) acts is the same as in other administrative matters. Both procedural and substantive legality of the challenged normative (regulatory) act can be reviewed.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
The requirement of the constitutional complaint is the exhaustion of all legal remedies. There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures for contesting of territorial planning documents (general plans, special plans).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

The Law on Legislative Framework sets out the principle of public consultation. According to Article 7 of the Law on Legislative Framework, the public shall have a possibility to submit proposals relating to the legislative initiatives and draft legal acts published in the Legislative Information System, as well as to monitor the carrying out of the legal regulation. The public must be consulted in due time and on essential issues (effectiveness of consultation), and to the extent necessary (proportionality of consultation). Methods of public consultation and ways of recording the results shall be selected by the entities initiating public consultation. Information on the results of public consultation must be provided to the entity adopting a legal act. Participation in the public consultation phase is not necessary.

If the special legal act sets out a requirement for participation in the public consultation phase, it is the requirement for legal standing before the national courts.

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).
According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, the proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the planning organiser in writing. The reply provided by the planning organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

According to Article 67-2 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, having regard to a reasoned request submitted by the petitioner to suspend the execution of the decision of the court, the Constitutional Court may suspend the execution of the decision of the court in exceptional circumstances where the constitutional rights or freedoms of the petitioner would be irremediably violated due to the execution of the decision of the court or where suspending the execution of the decision of the court is necessary for reasons of public interest. A request to suspend the execution of the decision of the court must be submitted together with the respective petition requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with the Constitution or laws.

According to Article 26 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, in cases where the Constitutional Court receives a submission by the President of the Republic or a resolution of the Seimas, the Constitutional Court shall carry out a preliminary investigation within three days. If the Constitutional Court adopts a decision to accept the petition for consideration, the President of the Constitutional Court shall immediately announce that the validity of the act in question is suspended from the day of the official publication of this announcement in the Register of Legal Acts until the ruling of the Constitutional Court concerning this case is published.

According to Article 70 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, provisional measures may be as follows:
- granting of a restraining injunction against certain actions;
- stay of execution under the writ of execution;
- temporary suspension of the validity of the disputed individual legal act, as well as the granting of subjective rights to another person (not the claimant);
- other measures applied by the court or the judge.

The administrative courts have no possibility to suspend the validity of a disputed normative (regulatory) legal act until the announcement of the effective decision of the administrative court on recognition of the relevant regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) as illegal. Where necessary, the administrative court may suspend the validity of the regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) recognised as illegal until the coming into effect of the court decision (Article 118 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court regarding the breach of their rights or interests, general rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings regarding stamp duty and other costs apply. In the case of an abstract application for review of legality of a regulatory administrative act, no stamp duty is required.

According to Article 39 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, expenses incurred by the institutions participating in the case in relation to their attendance and participation in proceedings before the Constitutional Court shall be compensated by the institutions and establishments that they represent.

After, subsequent to a petition by a person, a law or other act of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act of the Government that served as a basis for adopting a decision violating the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person is declared by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with the Constitution or laws, the necessary and justified expenses incurred by the petitioner in relation to participation in the proceedings before the Constitutional Court shall be compensated by the state institution that adopted the legal act (or part thereof) declared to be in conflict with the Constitution. The Government, or an institution authorised by it, shall determine the maximum amounts of compensation for expenses relating to participation in proceedings before the Constitutional Court and the procedure for their payment. Maximum amounts of compensation for expenses are regulated by Order of the Minister of Justice No. 1R-261 in 2019.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[6]

Only subjects foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings can challenge national normative (regulatory) legal acts directly by appeal in court. Other subjects have the right to ask the court to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court. It is only one option to apply directly to the court regarding the decision of the European Commission foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings - the State Data Protection Inspectorate shall submit a petition to apply to a competent legal authority of the European Union regarding the decision of the European Commission to the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania in cases specified in the Law on the Legal Protection of Personal Data (Article 1221 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Having examined the Petition on the Decision of the European Commission, the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania shall adopt one of the following decisions: 1) to apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union with a petition to adopt a prejudicial decision according to Article 267 TFEU; 2) to reject the petition of the State Data Protection Inspectorate on the Decision of the European Commission (Article 1223 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

In other cases, the court applies to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union. Any party in the proceedings may request that the court apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision, but this is at the discretion of the court.

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[2] The Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

[3] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference, see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Last update: 14/09/2016
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

- Remedies against the silence of the administration (the administrative passivity).
  According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned shall have the right, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.
  If the entity of public administration fails to perform its duties or delays the consideration of a certain issue and fails to resolve it by the due date, a complaint about such failure to act (delay in performance) may be lodged within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for settlement of the issue (Article 29 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).
  Personal standing rules are the same as for any other administrative or judicial review procedure. Only those persons whose rights are being breached have standing to challenge the failure to act, whereas standing is granted for environmental NGOs in cases related to their aims and activities.

- Penalties that the judiciary or any other independent and impartial body (information commissioner, ombudsman, prosecutor, etc.) can impose on the public administration for failing to provide effective access to justice.
  According to Article 99 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, after the court decision whereby the complaint/application/petition is met becomes effective, the approved copy (transcript) thereof shall be sent for enforcement by the entity of public administration or other persons whose legal acts or actions (inactions) or delay to perform actions were appealed, or to the entity of public administration representing the State (Government) in the case, as well as the claimant. If the entity of public administration or any other person fails to perform the decision within 15 calendar days or within the time limit set by the court, at the request of the claimant the administrative court which adopted the decision issues a letter of enforcement by also ordering the enforcement thereof by the bailiff according to the location of the seat of the respondent in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Code of Civil Procedure. Where the sums are recovered to the state budget, or in the case of recovery of damage resulting from illegal actions of entities of public administration, as well as in the case of recovery of sums associated with Office-related legal relations or payment of pensions, the court shall issue a letter of enforcement to the recovering entity without the request thereof.
  The Seimas Ombudsman shall investigate claimants’ complaints about the abuse of office by and bureaucracy of officials or other violations of human rights and freedoms in the sphere of public administration (Article 12 of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsman). When performing his duties, the Seimas Ombudsman shall have the right to draw up a record of administrative violations of law for failure to comply with the demands of the Seimas Ombudsman or for interfering in any other way with fulfilment by the Seimas Ombudsman of the rights granted to him (Article 19 (9) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsman).
  The state control of environmental protection and utilisation of natural resources shall be exercised by officials of the system of the Ministry of Environment – state inspectors of environmental protection. According to Article 18 of the Law on Environmental Protection, state inspectors of environmental protection in the cases, and in accordance with the procedure, specified by the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection shall have the right to issue mandatory instructions; draw up statements, acts and other documents in the specified format; hear cases of administrative offences and impose administrative penalties; hear cases of economic sanctions and impose economic sanctions.
  The state control of environmental protection and utilisation of natural resources shall be exercised by officials of the system of the Ministry of Environment – state inspectors of environmental protection. According to Article 31 of the Law on Environmental Protection, state inspectors of environmental protection shall have the right to suspend the construction or reconstruction of objects of economic and other activities, suspend or restrict the activities of legal and natural persons where laws on environmental protection are being violated or where these activities do not comply with the normative standards, rules, limits and other conditions established in respect of environmental protection; in the cases, and in accordance with the procedure specified by the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection and other laws, to issue mandatory instructions, draw up statements, acts and other documents in the specified format; hear cases of administrative offences and impose administrative penalties; hear cases of economic sanctions and impose economic sanctions.
  A state or municipal institution or agency which has compensated for damage caused by a civil servant shall have the right of recourse against said civil servant to the amount paid by it, but not in excess of 9 average salaries of the civil servant. If the civil servant caused the damage deliberately, a state or municipal institution or agency which has compensated for the damage caused by a civil servant shall have the right of recourse against said civil servant to the full amount paid by it (Article 39 of the Law on Civil Service).

- Penalties for the de-facto contempt of the court, e.g. when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected.
  There are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it does not follow and respect the judgment of the court.
  The execution of the court decision is regulated by the Law on Administrative Proceedings and the Code of Civil Procedure. If the court revokes the contested act (or part thereof) and/or obligates the appropriate entity of administration to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (e.g. to guarantee access to justice), the claimant can request that the court issue a letter of enforcement. The claimant can also initiate a new suit challenging this omission/failure and/or asking the court to award damages caused by unlawful actions of public administration entities. According to Article 83 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the judge or the court which hears an administrative case shall be entitled to impose fines if: officers and persons fail to meet, by the set time and without good reason, the requests by the judge or the court for a reply to the complaint/application/petition, documents and other material, or fail to comply with other requirements laid down by the judge/court related to the hearing of the case; a witness, specialist or expert fails to appear, without good reason, before the judge preparing the case for hearing or at the court hearing; after having been given a warning, persons participating in the proceedings again speak out of turn or insult other persons participating in the court proceedings; persons present in the courtroom fail to observe order or disregard the demands of the presiding judge that order be observed; persons abuse the right of disqualification; persons abuse the administrative proceedings. The administrative court may recognise the submission of a clearly unreasoned procedural document, or an objectively unfair action or inaction directed against cost-efficient, expedient and fair examination or resolution of the case as abuse of administrative proceedings.
  The court which hears the administrative case shall have the right to impose on natural persons and legal persons and their representatives a fine in the amount of up to 300 EUR, and on officers or representatives of institution or agencies in the amount of up to 600 EUR for each case of violation, except for the case referred to in paragraph 1 subparagraph 5 of this Article. The court shall have the right to impose a fine on a person abusing the right of disqualification in the amount of up to 1,500 EUR. A separate appeal may be filed against the order of the court of first instance concerning the imposition of a fine.

There are several special norms:

If a person summoned to court fails to appear, they may be brought to the court upon the order of the court or judge. Failure to appear in court or refusal to give evidence, explanations or opinions in the court may be punishable by a fine in the amount of up to 300 EUR or detention in custody for the term of up to one month (Article 58 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

Where injunctions applied as provisional measures are not complied with, the guilty persons shall be given a fine by court order in the amount of up to 300 EUR. A separate appeal may be filed against the order of the court concerning the imposition of a fine (Article 70 (12) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

The court shall have the right to impose a fine of up to 60 EUR on participants in the proceedings for failure to perform the obligation to inform the court of changes in address, email address, telephone and fax numbers, as well as addresses of other means of electronic communication if they are necessary in order to receive the procedural documents by means of electronic communication, where such failure to notify results in deferral of the hearing of the case (Article 76 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

According to Article 72 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, a law (or part thereof) or other act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the ruling of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. The same consequences shall arise where the Constitutional Court gives a ruling that an act of the President of the Republic or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with laws. All state institutions, as well as their officials, must annul the substantive acts adopted by them, or provisions of these substantive acts, if they are based on a legal act that has been ruled to be unconstitutional. Decisions based on legal acts that have been ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution or laws must not be executed if they had not been executed before entry into force of the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court. The legal force of a ruling of the Constitutional Court to declare a legal act or part thereof unconstitutional may not be overruled by the repeated adoption of a like legal act or part thereof.

Last update: 14/09/2016

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Lithuania

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 07/04/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

Articles 53 and 54 of the Constitution and the Law on Environmental Protection set out basic requirements which must be fulfilled. The purpose of the Law on Environmental Protection is to regulate public relations in the field of environmental protection, establish the principal rights and duties of legal and natural persons in preserving the biodiversity, ecological systems and landscape characteristic of the Republic of Lithuania, ensuring a healthy and clean environment, rational utilisation of natural resources in the Republic of Lithuania, the territorial waters, continental shelf and economic zone thereof (Article 2 of the Law on Environmental Protection). Environmental protection is a public interest (Constitutional Court's rulings of 29 October 2003, of 9 May 2014, of 5 March 2015).

A person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to a court (Article 30 (1) of the Constitution). One or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned[1] have the right to file, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect to the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons, or the interests protected under the law be punished; as well as to refer, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, to court where they believe that their application filed in accordance with the procedure laid down by the legal acts regulating the right to obtain information on the environment has been unlawfully dismissed, has been provided with a partially or completely inappropriate response or has not been given proper regard in compliance with the legal acts regulating the right to obtain information on the environment (Article 7 (1) of the Law on Environmental Protection). The public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources (Article 7 (2) of the Law on Environmental Protection).

The state administration of environmental protection shall be carried out by the Government of the Republic, the Ministry of Environment and other institutions under the Ministry of Environment (e.g. the Department of Environmental Protection, the Environmental Protection Agency, the State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, the General Forest Enterprise, the State Protected Areas Service), other special state authorities (e.g. National Parks Directorates) and institutions of local self-government.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

There is no right to a clean, healthy, favourable, etc. environment directly enshrined in the Constitution. But this right can be derived from other Articles of the Constitution[2]. The concept of environmental protection is mentioned in several Articles of the Constitution: “The State and each individual must protect the environment from harmful influence” (Article 53 (3)); “The State shall concern itself with the protection of the natural environment, its fauna and flora, separate objects of nature and particularly valuable districts, and shall supervise the moderate utilization of natural resources, as well as their restoration and augmentation. The exhaustion of land and elements of the earth, water and air pollution, the production of radiation, as well as the impoverishment of fauna and flora, shall be prohibited by law" (Article 54). The Constitution guarantees access to justice: “Any person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to appeal to court” (Article 30 (1)).

Text of the Constitution (English and Lithuanian)

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person can apply to a court for protection of their infringed right, contested right or interest protected under law. Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only applications to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right to an administrative court are admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). These main rules are applicable for different types of procedures and different actors. However, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest. The actors for this possibility include the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons. But this possibility can be used only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). E.g., according to the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before the courts, and in addition the public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources. So if there were a complaint in order to protect the public interest connected with the protection of the environment, this complaint should be admissible because it is prescribed by the Law on Environmental Protection. This rule is used for all matters (not only environmental matters). According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned have the right to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

There are specific rules regarding the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before the courts in the case of environmental impact assessment (Article 15 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity), integrated pollution prevention and control permits (Article 124 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by the Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number D1-528 in 2013), as well as territory planning (Article 49 of the Law on Territory Planning).

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The Supreme Administrative Court develops uniform practice of administrative courts in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. The Supreme Court, as a court of cassation, ensures uniform court practice of courts of general jurisdiction.

There is a distinction between cases about protection of the private interest and the public interest respectively. The protection of the private interest is guaranteed under the Constitution (Article 30). The protection of the public interest is possible only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings) (Supreme Administrative Court’s judgment of 23 September 2013 in case no. A520 - 211/2013). The Law on Environmental Protection foresees the possibility to protect the public interest in environmental matters (Article 7). The Supreme Administrative Court applies the Aarhus Convention directly and decides about the legal status of the person according to the Aarhus Convention (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 29 May 2013 in case no. A602 -/816/2013). The Supreme Administrative Court decided about the requirements for NGOs: they should be active in the area of environmental and environmental protection and should fulfil other requirements under the national law (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 23 September 2013 in case no. A520 - 211/2013). The status of “public concerned” can be qualified according to the Law on Environmental Protection and other laws, for example according to the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity (Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 29 May 2013 in case no. A602 -/816/2013).

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on International environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

The international treaties ratified by the Parliament (Seimas) are a constituent part of the legal system (Article 138 (3) of the Constitution). In cases of dispute, international agreements have primacy over national law (Article 11 (2) of the Law on International Treaties). Parties can rely directly on international law. The Aarhus Convention is effective without any additional national legislation. Administrative bodies and courts have to implement this treaty. The Aarhus Convention is implemented in national legislation.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

-

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

Lithuania has a dual judicial system with ordinary courts of general jurisdiction and administrative courts of special jurisdiction. The courts of general jurisdiction, dealing with civil and criminal matters, are the Supreme Court of Lithuania (1), the Court of Appeal of Lithuania (1) and, at first instance level, the regional courts (5) and the district courts (12). District courts also hear some cases of administrative offences from within their jurisdiction by law. The regional courts, the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Lithuania have a civil division and a criminal division. The Supreme Court of Lithuania is the court reviewing judgments, decisions, rulings and orders of the other courts of general jurisdiction. It develops uniform court practice in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. The Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania (1) and the regional administrative courts (2) are courts of special jurisdiction hearing disputes arising between citizens and administrative bodies from administrative legal relations. The Supreme Administrative Court is a first and final instance court for administrative cases assigned to its jurisdiction by law. It is an appeal instance court for cases concerning decisions, rulings and orders taken by regional administrative courts, as well as for cases involving administrative offences decided by district courts. The Supreme Administrative Court is also an instance Court for hearing, in cases prescribed by law, petitions on the reopening of completed administrative cases, including administrative offences. The Supreme Administrative Court develops uniform practice of administrative courts in the interpretation and application of laws and other legal acts. There are no specialised courts competent to hear specific types of administrative disputes.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no special court rules in the environmental sector. The Administrative Dispute Commission of Lithuania and the administrative courts carry out full review of all administrative acts, including acts in environmental matters. The courts of general jurisdiction deal with environmental damage cases.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

The administrative court can quash the contested administrative act (sometimes part thereof). The court can also oblige the appropriate entity of administration to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The administrative court cannot change the administrative act, but it can oblige the state institution to elaborate (pass) a new administrative act. The decision of the court may contain this new administrative act. There are no special rules in the Law on Administrative Proceedings about cases in environmental matters. There is a possibility of petition for the protection of the State or other public interests, including environmental matters (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

With regard to the preparation for the hearing of the case in the court, the judge shall issue the orders necessary for preparing the hearing without notifying the participants in the proceedings (asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, etc.), except when deciding the issue of ordering the expert examination (Article 67 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). In a court hearing, the judge can “actively” participate in the proceeding too by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court can apply to the Constitutional Court requesting that it determine whether the law or other legal act adopted by the Seimas applicable in the case is in conformity with the Constitution, and whether the acts adopted by the President of the Republic or the Government applicable in the case are in compliance with the Constitution and laws. The court can also apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union on its own motion.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The state administration of environmental protection shall be carried out by the Government of the Republic, the Ministry of Environment and other institutions under the Ministry of Environment (e.g. the Department of Environmental Protection, the Environmental Protection Agency, the State Territorial Planning and Construction Inspectorate, the General Forest Enterprise, the State Protected Areas Service), other special state authorities (e.g. the National Parks Directorates) and institutions of local self-government. The administrative procedure is regulated by the Law on Public Administration for all matters of administrative law. There are no specific rules for environmental matters. The administrative procedure shall be completed and the decision on the administrative procedure shall be adopted within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. This term can be extended for a period not longer than 10 working days (Article 10 (4) of the Law on Public Administration).

The Lithuanian legal system provides for both mandatory and optional prelitigation procedures. According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, before application is made to the administrative court individual legal acts adopted by public administration entities provided for by law, as well as their acts/omission may be, and in the cases established by the law must be, contested by applying to the institution for preliminary extrajudicial investigation of disputes (Article 26 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). In cases of mandatory prelitigation procedures, a certain body of pretrial investigation generally belongs to the internal organisational system of particular institutions of public administration and the examination of administrative disputes is one of its functions. In cases of optional prelitigation procedures, the individual is given the freedom of choice. An appeal may be lodged before the body for preliminary extrajudicial investigation or directly before the administrative court. The key authority of such pretrial investigation is the Lithuanian Administrative Disputes Commission. The Lithuanian Administrative Disputes Commission is composed by the Government of the Republic of Lithuania for the period of 4 years. This commission consists of members having higher legal education (Article 3 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure).

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

A person shall have the right to appeal against a decision on the administrative procedure adopted by an entity of public administration, at his own choice, either to an administrative disputes commission or to an administrative court in accordance with the procedure set out in law (Article 14 of the Law on Public Administration).

The administrative court can revoke the decisions made by competent authorities (or part thereof) or obligate the competent authority to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (Article 88 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no specific rules concerning environmental matters for the procedure before administrative courts.

The ordinary courts deal with cases concerning environmental liability. The possibility to claim compensation for damage is foreseen in Articles 32-34 of the Law on Environmental Protection. There are several possibilities for enforcing environmental liability. Each possibility is based on specific conditions. The person can ask the competent authority to act if the environment is damaged. The decision made by the competent authority can be appealed before the administrative court.

Legal and natural persons whose health, property or interests have been damaged can make direct claims for damages before ordinary courts. Competent officers can make such claims when damage has been done to the interests of the State.

Complaints (applications) lodged with the administrative disputes commission must be considered and a decision thereon must be taken within 20 working days after receipt thereof (this term can be extended for a period not longer than 10 working days) (Article 12 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure). The decision should be taken within 3 working days upon completion of the hearing of the case (Article 19 of the Law on Pre-trial Administrative Disputes Settlement Procedure).

The decision of the court shall be drawn up and announced, as a rule, on the same day after the hearing of the case (Article 84 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). After hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 working days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of a regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month. In the case of important reasons, at the reasoned request of the judge hearing the case or the member(s) of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or their appointed judge may extend such time limits by a reasoned ruling for no more than ten working days. In the event of illness of the judge hearing the case or all members of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or a judge appointed by them, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, or in the event of illness of one or several members of the chamber of judges examining the case, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, the remaining (participating) member(s) of the chamber of judges may extend this time limit by means of a ruling until the objective reason no longer applies (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no regulation in the law of how much time it should take between lodging a complaint and its hearing. There are several terms foreseen for the preparation of the case and of the hearing (as a rule the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the ruling to assign the case to be examined in the court hearing usually has to be adopted no later than one month before the day of the court meeting (Article 64 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special courts, tribunals or environmental boards in Lithuania. The Administrative Dispute Commission of Lithuania and the administrative courts carry out full review of all administrative acts, including acts in environmental matters.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person can challenge an administrative act before a regional administrative court. Applications to an administrative court to protect an individual’s infringed or protective right (Article 5) are admissible, as are applications to protect the state or other public interest (Article 55).

The decisions of regional administrative courts, adopted when hearing the cases in the first instance, may be appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania within 30 days from the pronouncement of the decision (Article 132 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

All court are likely to be applied in all matters. There are no specific rules in the environmental area.

The court shall suspend the hearing of the case when it applies to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the preliminary ruling on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union (Article 100 (1)(9)) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The ruling to suspend the hearing of the case regarding the application to a competent judicial authority of the European Union cannot be appealed (Article 100 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

There is a possibility to settle administrative disputes (including environmental disputes) by judicial mediation. The court asks the parties for their opinion regarding the intention and possibilities to resolve the dispute by judicial mediation (Article 71 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The Ombudsman cannot bring a claim before the administrative court against the individual administrative decision. But he can apply to the administrative court with a request to investigate conformity of an administrative regulatory enactment (or part thereof) with the law or Government resolution (Article 19 (1 (10)) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsmen). He can recommend that the prosecutor apply to the court according to the procedure prescribed by law for the protection of public interest (Article 19 (1(16)) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsmen). The public prosecutor can defend the public interest before administrative courts (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Other state institutions have legal standing to act before administrative courts either when it is in their own interest to claim or to defend, or when they are defending the public interest.

The Seimas Ombudsmen's Office

The protection of public interest by the public prosecutor

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only application to an administrative court as an individual in order to protect their own infringed or contested right or interest is admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). It is possible to bring a complaint to protect the State or other public interest laid down for the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons, but only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). A complaint/petition may be filed with the administrative court within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand. If the public or internal administration entity delays consideration of a certain issue and fails to resolve it by the due date, a complaint about the failure to act (in such delay) may be lodged within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for the settlement of the issue. No time limits shall be set for the filing of petitions for the review of the lawfulness of administrative legal acts by the administrative courts (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

NGOs can bring a complaint in order to protect their own and their members' infringed or contested rights or interests, or to protect the State or other public interest in the cases prescribed by law. The public concerned, as defined is Article 7 (2) of the Law on Environmental Protection, has the right to bring a complaint to protect the State or other public interest.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

There are additional rules regarding the possibility for the public concerned to bring a claim before courts in the case of environmental impact assessment (Article 15 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity) and integrated pollution prevention and control permits (Article 124 of Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by the Ministry of Environment of Lithuania - Order Number D1-528 in 2013), as well as territory planning (Article 49 of the Law on Territory Planning).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, any interested person (individuals, NGOs) can apply to a court for protection of their infringed right, contested right or interest protected under law. Any applicant who challenges an administrative act has to demonstrate a particular interest in the annulment of this act. Only applications to an administrative court to protect an individual's infringed or protective right are admissible (Article 5 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). These main rules are applicable for different types of procedure (first instance, appeal instance) and different actors (individuals, NGOs).

However, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the State or other public interest. The actors for this possibility include the prosecutor, entities of administration, state control officers, other state institutions, agencies, organisations or natural persons. But this possibility can be used only in the cases prescribed by law (Article 55 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). E.g., according to the Law on Environmental Protection the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before the courts, and in addition the public concerned has the right to refer to court for defence of public interest challenging the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions in the area of the environment and environmental protection as well as utilisation of natural resources. So if there were a complaint in order to protect the public interest connected with the protection of the environment, this complaint should be admissible because it is prescribed by the Law on Environmental Protection. This rule is used for all matters (not only environmental matters).

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Article 9 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that, in the process of administrative cases, decisions should be made and published in the Lithuanian language. All documents submitted to the court must be translated into Lithuanian. Where the participant in the proceedings to whom the procedural documents shall be served in a foreign state does not know the Lithuanian language, the administrative court shall be presented with translations of such documents into the language they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served, or, in the event that said country has several official languages, into one of the official language used at the place of delivery. Where the judicial procedural documents have to be sent to the participant in the proceedings who does not know the Lithuanian language and resides in a foreign state, the court shall translate them into one of the languages they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served. Upon the resolution of the judge who is preparing the case for hearing or of the court hearing the case, a document drawn up in another language may be translated at the court session by a translator. Persons who have no command of the Lithuanian language shall be guaranteed the right to have the assistance of an interpreter. The services provided by the interpreter at the court session shall be paid for from the State budget.

Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Parties and other persons present the evidence for the proceedings. The parties must prove the circumstances on which they base their claims and responses. In administrative and civil proceedings, the evidence includes: explanations of the parties and third parties (given directly or through representatives), witness evidence, written evidence, real evidence, statements of examination, expert evidence. The parties and other participants submit evidence to the court. If necessary, the court can allow those persons to submit additional evidence at the person’s request or may, on its own initiative, demand the necessary documents or request submissions from the officials. In civil proceedings, the court has the right to collect evidence on its own initiative only in exceptional cases prescribed by the law, such as in family cases and labour cases. The court may also demand and obtain evidence from the other party or third parties at another party’s request.

No evidence before the courts has a predetermined value. The court evaluates the evidence according to its own inner conviction based on a thorough, comprehensive and objective examination of the facts in accordance with the law, as well as justice and reasonableness criteria. Judges must actively participate in the collection of evidence, in the establishment of all significant circumstances of the case, and must make a comprehensive and objective examination thereof.

In the administrative review procedure, the entity of public administration may demand only such documents and information as is not available in the state registers and other state or municipal information systems, except for cases where such documents and information must be provided under laws. The deadline must be set for the provision of the documents and information. It shall be allowed to make a repeated demand for documents and information from the persons in respect of whom the administrative procedure has been initiated only in exceptional cases and with proper substantiation of the necessity for such documents and information. An entity of public administration may request the assistance of another entity of public administration in adopting the decision on the administrative procedure. Where institutional assistance can be rendered by several entities of public administration, the entity of public administration of the lower level shall first be addressed. Institutional assistance rendered by one entity of public administration to another entity of public administration shall be free of charge (Article 12 of the Law on Public Administration).

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

In administrative proceedings, parties can introduce new evidence up to the end of the hearing on merits. In civil proceedings, parties can introduce new evidence up to the end of the preparation for the hearing on the merits.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

Parties can submit expert opinions with other evidence to the court. Specialist explanations, opinions or conclusions gathered by the parties to the proceedings on their own initiative are not admitted as expert evidence. They are regarded as pieces of written evidence. The court decides either on its own initiative or at the request of the parties whether to order an expert examination in the proceedings. Usually an expert is ordered to examine certain issues arising in the case when the court needs special scientific, medical, artistic, technical or professional knowledge.

There is publicly available list of experts.

Expert opinions, like other evidence, do not have a predetermined value for the court. They are not binding on judges.

The amounts payable to experts and organisations of experts shall be paid in advance by the party which made a request for experts (Article 39 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). If the request has been made by both parties, or if the experts are summoned or the examination is carried out on the initiative of the court, the required amounts shall be paid in by the parties to the proceedings in equal amounts. The specified amounts shall be paid into a special bank account of the court. Having regard to the property status of the natural person or group of natural persons, the administrative court may fully or in part exempt them from payment into the special court account of the amounts specified in this Article. The request for exemption from payment into the account of the said amounts must be justified and substantiated by relevant evidence. The aggrieved party may also be exempted from payment into the account of the amounts indicated in this Article.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

The Forensic Science Centre of Lithuania (FSCL) is a governmental institution of public administration whose main task is to carry out forensic examinations required by courts and other pre-trial investigation institutions. The fees are regulated by the normative acts of this institution.

The fees of private experts are not regulated. No procedural fees exist.

The amounts payable to witnesses, specialists, experts and organisations of experts shall be paid in advance by the party which made a request to summon witnesses, specialists or experts (Article 39 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). If the requests have been made by both parties, or if the witnesses, specialists and experts are summoned or the examination is carried out on the initiative of the court, the required amounts shall be paid in by the parties to the proceedings in equal amounts (Article 39 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible Internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Parties can represent their interests in administrative courts themselves or through representatives. In administrative courts, the participation of lawyers is not compulsory in judicial procedures (including in environmental matters). A lawyer is compulsory before the cassation court (the Supreme Court of Lithuania) (e.g. in cases of environmental damage or in criminal cases). Generally, compulsory participation is required in criminal proceedings in all courts of general jurisdiction.

Lists of lawyers can be found on the following websites:

- https://www.advokatura.lt/savitama
- https://www.advokatura.lt/irasai/advokatu-paieska
- https://www.infolex.lt

A list of lawyers specialising in environmental matters can be found here.
1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance
An advocate can provide legal services free of charge, i.e. as legal aid (Article 4 (5) of the Law on the Bar). An advocate decides if they will provide legal services free of charge. This service is pro bono assistance and not necessarily legal aid.
All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania are eligible for primary legal aid (Article 11 (1) of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid). The secondary legal aid is foreseen only for natural persons who prove their right to receive secondary state-guaranteed legal aid (Articles 11 (2) and 12 of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid). The following persons are eligible for secondary legal aid:
citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union whose property and annual income do not exceed the property and income levels established by the Government of the Republic of Lithuania for the provision of legal aid;
citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union as specified in Article 12 of this Law; these persons are eligible for secondary legal aid regardless of property and income levels;
other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?
The procedure for pro bono assistance provided by an advocate is not regulated. There are several advocates who declare on their websites that they provide pro bono assistance.
The procedure for receiving state-guaranteed legal aid is regulated by the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid.
The costs of primary legal aid shall comprise the costs related to legal information, legal advice and drafting of the documents to be submitted to state and municipal institutions, drafting of procedural documents specified in paragraph 7 of Article 15 of this Law, as well as the costs related to advice on the out-of-court settlement of disputes and to actions for the amicable settlement of a dispute and drafting of a settlement agreement. The State shall guarantee and cover 100 per cent of the costs of primary legal aid and the costs of conciliation mediation (Article 14 (1)(6) of the Law On State-Guaranteed Legal Aid).

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?
There is a list of civil servants of the municipal administrations who provide primary legal aid:
Information about primary legal aid is provided by the State-guaranteed Legal Aid Service.
Vilnius University Legal Clinic is a non-governmental organisation that provides free legal aid. Legal consultations are provided by law students of Vilnius University.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts
There is a publicly available list of experts.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible
The list of NGOs who declare themselves to be environmental NGOs (NGOs do not have an obligation to be entered on this list, which is therefore not exhaustive) is found here.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits
1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
The general timeframe for challenging an administrative decision is one month. There are several kinds of environmental decision which have to be challenged by the administrative body within 10 working days after receipt thereof (e.g. a mandatory instruction according to Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection).

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
An administrative body shall complete the administrative procedure and adopt the decision of the administrative procedure within 20 working days from the beginning of the procedure. The public entity initiating the administrative procedure may extend the period by up to 10 working days where, for objective reasons, the administrative procedure cannot be completed within the set time limit. A person shall be notified about the extension of the time limit for the administrative procedure in writing or by e-mail (where the complaint has been received by e-mail) and the reasons for the extension (Article 10 (4) of the Law on Public Administration).
Special rules apply regarding complaints challenging a mandatory instruction. A complaint regarding a mandatory instruction submitted to the head of the state environmental control institution or a person authorised by them shall be examined within 10 working days (Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection).

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?
According to Article 26 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, before application is made to the administrative court, individual legal acts adopted by public administration entities, as well as their acts/omission, may be, and in cases established by law must be, contested by applying to the institution for preliminary extrajudicial investigation of disputes. There is no general rule in Lithuania that administrative acts must be challenged before a higher administrative authority or an independent dispute body before applying to the court. However, in certain kinds of administrative disputes the internal control of administrative acts/omission is compulsory (e.g. social security disputes, tax disputes). There are several kinds of environmental decision where internal control is compulsory (e.g. mandatory instructions). In other cases, the applicant, as a general rule, is entitled to have recourse to the court directly.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?
The decision of the court shall be drawn up and announced, as a rule, on the same day after the hearing of the case (Article 84 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). After hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 working days, and after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of a regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month. In the case of important reasons, at the reasoned request of the judge hearing the case or the member(s) of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or their appointed judge may extend such time limits by means of a reasoned ruling for no more than ten working days. In the event of illness of the judge hearing the case or all members of the chamber of judges hearing the case, the president of the court or a judge appointed by them, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, or in the event of illness of one or several members of the chamber of judges examining the case, or inability to participate for any other objective reason, the remaining (participating) member(s) of the chamber of judges may extend this time limit by means of a ruling until the objective reason no longer applies (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)
There are differences between administrative and civil proceedings. In administrative proceedings, there is a decision-making step before the court, while in civil proceedings, the court makes the decision. In administrative proceedings, the court can suspend the administrative decision, but in practice, many challenged decisions are not executed. The procedures for the administrative review before the competent authority must be performed within the time limits set by the competent authority (Article 12 (3) of the Law on Public Administration).

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
The appeal or action submitted to the court against the administrative decision does not have a suspensive effect except in respect of certain decisions (e.g. tax decisions, decision on deportations or returns). Only the court can suspend the administrative decision by means of applying interim measures. Usually, administrative decisions can be immediately executed after their adoption (enforcement), irrespective of an appeal.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

Only the court can apply interim measures. The authority shall suspend execution of the decision until the errors are corrected where such errors may have a significant influence on the execution of the decision (Article 15 (2) of the Law on Public Administration).

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures might lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. Provisional measures may also be applied in cases where temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

It is not regulated under what conditions an administrative decision can be immediately executed. The administrative decision is not suspended, but in practice, a lot of challenged decisions are not executed.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
The administrative decision is not suspended, but in practice, a lot of challenged decisions are not executed.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

Appeal against rulings of the court regarding interim measures is possible. Only in civil cases does the court have a right to require a deposit from the applicant for applying interim measures (Article 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure). The deposit is intended to protect the defendant against losses incurred as a result of the interim measures applied to them. The deposit could also be the bank guarantee.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.?

In administrative courts, the administrative costs could be a court fee (30 EUR in the first instance administrative court and 15 EUR in the appeal instance). There are exemptions, however, in cases of complaint in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, interpreters, specialists, experts and organisations of experts; costs for payment of legal services of the lawyer or assistant lawyer; costs associated with the preparation and submission of procedural documents and participation in the court proceedings; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

In civil courts, applicants have to pay a court fee. There are exemptions in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damage in relation to a physical personal injury or death, in cases concerning the defence of the public interest under the claim of the prosecutor, public institutions or other persons. Other litigation-related costs include:

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

There are differences between administrative and civil proceedings. In administrative proceedings, in the case of an injunctive relief or interim measure a deposit (cross-undertaking in damages) is not needed (it is not foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The Code of Civil Procedure establishes the court’s right to require a deposit from the applicant for applying the interim measures (Article 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure). The deposit is intended to protect the defendant against losses incurred as a result of the interim measures applied to them. The deposit could also be the bank guarantee. The amount of the deposit depends on the case and is quite difficult to evaluate generally.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
All citizens of the Republic of Lithuania, citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania shall be eligible for legal aid (Article 11 of Law on State-Guaranteed Legal Aid).

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?
State-guaranteed legal aid is not foreseen for associations, legal persons and NGOs. Pro bono assistance is possible for all persons (including legal persons and NGOs). The procedure of pro bono assistance is not regulated by law. It is a voluntary decision of the advocate.
Primary legal aid for NGOs is available from the Vilnius University Legal Clinic.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
There are no other financial mechanisms available.

6) Does the ‘loser pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?
The general rule is that the losing party has to bear all costs, including stamp duties and costs related to initial court proceedings. The party shall also be obliged to remunerate the costs of the winning party. Stamp duty, expert costs and other costs are usually paid in full, but the costs for legal representation are reduced as recommended by the Minister of Justice and the Chairman of the Bar. However, these amounts are only recommended and depend on the complexity of the court proceedings, case material and other factors. Nevertheless, in the absolute majority of civil and administrative cases state courts reduce parties’ requested legal expenses for their legal assistance according to the recommended amounts and reasonableness.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?
Complaints/petitions shall be received and heard by the administrative courts only after payment of the stamp duty prescribed by the law. Several exemptions from the stamp duty are foreseen in Article 36 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, e.g.: complaints/petitions relating to delay by entities of public administration in performing actions assigned within the remit of their competence, awarding or refusal to award pensions, violations of election laws and the Law on Referendum, petitions by state servants and municipal employees where such concern legal relations in the Office, compensation for damage inflicted upon a natural person or organisation by unlawful acts/omissions in the sphere of public administration, and complaints relating to the protection of public interests and some other complaints/petitions.
Having regard to the property status of a natural person or group of natural persons, the administrative court may grant full or partial exemption from stamp duty. The petition for exempting the natural person from stamp duty must be justified and substantiated by appropriate evidence (Article 37 of Law on Administrative Proceedings).

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?
Information about access to environmental information is provided on the website of the Ministry of Environment.
The procedure for access to information is regulated by the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information, approved by Government Resolution Number 1175 of 1999, with subsequent amendments.
The request can be made in writing or verbally. The information can be given verbally only if the applicant does not ask for a written answer. The requirements for the written request are: name, contact details, requested information, form of giving the information.
The applicant does not have to state an interest. If an applicant requests that information be made available in a specific form (including in the form of copies), the public authority shall make it so available (there are some exceptions foreseen in Articles 16 and 18 of the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information). The information shall be made available to an applicant within 14 calendar days after receipt of the request by the public authority. This term can be extended to at least 14 calendar days.
An applicant who considers that their request for environmental information has been ignored, wrongfully refused or inadequately answered has access to a review procedure before an administrative disputes commission or an administrative court. Alongside the establishment of administrative courts, the general procedure of pre-litigation of complaints (applications) contesting the adopted individual administrative acts in the sphere of public administration was established by the Law on Pre-Trial Resolution of Administrative Disputes. The law provides for the establishment of the Lithuanian Administrative Dispute Commission. The Order on Public Access to Environmental Information is applicable for all state institutions, other persons performing the functions of public administration, and other persons who are controlled by the state institutions whose activity has an impact on the environment. The Order on Public Access to Environmental Information is not applicable to information about the air, water and waste management plans and programmes.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?
Taking into consideration that the procedure on access to environmental information set out in the Order on Public Access to Environmental Information essentially does not differ from the general procedure on access to information from public administration entities, general regulations apply. According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, the public concerned, one or more natural or legal persons, have the right to bring a claim before courts. The applicant should request information from any public administration entity. Different environmental procedures set obligations event for the private actors to provide information for the public (e.g. EIA procedure).
A general provision applies that the appeal (access to justice) procedure should be described in every written answer provided by the public administration entity where the written request to provide information is rejected or partly rejected.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?
These are the sectoral rules regarding the access to information: regarding EIA: in the course of a screening for environmental impact assessment and an environmental impact assessment, the public concerned shall have the right to obtain information on the potential environmental impact of the proposed economic activity from other participants in the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment (Article 13 of the Law on Environmental Impact Assessment of the Proposed Economic Activity (EIA)).
Regarding IPPC/IED: the Environmental Protection Agency is responsible for providing the information and is obliged to ensure the availability of information on access to justice (Article 69 and 125 of the Rules on Issuance, Renewal and Cancellation of IPPC Permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of regarding territorial planning documents: the publicity of territorial planning is ensured by the organiser of planning (Article 31 of the Law on Territorial Planning; Article 8.3 of the Rules on Strategic Impact Assessment of Plans and Programmes, approved by Government Order Number 967 of 2004). The general and simplified procedure for territorial planning document publicity procedures is based on the type and level of territorial planning documents, as established in the Regulations on the Provision of Information to the Public, Public Consultation and Participation in Adopting Decisions Relating to Territorial Planning approved by Government Order Number 1079 of 1996; regarding air protection: according to Article 16 of the Law on Ambient Air Protection, persons have the right to obtain correct information from state administration and self-government institutions concerning the condition of ambient air, normative standards of allowable pollution and the effect of planned economic activities; regarding water protection: according to Article 27 of the Law on Water, the Ministry of the Environment and other institutions and persons who have information about river basins are obliged to provide this information to the public; according to Article 4 of the Law on Drinking Water, the municipal institutions are responsible for providing information about the quality of drinking water.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, an individual administrative act must contain clearly formulated established or granted rights and duties, and specify the appeal procedure. According to Article 87 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the appeal procedure and timeline for appeal should be provided in the judgement.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) EIA screening decisions are administrative decisions and can be reviewed by administrative courts. The conditions regarding legal standing, rules of evidence, rules on hearing or extent of review by the court are not specific for these cases. According to Article 15 of the Law on EIA, the public has the right to refer to court if it considers that its application filed in accordance with the procedure laid down by the legal acts governing the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment has been unlawfully dismissed, has been provided with a partially or completely inappropriate response or has not been given proper regard in accordance with the legal acts governing the processes of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment. The public concerned has the right to refer to court disputing the substantive or procedural legitimacy of decisions, acts or omissions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment. Natural or legal persons have the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an administrative act if their rights have been infringed upon. In the cases prescribed by law, it is possible to bring a complaint in order to protect the state or another public interest (including environmental interest). Agencies, organisations and groups may lodge an appeal against measures affecting their own interests (existence, use, activity, operating conditions) as well as asking for damages for the material and moral damage they suffer. But they may also go to court to defend the public interest of those they represent insofar as the regulatory or individual disputed measure harms this public interest.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) The public concerned has the right to refer to court disputing all decisions, acts or omissions in the areas of environmental impact assessment. The scoping decisions are included.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions? A complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO? All decisions in the area of environmental impact assessment, including the final EIA decision, can be challenged. A foreign NGO has the same rights to lodge a complaint concerning a final EIA decision as a national NGO.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable? According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? All decisions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment can be challenged directly before the court.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? The requirement of a necessary interest to have the power to act is at the very head of the conditions for an appeal’s admissibility. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the EIA procedure or to make comments to have standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an EIA administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 15 of the Law on EIA).

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure.
10) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
The Law on EIA sets out the terms for particular actions in the areas of screening for environmental impact assessment and environmental impact assessment, e.g.: a screening conclusion on whether an environmental impact assessment is obligatory shall be submitted in writing to the organiser (developer) of the proposed economic activity within 20 working days from receipt of the screening information (Article 7 (7)); the competent authority shall, within 10 working days from receipt of the programme, approve the programme or submit reasoned requests to the drafter of the environmental impact assessment documents to supplement or revise the programme (Article 8 (9)); the public concerned has the right to submit to the competent authority; within 10 working days from publication of the notice, written proposals on the environmental impact assessment of the proposed economic activity and the report (Article 10 (9)); the competent authority shall, within 25 working days from receipt of the report, adopt a decision regarding the environmental impact of the proposed economic activity (Article 11 (1)).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief is available in administrative cases in all matters. According to Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may, upon a motivated petition of the participants in the proceedings or upon their own initiative, take measures with a view to securing a claim. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. There are no special rules applicable to EIA procedures.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
The public concerned and NGOs have the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning a final administrative act in the area of the IPPC (Article 124 of the Rules on issuance, renewal and cancellation of IPPC permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania Order Number D1-528 in 2013 (IPPC rules)).

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
A complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand.
The public concerned has the right to receive information about the application for a permit, to submit proposals regarding the application and permit, and to receive an answer regarding their proposals from the competent authority.
The public concerned and NGOs have the right to challenge a final IPPC decision. A foreign NGO has the same rights to lodge a complaint concerning an IPPC decision as a national NGO.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no screening and scoping phases in the IPPC procedure. The IPPC procedure has two stages: approval of the application for a permit and adoption of the final IPPC decision. The EIA procedure is considered as a separate procedure. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning a final administrative act in the area of the IPPC.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
There are no screening and scoping phases in the IPPC procedure.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
In Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the area of IPPC.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
According to Article 124 of the IPPC rules, the public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning a final administrative act in the area of the IPPC. According Article 92 of the Rules on Issuance, Renewal and Cancellation on Emissions Permits, approved by Ministry of Environment of Lithuania, Order No D1-259 in 2014 (EP rules) the decisions in the area of the emissions permits can be challenged alternatively before the administrative dispute commission or before the administrative court. According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings and the Law on Environmental Protection, the public has the right to challenge the final emissions permit decision.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. All information related to the application for a permit can be controlled by the court. The court is obliged to "actively" participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are no special rules regarding decisions in the area of IPPC.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
There is no requirement for exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedure. Decisions in the area of IPPC can be challenged before the administrative court (Article 124 of the IPPC rules). Decisions in the area of emissions permits can be challenged before the administrative dispute commission or before the administrative court (Article 92 of the EP rules).

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
The requirement of a necessary interest to have the power to act is at the very head of the conditions for an appeal's admissibility. It is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the IPPC or EP procedure or to make comments to have standing before administrative courts. The public concerned has the right to lodge a complaint (application) concerning an IPPC administrative act in order to protect the public interest (Article 124 of the IPPC rules).

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
The IPPC rules and the EP rules set out the terms for particular actions in the areas of IPPC permit procedure and EP procedure, e.g.: the authority shall, within 30 working days from receipt of the application, take a decision accepting or rejecting the application (Article 36-2 of the IPPC rules); the authority shall, within 20 working days from accepting the application, take a permit decision (Article 83 of the IPPC rules); the operator has a right to receive a draft of the permit decision and to comment on it no later than 5 working days before the competent authority reaches a decision (Article 87 of the IPPC rules); the competent authority shall, within 20 working days from accepting the application, adopt a permit decision (Article 65 of the EP rules).

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in administrative cases in all matters. According to Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court or the judge may, upon a motivated petition of the participants in the proceedings or upon their own initiative, take measures with a view to securing a claim. The claim may be secured at any stage of the proceedings if failure to take provisional measures to secure a claim may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. There are no special rules applicable to IPPC and EP procedures.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, an individual administrative act must contain clearly formulated established or granted rights and duties, and specify the appeal procedure. According to Article 125 of the IPPC rules, the authority is obliged to ensure the availability of information on access to justice.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned have the right to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and demanding that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished. According to Article 54 (1) of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection, natural and legal persons have a right to challenge the decisions or acts/failure to act of officials and environmental authorities. The common requirements are set out in the Law on Administrative Proceedings. There are no special requirements regarding decisions taken on environmental remediation.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

According to Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the basic rule is that a complaint may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the contested act, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission). There are several kinds of environmental decision which have to be challenged by the administrative body within 10 working days after receipt thereof (e.g. a mandatory instruction according Article 25 of the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection). Only the person against whom the decision has been taken has the right to challenge such decisions.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

The applicant should deliver all relevant information and data which are available to them supporting the observations submitted in relation to the environmental damage in question. There is no need to deliver the scientific data and evidence.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

If the applicant demands that the competent authority take action to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, there is no requirement regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred. The ordinary courts deal with cases concerning environmental damage. The possibility to claim compensation for damage is foreseen in Article 32-34 of the Law on Environmental Protection. According to Article 33 of the Law on Environmental Protection, the following persons shall have the right to file claims regarding the damage caused: the persons whose health, property or interests have been impaired; officials of the Ministry of Environment, other officials authorised by law, where damage to the interests of the State has been caused. In civil cases, the claimant should provide the evidence regarding the ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred. The basic rules of the civil procedure are applicable. There is no special regulation regarding environmental damage.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

There are no special requirements regarding decisions in the area of environmental damage. A person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall, within 3 working days, be notified about the adopted decision on the administrative procedure, the factual circumstances determined during the consideration of the complaint, the legal acts based on which the decision on the administrative procedure has been adopted, as well as the procedure for appealing the decision. The decision on the administrative procedure shall be delivered or sent to the person with respect to whom the procedure is initiated (Article 13 of the Law on Public Administration). Special procedure and time limits for decision-making (5 working days) are set out in the Description of the procedure for the selection of environmental remediation measures and obtaining prior approval, approved on 16 May 2006, by order No. D1-228 of the Minister of Environment.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

In the presence of an imminent threat of environmental damage, an economic entity must, without delay, take all necessary preventive measures. Where, despite the preventive measures taken by the economic entity, the imminent threat of environmental damage is not dispelled, the economic entity must immediately inform the Ministry of Environment or an institution authorised by it (Article 32-1 of the Law on Environmental Protection). The Ministry of Environment or an institution authorised by it shall have the right and duty at any time:

- to require an economic entity to supply all information on any situation in the course of which damage was caused to the environment, or a threat thereof occurred, or in suspected cases that such a situation might occur;
- to require an economic entity to take necessary preventive and/or remedial measures;
- to require an economic entity to take or issue the appropriate entity instructions concerning all actions to collect contaminants and/or remove, control or otherwise manage other factors having a damaging effect on the environment in order to prevent or limit environmental damage and adverse effects on human health;
- to give compulsory instructions to an economic entity regarding the application of preventive and/or remedial measures;
- to take, at its own discretion, the necessary preventive and/or remedial measures (Article 32-1 of the Law on Environmental Protection).
7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The competent authority is the Environmental Protection Department under the Ministry of Environment.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
There is no requirement in environmental damage cases concerning the prior administrative review procedure.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases
1) Rules on involving other countries at which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Article 34 of the Law on Environmental Protection provides that disputes between legal and natural persons of the Republic of Lithuania and foreign states shall be settled in the manner established by the law of the Republic of Lithuania, unless international agreements of the Republic of Lithuania provide otherwise. The admissibility of an action before a court is possible under the general conditions set out in the Law on Administrative Proceedings or in the Code of Civil Procedure. There are no specific rules regarding EIA, IPPC, etc.

2) Notion of public concerned?
The concept of public concerned is not specific in a transboundary context. The general rules are applicable (especially concerning the admissibility of requests through the concept of legal interest).

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
Lithuanian administrative law recognises equal access to administrative courts for NGOs residing abroad on the same basis as applicants residing in Lithuania. There is no difference regarding the procedural rights of national NGOs and NGOs residing abroad.

There is no secondary legal aid for NGOs in Lithuania.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
Lithuanian administrative law recognises equal access to administrative courts for persons residing abroad on the same basis as applicants residing in Lithuania. There is no difference regarding the procedural rights of the parties.

Citizens of other Member States of the European Union as well as other natural persons residing lawfully in the Republic of Lithuania and other Member States of the European Union, and other persons specified in international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania shall be eligible for primary and secondary legal aid (Article 11 of the Law on State-Guaranteed Legal Aid).

There are no legal requirements regarding pro bono assistance provided by advocates.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
Regarding EIA:
Where the proposed economic activity is subject to procedures of transboundary environmental impact assessment, a competent institution shall inform the drafter of environmental impact assessment documents requesting that they prepare and submit to the competent authority a summary of the screening information or a programme which must include information on the proposed economic activity and its potential significant transboundary impact in a bilateral agreement, if available, in the specified language, or in other cases in English and, where requested by an affected state, also in its national language (Article 9 (2) of the Law on EIA). An institution shall dispatch a notice to an affected state accompanied by a description of the proposed economic activity, the available information on the potential significant transboundary impact of the proposed economic activity on the environment, the information on the nature of possible solutions, specify a time period (not less than 25 working days) for submission of a notice of the willingness of the affected state to participate in the process of transboundary environmental impact assessment, and request that the affected state inform the competent authorities and the public of the state (Article 9 (3) of the Law on EIA). A competent institution shall, upon receiving a reply from an affected state concerning its participation in the process of the transboundary environmental impact assessment of the proposed economic activity, inform the organiser (developer) of the proposed economic activity and the drafter of environmental impact assessment documents, who shall be instructed to submit a report, a summary of the relevant information about the proposed economic activity and its potential significant transboundary environmental impact in a bilateral agreement, if available, in the specified language, or in other cases in English and, where requested by the affected state, also in its national language (Article 9 (5) of the Law on EIA).

Regarding IPPC:
If the operation of the installation may have significant impact on the environment of another EU Member State, the drafter of documents should prepare and submit to the competent institution the documents regarding the application for a permit in English (Article 78 of the IPPC rules). The competent institution shall provide the documents to an affected state at the same time as the documents are provided to the public concerned and request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 40 working days from receipt of such information within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institutional; this information shall be published on the website of the Environmental Protection Agency (Article 79 of the IPPC rules).

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
Regarding EIA:
A competent institution provides the documentation of an environmental impact assessment to an affected state together with information on the environmental impact assessment procedures, the proposed transboundary consultations and the duration thereof, and a request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 30 working days from the date of dispatch within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institution (Article 9 (6) of the Law on EIA). The appeal against a decision may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no special rules for an affected state to appeal against a decision.

Regarding IPPC:
The competent institution shall provide the documents to an affected state at the same time as the documents are provided to the public concerned and request that information be provided to the public and the competent authorities of this state, indicating a period of not less than 40 working days from receipt of such information within which the affected state may submit its proposals to the competent institution (Article 79 of the IPPC rules). The appeal against a decision may be filed within one month from the day of publication of the decision, the day of delivery of the individual act to the party concerned, the notification of the party concerned of the act (or omission), within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for compliance with the demand (Article 29 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). There are no special rules for an affected state to appeal a decision.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
Regarding EIA:
Where the proposed economic activity has been subject to transboundary environmental impact assessment procedures, the competent authority shall provide information on the EIA decision to an affected state participating in the process of transboundary environmental impact assessment (Article 11 (12) of the Law on EIA). According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, the EIA decision should specify the appeal procedure.

Regarding IPPC:
There is no special regulation. According to Article 10 (5) of the Law on Public Administration, the IPPC decision should specify the appeal procedure.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
Article 9 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings provides that, in the process of administrative cases, decisions are made and published in the Lithuanian language. All documents submitted to the court must be translated into Lithuanian. Where the participant in the proceedings to whom the procedural documents shall be served in a foreign state does not know the Lithuanian language, the administrative court shall be presented with translations of such documents into the language they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served, or, in the event that said country has several official languages, into one of the official language used at the place of delivery. Where the judicial procedural documents have to be sent to the participant in the proceedings who does not know the Lithuanian language and resides in a foreign state, the court shall translate them into one of the languages they understand or the official language of the country where such documents have to be served. Upon the resolution of the judge who is preparing the case for hearing or of the court hearing the case, a document drawn up in another language may be translated at the court session by a translator. Persons who have no command of the Lithuanian language shall be guaranteed the right to have the assistance of an interpreter. The services provided by the interpreter at the court session shall be paid for from the State budget.

Administrative procedures shall be conducted in the official language, namely Lithuanian (Article 28 of the Law on Public Administration). When a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated or other interested persons do not speak or understand Lithuanian or are unable to make themselves understood because of a sensory or speech disorder, an interpreter must be present at the administrative procedure. An entity of public administration that has initiated the administrative procedure or a person in whose respect the administrative procedure has been initiated shall invite an interpreter at their own initiative.

9) Any other relevant rules?
No additional information.

[1] The Law on Environmental Protection defines public concerned as one or more natural or legal persons affected or likely to be affected by, or having an interest in, the taking of decisions, acts or omissions in the field of the environment and protection thereof as well as utilisation of natural resources. For the purposes of this definition, the associations and other public legal persons (with the exception of the legal persons established by the State or a municipality or institutions thereof) established in accordance with the procedure laid down by legal acts and promoting environmental protection shall in any case be deemed the public concerned.

[2] See for example, the ruling of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania of 1 June, 1998.

[3] See also case C-529/15.
acted within the limits of its discretion, and whether or not the legal act or action (omission) complies with the objectives and tasks for which purpose the institution has been set up and vested with powers.

The administrative court is not bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceeding. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure. The court must explain to the parties their procedural rights and duties, warn them of the consequences of the performance of or non-performance of procedural actions, and assist said persons in exercising their procedural rights (Article 12 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Administrative courts have an obligation to give guidance to the parties in order to ensure that all parties have equal opportunities to present their arguments and submit evidence.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are several categories of case which should be resolved within the time limit set by special laws (e.g. cases about the refusal to issue permits for residence and work in Lithuania or withdrawal of such permits, refusal or cancellation of asylum, cases about dismissal of a public or municipal servant). Environmental cases are not assigned to urgent cases.

The Law on Administrative Proceedings sets out the time limits for the court and for the parties, e.g.: after the court has received a complaint/application/petition, the president or the judge of the administrative court shall, within 7 business days, decide on the issue of acceptance thereof (Article 33 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); as a rule, the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the judge or the court shall hear the petition for securing the claim within no more than 3 business days from receipt thereof, without notifying the respondent and other participants in the proceedings (Article 70 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); after hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 business days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the claimant shall have the right to specify, change the basis of complaint/application/petition or the subject matter within 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of the replies from the parties to the proceedings (Article 50 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the respondent has to present to the court their opinions within the specified time limit, which is usually at least 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of a transcript (digital copy) of the complaint/application/petition (Article 67 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings) etc. The Law on Territorial Planning and other implementing legal acts set out terms for the actions of the organiser of the particular plan, for the institutions and for the public participating in the planning procedure.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons provisions as to the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in cases of need of temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, he should pay a stamp duty.

There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay a stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in the electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum of stamp duty) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 15 EUR.

The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

The prevailing party to the proceedings shall be entitled to recover costs from the non-prevailing adverse party (Article 40 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a recommendation from Minister of Justice and the Chairman of Bar concerning lawyer fees (Ministry of Justice Order No. 1R-85 from 2004). Recommended maximum remuneration sizes are calculated using the coefficients which are based on the Lithuanian Government approved the minimum monthly salary. An estimation of lawyer fees in the case of the legal aid is regulated by Order of the Ministry of Justice No 1R-332 from 2020.

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Article 44 of the SEA Resolution sets the common rule that disputes in the area of SEA shall be examined in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws. There are no special rules on standing for individuals and NGOs. The common rules on access to justice of the Law on Administrative Proceedings shall be applied (e.g. one month term, protection of the infringed right or interest protected under law). The special standing rules are foreseen in the special legal acts, e.g. in the Law on the Territorial Planning.

According to Article 6 of the SEA Resolution, the SEA is performed in the cases of: preparation of a plan or programme (or amendment to the plan or programme) intended for the development of industry, energy, transport, telecommunications, tourism, agriculture, forestry, fishery, aquaculture, waste management, preparation of a special territorial planning document, detailed plan or land management project which sets the framework for the development of the economic activities listed in Annexes 1 and 2 of the Law on EIA and which is prepared for an area of more than 10 square kilometres; preparation or amendment of a general plan;
implementation of a plan or programme related to the Natura 2000 sites and the State Service for Protected Areas determines that implementation of such a plan or programme (separately or together with other plans or programmes) may have significant consequences on the Natura 2000 sites; during the screening, a decision is made that SEA of a plan or programme is required. The participation of the individuals and NGOs on decision-making in territorial planning procedure is regulated by the Law on Territorial Planning and the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public information, Consultation and Participation on Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government from 1996). There are special rules regarding access to justice:

According to Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, representatives of the public concerned, other natural and legal persons concerned shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where:

- they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act of these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights;
- due to reasons recognised by the court as serious, they could not have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by the entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act of these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document.

According to Article 49 (6) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the period of limitation for entities defending the public interest to make a claim in relation to contesting the approved territorial planning documents, their solutions or administrative acts approving them shall be 20 working days from the date of issuance of a document permitting construction based on the territorial planning document sought to be contested, but not later than two years from the date of entry into force of the approved territorial planning document. A limitation period of two years provided for in this paragraph shall be definitive.

There are different rules of standing regarding the individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts (plans and programmes fall into one of these categories). According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court with an application for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (part thereof) with a law or a regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, ombudsman of the Seimas, children rights protection ombudsman, equal opportunities ombudsman, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the laws to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation when a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The public concerned does not have standing for the review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (decision relating to general plan or to special territorial planning document).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations when they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged „actively“ participate in the proceeding by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limited control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision. Annex 1 of the SEA Resolution sets the criteria for the determination of significance of the impact of plans and programmes. Annex 2 of the SEA Resolution determines information which shall be involved in the report on the SEA. These criteria and information can be controlled by the court.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to Article 33 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court shall by virtue of an order declare the complaint not receivable if the claimant has not complied with the procedure for extrajudicial consideration of the case established by the law for the cases of the said category. There is no common rule for all plans and programmes.

Having proof or legal basis for believing that the public interest specified in Article 8(1) of the Law on Territorial Planning has been violated, the public concerned shall have the right to defend the public interest in territorial planning and to apply to the institution protecting the public interest in the field in which the violation of the public interest has been committed or to the prosecutor requesting an investigation of the possible cases of violation of the public interest (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning). So the defence of the public interest in territorial planning is possible before the institution protecting the public interest or the prosecutor.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document representatives of the public concerned, other natural and legal persons concerned shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure to act of these entities to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, the proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the organiser of planning in writing. The reply provided by the organiser of planning may, within 10 working days, be appealed against to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in the event that temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).
There is a special regulation regarding territorial planning documents for projects of importance to the State in Article 23 of the Law on Territorial Planning. No later than within 10 working days from the date of submission by the organiser of planning of the reply to the complaint, the court shall, by its ruling, resolve the issue of whether further procedures of preparation, coordination and approval of the territorial planning document of the project of importance to the State need to be suspended due to the complaint lodged (Article 23 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases concerning complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omission in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 15 EUR.

The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative case. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The prevailing party to the proceedings shall be entitled to recover costs from the non-prevailing adverse party (Article 40 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a recommendation from the Minister of Justice and the Chairman of the Bar concerning lawyers’ fees (Ministry of Justice Order No. 1R-85 from 2004). Recommended maximum remuneration sizes are calculated using coefficients based on the Lithuanian Government’s approved minimum monthly salary. An estimation of lawyers’ fees in the case of legal aid is regulated by Order of the Ministry of Justice No. 1R-332 from 2020.

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Representatives of the public concerned and other natural and legal persons may be actively involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning. These procedures should be guaranteed for all territorial planning documents which do not fall under the regulation of the SEA Resolution but under the regulation of the Law on Territorial Planning.

The participation of individuals and NGOs in decision-making in territorial planning procedure is regulated by the Law on Territorial Planning and the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public Information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996). There are special rules regarding access to justice.

According to Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in the cases where:

- they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document, where in the course of the publicity procedures they were aware of or could have objectively foreseen the possible violation of their rights;

- for reasons recognised by the court as serious, they could not have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by the entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document.

According to Article 49 (6) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the period of limitation for entities defending the public interest to make a claim in relation to contesting the approved territorial planning documents, their solutions or administrative acts approving them shall be 20 working days from the date of issuance of a document permitting construction based on the territorial planning document sought to be contested, but not later than two years from the date of entry into force of the approved territorial planning document. A limitation period of two years provided for in this paragraph shall be definitive.

There are different rules of standing regarding the individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions. Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There are other plans and programmes which are not territorial planning documents, e.g. land holding projects (land use planning projects for land reform; projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels; projects for taking land for public needs; land consolidation projects) (Article 37 of the Law on Land); plans on protection zones etc.

According to Article 44 of the Law on Land, disputes regarding decisions taken by state and municipal institutions related to land management shall be investigated in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Law on Administrative Proceedings. The land owner or another user may apply for compensation for damage incurred due to the actions of a state or municipal institution when drafting and implementing the land use planning documents to the institution that has taken the decision to approve the land use planning document, or shall have the right to claim damages in the court proceedings. A person must apply to the institution that has taken the decision to approve the land use planning documents not later than within one month after the day they found out about the occurrence of the damage. Disputes regarding the amount of and compensation for damage shall be settled in court in the manner prescribed by law.
There are several legal acts regulating the participation of the public. E.g., according to Articles 58-61 of the Rules of the Projects of Formation and Rearrangement of Land Parcels, approved by Order of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Environment No. 3D-452/D1-51 of 2004, proposals of representatives of the public regarding projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels shall be submitted to the project organiser in writing. The reply provided by the project organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the National Land Service. A decision of the National Land Service shall be revoked by the court.

In light of the national case-law, access to national courts can be considered effective.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative courts review the procedural legality and also the substantive legality of all administrative decisions. The courts study the material, technical findings and calculations where they are considered as belonging to the decision. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceedings by asking for evidence, appointing witnesses, experts, etc. The court has no limitation on its control. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

According to Article 33 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the court shall, by means of an order, declare the complaint not receivable if the claimant has not complied with the procedure for extrajudicial consideration of the case established by the law for cases of the said category. There is no common rule for all plans and programmes.

Having proof or legal basis for believing that the public interest specified in Article 8(1) of the Law on Territorial Planning has been violated, the public concerned shall have the right to defend the public interest in territorial planning and to apply to the institution protecting the public interest in the field in which the violation of the public interest has been committed, or to the prosecutor requesting an investigation of possible cases of violation of the public interest (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

There are several other legal acts which set a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. E.g., proposals of representatives of the public regarding projects of formation and rearrangement of land parcels shall be submitted to the project organiser in writing. The reply provided by the project organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the National Land Service. A decision of the National Land Service shall be revoked by the court. According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the planning organiser in writing. The reply provided by the planning organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in the event that temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a special regulation regarding territorial planning documents of projects of importance to the State in Article 23 of the Law on Territorial Planning. Not later than within 10 working days from the date of submission by the planning organiser of the reply to the complaint, the court shall, by its ruling, resolve the issue of whether further procedures of preparation, coordination and approval of the territorial planning document of the project of importance to the State need to be suspended due to the complaint lodged (Article 23 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omissions in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses.

When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgment is 15 EUR. The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative cases. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The procedure of preparing plans and programmes does not depend on whether the basis for the preparation of such plans and programmes comes from the EU, international or national law. The possibility of administrative review or legal challenge before the national courts depends on the type of document and its legal status.

There are different rules of standing regarding the individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsman of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsman, the equal opportunities ombudsman, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.
Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned shall have the right to file, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

The persons have the right to file a complaint regarding the protection of the environment and to ask the court to initiate the review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act.

If there is a special territorial planning document or detailed plan, the information, consultation and participation procedure is regulated by the Resolution of the Government of the Republic of Lithuania on Public Information, Consultation and Participation in Decision-Making in Territorial Planning (approved by Resolution No. 1079 of the Government of 1996).

There is a special legal act which sets out the rules regarding the informing and participation of the public in decision-making in the preparation of plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management (approved by Order of the Minister of Environment No. D1-381 from 2005).

According to Article 7 of this Order, representatives of the public have a right to submit proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme. According to Articles 12 and 13 of the Order, the institution shall, on its website, provide persons who have submitted proposals with a reasoned reply and shall inform the public about the adoption of the plan or programme and about the reasons.

There are no other special legal standing rules foreseen in the aforementioned acts.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

There are different rules of standing regarding individual administrative acts and normative (regulatory) administrative acts. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions.

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court.

If there is a territorial planning document, Article 49 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning sets out the requirement for participation in the publicity procedures of territorial planning, including administrative review.

If there are plans and programmes in the areas of air and water protection and waste management which fall under the regulation of Order of the Minister of Environment No. D1-381, the submission of the proposals to the institution which is preparing the plan or programme is a requirement for the judicial review.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

According to Article 3 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the administrative court shall settle disputes over issues of law in public administration. The court shall not offer assessment of the disputed legal acts and actions (omissions) from the point of view of political or economic expediency and shall only establish whether or not, in a particular case, there has been violation of a law or any other legal act, whether or not the entity of public administration has acted within the limits of its discretion, and whether or not the legal act or action (omission) complies with the objectives and tasks for which purpose the institution has been set up and vested with powers.

The administrative court is not bound to allegations specifically presented in the appeal. The court is obliged to “actively” participate in the proceeding. It can review all aspects of the contested decision.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

According to the Law on Administrative Proceedings, each party has equal rights in the procedure. The court must explain to the parties to the proceedings their procedural rights and duties, warn them of the consequences of the performance or non-performance of procedural actions, and assist said persons in exercising their procedural rights (Article 12 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Administrative courts have an obligation to give guidance to the parties in order to ensure that all parties have equal opportunities to present their arguments and submit evidence.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There are several categories of case which should be resolved within the time limit set by special laws (e.g. cases about the refusal to issue permits for residence and work in Lithuania or withdrawal of such permits, refusal or cancellation of asylum, cases about dismissal of a public or municipal servant). Environmental cases are not assigned to urgent cases.
The Law on Administrative Proceedings sets out the time limits for the actions of the court and for the parties, e.g.: after the court has received a complaint/application/petition, the president or the judge of the administrative court shall, within 7 business days, decide on the issue of acceptance thereof (Article 33 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); as a rule, the preparation of administrative cases for hearing in the court must be completed within one month from the day of acceptance of the complaint/application/petition (Article 64 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the judge or the court shall hear the petition for securing the claim within not more than 3 business days from receipt thereof, without notifying the respondent and other participants in the proceedings (Article 70 (4) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); after hearing the case, the court can defer adoption of the court decision and publication for no longer than 20 business days, and, after hearing the case regarding the legitimacy of regulatory administrative act, for no longer than one month (Article 84 (5) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the claimant shall have the right to specify, change the basis of complaint/application/petition or the subject matter within 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of the replies from the parties to the proceedings (Article 50 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings); the respondent has to present to the court their opinions within the specified time limit, which is usually at least 14 calendar days from the day of receipt of a transcript (digital copy) of the complaint/application/petition (Article 67 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The Law on Territorial Planning and other implementing legal acts set out terms for the actions of the organiser of the particular plan, for the institutions and for the public participating in the planning procedure. E.g., according to Article 25 (4) of the Law on Territorial Planning, prior to commencing the preparation of a document of complex territorial planning, the planning organiser, or a person authorised by them, shall apply in writing to the institutions specified in the Rules for the Preparation of Documents of Complex Territorial Planning requesting that they issue planning conditions within 15 working days (in the case of documents of municipal-level and local-level territorial planning, within ten working days) from the date of receipt of the application. If the planning conditions have not been issued within the set time limit and the planning organiser has not been informed of the reasons for refusal, the planning organiser shall have the right to commence the preparation of the document of complex territorial planning; according to Article 37 (2) of the Law on Territorial Planning, the reply provided by the planning organiser may, within ten working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning, etc.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in all administrative matters in the same manner. The claim shall be secured at any stage of the proceedings if the participant in the proceedings reasons the claim and failure to take provisional measures may lead to irreparable damage or damage that would be difficult to repair. The court can take provisional measures to ensure the claim by the reasoned application of the participants in the proceedings or on its own initiative. The provisional measures may also be applied in the event that temporary regulation of the situation related to the disputed legal relations is needed (Article 70 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is a special regulation regarding territorial planning documents of projects of importance to the State in Article 23 of the Law on Territorial Planning. Not later than within 10 working days from the date of submission by the planning organiser of the reply to the complaint, the court shall, by its ruling, resolve the issue of whether further procedures of preparation, coordination and approval of the territorial planning document of the project of importance to the State need to be suspended due to the complaint lodged (Article 23 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

General rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings apply. If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court, they should pay stamp duty. There are exemptions, however, in cases about complaints in order to protect the State or other public interests, in cases concerning compensation for material and moral damages inflicted by unlawful acts or omissions in the sphere of public administration, for example. Other litigation-related costs include: costs paid to witnesses, experts and expert organisations; costs for lawyers or lawyers’ assistants; other necessary and reasonable expenses. When submitting an appeal to the first instance administrative court, the applicant should pay stamp duty in the amount of 30 EUR (in electronic cases, 75 per cent of the sum) (Article 35 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). The amount of stamp duty for the appeal of the first instance court’s judgement is 15 EUR. The amount of stamp duty is the same for all categories of administrative case. The court, taking into account the financial situation of a natural person, may decrease the amount of stamp duty or exempt the person from the obligation to pay the stamp duty (Article 37 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The EU regulatory acts in the environmental area are implemented through laws, resolutions and decisions of the Government, regulatory acts of ministers, heads of Government bodies and other state institutions and bodies and collegial institutions, regulatory acts of municipal institutions. These are normative (regulatory) legal acts. Only subjects foreseen in the Constitution and in the Law on Administrative Proceedings have a right to challenge normative (regulatory) legal acts before courts.

According to Article 105 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court shall consider and adopt a decision whether the laws of the Republic of Lithuania and other acts adopted by the Seimas are not in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. The Constitutional Court shall also consider if the following are not in conflict with the Constitution and laws: acts of the President of the Republic; acts of the Government of the Republic. The President of the Republic, the Government, not less than 1/5 of all the members of the Seimas and the courts shall have the right to apply to the Constitutional Court. The right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of all above-mentioned legal acts is also granted to any person who believes that a decision adopted on the basis of such a legal act has violated their constitutional rights or freedoms and the person has exhausted all legal remedies. Such a person may apply to the Constitutional Court only where, in the case concerning the decision violating their constitutional rights or freedoms, the final and non-appealable decision on the merits of the case or on rejecting the complaint is adopted by a court of general competence or an administrative court, i.e. such a decision of a court is adopted that precludes any further defence of the violated rights or freedoms of the person before the courts of general competence or the administrative courts. A petition concerning the violated constitutional rights or freedoms may be filed with the Constitutional Court not later than within 4 months of the day that the final and non-appealable decision of the court came into force. According to Article 112 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the right to apply to the administrative court with an application for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with a law or regulation issued by the Government shall be vested in the members of the Seimas, the ombudsperson of the Seimas, the children’s rights protection ombudsperson, the equal opportunities ombudsperson, the control officers of the State of the Republic of Lithuania, courts of general and specialised competency, prosecutors and professional self-government associations established according to the law to perform public functions. The right to apply to the administrative court with a petition for review of conformity of a regulatory administrative act issued by the entity of municipal administration with a law or Government regulation shall also be vested in the Government representatives supervising the activities of municipalities (Article 112 (2) of the Law on Administrative Procedings).

Other persons shall have the right to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court (Article 113 (1) of the Law on Administrative Procedings).

The persons have the right to apply for review of the normative (regulatory) administrative act only if there is a case regarding the breach of their rights initiated before the court. The right to file a petition with the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutionality of laws of the Republic of Lithuania and other acts adopted by the Seimas, the Government or the President of the Republic is also granted to any person who believes that a decision adopted on the basis of such a legal act has violated their constitutional rights or freedoms and the person has exhausted all legal remedies.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The competence of the courts regarding review of normative (regulatory) acts is the same as in other administrative matters. Both procedural and substantive legality of the challenged normative (regulatory) act can be reviewed.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The requirement of the constitutional complaint is the exhaustion of all legal remedies. There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures for contesting of territorial planning documents (general plans, special plans).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

The Law on Legislative Framework sets out the principle of public consultation. According to Article 7 of the Law on Legislative Framework, the public shall have a possibility to submit proposals relating to the legislative initiatives and draft legal acts published in the Legislative Information System, as well as to monitor the carrying out of the legal regulation. The public must be consulted in due time and on essential issues (effectiveness of consultation), and to the extent necessary (proportionality of consultation). Methods of public consultation and ways of recording the results shall be selected by the entities initiating public consultation. Information on the results of public consultation must be provided to the entity adopting a legal act. Participation in the public consultation phase is not necessary.

The special legal act sets out a requirement for participation in the public consultation phase, it is the requirement for legal standing before the national courts.

In the procedure of the preparation of a territorial planning document, representatives of the public concerned, and other natural and legal persons concerned, shall have the right to apply to court regarding the adopted administrative decision on the revocation of approval of a territorial planning document only in cases where they have been involved in the publicity procedures of territorial planning and have lodged complaints or reports regarding the decisions relating to territorial planning adopted by entities of public administration or regarding the failure of these entities to act to the institutions carrying out state supervision of territorial planning before the adoption of the appealed administrative decision on the approval of the territorial planning document where, in the course of the publicity procedures, they were aware of, or could have objectively foreseen, the possible violation of their rights (Article 49 (5) of the Law on Territorial Planning).

According to Article 37 of the Law on Territorial Planning, the proposals regarding territorial planning documents shall be submitted to the planning organiser in writing. The reply provided by the planning organiser may, within 10 working days, be appealed to the respective institution carrying out state supervision of territorial planning.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

According to Article 67-2 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, having regard to a reasoned request submitted by the petitioner to suspend the execution of the decision of the court, the Constitutional Court may suspend the execution of the decision of the court in exceptional circumstances where the constitutional rights or freedoms of the petitioner would be irreparably violated due to the execution of the decision of the court or where suspending the execution of the decision of the court is necessary for reasons of public interest. A request to suspend the execution of the decision of the court must be submitted together with the respective petition requesting an investigation into the compliance of a legal act with the Constitution or laws.

According to Article 26 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, in cases where the Constitutional Court receives a submission by the President of the Republic or a resolution of the Seimas, the Constitutional Court shall carry out a preliminary investigation within three days. If the Constitutional Court adopts a decision to accept the petition for consideration, the President of the Constitutional Court shall immediately announce that the validity of the act in question is suspended from the day of the official publication of this announcement in the Register of Legal Acts until the ruling of the Constitution Court concerning this case is published.

According to Article 70 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, provisional measures may be as follows:

- granting of a restraining injunction against certain actions;
- stay of execution under the writ of execution;
- temporary suspension of the validity of the disputed individual legal act, as well as the granting of subjective rights to another person (not the claimant);
- other measures applied by the court or the judge.

The administrative courts have no possibility to suspend the validity of a disputed normative (regulatory) legal act until the announcement of the effective decision of the administrative court on recognition of the relevant regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) as illegal. Where necessary, the administrative court may suspend the validity of the regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) recognised as illegal until the coming into effect of the court decision (Article 118 (3) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

If the person submits an appeal to the administrative court regarding the breach of their rights or interests, general rules of the Law on Administrative Proceedings regarding stamp duty and other costs apply.

In the case of an abstract application for review of legality of a regulatory administrative act, no stamp duty is required.

According to Article 39 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, expenses incurred by the institutions participating in the case in relation to their attendance and participation in proceedings before the Constitutional Court shall be compensated by the institutions and establishments that they represent.
After, subsequent to a petition by a person, a law or other act of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act of the Government that served as a basis for adopting a decision violating the constitutional rights or freedoms of the person is declared by the Constitutional Court to be in conflict with the Constitution or laws, the necessary and justified expenses incurred by the petitioner in relation to participation in the proceedings before the Constitutional Court shall be compensated by the state institution that adopted the legal act (or part thereof) declared to be in conflict with the Constitution. The Government, or an institution authorised by it, shall determine the maximum amounts of compensation for expenses relating to participation in proceedings before the Constitutional Court and the procedure for their payment. Maximum amounts of compensation for expenses are regulated by Order of the Minister of Justice No. 1R-261 in 2019.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[6]

Only subjects foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings can challenge national normative (regulatory) legal acts directly by appeal in court. Other subjects have the right to ask the court to apply to the administrative court to review conformity of a regulatory administrative act (or part thereof) with the law or Government regulation where a specific case regarding infringement of their rights is heard before the court.

It is only one option to apply directly to the court regarding the decision of the European Commission foreseen in the Law on Administrative Proceedings - the State Data Protection Inspectorate shall submit a petition to apply to a competent legal authority of the European Union regarding the decision of the European Commission to the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania in cases specified in the Law on the Legal Protection of Personal Data (Article 1221 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings). Having examined the Petition on the Decision of the European Commission, the Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania shall adopt one of the following decisions: 1) to apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union with a petition to adopt a prejudicial decision according to Article 267 TFEU; 2) to reject the petition of the State Data Protection Inspectorate on the Decision of the European Commission (Article 1223 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

In other cases, the court applies to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision on the issue of interpretation or validity of the laws of the European Union. Any party in the proceedings may request that the court apply to a competent judicial authority of the European Union for the prejudicial decision, but this is at the discretion of the court.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-864/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters
[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[3] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-162/10, as referred to under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaardens Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:274.
[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference, see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaardens Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:274.

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

According to Article 7 (8) of the Law on Environmental Protection, one or more natural or legal persons and the public concerned shall have the right, in accordance with the procedure laid down by laws of the Republic of Lithuania, to file a complaint/application demanding that appropriate action be taken to prevent or minimise environmental damage or restore the environment to its baseline condition, and that the persons guilty of causing a harmful effect on the environment and the officials whose decisions or acts/failure to act have violated the rights of citizens, the public concerned, other legal and natural persons or the interests protected under law be punished.

If the entity of public administration fails to perform its duties or delays the consideration of a certain issue and fails to resolve it by the due date, a complaint about such failure to act (delay in performance) may be lodged within two months from the day of expiry of the time limit set by a law or any other legal act for settlement of the issue (Article 29 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

Personal standing rules are the same as for any other administrative or judicial review procedure. Only those persons whose rights are being breached have standing to challenge the failure to act, whereas standing is granted for environmental NGOs in cases related to their aims and activities.

- Penalties that the judiciary or any other independent and impartial body (information commissioner, ombudsman, prosecutor, etc.) can impose on the public administration for failing to provide effective access to justice.

According to Article 99 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, after the court decision whereby the complaint/application/petition is met becomes effective, the approved copy (transcript) thereof shall be sent for enforcement by the entity of public administration or other persons whose legal acts or actions (inactions) or delay to perform actions were appealed, or to the entity of public administration representing the State (Government) in the case, as well as the claimant. If the entity of public administration or any other person fails to perform the decision within 15 calendar days or within the time limit set by the court, at the request of the claimant the administrative court which adopted the decision issues a letter of enforcement by also ordering the enforcement thereof by the bailiff according to the location of the seat of the respondent in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Code of Civil Procedure. Where the sums are recovered to the state budget, or in the case of recovery of damage resulting from illegal actions of entities of public administration, as well as in the case of recovery of sums associated with Office-related legal relations or payment of pensions, the court shall issue a letter of enforcement to the recovering entity without the request thereof.

The Seimas Ombudsman shall investigate complainants’ complaints about the abuse of office by and bureaucracy of officials or other violations of human rights and freedoms in the sphere of public administration (Article 12 of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsman). When performing his duties, the Seimas Ombudsman shall have the right to draw up a record of administrative violations of law for failure to comply with the demands of the Seimas Ombudsman or for interfering in any other way with fulfilment by the Seimas Ombudsman of the rights granted to him (Article 19 (9) of the Law on the Seimas Ombudsman).
The state control of environmental protection and utilisation of natural resources shall be exercised by officials of the system of the Ministry of Environment – state inspectors of environmental protection. According to Article 18 of the Law on Environmental Protection, state inspectors of environmental protection in the cases, and in accordance with the procedure, specified by the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection shall have the right to issue mandatory instructions; draw up statements, acts and other documents in the specified format; hear cases of administrative offences and impose administrative penalties; hear cases of economic sanctions and impose economic sanctions.

The state control of environmental protection and utilisation of natural resources shall be exercised by officials of the system of the Ministry of Environment – state inspectors of environmental protection. According to Article 31 of the Law on Environmental Protection, state inspectors of environmental protection shall have the right to suspend the construction or reconstruction of objects of economic and other activities, suspend or restrict the activities of legal and natural persons where laws on environmental protection are being violated or where these activities do not comply with the normative standards, rules, limits and other conditions established in respect of environmental protection; in the cases, and in accordance with the procedure specified by the Law on State Control of Environmental Protection and other laws, to issue mandatory instructions, draw up statements, acts and other documents in the specified format; hear cases of administrative offences and impose administrative penalties; hear cases of economic sanctions and impose economic sanctions.

A state or municipal institution or agency which has compensated for damage caused by a civil servant shall have the right of recourse against said civil servant to the amount paid by it, but not in excess of 9 average salaries of the civil servant. If the civil servant caused the damage deliberately, a state or municipal institution or agency which has compensated for the damage caused by a civil servant shall have the right of recourse against said civil servant to the full amount paid by it (Article 39 of the Law on Civil Service).

- Penalties for the de-facto contempt of the court, e.g. when the judgment of the court is not followed and respected.

There are no penalties for the competent body in the event that it does not follow and respect the judgment of the court.

The execution of the court decision is regulated by the Law on Administrative Proceedings and the Code of Civil Procedure. If the court revokes the contested act (or part thereof) and/or obligates the appropriate entity of administration to remedy the committed violation or carry out other orders of the court (e.g. to guarantee access to justice), the claimant can request that the court issue a letter of enforcement. The claimant can also initiate a new suit challenging this omission/failure and/or asking the court to award damages caused by unlawful actions of public administration entities.

According to Article 83 of the Law on Administrative Proceedings, the judge or the court which hears an administrative case shall be entitled to impose fines if:

- officers and persons fail to meet, by the set time and without good reason, the requests by the judge or the court for a reply to the complaint/application /petition, documents and other material, or fail to comply with other requirements laid down by the judge/court related to the hearing of the case;
- a witness, specialist or expert fails to appear, without good reason, before the judge preparing the case for hearing or at the court hearing;
- after having been given a warning, persons participating in the proceedings again speak out of turn or insult other persons participating in the court proceedings;
- persons present in the courtroom fail to observe order or disregard the demands of the presiding judge that order be observed;
- persons abuse the right of disqualification;
- persons abuse the administrative proceedings. The administrative court may recognise the submission of a clearly unreasoned procedural document, or an objectively unfair action or inaction directed against cost-efficient, expedient and fair examination or resolution of the case as abuse of administrative proceedings.

The court which hears the administrative case shall have the right to impose on natural persons and legal persons and their representatives a fine in the amount of up to 300 EUR, and on officers or representatives of institution or agencies in the amount of up to 600 EUR for each case of violation, except for the case referred to in paragraph 1 subparagraph 5 of this Article. The court shall have the right to impose a fine on a person abusing the right of disqualification in the amount of up to 1,500 EUR. A separate appeal may be filed against the order of the court of first instance concerning the imposition of a fine.

There are several special norms:

If a person summoned to court fails to appear, they may be brought to the court upon the order of the court or judge. Failure to appear in court or refusal to give evidence, explanations or opinions in the court may be punishable by a fine in the amount of up to 300 EUR or detention in custody for the term of up to one month (Article 58 (1) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings);

Where injunctions applied as provisional measures are not complied with, the guilty persons shall be given a fine by court order in the amount of up to 300 EUR. A separate appeal may be filed against the order of the court concerning the imposition of a fine (Article 70 (12) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings);

The court shall have the right to impose a fine of up to 60 EUR on participants in the proceedings for failure to perform the obligation to inform the court of changes in address, email address, telephone and fax numbers, as well as addresses of other means of electronic communication if they are necessary in order to receive the procedural documents by means of electronic communication, where such failure to notify results in deferral of the hearing of the case (Article 76 (2) of the Law on Administrative Proceedings).

According to Article 72 of the Law on the Constitutional Court, a law (or part thereof) or other act (or part thereof) of the Seimas, an act of the President of the Republic, or an act (or part thereof) of the Government may not be applied from the day of the official publication of the ruling of the Constitutional Court that the act in question (or part thereof) is in conflict with the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania. The same consequences shall arise where the Constitutional Court gives a ruling that an act of the President of the Republic or an act (or part thereof) of the Government is in conflict with laws. All state institutions, as well as their officials, must annul the substatutory acts adopted by them, or provisions of these substatutory acts, if they are based on a legal act that has been ruled to be unconstitutional. Decisions based on legal acts that have been ruled to be in conflict with the Constitution or laws must not be executed if they had not been executed before entry into force of the respective ruling of the Constitutional Court. The legal force of a ruling of the Constitutional Court to declare a legal act or part thereof unconstitutional may not be overruled by the repeated adoption of a like legal act or part thereof.

Last update: 07/04/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters – Luxembourg

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

In Luxembourg, the environment is protected by the constitution, national laws, European and international law. Access to justice is limited to individuals and organisations who have standing. Only individuals who have a direct, certain, actual, effective and legitimate interest may challenge a decision. Although there are no court fees in Luxembourg, the high level of lawyers’ fees may deter individuals to bring actions before courts.

The Ministry of the Environment, Climate and Sustainable Development is the main public body in charge of the protection of the environment. It works with 3 administrations to carry out its mission: the administration of the environment, the administration of nature and forests and the administration of water management.

The High Council for the protection of nature and natural resources (Conseil supérieur pour la protection de la nature et des ressources naturelles) provides advice on all projects affecting nature to the Minister. In addition, the Inspection of work and mines (Inspection du travail et des mines) is competent to set out authorization conditions for dangerous industrial establishments and to control the application of existing laws.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

In 1999, the Luxembourg government amended the Constitution and added the protection of the environment and animals as a new constitutional principal (Article 11 b). It includes the protection of the human environment which is covered by the Ministry of the Environment, Climate and Sustainable Development.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Environmental laws, regulations, international conventions and case law are codified in the code of the environment. The most important environmental laws are the Law on classified installation of 10 June 1999, the Law of 19 December 2008 on water, the Law of 19 January 2004 on the protection of nature and natural resources, the Law relating to environmental liability of 20 April 2009 and the law relating to waste management of 21 March 2012.

The Law related to public access to environmental information of 21 November 2005 provides rules to access to justice in environmental matters. No specific sectoral legislation contains the provisions on access to justice.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

Since the 2010 case Greenpeace asbl Esch sur Alzette, ENGOs of national importance may take action before administrative courts to challenge individual administrative decision and not only regulatory decisions. The status of national importance for associations restricts access to justice to a small number of national ENGOs.

The supreme case is competent to rule on environmental cases only if the case is related to civil and criminal environmental law. It does not rule on any case related to administrative environmental law.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Parties can rely on international environmental agreements when ratified by national and EU authorities.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

In Luxembourg, there are two orders of jurisdiction: the civil order and the administrative order.

In the civil order, there are three levels of courts: the “tribunal d’arrondissement” (High Court of Justice), the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court (Cour de Cassation). The cases in cancellation of the judgments delivered by the various chambers of the Court of Appeal are mainly carried before the Supreme Court to be appealed.

In the administrative order, the first level is the Administrative Tribunal. The Administrative Court constitutes the supreme jurisdiction of the administrative order.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

There are two district tribunals (Luxembourg and Diekirch). The judges of the courts are directly appointed by the Grand Duke. There are also three small claims courts (juge de paix), (Diekirch, Luxembourg and Esch-sur-Alzette) Territorial competence of judicial tribunals is determined by the residence of the defendant. The cases heard by these courts are criminal and civil law cases which can include environmental cases with the exception of administrative matters in environmental law.

All decisions of first instance ruled by the district tribunals (“tribunal d’arrondissement”) of Luxembourg and Diekirch can be appealed before the Court of Appeal. To appeal a judgment, the appellant must bring his appeal within 40 days of the notification of the decision before the clerk of the court. The court of appeal will examine the application of the law to the facts by the district tribunal and will confirm or overrule the judgment of the tribunal.

Judgments of small claims courts can be appealed before district tribunals.

Decisions of the court of appeal and decisions of other tribunals ruled in last instance can be challenged before the "cour de cassation". The "cour de cassation" will only examine the application of the law and the rules of procedure. The time limit to bring an action before the "cour de cassation" is 2 months from the notification of the judgment.

There is only one administrative tribunal in Luxembourg.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

In Luxembourg, there are no specific courts or tribunals to decide on environmental matters. Environmental cases are judged by administrative or judiciary tribunal depending on the matter.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)
2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

An appeal can be brought before the administrative tribunal within three months of the notification of the administrative decision. A lawyer will bring the appeal. The administrative procedure is written and is organized around strict time limits. The examination of the file by the Tribunal takes 7 months before ruling the case.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special environmental courts in Luxembourg.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

The Administrative Court has cassation and reformatory rights. The administrative judge can rule on the legality as well as the proportionality of the administrative decision. He can substitute his decision for the decision of the administration. The time limit to appeal court orders and decisions before the administrative court of appeal is 40 days from the notification to the parties. An appeal is brought by an appeal claim through a lawyer. The rules are provided by the Law of 21 June 1999 on the procedure before administrative jurisdiction.

There are no extraordinary ways of appeal in Luxembourg apart from interim emergency procedures. Preliminary rulings can be requested from the EU Court or from a higher domestic jurisdiction by the Luxembourg judge according to article 267 TFEU. When the judge orders a preliminary ruling, he needs to order a stay of the proceedings.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

Mediation as a form of alternative dispute resolution is usually used in Luxembourg in commercial and family litigation. It is not very common in conflict related to environmental areas.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsman (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

As the Mediator of the Grand-Duchy of Luxembourg, the Ombudsman manages complaints related to the functioning of the state and municipal administrations and others related to public institutions.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Standing rules are consistent before all courts. However, Article 63 of the Law on the protection of nature and natural resources has set specific rules for environmental association. In Luxembourg, courts assess litigants’ standing. Standing rules are applicable throughout the environmental procedure from administrative appeal to judicial review. The requirements for standing do not change according to the type of remedy sought. Pursuant to a new bill of law on nature and natural resources protection, the Council of State has confirmed that case law allowing ENGOs to bring judicial review against individual administrative decisions did not need to be included in the new bill as judges must be able to use their discretionary power.

Courts consider standing before giving an opinion on the merits. It is up to the judge’s discretionary power. If the judge does not recognize parties to have standing, he will not consider the merit of the case.

Standing criteria for environmental cases that concern union law are the same as for environmental cases that do not. Union law has influenced the concept of standing in national law. The concept of “concerned public” does not exist in national law. However, the Ministry of Sustainable Development and Infrastructure has argued that it could be used as an opposable norm by a mere application of the Aarhus Convention.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

As a result of the transposition of EIA Directive (2011/92/EU) and IED Directive (2010/75/EU) into national legislation, associations of national importance are considered to have “sufficient interest”. These associations are recognized by the competent Ministry according to their object.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts as well as administrative review before the competent authority. The interest must be personal and different from general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. He must also demonstrate that he has suffered or will suffer damage from the decision. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them, but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfil the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the competent Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Luxembourg respects article 6 of the European Convention on Human rights. Individuals are allowed to have a translator during trials.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

In administrative law, the proof burden is shared between the Administration and the person initiating the legal action. The judge holds an inquisitorial power to accept or reject the evidence produced.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them, but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfil the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the competent Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs.
Expert opinion is not binding on judges. They have a certain level of discretion. The court can reject the expert opinion if it thinks that the expert has made an error.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
In order to obtain technical information, the court can call upon an expert. The parties are convened to a meeting by the expert. He will write a report on which the parties can add comments. They need to interact with the parties with respect to the adversarial principle. They need to be independent.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
The parties can request the court to call upon an expert to obtain technical information. The judge will choose an expert from the list of experts appointed who will prepare a report answering the technical questions written on the court decision. Once the report is produced, the Parties will use it to ask the court to take a position on the main litigation aspect of the case. If the parties have reason to believe that the expert is not impartial, they can ask the judge to reject this expert.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
There are no procedural fees. Expert fees will be paid by the person requesting the expert opinion.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures
1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field.
It is compulsory to be assisted by a lawyer before all the administrative jurisdictions and the judiciary tribunal “Tribunal d’arrondissement” in civil matters as well before the Court of appeal and the Supreme Court.
The bar of Luxembourg has established a registry of all the lawyers registered. A search by legal field is available.
It is only compulsory to be represented by a lawyer before administrative courts and the “Tribunal d’arrondissement” (civil court).

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance
In Luxembourg, legal aid is available to people having financial difficulties. Some law firms offer pro bono assistance, but it depends on the size and legal interest of the cases.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?
People have to fill in a request to the Bar of Luxembourg or to the Central Social Assistance Services. Both claimant and defendants may apply for legal in civil, administrative, commercial legal cases and therefore in environmental cases. Although there are no specific rules applying to environmental cases, legal aid will be available to people corresponding to the general attribution criterion. Due to the small number of lawyers practicing in the area of environmental public interest litigation, there is no pro bono legal assistance available to individuals or ENGOs. In addition, there are no law school clinics that focus on representing the public in environmental cases.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts
People can choose experts from the list provided on the website of the Justice Ministry.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible
Natur & umwelt asbl foundation
Fédération des Unions d’Apiculteurs du Luxembourg
Bio-Nest asbl
Centre de soin de la faune sauvage
Verenegug fir biologesche landbau Lëtzebuerg
Mouvement Ecologique Section Milërderral-Echternach
Coin de terre et du Foyer - Société pour la Protection des Animaux Differdange: animaux@pt.lu
Mouvement écologique
Association luxembourgeoise de droit de l’environnement

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State Greenpeace.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures
1.7.1. Procedural time limits
1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
The time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (administrative review) is usually 3 months i.e. before the expiration of the time limit to bring a claim before the Administrative Tribunal. However, there is no specific time frame to challenge an administrative environmental decision before the competent administrative authority.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
Administrative authorities are asked to deliver a decision within 3 months of the request sent by an applicant. If the administration does not provide a decision within 3 months, its silence equals a negative decision.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?
Before bringing a case before the administrative tribunal, individuals do not need to have exhausted all “organized administrative recourses”.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?
Instruction of the case by the court is limited to 7 months. The Administrative Tribunal must rule within this deadline. The administrative court of appeal must take its decision within a timeframe of 5 months from the judgment of the Administrative Tribunal.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)
The motion must be submitted to the Tribunal within one month of the submission of the claim. The defendant has to submit his statement of defence within 1 month. The claimant can respond once within 1 month and so on. The tribunal decides on the pleading date within the month of the submission of the last statement. Judgment is delivered by the Administrative Tribunal within one month of the pleading hearings.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments
1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
In administrative law, the appeal or the action submitted to an administrative court against an administrative decision does not have a suspensive effect. The administrative decision is considered to be legal and enforceable even if its legality is challenged.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?
In environmental matters, action against an administrative decision may have a suspensive effect if it is based on serious grounds and the execution of the decision may cause serious and irreparable damages. The administrative decision of the court can either be positive or negative. The claimant can request the execution of the judgment once it has been ruled. He can ask a “special commissioner” (“commissaire spécial”) to execute the decision through an extraordinary procedure.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request? It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures (“juge des références ordinaires”). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is oral. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions? There is an immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase? The administrative decision is not suspended once challenged before the court.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit? It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The court decision can be appealed within 15 days of the notification of the decision. The court of appeal is competent to rule on the case. An emergency procedure will be following as in first instance. No financial deposit is needed.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms
1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filling a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc. Claimants will face bailiff fees, expert fees and lawyers’ fees. Bailiff fees are determined by a flat fee and governed by Grand-Ducal regulation. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursements other than the statutory fees.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/Interim measure, is a deposit necessary? The cost of injunctive relief/an interim measure may vary according to the complexity and the value of the case. Although the injunctive relief procedure should be straightforward and inexpensive, lawyers may charge higher fees for this work than for other simple procedures. There are no specific procedural fees to be paid apart from lawyers’ fees.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons? Legal aid is available for people who have financial difficulties. They have to fill in a request to the Bar of Luxembourg or to the Central Social Assistance Services. This financial assistance covers all fees linked to the legal procedure and the lawyer, notary, bailiff and translator's fees. Legal aid is available for civil, commercial and administrative legal cases for both plaintiffs and defendants. It is available in litigation and in extra judicial recourses. Legal aid may also be granted in the case of precautionary measures and procedures to enforce court decisions or any other authority to execute.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance? There is no specific legal aid available to associations, legal persons or NGOs. However, regular legal aid rules for natural persons apply to environmental cases that are to be brought before either a civil or an administrative court. Legal aid is only available to individuals of insufficient means.

There is pro bono legal assistance provided by certain big law firms in Luxembourg. In addition, the legal information service provides free legal information but is not specialized in environmental law.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance? Legal protection insurance provides financial assistance. Insurance will either pay lawyers’ fees directly or will reimburse the client. They allocate a specific amount that can be paid per year or by specific case.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions? The Bar of Luxembourg prohibits contingency fees (pacte de quota litis) for the entire lawyers’ fee. There is no general rule according to which the losing party will have to bear the prevailing party’s lawyer's fees.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic? In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination? Public access to administrative judgments is provided to the public via a website. Information on access to justice in environmental matters is accessible through the government sites:

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information? Information on access to justice in environmental matters is provided to the public via several websites. However, the information is neither very structured nor very clear. Public access to administrative judgments is provided to the public via a website. Information on access to justice in environmental matters is accessible through the government sites.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)? In Luxembourg, there are no specific sectoral rules. Regular administrative procedure applies to administrative environmental cases.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? Each administrative decision must state the available remedies for access to justice and the time limit.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? In Luxembourg, there are three administrative languages: French, German and Luxembourgish. All procedural documents must be written in French, but the hearing may be carried out in these three languages. Translation can be provided to parties in court and will be paid for by the government. However, if a party wants to produce a witness who needs a translator, the party will have to pay for the witness as well as for the translator.
1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no rules on EIA screening decisions in Luxembourg.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The applicant (NGO, natural person) can bring a case before the Administrative Tribunal. The claim must include the name and address of the claimant, the designation of the administrative decision, a summary of the facts and objections and the object of the claim.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Legal action before the Administrative Tribunal against the final administrative decision can be brought within a time limit of 40 days of the notification of administrative decision. The scoping can be brought before the Administrative Tribunal.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The Administrative Courts can review final EIA decisions or authorizations. The applicant, ministers, communes, neighbours of the establishment who have a sufficient and direct interest and associations of national importance can bring a case before the Administrative Tribunal. The Claim must include the name and address of the claimant, the designation of the administrative decision, a summary of the facts and objections and the object of the claim. It must also include the list of the exhibits that the claimant will use in the trial. The Administrative court will review the legality of the administrative decision and its validity.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

Administrative courts review the procedural and the substantive legality of EIA decision. As they judge on the merits of the case, they will review the technical documents and the material evidence submitted. They can order an expert report and a visit the site.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

Legal action before the Administrative Tribunal against the final administrative decision which has a legal base can be brought within a time limit of 40 days of the notification of administrative decision.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?

Decisions are challengeable once they have been notified or published.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.
10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the IPPC procedure, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision related to IPPC.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There is no such notion as equality of arms in Luxembourg.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific requirement in law that environmental procedure should be timely.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief is available in IPPC procedures in cases where there is a risk of serious damage. There are no special rules applicable to IPPC procedures besides the regular national provision.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
Information on access to justice in environmental matters is provided to the public via several websites. However, the information is neither very structured nor very clear.
Public access to administrative judgments is provided to the public via a website.
Information on access to justice in environmental matters is accessible through the government sites.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[1]
Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
Natural or legal person affected or likely to be affected by environmental damage or having a sufficient interest in environmental decision-making relating to the damage or, alternatively, alleging the impairment of a right can submit any observation relating to instances of environmental damage or an imminent threat of such damage of which they are aware to the Minister or the competent administration and are entitled to ask the Minister to take action under the law of 20 April 2009 relating to environmental liability (which constitutes the administrative review by the competent authority). The person directly affected can also bring an action before the court instead. They do not have to exhaust administrative review before bringing a case to court.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
Legal action before the Administrative Tribunal against the decision can be brought within a time limit of 40 days.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
There are no requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
There are no specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
The notification of the decision to the natural or legal person does not need to respect any particular form. The authority is only required to sign the decision and to be able to prove the reception date.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
Annex II of the law of 20 April 2009 provides a guideline for reparation of environmental damages. Article 7 (3) of the Law states that the “Minister forces the operator to take repair measures” but if the operator does not take the appropriate measures, the Minister can take measures himself or ask third parties to take the necessary measures.
The competent authority, i.e. the Minister, has the power but not the duty to carry out preventive remedial measures if the operator has not been identified.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The Minister: Member of the government who is in charge of protection of the environment.
The competent administration who is in charge of protection of the environment.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
The MS does not require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases
1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
In EIA and IPPC procedures in which the establishment may have an impact on the environment of another country, the request file will be transmitted to the country that will be able to provide its comments. It will then be informed of the final decision. The final decision can be challenge before the competent authority.

2) Notion of public concerned?
The public concerned in a transboundary context includes individuals that have a direct and sufficient interest whether they are a Luxembourg resident or not. The notion of interest as described above remains the main condition to have standing.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
NGOs who have not received an agreement from the Luxembourg state do not have standing. As result of the transposition of EIA Directive (2011/92/EU) and IED Directive (2010/75/EU) into national legislation, associations of national importance are considered to have a “sufficient interest”.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
Individuals of the affected country that have a direct interest have standing and can bring an action before a Luxembourg court. They are eligible for legal aid on the same conditions as Luxembourg residents. They can bring an action and request injunctive relief or interim measures under the same conditions as Luxembourg residents.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
The information will be provided to the concerned public through its publication.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
Administrative organs are asked to deliver a decision within 3 months of the request sent by the applicant.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
Information on access to justice in environmental matters is provided to the public via several websites. However, the information is neither very structured nor very clear.

Public access to administrative judgments is provided to the public via this website.

Information on access to justice in environmental matters is accessible through the government sites:

- Ministry of the Environment, Climate and Sustainable Development

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
In Luxembourg, there are three administrative languages: French, German and Luxembourgish. All procedural documents must be written in French, but the hearing may be carried out in these three languages.

Translation can be provided to parties in court and will be paid for by the government. However, if a party wants to produce a witness who needs a translator, the party will have to pay for the witness as well as for the translator.

9) Any other relevant rules?
There are no other relevant rules.

---

[1] See also case C-529/15
Last update: 22/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

---

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives

| | |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts. They can also bring a claim for administrative review before the competent authority. The interest must be personal and different from a general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfil the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg "residence" in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs. Access to national courts in light of CJEU case law and related national case law is relatively effective in Luxembourg as long as the ENGOs have standing.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The administrative tribunal judges the procedural and the substantive legality of the administrative decision as it judges on the merits of the case. The judge will verify factual and technical criteria and all appropriate documents. He can order an expert report and order the administration to submit files and documents. He can also visit the site to collect information related to the situation.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before national courts, it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase.

6) Fair, equitable – what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There is no such notion as equality of arms in Luxembourg.

7) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
There are no specific requirement in law that environmental procedure should be timely.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief is available outside of the scope of the EIA and IED Directives in cases where there is a risk of serious damage. It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures ("juge des référendaires-ordinaires"). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is not written. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits. There are no special rules applicable to each sector.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursement other than the statutory fees. There are no safeguards against the costs being prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts. They can also bring a claim for administrative review before the competent authority. The interest must be personal and different from general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfill the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs. Access to national courts in light of CJEU case law and related national case law is relatively effective in Luxembourg.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative tribunal judges the procedural and the substantive legality of the administrative decision as it judges on the merits of the case. The judge will verify factual and technical criteria and all appropriate documents. He can order an expert report and order the administration to submit files and documents. He can also visit the site to collect information related to the situation.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits. There are no special rules applicable to each sector.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in cases where there is a risk of serious damage.

It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures (“juges des référés-ordinaires”). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is not written. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursement other than the statutory fees. There are no safeguards against the costs being prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts. They can also bring a claim for administrative review before the competent authority. The interest must be personal and different from general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfill the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The administrative tribunal judges the procedural and the substantive legality of the administrative decision as it judges on the merits of the case. The judge will verify factual and technical criteria and all appropriate documents. He can order an expert report and order the administration to submit files and documents. He can also visit the site to collect information related to the situation.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? Injunctive relief is available in cases where there is a risk of serious damage. It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures ("juge des référendaires ordinaires"). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is not written. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits. There are no special rules applicable to each sector.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursment other than the statutory fees. There are no safeguards against the costs being prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts. The interest must be personal and different from general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision. Administrative review can take two forms before the administrative tribunal: a claim to obtain the invalidation of the administrative decision or a claim to request the reformation of the decision. Before taking an action before the administrative tribunal, an administrative review can be taken before the competent authority.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfill the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted makes a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)? The form in which the plan or programme is adopted makes no difference in terms of legal standing.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? The administrative tribunal judges the procedural and the substantive legality of the administrative decision as it judges on the merits of the case. The judge will verify factual and technical criteria and all appropriate documents. He can order an expert report and order the administration to submit files and documents. He can also visit the site to collect information related to the situation.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? There is no such notion as equality of arms in Luxembourg.

8) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation? There are no specific requirements in law that environmental procedure should be timely.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? Injunctive relief is available in cases where there is a risk of serious damage. It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures ("juge des référents ordinaires"). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is not written. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits. There are no special rules applicable to each sector.
10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursement other than the statutory fees. There are no safeguards against the costs being prohibitive.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[5]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Only individuals who have a direct, certain, personal, actual, effective and legitimate interest in the matter can bring a case before judiciary or administrative courts. The interest must be personal and different from general interest. The individual must demonstrate that there is a link between the administrative decision and his own situation. The situation must also exist at the moment of the decision.

ENGOs have legal standing if they have received official approval by the State of Luxembourg based on their national importance. To receive official approval, the protection of the environment must have been included in their bylaws for three years. Foreign ENGOs have legal standing if the State of Luxembourg authorises them but national ENGOs are favoured as it is easier for them to receive official approval. In theory, local ENGOs could be recognized as having national importance if they fulfil the legal requirement. However, their number is quite small in Luxembourg and it seems that only very few ENGOs have been recognized as having national importance by the Ministry. Foreign ENGOs need to have Luxembourg “residence” in order to be recognized as having national importance. This system might be quite discriminating for foreign ENGOs.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The administrative tribunal judges the procedural and the substantive legality of the administrative decision as it judges on the merits of the case. The judge will verify factual and technical criteria and all appropriate documents. He can order an expert report and order the administration to submit files and documents. He can also visit the site to collect information related to the situation.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Before filing a court action, there is no requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In order to have standing before national courts, it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase, to make comments, or to participate at hearing. The regular rules on standing before national courts apply to people who want to challenge a decision.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief is available in cases where there is a risk of serious damage. It is possible to obtain injunctive relief to prevent imminent damage or to stop a statutory nuisance by the way of an interim emergency procedure. The emergency interim procedure is available in the case of an emergency before the judge of ordinary interim procedures ("juge des référés-ordinaires"). He can order any measures to protect evidence, order a witness to appear or make any decision to prevent imminent damage. The procedure is not written. Parties do not need to be represented by a lawyer. The judge’s decision is only temporary and can be modified by the same judge later on or by the judge ruling on the merits. There are no special rules applicable to each sector.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

In Luxembourg, all Parties have to bear their own costs irrespective of the outcome of the case. Procedural indemnities are very rarely granted to parties. Other costs must usually be borne by the losing party. Bailiff costs and lawyers’ fees are very high in Luxembourg. Expert, witness, translator and interpreter fees are also governed by a Grand-Ducal regulation. Lawyers will individually determine their own fees. Their fees may be calculated on an hourly basis or according to the complexity of the case. Lawyers will generally ask for retainers for their fees, costs and disbursement other than the statutory fees. There are no safeguards against the costs being prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how[6]?

It is possible to bring a legal challenge before the administrative tribunal of Luxembourg concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU. Prejudicial questions can be sent to the Tribunal.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters
[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774
[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774

Last update: 22/07/2021
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

An appeal against a decision of an administrative tribunal must be brought within 40 days. The loser will be ordered to pay the procedural fees.

Last update: 22/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Hungary

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 28/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

In Hungary, the regulation of environmental protection and overseeing of compliance therewith, as well as the planning and direction of environmental protection, are performed by state bodies and local governments. The Parliament enforces environmental interests in its legislative work, adopts the National Environmental Program, determines the environmental duties of the Government and the local governments, and approves the funds used to achieve environmental objectives and control the use thereof.

The Government directs the implementation of the state's responsibilities regarding environmental protection, and it determines and coordinates the environmental protection activities of the ministries and the bodies directly subordinate to the Government.

The minister with responsibility for environmental protection (at present the Minister for Agriculture) directs the environmental protection activities assigned to them and the administration of environmental protection within their jurisdiction. It should be noted that, with regard to water as an environmental medium, these tasks are carried out by the minister with responsibility for the protection of water as an environmental medium (the ‘Minister responsible for water protection'), at present the Minister for the Interior).

The activities of environmental protection administration directed by the Minister cover the activities of the environmental protection authority and, in particular, licensing of the use of the environment and enforcement of the administrative legal responsibility for the environment, data management and information tasks related to operation of the Environmental Information System, organisation of tasks aimed at averting environmental damage, and drawing up and monitoring of the execution of measures and programmes for the protection, improvement and restoration of the environment.

Natural and legal persons and unincorporated entities are entitled to participate in non-regulatory procedures concerning the environment, and everyone has the right to call the attention of users of the environment and the authorities to the fact that the environment is being endangered, damaged or polluted. The right to public participation may be exercised in person or through a representative, associations or municipal local governments respectively.

Although there are differences in the conditions relating to legal standing, in administrative proceedings and judicial procedures the legal standing is provided for anyone (natural or legal persons) directly affected by the case. Environmental associations fulfilling the requirements stipulated by law may act as a client (a person whose rights or rightful interests are affected by the case and who has legal standing) in the administrative proceedings and/or as a party in the judicial procedures aimed at reviewing the definitive decision of the environmental authority. Furthermore, environmental and nature conservation associations can bring to court an action against the polluter if the environment is threatened or damaged.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The Fundamental Law of Hungary[1] was adopted on 25 April 2011, replacing the former Constitution, which had been in force since 1949. Article XXI of the Fundamental Law lays down that Hungary recognises and implements the right of all to a healthy environment. This provision also stipulates the 'polluter pays principle', which provides that any person causing environmental damage shall be liable to take the necessary remedial actions and/or pay for remediation. Implementation of the right to a healthy environment is principally the obligation of the State, though this right can be relied on directly where the legislation or the state administration fails to enforce it.

According to Articles XXIV and XXV of the Fundamental Law, everyone shall have the right to have their affairs handled impartially, fairly and within a reasonable time by the authorities, and to submit – either individually or jointly with others – a written request, complaint or proposal to any organ exercising executive powers. The right to seek remedy against judicial, administrative or other official decisions is ensured by Article XXVIII.

The Fundamental Law also ensures the right to have access to and disseminate information of public interest (Article VI, Paragraph (3)). As explained below, the national legislation sets out that environmental information shall be regarded as data of public interest, therefore access to such information is ensured by the Fundamental Law and other national acts.

The Constitutional Court is the principal organ for the protection of the Fundamental Law, and the proceedings thereof are governed by the Act on the Constitutional Court[2].

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. – main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Beyond the national provisions referred to in the previous section, the following pieces of legislation shall be considered as the most relevant in respect of environmental protection and access to justice in environmental matters in Hungary.

Act LIII of 1995 on the general rules of environmental protection ([‘the Kvt.’][3] lays down the fundamental principles of environmental protection, access to environmental information and participatory rights in environmental administrative proceedings. In accordance with the Kvt., specific pieces of legislation... acts, governmental and ministerial decrees) govern the protection of specific environmental elements, regulate certain activities impacting on the environment, and establish the system of environmental administration.

In its Article 98, the Kvt. ensures that environmental NGOs (determined by the Kvt. as ‘associations formed to represent environmental interests’) which are active in the impact area are entitled, in their area of operation, to the legal status of a client in environmental administrative procedures, in particular in environmental impact assessments, environmental audits, consolidated environmental use permit procedures and procedures where the environmental authority acts as an expert authority[4]. In the event that the environment is being threatened or damaged, environmental associations are entitled to initiate the procedure of the competent authorities and/or bring to court an action against the polluter.

In line with the Kvt., environmental NGOs also have the right to cooperate in drawing up regional development plans, zoning plans and environmental protection programmes that affect their area of operation or activity, to give their opinion on legislative bills before Parliament and local government draft laws, and to opine on the draft version of plans and programmes that affect their area of operation and activity.

Act CL of 2016 on the General Public Administration Procedures (the Âkr.)[5] governs administrative procedures in Hungary and its provisions also apply to environmental procedures. In applying the Âkr., based on its Article 10 a client is, inter alia, any natural or legal person, or other entity, whose rights or legitimate interests are directly affected by a case. In addition to this general rule, Paragraph (2) of Article 10 of the Âkr. sets out that an act or government decree may define the persons and entities who shall be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case. In environmental administrative procedures, Article 98 of the Kvt. provides participatory rights for environmental NGOs in accordance with Article 10(2) of the Âkr.

Governmental Decree No 314/2005 on environmental impact assessment and consolidated environmental use permits (the Khvr.)[6] transposes into national law Directive 2011/92/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 December 2011 on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment (the ‘EIA Directive’) and Directive 2010/75/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 November 2010 on industrial emissions (the ‘IED’). The Khvr. sets out the scope of activities subject to these EU Directives and the specific procedural requirements of environmental authorisation. As regards the scope of persons having participatory rights in the procedures conducted under this Decree, account shall be taken of the Khvr.’s term ‘public concerned’, which covers any natural person, legal person or organisation without a legal personality that is affected, or may be affected, by the decision of the environmental authority, or which otherwise has an interest, including environmental organisations specified in Article 98 (1) of the Kvt.

Act I of 2017 on the Code of Administrative Litigation (the ‘Kp.’)[7] lays down the rules concerning administrative lawsuits aimed at ensuring efficient legal protection against the violation of law through administrative activity or omission. In certain cases, the Kp. only orders application of the provisions of Act CXXX of 2016 on the Code of Civil Procedures (the ‘Pp.’)[8], which establishes the general framework of civil court proceedings.

With respect to access to environmental justice, points a) and d) of Article 17 of the Kp. must be mentioned. These provisions ensure the possibility of legal standing for any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the administrative activity and for any non-governmental organisation, in the cases specified in law or government decree, that has been pursuing its registered activity in order to protect any fundamental right or enforce any public interest in a geographical territory affected by the administrative activity for at least one year, if the administrative activity affects its registered activity; these persons and entities shall have the right to bring to court an action, i.e. to initiate an administrative lawsuit against the decision (or omission) of the competent administrative authority.

Directive 2001/42/EC on the assessment of the effects of certain plans and programmes on the environment (the ‘SEA Directive’) has been transposed into Hungarian legislation by amendment of the Kvt. and by adoption of Governmental Decree No. 2/2005 on the Environmental Assessment of Certain Plans and Programmes (the ‘Skvr.’)[9]. The national legislation ensures the participation of the public in SEA procedures, however it does not expressly provide for the administrative or judicial review of infringements of SEA requirements. The plans and programmes subject to an SEA can be adopted by various public bodies and by norms which can be legally non-binding or can have the force of law. Where the conditions stipulated by Act CLI of 2011 on the Constitutional Court (‘Act CLI/2011’)[10] are met, the legal review of laws and normative resolutions can be initiated before the Constitutional Court.

In Hungary, there are several acts regulating the issue of access to environmental information and access to justice in environmental matters. The basic rights are laid down by the Kvt. and Act CXXII of 2011 on Informational Self-Determination and Freedom of Information (the Infotv.)[11]. Governmental Decree 311/2005 on the rules governing public access to environmental information[12]. Mostly, these regulations have transposed into national law the requirements of Directive 2003/4/EC. In accordance with Article 12 of the Kvt., and under the specific conditions set out by Gov. Decree 311/2005, information relating to the environment shall be considered as data of public interest. As a main rule, Article 28(1) of the Infotv. stipulates that information of public interest (including environmental information) shall be made available to anyone upon a request presented verbally, in writing or by electronic means. In the event of failure to meet the deadline for compliance or refusal of compliance with a request for access to public information, or for having the fee charged for compliance with the request reviewed, the requesting party may bring the case before the courts.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The Curia (formerly the Supreme Court of Hungary) has the competence to decide on appeals filed against decisions of the general courts and courts of appeal, as well as motions for review. The Curia adopts uniformity decisions, which are binding upon all courts of law, and performs jurisprudence analysis of cases closed by final or definitive decision of courts and explores the judicial practice of courts. This body decides on the legality of municipal decrees and, where appropriate, annuls them. The Curia adjudicates on uniformity complaints, which will be a new instrument for legal remedy applicable in specific cases. Uniformity decisions are adopted where necessary for the development of, or to ensure the uniformity of, judicial practice. All uniformity decisions are published in the Official Journal (the ‘Magyar Közlöny’). As regards the legal standing of environmental associations in environmental administrative and judicial proceedings, administrative uniformity decision KJE 4/2010 (X.20.) of the Supreme Court states that such associations may act as clients in environmental administrative procedures, where the main decision-making body is the environmental authority or where that authority proceeds as an expert authority. The practical ramification of this statement is that e.g. the proceedings of the water management authority or the forest authority are not regarded as environmental administrative proceedings unless the environmental authority appointed by Gov. Decree 71/2015 is participating as an expert authority providing its opinion on environmental questions specified by law.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

The parties to the administrative procedure cannot directly rely on international environmental agreements. National administrative authorities exercise their powers within the framework of the national law. Likewise, the courts shall in principle interpret the national laws in accordance with their objective and with the Fundamental Law. In the case of administrative court proceedings (judicial review of administrative decisions), the provisions of Article 34 of the Kp. provide that the court may, ex officio or upon petition, ask the Court of Justice of the European Union to provide a preliminary opinion, or the Constitutional Court to commence its proceedings for declaring that a legal regulation, statutory provision, means of regulation of public-law organisations or uniformity decision is contrary to the Fundamental Law and contrary to international agreements.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system
Justice is administered by the following courts in Hungary:

- the Curia;
- the courts of appeal;
- the general courts;
- the district courts and Budapest district courts (collectively ‘district courts’); and administrative and labour courts.

After 31 March 2020, administrative and labour courts will be integrated and operated within the structure of general courts.

The Constitutional Court of Hungary is the supreme organ for the protection of the Fundamental Law. The Constitutional Court is entitled to examine whether the acts adopted by the Parliament are in accordance with the Fundamental Law (ex-ante examination). On the basis of a constitutional complaint, the Constitutional Court reviews laws to be applied in a specific case or a judicial decision with regard to its conformity with the Fundamental Law. This body performs the ex-post review of laws at the initiative of the Government, one fourth of all Members of Parliament, the President of the Curia, the Prosecutor General or the Commissioner of Fundamental Rights. It also examines the conformity of national legislation with international treaties.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

As a main rule, district courts shall proceed in the first instance. Administrative and labour courts shall proceed in the first instance in cases of the judicial review of administrative decisions, in actions relating to contracts of employment and other similar relationships, and in other cases delegated to it by law.

Administrative colleges functioning within the general courts shall proceed in the first instance in the judicial review of administrative decisions after 31 March 2020.

The general courts proceed in the first instance in cases defined by law, and in the second instance they hear appeals lodged against decisions of the district courts and administrative and labour courts.

The Curia is the first instance in the review of certain administrative decisions and the second instance in the review of decisions taken by the administrative colleges of the general courts in the first instance.

According to the provisions of the Kp., if there is not another court with exclusive jurisdiction, the court having jurisdiction is determined based on the location of the immovable property in question in the case of any right or obligation relating to immovable property or a legal relationship with the immovable property;

- the place where the activity is or is planned to be exercised in the case of notification or authorisation of an activity;
- with the exception of the cases set out above, the permanent residence, habitual residence or registered office of the plaintiff in the case of an authority acting with administrative competence covering more than one county;
- with the exception of the cases set out above, the seat of the administrative body in the case of omission;
- or the place where the administrative action was realised.

In the event that the administrative activity was realised abroad, the Capital Administrative and Labour Court (after 31 March 2020, the Capital General Court) exercises exclusive jurisdiction to proceed.

If the claim was submitted jointly and more than one court proceeding in administrative cases has the competence and jurisdiction to petition, the higher-level court or, in the case of courts of identical level, the court having exclusive jurisdiction over a certain petition of claim, shall proceed.

In the event of any conflict of competence or jurisdiction, or if the competent court cannot be identified or is disqualified, the court has to be delegated within thirty days. If the competent court cannot be identified, the party may submit a request for delegation at any administrative and labour court; otherwise the court proceeding in the action shall present a motion for the delegation ex officio. The court having competence and jurisdiction will be delegated and instructed to conduct the proceedings by the Curia.

The general rules on competence and jurisdiction in civil court procedures are laid down by the Pp. The court in whose area of jurisdiction the defendant’s home is located has to proceed. In the event that the defendant has no permanent residence in Hungary, jurisdiction shall be determined according to the defendant’s habitual residence in Hungary. Where the defendant’s habitual residence is not known, or if it is located abroad, the last-known domestic residence shall apply or, if this cannot be identified or if the defendant has never had a permanent residence in Hungary, jurisdiction shall be based on the plaintiff’s home address in Hungary or, failing this, on the plaintiff’s habitual residence in Hungary or, if other than a natural person, on the plaintiff’s Hungarian registered office.

In actions against entities other than natural persons, general jurisdiction is based on the place where the entity’s representative body appointed for the case in dispute or department operates in addition to the registered office of the entity. If the legal entity has no registered office in Hungary in an action where the plaintiff is a resident legal person, jurisdiction is determined based on the plaintiff’s registered office or its place of operation. Jurisdiction of a court is established based on the time when the statement of claim is submitted.

The court takes into consideration its lack of jurisdiction ex officio. Furthermore, in the event of any conflict of competence or jurisdiction where the competent court cannot be identified or is disqualified, priority is given to designating the court of competent jurisdiction.

In the matter of designation, the decision lies with the general court if the conflict occurs between district courts within its territorial jurisdiction, and, if a district court is disqualified within its territorial jurisdiction, another district court can be appointed. In other cases, the decision lies with the court of appeal if the conflict occurs between district courts and general courts within its territorial jurisdiction, and, if the district court or the general court is disqualified within its territorial jurisdiction, another district court or general court can be appointed. In further cases, the Curia shall designate the court which is to conduct the proceedings.

For cases in connection with private law relationships containing a foreign component, the provisions of Act XXVIII of 2017 on Private International Law (Nml.[13] apply. This Act lays down that where proceedings between the parties are pending – at the time the proceedings are instituted – before a foreign court brought for the same subject under the same cause of action, the Hungarian court may suspend its proceedings of its own motion or upon request, provided that recognition of the foreign court’s judgment in Hungary is not precluded. The Hungarian court continues the proceedings that were terminated by a foreign court without a decision on the merits. If the foreign court has adopted a decision on the merits of the case, and such decision can be recognised in Hungary, the Hungarian court shall terminate its proceedings.

In the case of administrative court proceedings, the national legislation does not provide rules for determining the court having jurisdiction where there is conflict between different national tribunals in different Member States. Administrative lawsuits can be initiated against the administrative actions (or omissions) of national authorities. In the case of activities having transboundary environmental impacts, the specific legislations on environmental assessments – covering the rules on consultations with other Member States concerned – shall apply.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

There are no special provisions on court proceedings regarding the environmental sector.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.
The court has to judge the dispute within the framework of the petition of claim, the applications and legal statements submitted by the parties. The court will take account of the applications and statements in accordance with their content and not in accordance with their specification in terms of form. The court may order an examination or taking of evidence ex officio only in cases specified by law.

Several requirements of the Kp. provide for own motion of the court, e.g. the court may, upon request or ex officio, bring any person into the action as a person concerned whose rights or lawful interests are affected by the judgment to be passed in the action if the court deems that their involvement in the action is necessary in order to resolve the dispute.

The court may, ex officio or upon petition, ask the Court of Justice of the European Union to provide a preliminary opinion, or request the Constitutional Court to commence its proceedings for declaring that a legal regulation, statutory provision, means of regulation of public-law organisations or uniformity decision is contrary to the Fundamental Law and contrary to international treaties. Furthermore, the court may order the taking of evidence ex officio with respect to evidence to support any fact or circumstance that must be taken into consideration ex officio, or in the case of reference made to legal injury jeopardising the interests of a minor or a person entitled to disability benefit, or if the law so provides.

The court examines the lawfulness of the administrative activity within the limits of the petition of claim; however, the court must ex officio take into consideration the grounds for nullity or other legally stipulated grounds for invalidity of the disputed administrative act and any material deficiency in formal requirements owing to which the administrative act is to be considered as non-existing, the fact that the administrative act is based on a legal regulation that is not applicable in the case, and other facts and circumstances stipulated in law.

Where the legal injury is declared, the court shall ex officio require the administrative body to eliminate the consequences of the activity that injures rights.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Governmental Decree 71/2015 on the appointment of public administrative authorities of environmental and nature protection (Gov. Decree 71/2015) sets out the structure and competences of environmental authorities and the competences and jurisdiction thereof in Hungary. The minister with responsibility for environmental and nature protection (the ‘Minister’), County Government Offices, district environmental authorities, the National Meteorological Service, mayors and notaries are appointed as having competences in environmental administration. County Government Offices proceed as territorial environmental authorities in most environmental administrative cases. In specific cases stipulated by law, the Government Office of Pest County or the Minister shall proceed as the environmental authority of nationwide competence.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Administrative decisions of the environmental authority are taken in single-instance proceedings, i.e. the decision of the environmental authority is definitive (there is no administrative review procedure) and can be challenged before the court in accordance with the provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. An action can be initiated by lodging a statement of claim, the content of which is provided by Article 37 of the Kp. The documents, or a copy thereof, which are referred to by the plaintiff as evidence supporting the claim, or which are required to verify the facts and circumstances to be taken into consideration by the court ex officio, have to be enclosed with the claim. Several petitions of claim may be submitted jointly if they arise from the same legal relation or legal relations connected on the basis of facts and legal basis.

In the claim, the plaintiff may request abrogation, annulment or changing of the administrative act, declaration of omission of the administrative act, prohibition of realisation of the administrative act, obligation to fulfil the duty arising from administrative legal relation, obligation to reimburse the damage caused in relation to an administrative contract legal relation or civil service legal relation or the declaration of the fact of legal injury brought about by the administrative activity or ascertaining of other facts essential in terms of the administrative legal relation.

The statement of claim shall be lodged with the administrative body realising the disputed act within thirty days from disclosure of the disputed administrative act. The administrative body forwards the statement of claim to the court. Unless otherwise provided by law, the statement of claim shall have no suspensive effect on the administrative act taking effect.

A specific rule on environmental fines is provided by Article 96/C of the Kv., which stipulates that the lodging of a statement of claim against a resolution of the authority on imposing a fine shall have suspensive effect on enforcement. In other environmental cases, lodging a statement of claim against the decision of the environmental authority does not have suspensive effect.

Based on the principle of concentration of actions laid down by the Pp. as well as the Kp., the court and the parties shall aim to ensure that all facts and evidence are made available within such a timeframe that a judgment in the dispute can be delivered after one hearing only. The national acts do not stipulate an exact time limit for adopting a decision in the court proceedings, the duration of which depends on several factors (e.g. obtaining the opinion of judicial experts). The official website of the Hungarian Courts provides a calculator for determining the length of court proceedings which can be reasonably expected.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special environmental courts in Hungary.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

Anyone having the legal status of a client in the administrative procedure is entitled to bring to court an action against definitive decisions of the authority. Administrative decisions of the environmental authority are taken in single-instance proceedings, i.e. the decision of the environmental authority is definitive (and enforceable) and can be challenged before the general court in accordance with the provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. For any appeals against first-instance decisions taken by the general court, the second instance is the Curia. In administrative lawsuits, in most cases there is no appeal against the first-instance judgement, only petition for review before the Curia, which is an extraordinary remedy.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

Based on the provisions of the Kp., extraordinary forms of legal remedy are the review procedure of the Curia and retrial. A motion for the review of a final judgment and a final ruling for rejecting the statement of claim or for dismissal of the proceedings may be submitted — with reference to violation of law — by the party, the person concerned and any person to whom any provision of the decision may be of concern, against the appropriate section. The petition for review has to be submitted to the court that rendered the decision in the first instance within thirty days from service of the final decision through a legal representative.

The Curia admits the petition for review if the examination of the violation of law affecting the merits of the case is justified owing to ensuring the uniformity or improvement of the practice of law, the special weight or social significance of the legal issue raised, the necessity of the proceedings of the Court of Justice of the European Union to provide a preliminary opinion, or any provision of judgment different from the published practice of judgment of the Curia.

Submission of the petition for review shall have no suspensive effect on the court decision and the underlying administrative decision. Simultaneously with the petition for review, a request for immediate legal protection may also be submitted. The Curia shall adopt a decision on the request for immediate legal protection no later than adopting the ruling on admittance.
provides the right to initiate and Governmental Decree 275/2004 on the nature must be taken into account. In this case, the term “public concerned” does not explicitly cover representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups)

As regards nature conservation cases, the provisions of Act LIII of 1996 of Nature Conservation areas of operation, to the legal status of a party in the case in environmental administration procedures. Therefore, environmental associations meeting the ced to represent environmental interests, other than political parties, and interest representations which are active in the impact area are entitled, in their certain specific cases provided by law, the rights of clients may also be vested upon other persons or organisations. The Kvt. ensures that associations formed to represent environmental interests, other than political parties, and interest representations which are active in the impact area are entitled, in their areas of operation, to the legal status of a party in the case in environmental administration procedures. Therefore, environmental associations meeting the requirements provided by the Kvt. can bring an action to the courts.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept concerned public and NGOs)?

In this respect, the provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. shall be taken into consideration. According to the Kp., the judicial review of administrative decisions and omissions is provided for those having the legal status of a client in the administrative proceedings. In addition, the Kp. stipulates that any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the administrative activity can institute an action against the administrative act.

In the terminology of the Ákr., a client is any natural or legal person, or other entity, whose rights or legitimate interests are directly affected by the act. In certain specific cases provided by law, the rights of clients may also be vested upon other persons or organisations. The Kvt. ensures that associations formed to represent environmental interests, other than political parties, and interest representations which are active in the impact area are entitled, in their areas of operation, to the legal status of a party in the case in environmental administration procedures. Therefore, environmental associations meeting the requirements provided by the Kvt. can bring an action to the courts.

The concept of public concerned is provided by the sectoral environmental legislations. Article 2(1) of the Khvr. – transposing correctly the concept of public concerned as set out by the EIA Directive and the IED – read together with Art. 10 of the Ákr. ensures that members of public concerned can have the legal status of a client, and thereby exercise the right to judicial review.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

In administrative proceedings, the provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. – explained under point 1.4.1. – shall apply.

In addition, the sectoral legislations may designate the personal scope of the public concerned. As mentioned above, in EIA and IED proceedings, environmental associations and members of the public concerned can have the legal status of a client and initiate a judicial review (bring an action) against the definitive decision of the environmental authority.

As regards nature conservation cases, the provisions of Act LIII of 1996 of Nature Conservation and Governmental Decree 275/2004 on the nature conservation areas with European Community Importance must be taken into account. In this case, the term “public concerned” does not explicitly cover nature conservation associations, however it does cover any natural and legal persons likely to be concerned by the decision of the nature protection authority.

In the case of administrative proceedings – e.g. in the field of water management or waste – where the sectoral legislation does not provide a specific definition of public concerned and/or does not specify the term client, the definition of client set out by the Ákr. and the provisions of the Kp. on legal standing must be taken into account.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and Individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)
In administrative proceedings, according to Article 10(1) of the Ákr, the term “client” covers any natural or legal person, or other entity, whose rights or legitimate interests are directly affected by a case, who is the subject of any data contained in official records and registers, or who is subject to regulatory inspection. Furthermore, an act or government decree may define the persons and entities who are to be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensure the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups and foreign NGOs may be treated as clients if the conditions laid down by Article 10(1) of the Ákr. are met.

As regards judicial proceedings, the Kp. lays down the requirements for legal standing of the plaintiff, who can be any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the administrative activity (i.e. the decision), the public prosecutor’s office or the body exercising regulatory supervision or legal control, any administrative body that did not take part in the prior proceedings if its competence is affected by the administrative activity, any non-governmental organisation, in the cases specified in law or government decree, that has been pursuing its registered activity in order to protect any fundamental right or enforce any public interest in a geographical territory affected by the administrative activity for at least one year. If the administrative activity affects its registered activity, any interest-representation organisation or body whose activity is affected by the administrative activity. These parties have the right to institute an action. Any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the disputed administrative activity, or might be directly affected by the judgment, may have the legal standing of “person concerned”. Furthermore, any person who took part in the prior proceedings as a client who did not bring the action to court, may join the action as a person concerned. As a main rule, the person concerned shall be entitled to, and bound by, the same rights and obligations as the party and is entitled to take any legal action without prejudice to the parties’ right of disposal, which shall also be effective if it is contrary to the parties’ acts.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Court proceedings are conducted in the Hungarian language. Furthermore, submissions addressed to the court shall be made out, and the court shall deliver such submissions and its decision, in Hungarian.

However, the Pp. provides that, in court proceedings, including those conducted under the Kp., all parties are entitled, in oral communications, to use their native language, the language of their respective nationality, or the language of their region or nationality to the extent provided for by international agreement.

Further, any person who is hearing impaired or deafblind may use sign language or other special communication methods provided for by law that are known by them. Upon request, hearing- or speech-impaired persons shall be allowed to make a written statement instead of being interviewed.

In civil as well as administrative court proceedings, the court shall appoint an interpreter, sign language interpreter or translator. The costs arising in relation to interpreters or translators are counted as costs of the court proceedings and – as a main rule – are paid by the losing party. Where there is a need for translation, non-certified translations shall suffice; however, if there is any doubt as to the accuracy and completeness of the translated text, a certified translation shall be obtained.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure.

1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

In administrative proceedings, if the available information is insufficient to reach a decision, the authority shall initiate a procedure for taking evidence. The administrative authority is free to define the means and extent of the evidentiary procedure. All evidence is admissible that is suitable for ascertaining the relevant facts of the case, however any evidence illegally obtained by the authority is inadmissible. The facts which are officially known by the authority and of common knowledge shall not be evidenced. Clients of the proceedings are also entitled to submit evidence to the administrative authority, which evaluates the available evidence at its own discretion.

If special knowledge is required in the case and the competent authority does not have sufficient expertise, an expert shall be consulted or an expert opinion obtained; however, no expert may be appointed if the opinion of a specialist authority is to be obtained for the subject matter in question.

In the administrative court proceedings, the courts assess the evidence severally and in its totality, compared with the facts established in the prior proceedings. As a main rule, a request for taking of evidence may be submitted and means of proof may be made available in the first hearing at the latest. The court may order the taking of evidence on its own motion with respect to evidence to support any fact or circumstance that must be taken into consideration ex officio and/or in the case of reference made to legal injury jeopardising the interests of a minor or a person entitled to disability benefit. In this case, the court informs the parties that it has ordered the taking of evidence and calls them to submit their comments and supporting evidence or the evidence determined by the court.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

In administrative proceedings, clients and members of public concerned (not acting as clients) may submit their comments and opinions, and provide evidence to the authority.

In the judicial proceedings, the Kp. stipulates as a main rule that a request for taking of evidence may be submitted and means of proof may be made available in the first hearing at the latest. However, the court may allow taking of evidence within 15 days if the statement of claim was modified at the first hearing or it becomes necessary with respect to the substantive conduct of proceedings.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.

In the judicial proceedings, an expert has to be engaged if specific expertise is considered necessary for defining the framework of the dispute or for establishing or ascertaining facts considered material to the case. The experts provided for in Act XXIX of 2016 on the Activities of Forensic Experts, or ad hoc experts therein specified, may be engaged. As a main rule, an expert may be engaged, if appointed by the party or by way of assignment of the court, upon recommendation. A database of forensic experts is available on the official site of the Government.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

The opinion of an expert who was dismissed or excluded from the proceedings, a private expert’s report or the opinion of an appointed expert that is considered to give cause for concern, and a private expert’s report or the opinion of an expert appointed for other proceedings, if filed notwithstanding the provisions of an act or in breach of the relevant legal provisions, is inadmissible in the action as evidence. Therefore, in the event that the expert fulfils their obligations set out by law and their opinion does not give any cause for concern, the expert’s opinion shall be considered by the court as evidence.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court.

As a main rule, the party may propose the submission of the opinion of an expert who is commissioned by the party (a private expert’s report) or the party may propose to use the opinion of an expert appointed in another proceeding.
At the proposal of the party having the burden of proof, the court shall appoint an expert if, with regard to a specific issue, neither of the parties proposed to involve a private expert or an expert appointed for other proceedings, or the private expert’s report contains cause for concern, or it is necessary to receive information so as to address any concern that may exist with respect to the opinion of the expert appointed for other proceedings, or to receive answers to questions proposed to be asked. As a general principle, the court shall appoint one expert for the same specific issue.

The motion for the appointment of an expert shall contain the definitive questions which the expert is required to answer. The adversary party may also propose questions to be asked.

The court may put questions to the expert with regard to factual claims affected by the questions the parties have indicated and must discount questions not connected with the case and for which the expert is not qualified. The appointed expert is allowed to appear at the hearing or at the taking of evidence, and to propose putting questions to the parties and to contributors. The court delivers the appointed expert’s written report to the parties, who may propose putting questions to the expert having regard to the expert opinion or to material information which had not been disclosed to the expert, and to instruct the expert to convey the necessary information to address any concern that may exist with respect to the expert’s report. If the appointed expert’s opinion contains any cause for concern, and such cause for concern could not have been eliminated despite the information given by the expert, the court shall appoint a new expert upon request.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties.

The party may propose the submission of the opinion of an expert ("private expert’s report") the party has commissioned. If the motion is granted, the private expert’s report must be presented within the time limit specified by the court. Two or more parties adducing evidence, or two or more opposing parties of the party adducing evidence, may engage only one private expert for the same subject matter.

The party adducing evidence may propose using the opinion of an expert appointed in other proceedings prepared with regard to the specific issue. Where an appointed expert or a private expert provided an opinion, an expert appointed for other proceedings may not be engaged for the same subject matter. The court delivers the private expert’s report to the adversary party, which is entitled to put questions to the private expert regarding the private expert’s report. The party may propose that the private expert’s submitted report be supplemented in writing or orally.

If there is any contradiction in the private expert’s reports in specific issues, either of the parties may propose to ask the private experts to explain their reports verbally at the same hearing in order to explain the cause of the contradiction.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

Appointed experts are entitled to be compensated for their expenses incurred in connection with their contribution, and to appropriate remuneration if such contribution manifests in exercising their profession.

As a main rule, the costs of evidentiary shall be advanced by the party adducing evidence. The expert’s fee shall be advanced by the requesting party in the event that the court appoints expert because each private expert’s report contains cause for concern, or if it is necessary to receive information so as to address any concern that may exist with respect to the opinion of the expert appointed for other proceedings, or to receive answers for questions proposed to be asked. The court shall order a sufficient sum to be deposited that is estimated to cover the remuneration of the appointed expert’s fee. The party may request recovery of the costs of proceedings by way of charging. In the process of charging, the amount of the costs to be recovered shall be indicated, as well as the material circumstances as to how they were incurred and the related right in dispute. These shall also be supported by documentary evidence at the time of charging, where deemed appropriate.

The cost that may be determined by the court in its decision closing the proceedings may be charged by way of reference to the statutory provision governing the amount thereof.

The cost of drawing up the work plan of the expert shall be advanced by the party adducing evidence. If the party adducing evidence did not request the expert to carry out the assignment or fails to deposit the expert’s fee indicated in the action plan, the costs of the action plan may not be included among court costs. Where so justified by the high cost estimated for the work of the expert, the court – at the party’s request – shall instruct the expert in the appointment to draw up a preliminary action plan outlining their functions and the estimated costs and expenses involved.

The remuneration and expenses of the appointed expert are part of the court costs. The main rule is that the court costs of the successful party shall be covered by the unsuccessful party. Where a party only succeeds in part, it must cover the costs of the opposing party proportionate to the loss. The fee of the private expert must be paid by the party commissioning the expert. If the private expert’s report is considered to give cause for concern, the party shall not be allowed to include the private expert’s fee among court costs.

1.5. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible Internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

In judicial proceedings of the administrative and labour court (the administrative collegium of the general court after 31 March 2020) aimed at reviewing the definitive decision of the environmental authority, legal representation is not compulsory.

The official website of the Hungarian Bar Association: https://www.mük.hu/

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

In addition to pro bono assistance provided by legal assistance services operating within Government Offices in accordance with Act LXXX of 2003 on Legal Aid[18], NGOs providing legal assistance to individuals and other NGOs in environmental cases must also be mentioned.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

Elements of and conditions for receiving pro bono assistance depend on the given organisation providing such a service.

- Védegyőr
- Levegő Munkacsoport (in English)
- MTVSZ
- EMLA Egyesület (in English)
- Reflex Környezetvédelmi Egyesület

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

This depends on the given organisation providing pro bono assistance. In general, the websites of these organisations contain contact information which can be used for submitting an application.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

The official website of the National Chamber of Forensic Experts can be found here.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

- Védegyőr
- Levegő Munkacsoport (in English)
- MTVSZ
1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
As there is no longer an administrative review for environmental decisions in Hungary, this is not applicable.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
As there is no longer an administrative review for environmental decisions in Hungary, this is not applicable.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?
Clients may bring before the courts an administrative action against definitive decisions. If the decision can be appealed, an administrative action may be brought if either of the entitled parties filed an appeal and the appeal has already been determined by the second instance. Where there is a single-instance procedure, i.e. in environmental administrative proceedings, the first-instance decision is considered definitive with its delivery and it can be directly challenged before the court.

In the case of non-compliance with the deadline prescribed by the prosecutor in his intervention to bring the infringement to an end, the public prosecutor may also bring administrative action against the authority’s definitive decision.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?
There is no exact time limit provided by the national legislation in this regard, however the principle of concentration of actions applies in court proceedings. This principle requires the court and the parties to ensure that all facts and evidence required for determining the case is made available within a specific timeframe so that a judgment can be delivered in the course of one hearing only.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)
The Ákr. and the sectoral environmental legislations stipulate the time limits applicable in the given environmental administrative proceedings, and the Pp. and the Kp. provide the relevant time limits in relation to court procedures.

As regards the general rules of administrative proceedings, beyond the time limit to deliver the decision the Ákr. does not set out deadlines for clients. If there is a need to remedy deficiencies in the application documentation, the competent authority must advise the applicant on one occasion to remedy the deficiencies within the time limit prescribed by the authority.

In addition, it should be noted that, where the time limit for the execution of a procedural step is not specified by law, the authority, the client and other parties to the proceedings must take action without delay and at the latest within 8 days.

For the time limits applicable in specific environmental administrative proceedings, please see the respective parts of point 1.8.

In administrative court proceedings, the petition of claim must be submitted to the administrative body realising the disputed act within 30 days. The statement of claim has to be forwarded to the competent court within 15 days from its lodging, together with the documents relating to the case. Where the statement of claim also contains a request for immediate legal protection, the statement of claim must be forwarded to the court within 5 days from its lodging, together with the documents relating to the case.

The holding of a hearing may be requested by the plaintiff in the statement of claim and by the defendant in the document of defence. The holding of a hearing may be requested in the request for joining the action and also within 15 days from being joined in the action.

The court proceeds to have the day in court set within 30 days from the time it receives the statement of claim. The first hearing is scheduled to allow at least 15 days to elapse between the time the document of defence is delivered to the plaintiff and the date of the hearing. In urgent cases, this period may be reduced by the court.

The court summons the parties to appear in court. The writ of summons for the first hearing shall be accompanied by the submissions that were not served earlier. In the writ of summons, the parties are instructed to bring to the hearing all the documents pertinent to the case that are in their possession and were not previously submitted. In the writ of summons, the court informs the plaintiff and the person concerned that they may make a written statement on the content of the document of defence before the hearing, and warns the parties that in the hearing they may only make an oral statement. The court sets a deadline preceding the date of hearing, no shorter than 15 days, for making the statement. The court may disregard any statements submitted after this deadline.

A request for taking of evidence may be submitted, and means of proof may be made available in the first hearing at the latest.

Hearings may only be postponed in justified cases, in which event the court notifies the parties summoned to appear in court – if possible – in advance and simultaneously takes action to set the new day in court. At the parties’ justified joint request, the court may postpone the hearing on one occasion for a maximum of 60 days if it deems that it might facilitate resolving the legal dispute within a reasonable time.

The parties may make comments orally at the hearing on the results of taking of evidence. If the hearing has to be postponed because further taking of evidence is necessary, the court may set a deadline no shorter than fifteen days for submitting written statements.

If the case is decided without a formal hearing, the court has to set a deadline, no shorter than 15 days, for the parties to submit their submissions. The court may set a deadline no shorter than 15 days for submitting answers to be given to such submissions and other submissions.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
As a main rule, if the authority did not declare a decision immediately enforceable, the appeal has a suspensive effect on enforcement of the decision. This provision does not apply in environmental administrative proceedings which are single-instance procedures, and the decisions of the environmental authority cannot be appealed, only challenged before the court. A specific rule on environmental fines provided by Article 96/C of the Kvt. stipulates that the lodging of a statement of claim against a resolution of the authority on imposing a fine will have a suspensive effect on enforcement. In other environmental cases, the lodging of a statement of claim against the decision of the environmental authority does not have a suspensive effect.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?
If the decision can be appealed, the appeal has a suspensive effect on enforcement of the decision. No other possibility is provided for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
In administrative proceedings, there is no possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

The authority declares its decision immediately enforceable in four cases:
- if it is necessary to prevent or eliminate any life-threatening or potentially devastating situation or a severe violation of rights relating to personality, or to mitigate the detrimental consequences thereof;
- if it is considered necessary for reasons of national security, defence or public security, or for the protection of public interests;
- if the decision provides for the support or maintenance of any person; or
- where prompt entry into the relevant official records and registers is prescribed by law.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

As a general rule, the administrative lawsuit does not have a suspensive effect on the implementation of the decision challenged. However, the procedural provisions allow that any person whose rights or lawful interests are injured by the act of the administrative authority may request immediate legal protection from the court in order to eliminate the directly threatening disadvantage, temporarily resolve the legal relation made disputed or invariably maintain the condition providing grounds for the legal dispute. It is possible to request the ordering of suspensive effect, relieving suspensive effect or temporary measures, or the ordering of the provision of preliminary evidence.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

Injunctive relief is provided by national tribunals without it being conditional upon a financial deposit, however the court may make performance of the petition subject to the provision of security. The decision on injunctive relief (and on security, if so required by the court) can be challenged at the Curia within 8 days.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Procedural costs in administrative proceedings cover all costs arising over the course of the procedure, and these costs must be borne by the person who incurred them. If more than one client of the same interest is involved, they are jointly and severally liable for the bearing of procedural costs.

In proceedings opened upon request, procedural costs must be advanced by the requesting client, however the client may not be ordered to advance any procedural costs already covered by the fee. The costs of the procedure for taking evidence must be advanced by the party requesting the evidence.

In proceedings opened or conducted on the authority’s own initiative, procedural costs are advanced by the authority, except for the costs incurred in connection with the client’s appearance, the costs of the client’s representative, translation costs not to be borne by the authorities, and the costs of postage and document transmission incurred by the client and other parties to the proceedings.

The authority specifies the amounts of procedural costs and decides as to the bearing of these costs, including the refund of advanced costs where applicable. The amount of procedural costs is determined based on the supporting evidence available. The authority must reduce the amount of procedural costs if they are considered unreasonably high.

The authority may grant exemption from costs to any natural person client who – due to their income and financial situation – is unable to pay all or part of the procedural costs, with a view to easing the burden on such a person in enforcing his rights, or for other material reasons provided for by an act.

Exemption from costs can be total or partial exemption from advancing and bearing procedural costs.

The costs of court proceedings include all expenses the party has necessarily incurred during or prior to the proceedings in a causal relationship with the enforcement of a right in the action, including the loss of income stemming necessarily from having to appear before the court.

Costs of court proceeding include e.g. procedural fees, remuneration of experts and the legal fee. As a main rule, in administrative lawsuits the court duty is 30,000 HUF. Where the subject matter of the proceedings is connected with tax, duties or similar obligations, social security benefits or customs obligations, competition, press products and media services – apart from complaints – electronic communications or public procurement, the duty is calculated in a different way.

Civil organisations (foundations and associations) are exempt from the obligation to pay duties, however this exemption does not pertain to other costs of the procedure.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

Any person whose rights or lawful interests are injured by the administrative activity may request immediate legal protection from the court. The petition has to be lodged with the court if it is not filed together with the statement of claim submitted to the authority. The petition must specify in detail the reasons for the necessity of immediate legal protection and the documents for verifying them must be attached. The facts providing grounds for the petition must be substantiated. The court may make performance of the petition subject to the provision of security.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Act LXXX of 2003 on Legal Aid[19] ensures legal aid in forms of extrajudicial aid and aid in civil actions and administrative proceedings.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Based on Act LXXX of 2003 on Legal Aid, legal aid may be made available to public-benefit organisations and trade unions, regardless of their financial situation, in lawsuits instituted by them in the public interest pursuant to authorisation by specific other legislation, for example consumer protection or environmental protection. In the framework of legal aid, representation is provided to the plaintiff, defendant, interested party, petitioner and respondent through an advocate in legal proceedings, and the costs thereof are advanced or borne by the State.

The application for legal aid must be submitted to the legal assistance service by filling in the form prescribed for this purpose in a single copy. The documents and/or official certificates proving eligibility for aid should be attached to the form (Template of the request for legal aid).

In addition to pro bono assistance provided by legal assistance services operating within Government Offices in accordance with this Act, NGOs performing legal assistance for individuals and other NGOs in environmental cases must also be mentioned.

The application for legal aid specified in the Act on Legal Aid must be submitted to the legal assistance service by filling in the form prescribed for this purpose in a single copy. The documents and/or official certificates proving eligibility for aid should be attached to the form (Template of the request for legal aid).

The legal assistance service should make decisions immediately, or at the latest within five days, regarding applications submitted in person (if it can be determined, on the basis of the application, that the conditions for granting aid have been met). Decisions regarding applications submitted in writing should be made within fifteen days.

The legal assistance service also provides, free of duty and charge, information on aid; the conditions for authorising, reviewing, withdrawing and repaying it; and legal aid providers and their contact data. The legal assistance service should also provide the necessary aid application forms and help the applicant to fill out the forms.
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

Administrative as well as court proceedings are conducted in the Hungarian language. However, the Ákr. requires an interpreter to be engaged if the case officer does not speak the foreign language of the client or any other party to the proceedings.
Furthermore, the Pp. provides that in court proceedings, including those conducted under the Kp., all parties are entitled in oral communications to use their native language, the language of their respective nationality, or the language of their region or nationality to the extent provided for by international agreement. In civil as well as in administrative court proceedings, the court must appoint an interpreter, sign language interpreter or translator.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

According to the provisions of the Åkr., a client is a natural or legal person, or an organisation, whose rights or legitimate interests are affected by the case (Art. 10(1) of this Act). In addition, in certain specific cases the rights of clients may be vested in other persons or organisations. In screening procedures, public concerned means any natural or legal person affected or likely affected by the decision made in a procedure, or otherwise interested in the decision made in a procedure, including an environmental organisation specified in Art. 98(1) of the Kvt.

The term “client” is construed comprehensively by the Kvt. insofar as it clearly spells out that associations established to represent environmental interests and other civil organisations not deemed to be political parties or interest representatives and operating in the impact area may have the status of a client in environmental administrative procedures. This privileged legal standing is also confirmed by Khvr., which lays down the framework of EIA and IED procedures and declares that NGOs operating in the area affected by the activity subject to EIA must always be deemed “concerned”.

In administrative judicial proceedings, persons who were considered as “clients” in the administrative stage can file a court action against the administrative decision. The lawful interests necessary for intervention in administrative lawsuits are determined by involvement in the specific impact area and the interest in operation. Compared to Art. 98(1) of the Kvt., a further condition for filing a claim against the decision is stipulated by the Code of Administrative Litigation, namely that the NGO in question must be active in the impact area for at least one year.

Members of the public concerned and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceedings and are entitled to bring administrative action against the definitive decision of the authority. The EIA screening decision can be challenged before the court separately.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Similar to the rules applicable to screening, standing in scoping is ensured for “clients” under Art. 10(1) of the Åkr., and members of the public concerned, covering any natural or legal person affected or likely affected by the decision made in a procedure, or otherwise interested in the decision made in a procedure, including an environmental organisation specified in Art. 98(1) of the Kvt.

Members of the public concerned and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceeding. The result of scoping can be challenged together with the final decision taken in the EIA procedure.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

As already mentioned, environmental administrative proceedings are single-instance procedures, and the decision of the environmental authority is definitive at the time of its delivery. The decision of the authority can take the form of a ruling on procedural issues or a resolution on the merits of the case which closes the EIA proceedings and incorporates the environmental permit. Clients (members of the public concerned, environmental NGOs having legal standing) may bring administrative action against definitive decisions within 30 days.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

Final authorisation can be challenged by any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the administrative activity, the public prosecutor’s office or the body exercising regulatory supervision or legal control if the deadline set in the notice elapsed without any result, any administrative body that did not take part in the prior proceedings as an authority or regulatory authority if its competence is affected by the administrative activity, or, in the cases specified in law, any NGO that has been pursuing its registered activity in order to protect any fundamental right or enforce any public interest in a geographical territory affected by the administrative activity for at least one year if the administrative activity affects its registered activity.

In this regard, rights of members of the public concerned (natural and legal persons and environmental NGOs) are deemed to be affected in EIA procedures. Therefore, individual members of the public concerned (natural and legal persons) and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceedings and are entitled to bring administrative action against the definitive decision of the authority.

The provisions of the Kvt. and the Khvor. do not ensure the right of foreign NGOs to challenge the final authorisation granted in EIA proceedings. However, based on the general concept of “client”, any natural or legal person (including a foreign NGO having legal personality) can participate in the proceedings if its rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the case. This means that a foreign environmental NGO does not have the right provided by Art. 98(1) of the Kvt. – its interests are not deemed to be affected automatically – but can have the right to have legal standing under Art. 10(1) of the Åkr.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

National law does not set out specific rules for administrative court procedures in environmental matters. The general provisions of the Kp. apply in the judicial review of the environmental authority’s decision.

The court has to judge the dispute within the frameworks of the petition of claim, applications and legal statements submitted by the parties. The court may order an examination or taking of evidence ex officio only in cases specified by law.

Several requirements of the Kp. provide for own motion of the court, e.g. the court may, upon request or ex officio, bring any person into the action as a person concerned whose rights or lawful interests are affected by the judgment to be passed in the action if the court deems that their involvement in the action is necessary in order to resolve the dispute.

The court may, ex officio or upon petition, ask the Court of Justice of the European Union to provide a preliminary opinion, or ask the Constitutional Court to commence its proceedings for declaring that a legal regulation, statutory provision, means of regulation of public-law organisations or uniformity decision is contrary to the Fundamental Law and to international treaties.

Furthermore, the court may order the taking of evidence ex officio with respect to evidence to support any fact or circumstance that must be taken into consideration ex officio, or in the case of reference made to legal injury jeopardising the interests of a minor or a person entitled to disability benefit, or if the law so provides.

The judicial review covers both the substantive as well as the procedural legality of the challenged act of the authority. The court examines the lawfulness of the administrative activity within the limits of the petition of claim; however, the court must ex officio take into consideration the grounds for nullity or other legally stipulated grounds for invalidity of the disputed administrative act and any material deficiency in formal requirements owing to which the administrative act is to be considered as non-existing, the fact that the administrative act is based on a legal regulation that is not applicable in the case, and other facts and circumstances stipulated in law.

Where the legal injury is declared, the court must ex officio require the administrative body to eliminate the consequences of the activity that injure rights.
6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

National law does not set out specific rules for administrative court procedures in environmental matters. The general provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. apply in the judicial review of the environmental authority’s decisions or omissions. The petition of claim can be submitted to the administrative body which adopted the disputed decision within 30 days from its disclosure. The authority must forward the case documents to the court within 15 days.

Administrative authorities (including environmental authorities) are required to act within their area of jurisdiction in cases for which they are competent. However, if an authority fails to meet its obligation to act within the administrative time limit, its supervisory body will instruct it to carry out the procedure. If there is no supervisory body, or if the supervisory body fails to take action, the court of competent jurisdiction in administrative actions will order the authority to carry out the procedure.

In the event of omissions (i.e. if the administrative authority does not meet its obligations stipulated by law), the client or the person whose rights are directly affected by the omission, or the public prosecutor’s office, or the body exercising regulatory supervision, has the right to bring an action. The statement of claim must be submitted to the court within 90 days from becoming aware of the unsuccessful outcome of the administrative proceedings serving to remedy the omission or, in the case of omission of a legal remedy organisation, from expiry of the deadline available for taking measures, but no later than one year after expiry of the deadline for implementing the administrative act.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

As already mentioned, environmental administrative proceedings are single-instance procedures, and the decision of the environmental authority is definitive at the time of its delivery. In relation to EIA proceedings, the national legislation does not require an administrative review procedure to be exhausted prior to recourse to the judicial review procedure. Clients (members of the public concerned, environmental NGOs having legal standing) may bring to the court an administrative action against definitive decisions of the authority within 30 days.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meeting the requirement determined under point 12?

In EIA proceedings, it is not required by national legislation that participation in the public consultation phase is necessary to have legal standing before the court.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Fair and equitable proceedings in relation to access to justice in environmental administrative procedures is ensured by the general provisions of the Ákr., which stipulate that administrative authorities must adhere to the principles of legality. Authorities must exercise their powers under the principle of due course of the law. This means that cases must be handled professionally and in good faith, having regard to the objectives of simplicity and cooperation with clients, in due observation of the right to equality before the law and the principle of equal treatment, without undue discrimination, bias or prejudice.

Administrative authorities are responsible for ascertaining that the client and other parties to the proceeding are properly informed of their rights and obligations.

According to the basic principles of court proceedings, all clients have equal rights and the court must adjudge the dispute in fair, concentrated and cost-effective proceedings. The court must, in such a manner and by means of the tools stipulated by law, contribute to enabling the parties and other persons in the lawsuit to exercise their procedural rights and fulfill their obligations.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

With regard to access to justice in EIA proceedings, the general procedural rules must be taken into account. The Ákr., the Pp. and the Kp. entered into force in 2018, and these new legislations reformed the provisions on time limits in order to accelerate the administrative proceedings and make the judicial review of administrative decisions (administrative actions) more concentrated.

As regards the proceedings of administrative courts, the Kp. stipulates strict time limits for certain procedural steps (forwarding case documentation to the court for examination of the statement of claim, adjudication of petitions for immediate legal protection, setting the date of the court hearing etc.). A court hearing can be postponed only under the conditions stipulated by this Code. The timelines mentioned are aimed at most judgments being delivered within a reasonable time.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

In relation to EIA, the general provisions on injunctive relief as provided by the Kp. apply. Any person whose rights or lawful interests are injured by the administrative activity may request immediate legal protection from the court. The petition must be lodged with the court if it is not filed together with the statement of claim submitted to the authority. The petition must specify in detail the reasons for the necessity of immediate legal protection and the documents for verifying them must be attached. The facts providing grounds for the petition must be substantiated.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

Most provisions of IED have been transposed into national law by the Khvr. With regard to access to justice in IPPC/IED proceedings, the general procedural rules pertaining to administrative and court procedures (i.e. the Ákr., the Pp. and the Kp.) must be taken into account. As mentioned above, the EIA as well as the IED rules are stipulated by the Khvr., and where the activity to be authorised is subject to both regimes, the applicant (the developer) is entitled to ask the authority to conduct an integrated procedure for a consolidated environmental permit.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

Standing rules are similar to those stipulated by national law for EIA proceedings. Decisions of the authority can be challenged by any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected, or, in the cases specified in law, by any NGO that has been pursuing its registered activity in order to protect any fundamental right or enforce any public interest in a geographical territory affected by the administrative activity for at least one year if the administrative activity affects its registered activity.

The decision of the authority can take the form of a ruling (deciding on procedural issues) or a resolution (on the merits of the case) which closes the EIA proceedings and incorporates the environmental permit. Both types of decision can be challenged before the court within 30 days.

In this regard, rights of members of public concerned (natural and legal persons and environmental NGOs) are deemed to be affected in IED procedures. Therefore, individual members of the public concerned (natural and legal persons) and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceedings and are entitled to bring administrative action against the decision of the authority.

The provisions of the Kvt. and the Khvr. do not expressly provide the right of foreign NGOs to challenge the final authorisation granted in IED proceedings. However, based on the general concept of “client”, any natural or legal person (including a foreign NGO having legal personality) can participate in the proceedings if its rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the case. This means that a foreign environmental NGO does not have the right provided by Art. 98(1) of the Kvt. – its interests are not deemed to be affected automatically – but can have the right to have legal standing under Art. 10(1) of the Ákr.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
Where the activity is subject to the EIA/IED regime, the environmental authority may take the following decisions in the screening procedure:
the activity will likely have a significant impact on the environment, therefore EIA and IED procedures must be conducted (separately or even in integrated proceedings);
the activity will not have significant impact on the environment and only the IED permitting procedure is necessary.
The decision made in the EIA/IED screening procedure can be separately challenged before the court.
In screening procedures, “public concerned” means any natural or legal person affected or likely affected by the decision made in a procedure, or otherwise interested in the decision made in a procedure, including an environmental organisation specified in Art. 98(1) of the Kvt.
The Kvt. provides that associations established to represent environmental interests and other civil organisations not deemed to be political parties or interest representatives and operating in the impact area may have the status of a client in environmental administrative procedures. This privileged legal standing is also confirmed by Khrvr., which lays down the framework of EIA and IED procedures and declares that NGOs operating in the area affected by the activity subject to IED must always be deemed “concerned”.
In administrative judicial proceedings, persons who were considered as “clients” in the administrative stage can file an action at the court against the administrative decision. The lawful interests necessary for intervention in administrative lawsuits are determined by involvement in the specific impact area and the interest in operation. Compared to Art. 98(1) of the Kvt., a further condition for filing a claim against the decision is stipulated by the Code of Administrative Litigation, namely that the NGO in question must be active for at least one year in the impact area.
Members of the public concerned and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceedings and are entitled to bring administrative action against the definitive decision of the authority.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)
For cases where an activity is subject to mandatory EIA and IED, or only subject to IED, the national legislation provides for the developer to initiate a preliminary consultation procedure (scoping). Public participation in scoping is ensured for members of the public concerned, covering any natural or legal person affected or likely affected by the decision made in a procedure, or otherwise interested in the decision made in a procedure, including an environmental organisation specified in Art. 98(1) of the Kvt.
Members of the public concerned and environmental NGOs can submit application for legal standing during the administrative proceedings. It should be noted that in a preliminary consultation the authority issues an opinion on the content of the application documentation and does not take a decision, which cannot be challenged before the court separately.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?
The petition of claim can be submitted to the administrative body which adopted the disputed decision within 30 days from its disclosure. The authority must forward the case documents to the court within 15 days.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?
Members of the public concerned and environmental NGOs fulfilling the legal requirements stipulated by the Kvt. and the Kp. are entitled to bring administrative action against the definitive decision of the authority (which incorporates the final authorisation).

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?
As mentioned above, national law does not set out specific rules for administrative court procedures in environmental matters. The general provisions of the
Kp. apply in the judicial review of the environmental authority’s decision.
The court has to judge the dispute within the frameworks of the petition of claim, applications and legal statements submitted by the parties. The court will take account of the applications and statements in accordance with their content and not in accordance with their specification in terms of form. The court may order an examination or taking of evidence ex officio only in cases specified by law.
Several requirements of the Kp. provide for own motion of the court, e.g. the court may, upon request or ex officio, bring any person into the action as a person concerned whose rights or lawful interests are affected by the judgment to be passed in the action if the court deems that their involvement in the action is necessary in order to resolve the dispute.
The court may, ex officio or upon petition, ask the Court of Justice of the European Union to provide a preliminary opinion, or ask the Constitutional Court to commence its proceedings for declaring that a legal regulation, statutory provision, means of regulation of public-law organisations or uniformity decision is contrary to the Fundamental Law and to international treaties.
Furthermore, the court may order the taking of evidence ex officio with respect to evidence to support any fact or circumstance that must be taken into consideration ex officio, or in the case of reference made to legal injury jeopardising the interests of a minor or a person entitled to disability benefit, or if law so provides.
The judicial review covers both the substantive as well as the procedural legality of the challenged act of the authority. The court examines the lawfulness of the administrative activity within the limits of the petition of claim; however, the court must ex officio take into consideration the grounds for nullity or other legally stipulated grounds for invalidity of the disputed administrative act and any material deficiency in formal requirements owing to which the administrative act is to be considered as non-existing, the fact that the administrative act is based on a legal regulation that is not applicable in the case, and other facts and circumstances stipulated in law.
Where the legal injury is declared, the court shall ex officio require the administrative body to eliminate the consequences of the action that injure rights.
Own motion acts of the court are adopted by rulings which – if explicitly provided by the Kp. – may be appealed by the party, the person concerned and those regarding whom the ruling contains provisions with respect to the relevant part of such provision applying to them.
In civil (and administrative) court proceedings, the party may lodge a complaint with the court if the court was bound to certain time limits for the conduct of proceedings, for carrying out certain procedural steps or for adopting resolutions and the court failed to observe such time limits. This applies in cases where the court lays down time limits for carrying out certain procedural steps which lapse without success and the court fails to impose sanctions on the defaulting person or body, or where the court fails to perform a procedural step within a reasonable timeframe for the completion thereof or fails to ensure that such a procedural step is carried out.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
National law does not set out specific rules for administrative court procedures in environmental matters. The general provisions of the Ákr. and the Kp. apply in the judicial review of the environmental authority’s decisions or omissions.
The petition of claim can be submitted to the administrative body which adopted the disputed decision within 30 days from its disclosure. The authority must forward the case documents case to the court within 15 days.
Administrative authorities (including environmental authorities) are required to act within their area of jurisdiction in cases for which they have competence. However, if an authority fails to meet its obligation to act within the administrative time limit, its supervisory body will instruct it to carry out the procedure. If there is no supervisory body, or if the supervisory body fails to take action, the court of competent jurisdiction in administrative actions will order the authority to carry out the procedure.

In the event of omissions (i.e. if the administrative authority does not meet its obligations stipulated by law), the client or the person whose rights are directly affected by the omission, or the public prosecutor’s office, or the body exercising regulatory supervision, has the right to bring an action. The statement of claim must be submitted to the court within 90 days from becoming aware of the unsuccessful outcome of the administrative proceedings serving to remedy the omission or, in the case of omission of a legal remedy organisation, from expiry of the deadline available for taking measures, but no later than one year after expiry of the deadline for implementing the administrative act.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In relation to IED proceedings, national legislation does not require an administrative review procedure to be exhausted prior to recourse to the judicial review procedure.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

In IED proceedings, it is not required by national legislation that participation in the public consultation phase is necessary to have legal standing before the court.

11) Fair, equitable – what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Fair and equitable proceedings in relation to access to justice in environmental administrative procedures (including IED) are ensured by the general provisions of the Ákr., which stipulate that administrative authorities must adhere to the principles of legality. Authorities must exercise their powers under the principle of due course of the law. This means that cases must be handled professionally and in good faith, having regard to the objectives of simplicity and cooperation with clients, in due observation of the right to equality before the law and the principle of equal treatment, without undue discrimination, bias or prejudice. Administrative authorities are responsible for ascertaining that the client and other parties to the proceedings are properly informed of their rights and obligations.

In line with the basic principles of court proceedings, all clients have equal rights and the court must adjudge the dispute in fair, concentrated and cost-effective proceedings. The court must, in such a manner and by means of the tools stipulated by law, contribute to enabling the parties and other persons in the lawsuit to exercise their procedural rights and fulfill their obligations.

12) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?

With regard to access to justice in IED proceedings, the general procedural rules must be taken into account. The Ákr., the Pp. and the Kp. entered into force in 2018, and these new legislations reformed the provisions on time limits in order to accelerate the administrative proceedings and make the judicial review of administrative decisions (administrative actions) more concentrated.

As regards the proceedings of administrative courts, the Kp. stipulates strict time limits for certain procedural steps (forwarding the case documentation to the court for examination of the statement of claim, adjudication of petitions for immediate legal protection, setting the date of the court hearing etc.). A court hearing can be postponed only under the conditions stipulated by this Code. The timelines mentioned are aimed at most judgments being delivered within a reasonable time.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

In relation to IED, the general provisions on injunctive relief as provided by the Kp. apply. Any person whose rights or lawful interests are injured by the administrative activity may request immediate legal protection from the court. The petition must be lodged with the court if it is not filed together with the statement of claim submitted to the authority. The petition must specify in detail the reasons for the necessity of immediate legal protection and the documents for verifying them must be attached. The facts providing grounds for the petition must be substantiated.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

The most important national legislations on access to justice in IED proceedings are laid down by the Ákr., the Kp., the Kvt. and the Khvr., which can be found on the official website of the Official Journal and in the National Database of Laws. Structured information in this regard can be found on the websites of environmental NGOs, for instance here.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[21]

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

Where a decision has been taken by the environmental authority, it can be challenged before the court in accordance with the general rules of the Kp., i.e. by any national or legal person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the decision. Environmental NGOs (associations formed to represent environmental interests which are active in the impact area for at least one year) are also entitled to bring an action to the court, as provided for by the Kp. and the Kvt.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

In this regard, the general rules for lodging a petition of claim apply, therefore it can be submitted to the administrative body which adopted the disputed decision within 30 days from its disclosure.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

The Kvt. lays down that where the environment is endangered, damaged or polluted, environmental associations are entitled to intervene, in the interest of protecting the environment, and ask the competent authority to take appropriate measures, or file a lawsuit against the user of the environment.

In such a lawsuit, the court can be asked to require the party posing the hazard to refrain from the unlawful conduct (operation) or to compel the same to take the measures necessary to prevent the damage.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding 'plausibility' for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

National legislation does not provide specific provisions in this regard.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

Based on Art. 99 of the Kvt., where the environment is being threatened, damaged or polluted, associations formed to represent environmental interests which are active in the impact area are entitled to intervene, in the interest of protecting the environment, and ask the competent authority to take appropriate measures within its jurisdiction, or file a lawsuit against the user of the environment. In the lawsuit, the party in the case may ask the court to enjoin the party posing the hazard to refrain from the unlawful conduct or compel the same to take the measures necessary to prevent the damage.

Therefore, environmental associations are entitled to submit their request to the competent authority or to the court in the case of imminent threat of damage to the environment.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The minister with responsibility for environmental and nature protection (the “Minister”), County Government Offices, district environmental authorities, the National Meteorological Service, mayors and notaries are appointed as having competence in environmental administration. County Government Offices proceed as territorial environmental authorities in most environmental administrative cases. In specific cases stipulated by law, the Government Office of Pest County or the Minister proceeds as the environmental authority of nationwide competence.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

In relation to proceedings stipulated by Art. 99 of the Kvt. (see point 6.), national legislation does not require an administrative review procedure to be exhausted prior to recourse to court proceedings.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

The national environmental legislation requires that enforcement of environmental interests must be encouraged by Hungary through international agreements, particularly in its relations with neighbouring countries, and that consideration must be given to the environmental interests of other countries, the reduction of cross-border loading of the environment and endangering the environment, and the prevention of environmental pollution and damage to the environment.

In Hungary, the Espoo Convention has been implemented by Governmental Decree 148/1999 (X.18.). This piece of legislation contains the provisions of the Convention. The coordinator of the Espoo procedure is the ministry with responsibility for environmental protection, which is the Ministry of Agriculture, in close cooperation with the competent environmental authority.

The specific rules on cross-border impacts are assessed in accordance with the specific pieces of legislation in the Skvr. (transposing the SEA Directive) and the Khvr. (transposing the EIA Directive).

Trans-boundary EIA procedures are governed by the Khvr. The competent environmental authority sends the relevant information to the ministry responsible for environmental protection as soon as it emerges that the activity under consideration may have significant environmental effects on the territory of another Member State. The affected country must be notified when it emerges, during the preliminary assessment procedure (screening) or during the preliminary consultation (scoping), that a trans-boundary environmental impact can be assumed.

Cases where a Member State likely to be significantly affected requests information on the project are not expressly regulated by Khvr., however in accordance with Art. 3(7) of the Espoo Convention (implemented by Art. 3(7) of Governmental Decree 148/1999), the concerned party must, at the request of the affected party, exchange sufficient information for the purposes of holding discussions on whether there is likely to be a significant adverse trans-boundary impact.

In connection with plans and programmes which are likely to have a significant impact on the environment, the strategic environmental assessment must cover consultations with neighbouring countries in the case of significant cross-border impact and take into account the results of the consultations in drawing up the plan or programme.

Based on Art. 9.1 of the SEA Decree, if, on the basis of the environmental evaluation, significant adverse trans-boundary environmental effects are likely to occur in a Member State of the European Union or in the territory of other countries with which reciprocity with regard to environmental assessment of the trans-boundary effects of the plans and programmes is guaranteed by international treaties, or if so requested by other countries, the developer must forward the relevant documents to the ministry responsible for protection of the environment in that country at the same time as national consultations on the draft plan or programme are held.

As mentioned above, national legislation does not expressly provide legal standing for foreign NGOs, however if their rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the proceedings, they can be clients in administrative proceedings in accordance with the general rules of the Ákr., which also ensures that the rules on translation and interpreters apply to foreign NGOs as clients. The right to legal aid is not provided for foreign NGOs.

Environmental administrative proceedings are single-instance procedures, and the decision of the environmental authority is definitive at the time of its delivery.

The decision of the authority can take the form of a ruling on procedural issues or a resolution on the merits of the case which closes the proceedings. Clients (members of the public concerned, environmental NGOs having legal standing) may bring administrative action against definitive decisions within 30 days from delivery of the given decision.

2) Notion of public concerned?

The notion of public concerned is stipulated by the national EIA, IED and SEA legislations, i.e. by the Khvr. and the Skvr., and these terms apply in the proceedings relating to projects, plans or programmes likely to have trans-boundary impacts. According to the Khvr., “public concerned” covers any natural or legal person and any association lacking the legal status of a legal person which is or might be affected by the decision or which is interested in the decision taken.

The Skvr. defines “public concerned” as natural persons, legal entities or organisations without legal entity which are or may be affected by the decision on the plan or programme requiring environmental assessment, in particular because of its effects on the environment, which have an interest with regard to the decision, in particular environmental or other non-governmental organisations whose range of activity is affected, or which are defined as affected by law or by the developer.

As the SEA Directive regulates, the authorities and the public must be given an early and effective opportunity, within appropriate timeframes, to express their opinion on the draft plan or programme and the accompanying environmental report before adoption of the plan or programme or its submission to the legislative procedure.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
As mentioned above, national legislation does not expressly provide legal standing for foreign NGOs, however if their rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the proceedings, they can be clients in administrative proceedings in accordance with the general rules of Ákr. In this case, the general procedural rules of administrative and court proceedings are applicable. According to the general rules of administrative procedures, under the information on legal remedy, the decision provides information on which general court is entitled to review the decision.

Right to legal aid is not provided for foreign NGOs.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

According to the Ákr., any natural person (including citizens of other countries) may have the status of a client if their rights or lawful interests are affected by the case. In this case, the general procedural rules of administrative and court proceedings are applicable for submissions, time limits, etc. Legal aid is not available to foreign parties in the case of environmental proceedings.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

In EIA and IED proceedings, at the earliest stage of the procedure the environmental authority publishes on its website a notice about the details of the case. At the same time, the notaries of the affected municipalities must be informed concerning the procedure and the notaries must make available to the public the announcement on the proceedings and the features of the planned project.

In the case of plans and programmes, the developer must publish its decision on the necessity of preparing an SEA. The scoping decision is also made public, together with the way the developer intends to ensure public participation.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

In the national legislation on EIA, in preliminary assessment proceedings (screening), after submission of the request and the preliminary assessment documentation, the environmental authority publishes on its website:

- the fact that the environmental impact assessment has been initiated;
- information on the website where the documentation can be accessed;
- whether consultation is in progress with other countries likely to be affected;
- a call for making any comments directly to the environmental authority within 21 days from the date of publication of the environmental authority’s announcement;
- the date of the start of the proceedings and the administrative time limit, name and official contact details of the contact person;
- the decisions which potentially may be made by the environmental authority.

Simultaneously with the publication of the announcement, the environmental authority must deliver the announcement, the printed copies of the application and its annexes to the notary of the affected municipality and to the notaries of the presumed to be affected municipalities. The notary must immediately, and no later than within five days, make sure that the announcement is made public by displaying it in public places and using other local customary methods.

In EIA proceedings, after submission of the request the environmental authority publishes on its website:

- the fact that the environmental impact assessment has been initiated;
- information on the website where the documentation can be accessed;
- whether consultation is in progress with other countries likely to be affected;
- the ways of providing information and the possibilities of submitting comments and asking questions;
- the date of the start of the proceedings and the administrative time limit, name and official contact details of the contact person;
- the decisions which potentially may be made by the environmental authority.

Together with the publication of the announcement, the environmental authority must deliver the announcement, the printed copies of the application and its annexes to the notary of the affected municipality and to the notaries of the presumed to be affected municipalities. The notary must immediately, and no later than within five days, make sure that the announcement is made public by displaying it in public places and using other local customary methods. The period of publication must be at least 30 days.

In EIA proceedings, comments may be submitted to the environmental authority, or to the notary of the municipality competent according to the location of the public hearing, up to the time of the public hearing. The environmental authority must make available to the public concerned the opinion of the specialist authorities and the expert opinions, and also the documents prepared in order for corrections to be made within eight days of their submission or availability (or the consultation, if any).

In IED proceedings, at the earliest stage of the procedure (within 15 days after receipt of the application documentation and all necessary information), the environmental authority publishes on its website a notice about the details of the case, including the relevant information on the project, the impact area, the expected emissions and impacts on the environment and human health, the measures to prevent or to mitigate the likely impacts, the monitoring tools, and the measures to prevent accidents and inform the public.

At the same time, the notaries of the affected municipalities must be informed concerning the procedure. Within five days, the notaries must make available to the public the announcement on the proceedings and the features of the planned project for at least 21 days.

National legislation does not provide specific timeframes for access to justice in the case of trans-boundary decisions. An action against the authority’s decision can be brought within 30 days.

In the case of plans and programmes, the developer must publish its decision on the necessity of preparing an environmental assessment (SEA). The scoping decision is also made public, together with the way the developer intends to ensure public participation. The public has 30 days to comment on the draft environmental report.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

In the case of EIA and IED proceedings, the notification on the proceedings contains information on the details of public participation (timelines, date of public hearing, deadline for submitting comments etc.), and the decision of the authority (which has to be delivered to the clients) must contain information on legal remedy and the relevant time limit.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

In this respect, the general rules of administrative proceedings and court proceedings apply. Administrative as well as court proceedings are conducted in the Hungarian language. However, the Ákr. requires that an interpreter must be engaged if the case officer does not speak the foreign language of the client or any other party to the proceeding.

Furthermore, it is provided by the Pp. that in court proceedings, including those conducted under the Kp., all parties are entitled, in oral communications, to use their native language, the language of their respective nationality, or the language of their region or nationality to the extent provided for by international agreement. In civil as well as in administrative court proceedings, the court must appoint an interpreter, sign language interpreter or translator.

9) Any other relevant rules?
In administrative proceedings, and depending on the subject of the procedure, the main decision-making authority may be obliged to involve expert authorities within their fields of competence. An expert authority provides its opinion, including an approval or refusal of the application. Where the law requires the involvement of expert authorities in a permit procedure, the permit shall not be granted without the expert authority’s approval.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.

In environmental administrative proceedings, the above-mentioned provision of the Ákr. ensures the legal standing of individuals whose legal interests are directly affected, and Article 98 of the Kvt. provides that environmental associations can also participate as clients. Other legal entities, members of ad hoc groups or foreign NGOs may be treated as clients in connection with certain specific types of case.
legal statements submitted by the parties. The court will take account of the applications and statements in accordance with their content and not in accordance with their specification in terms of form. The court may order an examination or taking of evidence ex officio only in cases specified by law. The judicial review may cover both procedural and substantive legality depending on the content of the petition of claim.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? If the decision can be appealed, an administrative action may be brought if either of the entitled parties filed an appeal and the appeal has already been determined. Since 1 March 2020, in administrative environmental cases the decision of a second-instance environmental authority cannot be requested. Clients may bring to the court an administrative action against the decision.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? In general, it is not required by national legislation that participation in the public consultation phase is necessary to have legal standing before the court. In this respect, the provisions of the Kp. must be taken into account. Any person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the administrative activity (i.e. the decision), or any non-governmental organisation, in the cases specified in law or government decree, that has been pursuing its registered activity in order to protect any fundamental right or enforce any public interest in a geographical territory affected by the administrative activity for at least one year, if the administrative activity affects its registered activity, has the right to institute an action.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase? There are no explicit provisions precluding arguments from the judicial review phase. The subject of the administrative dispute is the lawfulness of the act of the authority regulated by administrative law or the omission of such act.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? Fair and equitable proceedings in relation to access to justice in environmental administrative procedures are ensured by the general provisions of the Kp., which stipulate that administrative authorities must adhere to the principles of legality. Authorities must exercise their powers under the principle of due course of the law. This means that cases must be handled professionally and in good faith, having regard to the objectives of simplicity and cooperation with clients, in due observation of the right to equality before the law and the principle of equal treatment, without undue discrimination, bias or prejudice. Administrative authorities are responsible for ascertaining that the client and other parties to the proceedings are properly informed of their rights and obligations. In accordance with the basic principles of court proceedings, all clients have equal rights, and the court must adjudge the dispute in fair, concentrated and cost-effective proceedings. The court must, in such a manner and by means of the tools stipulated by law, contribute to enabling the parties and other persons in the lawsuit to exercise their procedural rights and fulfill their obligations.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? The Kp., the Pp. and the Kp. entered into force in 2018 and these new legislations reformed the provisions on time limits in order to accelerate the administrative proceedings and make the judicial review of administrative decisions (administrative actions) more concentrated. As regards the proceedings of administrative courts, the Kp. stipulates strict time limits for certain procedural steps (forwarding the case documentation to the court for examination of the statement of claim, adjudication of the petitions for immediate legal protection, setting the date of the court hearing etc.). A court hearing can be postponed only under the conditions stipulated by this Code. The timelines mentioned are aimed at most judgments being delivered within a reasonable time.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The general provisions on injunctive relief are provided by the Kp. Any person whose rights or lawful interests are injured by the administrative activity may request immediate legal protection from the court. The petition must be lodged with the court if it is not filed together with the statement of claim submitted to the authority. The petition must specify in detail the reasons for the necessity of immediate legal protection and the documents for verifying them must be attached. The facts providing grounds for the petition must be substantiated. There are no special rules applicable in this regard.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? The costs which must be considered when filing a lawsuit with the administrative court in access to justice matters are the duty and the legal fees. As a main rule, the duty on administrative actions is 30,000 HUF (ca. 85 EUR), which must be paid by the party submitting the petition of claim. Legal fees can also be requested to be paid by the unsuccessful party as a court cost. The amount of this may be reduced by the court. The main rule is that the court costs of the successful party (including the duty) must be covered by the unsuccessful party. Where a party only succeeds in part, it must cover the costs of the opposing party in proportion to the loss. The co-litigants cover the costs of court proceedings jointly and severally. In the case of the settlement of the parties, the agreement reached in this respect, the court costs of the successful party to the settlement must be covered by the unsuccessful party to the settlement. If the ratio of winning and losing cannot be determined, neither of the parties will be required to cover the court costs. If the proceedings are terminated, the court costs of the defendant must be covered by the plaintiff. However, where the proceedings are terminated due to withdrawal and the withdrawal took place because the defendant satisfied the claim after the opening of proceedings, the court costs of the plaintiff are to be covered by the defendant. Furthermore, if the proceedings are terminated due to death or dissolution, neither party is required to cover the court costs of the opposing party. Where a party fails in carrying out certain acts during the proceedings, is delayed in certain acts without justification, fails to meet a deadline or time limit, or causes unnecessary expenses to the opposing party in any other way, either during the proceedings or beforehand, said party must cover those costs irrespective of the outcome of the action. The party might be entitled to different types of cost allowances: subject-specific and individual cost exemption; subject-specific and individual right for the suspension of payment of costs; subject-specific and individual duty exemption; right for the suspension of payment of specific duty; reduced duty; exemption from the prepayment of the advocacy fee, or the payment thereof. In general, the party is entitled to individual cost exemption and individual right for the suspension of payment of costs upon request based on their income and financial situation, whereas individual duty exemption will be granted ex officio. Specific allowances can be based on the subject matter of the proceedings, and the allowance of duty reduction will be granted ex officio upon the occurrence of specific procedural events.
Under cost exemption, the party is exempt from the advance payment of duties, the prepayment of costs incurred during the proceedings, save as otherwise provided for by law, the payment of any unpaid duty and the recovery of expenses advanced by the State, and the requirement to provide security for court costs.

The right for the suspension of payment of costs covers exemption from the advance payment of duties and from the prepayment of costs incurred during the proceedings. In the case of partial individual right for the suspension of payment of costs, the allowance applies to a specific percentage of duties and expenses, or to duties, and/or to itemised specific expenses.

It should be noted that cost exemption does not exempt the party from covering the unpaid duties and the costs of any unnecessary procedural act.

The decision on the authorisation of individual cost allowance and the individual right for the suspension of payment of costs and for the withdrawal of authorised cost allowances lies with the Court. The resolution rejecting the application for authorisation and the decision for the withdrawal of an authorised cost allowance may be appealed separately.

The specific rule in administrative court proceedings is that in a model action[2] the Court may provide that the court costs incurred in the scope of taking of evidence, or a part of such costs, are to be advanced or borne by the State.

The amount of the duty (30,000 HUF – 85 EUR) cannot be considered as being prohibitive. Furthermore, in Hungary associations and funds are exempt from the obligation to pay duties. Therefore, in administrative court proceedings NGOs should count with legal fees and – if applicable – expert fees.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[3]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

According to national law, plans or programmes (including land-use plans) may be adopted by different legal measures, i.e. by law or by a public administrative measure without legal force. Challenging the legality of laws and/or public administrative measures by a natural person or by an organisation is possible by means of a constitutional complaint lodged with the Constitutional Court. Where the legal measure adopting the plan or programme is contrary to the Fundamental Law and this infringes a fundamental right of a natural or legal person, for example the right to a healthy environment laid down by the Fundamental Law, the Constitutional Court is entitled to annul the contested provision.

A person or organisation affected by a concrete case may submit a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court if, due to the application of a legal regulation contrary to the Fundamental Law in their judicial proceedings their rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, and the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

By exception, Constitutional Court proceedings may also be initiated if, due to the application of a legal provision contrary to the Fundamental Law, or when such legal provision becomes effective, rights were violated directly, without a judicial decision, and there is no procedure for legal remedy designed to repair the violation of rights, or the petitioner has already exhausted the possibilities for remedy. In these proceedings, the Constitutional Court may also examine the constitutionality of a judicial decision.

The Constitutional Court will admit constitutional complaints if a conflict with the Fundamental Law significantly affects the judicial decision, or if the case raises constitutional law issues of fundamental importance.

Constitutional complaints may be submitted within 60 days of receipt of the contested decision, or within 180 days of entry into force of the legal regulation contrary to the Fundamental Law. If the decision is not communicated, the time limit for submitting constitutional complaints will be 60 days from the date of becoming aware of the decision or from the date of the violation of rights guaranteed by the Fundamental Law. The Constitutional Court may also rule on constitutional complaints that were submitted after the time limit due to the submitter’s inability to submit the complaint due to a circumstance beyond their control, providing that the petitioner submits an application for extension along with the complaint within 15 days of the termination of the obstacle. However, no Constitutional Court proceedings may be initiated 180 days after the communication of the decision, the violation of the right guaranteed by the Fundamental Law and entry into force of the legal regulation that is contrary to the Fundamental Law.

The Constitutional Court must decide on constitutional complaints within a reasonable time. In practice, it is not uncommon for proceedings of the Constitutional Court to take years.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantiative legality?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

A person or organisation affected by a concrete case may submit a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court if their rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

No injunctive relief is available.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The proceedings of the Constitutional Court are free of charge. The applicant must bear their costs incurred in the course of the proceedings.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[4]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Legal standing in administrative and/or judicial review of plans and programmes depends on the legal form by which the plan or programme was adopted. If the act adopting a plan or programme is considered as a legal measure or a public administrative measure without legal force and the relevant conditions are met, a constitutional complaint can be lodged with the Constitutional Court as explained under Chapter 2.2. point 1. However, plans and programmes subject to Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention which are not considered as such acts cannot be challenged.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? How is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible. No injunctive relief is available.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The Constitutional Court must decide on constitutional complaints within a reasonable time. In practice, it is not uncommon for proceedings of the Constitutional Court to take years.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Constitutional Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In accordance with the basic principles of court proceedings, all clients have equal rights and the court must adjudge the dispute in fair, concentrated and cost-effective proceedings.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The Constitutional Court must decide on constitutional complaints within a reasonable time. In practice, it is not uncommon for proceedings of the Constitutional Court to take years.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Constitutional Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[6]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Legal standing in administrative and/or judicial review of plans and programmes depends on the legal form by which the plan or programme was adopted. If the act adopting a plan or programme is considered as a legal measure or a public administrative measure without legal force and the relevant conditions are met, a constitutional complaint can be lodged with the Constitutional Court as explained under Chapter 2.2. point 1. However, plans and programmes subject to Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention which are not considered as such acts cannot be challenged.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Constitutional Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

Explicitly not, however the constitutional complaint must be based on the fact that the fundamental rights of the complainant were violated.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

In accordance with the basic principles of court proceedings, all clients have equal rights and the court must adjudge the dispute in fair, concentrated and cost-effective proceedings.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

The Constitutional Court must decide on constitutional complaints within a reasonable time. In practice, it is not uncommon for proceedings of the Constitutional Court to take years.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

No injunctive relief is available.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to Implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[8]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
Similar to the cases covered by Chapters 2.2 to 2.4, executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments – as legal measures or public administrative measures without legal force – can be challenged by a constitutional complaint lodged with the Constitutional Court if the conditions stipulated by the Act on the Constitutional Court are met. A person or organisation affected by a concrete case may submit a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court if, due to the application of a legal regulation contrary to the Fundamental Law in their judicial proceedings their rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, and the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

By exception, Constitutional Court proceedings may also be initiated if, due to the application of a legal provision contrary to the Fundamental Law, or when such legal provision becomes effective, rights were violated directly, without a judicial decision, and there is no procedure for legal remedy designed to repair the violation of rights, or the petitioner has already exhausted the possibilities for remedy. In these proceedings, the Constitutional Court may also examine the constitutionality of a judicial decision.

The Constitutional Court will admit constitutional complaints if a conflict with the Fundamental Law significantly affects the judicial decision, or if the case raises constitutional law issues of fundamental importance.

Constitutional complaints may be submitted within 60 days of receipt of the contested decision, or within 180 days of entry into force of the legal regulation contrary to the Fundamental Law. If the decision is not communicated, the time limit for submitting constitutional complaints will be 60 days from the date of becoming aware of the decision or from the date of the violation of rights guaranteed by the Fundamental Law. The Constitutional Court may also rule on constitutional complaints that were submitted after the time limit due to the submitter’s inability to submit the complaint due to a circumstance beyond their control, providing that the petitioner submits an application for extension along with the complaint within 15 days of the termination of the obstacle. However, no Constitutional Court proceedings may be initiated 180 days after the communication of the decision, the violation of the right guaranteed by the Fundamental Law and entry into force of the legal regulation that is contrary to the Fundamental Law.

The Constitutional Court must decide on constitutional complaints within a reasonable time. In practice, it is not uncommon for proceedings of the Constitutional Court to take years.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The Constitutional Court examines whether the rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated, which may include infringement of both procedural and substantive norms.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

A constitutional complaint may be submitted to the Constitutional Court if the possibilities for legal remedy (not including the review procedure of the Supreme Court as extraordinary legal remedy) have already been exhausted or legal remedy is not possible.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

A person or organisation affected by a concrete case may submit a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court if their rights enshrined in the Fundamental Law were violated.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

No injunctive relief is available.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Proceedings of the Constitutional Court are free of charge. The applicant must bear their costs incurred in the course of the proceedings.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[7]

National legislation does not provide for legal challenge against EU regulatory acts before national courts.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[2] If at least ten proceedings with an identical legal and factual base commence before the court, the court may – while providing the parties with a right to make a statement – decide to adjudge one of the cases in a model action and stay the rest of the proceedings until it adopts its decision concluding the proceedings. (Kp. Art. 33(1))

[3] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

[4] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[5] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, such as Case C-237/97, Janecek, and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[6] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774

[7] For an example of such a preliminary reference, see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774

Last update: 28/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

The obligation for administrative authorities to act is stipulated by the Akr. The authority has an obligation to act within its area of jurisdiction in the cases for which it has competence, or on the basis of delegation. If the authority fails to meet its obligation to act within the administrative time limit, the supervisory body provided will instruct it to carry out the procedure. If there is no supervisory body, or the supervisory body fails to take action, the court of competent jurisdiction in administrative actions will order the authority to carry out the procedure. Such petition of claim can be submitted by any natural or legal person whose rights or lawful interests are directly affected by the omission of the environmental authority.

There are cases in which the authority may exercise the right to remain silent. This means that the client is considered to have been authorised to exercise the right asserted if the authority decided not to adopt a resolution within the prescribed administrative time limit. The right to remain silent may be exercised in automated decision-making processes if not precluded by law, or in other cases if it is expressly ordered by law.

The decisions of the courts and other judicial forums are executed by judicial enforcement proceedings in accordance with the Act on Judicial Enforcement[1]. In the course of judicial enforcement, executive force may be employed to order a party compelled to pay money or undertake some other conduct to fulfill such obligation. The enforcement order may be issued if the writ of execution contains an obligation (ruling against the judgment debtor), if it is final, definitive or subject to preliminary enforcement, and the resolution of the public prosecutor’s office and/or the investigating authority is not subject to further remedy, and the deadline of performance has expired.

The court will impose a fine on the debtor or the person or organisation obliged to participate in the enforcement procedure for contempt, for failure to meet the obligations in connection with enforcement or for engaging in any conduct aimed at obstructing the authority carrying out the enforcement procedure. The fine for contempt may not exceed the enforceable amount. No fine for contempt may be imposed for the sole reason of the judgment debtor’s failure to comply with their obligation prescribed in the enforcement order.

Last update: 28/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Malta

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 11/09/2023

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Maltese law is what is known as a mixed legal system (mainly based on continental Civil Law, but with influences from the Common Law tradition). Maltese law has its roots in Roman law, whilst public law has been greatly influenced by British law. The sources of Maltese law are the Constitution, the Codes, the Acts of Parliament, subsidiary legislation that may be published under such Acts, directly applicable EU legislation as well as ratified international conventions. The courts in Malta are categorised as Superior or Inferior Courts, and there is a distinction between civil and criminal courts. The Superior Courts are made up of the Constitutional Court, the Court of Appeal, the Court of Criminal Appeal, the Criminal Court and the Civil Court. The Inferior Courts are the Courts of Magistrates (Malta) and the Court of Magistrates (Gozo). The latter court has both a superior and an inferior jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court, which may be regarded as the highest court in Malta, hears and determines specific disputes including the human rights cases. All cases relating to violations of human rights are heard before the Civil Court, First Hall and the Constitutional Court (the ‘Civil Court (Constitutional Jurisdiction)’) may then act as a court of last instance. The Judiciary is composed of two offices:

- Judges who preside over the Superior Courts, and the magistrates who preside over the inferior courts and conduct criminal inquiries.
- The criminal or civil action is brought before the relevant Courts of First Instance. In general, parties to the dispute may appeal against the decision of the Courts of First Instance.

The main entity that regulates environmental matters is the Environment and Resources Authority (ERA). Decisions by other authorities, such as the Planning Authority, may also have direct or indirect effect on the environment. Historically these authorities had formed one authority, the Malta Environment and Planning Authority (MEPA), however the demerger ensures that the functions and roles of each entity are separate, and each is regulated by its own piece of legislation.

The Environment and Resources Authority (ERA) is the competent authority responsible for environmental protection under the Environmental Protection Act (Chapter 549). Its mission is to safeguard the Maltese environment for a sustainable quality of life. The goals of the ERA are: to mainstream environmental targets and objectives across Government and society; to take a leading role in advising Government on environmental policy-making at the national level, as well as in the context of international environmental negotiations; to develop evidence-based policy backed by a robust data gathering structure; and to draw up plans, provide a licensing regime and monitor activities having an environmental impact and to integrate environmental considerations into the development control process. The Environmental Protection Act (Chapter 549 of the Laws of Malta) is the main legal provision which regulates the operations of the ERA.

The Planning Authority (PA) carries out and monitors the permit granting process for development applications and also has a policy-making function in the land-use sphere. The PA is regulated by the Development Planning Act (Chapter 552 of the Laws of Malta).

Access to justice in environmental matters is provided mainly through the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal (EPRT), which was first established in 2010. The Tribunal is regulated through the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal Act (Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta). Chapter 551 distinguishes between decisions made by the Environment and Resources Authority (ERA), and the Planning Authority (PA). The decisions taken by the PA which can be appealed before the EPRT are listed in Article 11 of Chapter 551.
With regard to decisions taken by the ERA, Article 47 of Chapter 551 and Article 63 of the 7th Environmental Protection Act (Chapter 549), provide the right for an aggrieved person to challenge such decisions before the EPRT. Notably, for appeals lodged by a person other than the applicant, such a person need not prove that he has an interest in that appeal in terms of the doctrine of juridical interest, but he is required to submit reasoned grounds based on environmental considerations to justify his appeal.

In all cases, the definition of a ‘person’ includes an association or organisation, whether registered as a legal person or not, including NGOs.

The Court of Appeal is the judicial body which decides on appeals against decisions of the EPRT.

The Courts of Civil Jurisdiction (the First Hall of the Civil Court) can rule on another form of review, namely judicial review of administrative actions filed under Article 469A of the 7th Code of Organisation and Civil Procedure (Chapter 12). The latter allows the courts of civil jurisdiction to enquire into the validity of any administrative act or declare such an act null, invalid or without effect, only in cases where the act is in violation of the Constitution of Malta, or when it is ultra vires on the grounds specifically contained in subsection (1)(b) of Article 469A.

The Constitutional Court has both an original and an appellate jurisdiction. As an appellate court it hears appeals against decisions of other courts on questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution and on the validity of laws, as well as appeals against decisions on alleged violations of fundamental human rights. As a court of original jurisdiction, the Constitutional Court decides questions concerning the validity of the election of members of the House of Representatives, the requirement in certain cases for a member to vacate his seat in the said House, and the validity of the election of the Speaker from among persons who are not members of the House. As a court of original jurisdiction, the Constitutional Court also decides questions concerning the validity of general elections, including allegations of illegal or corrupt practices or foreign interference in such elections. No appeal lies from a decision of the Constitutional Court given in its original jurisdiction.

Certain subsidiary legislation also provides for access to justice with regard to specific matters, such as the 7th Freedom of Access to Information on the Environment Regulations (S.L. 549.39) which provide for two forms of appeal for an applicant who requested environmental information and was dissatisfied with the response. The applicant may appeal to the Information and Data Protection Commissioner as per regulation 12, or to the EPRT as per regulation 11A. In the latter case, the Tribunal is obliged to hold its first hearing within six working days from receipt of the appeal.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The Constitution contains a declaration of principles which includes reference to the State’s obligations to protect and conserve the environment and its resources for the benefit of present and future generations, to prevent environmental degradation and to promote, nurture and support the right of action in favour of the environment[1]. However, in accordance with Article 21 of the Constitution, this is not justiciable. Article 33 of the Constitution protects the right to life of every citizen as a fundamental human right. The wording of the provision is wide and can be interpreted to include the right to a healthy environment as an aspect of the right to life. As yet there has been no legal challenge to this provision to confirm its interpretation in the sense that the right to life includes the right to a healthy environment. Article 41 also provides for the right to freedom of expression, including also freedom to receive ideas and information without interference. Article 46 provides for the right to file a constitutional case against the government when a violation of human rights is alleged. The Constitution contains provisions ensuring procedural rights such as the requirement of impartiality of tribunals deciding upon civil rights (including environmental rights).

The Constitution also includes the right to be given a fair hearing within a reasonable time. This incorporates safeguarding of the principles of natural justice. Furthermore, there is a Constitutional provision[2] which allows for the filing of a class action known as the “actio popularis” where a law may be challenged as being invalid for reasons of public interest. An example of such a case would be one where an allegation is made that a law was not regularly approved by Parliament or the relevant minister according to its procedural norms.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Under the Maltese national order, there are five main routes whereby individuals, associations or NGOs can have access to justice in the environmental field. These are the following:

Access to information;
Public participation in decisions relating to the environment;
Right of appeal for decisions relating to the environment;
Right of action for Judicial Review of acts or omissions of authorities;
Right of action for the declaration of the invalidity of a law.

The relevant pieces of legislation which provide for access in this manner are listed below and are broadly grouped in relation to the above-cited categories (though the scope of some will overlap):

General
The Environmental Protection Act (Chapter 549) and the Development Planning Act (Chapter 552)
Access to Information
The Freedom of Access to Information on the Environment Regulations (S.L. 549.39)
The Freedom of Information Act (Chapter 496)
Public Participation
The Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations (S.L. 549.46)
The Strategic Environmental Assessment Regulations (S.L. 549.81)
The Industrial Emissions (Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control) Regulations (S.L. 549.77)
The Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations (S.L. 549.41)
The Water Policy Framework Regulations (S.L. 549.100)
The European Pollutant Release and Transfer Register Reporting Obligations Regulations (S.L. 549.47)
The Control of Major Accident Hazard Regulations (S.L. 424.19)
The Development Planning (Procedure for Applications and their Determination) Regulations (S.L. 552.13)
Access to Justice – Appeal and Judicial review
The Environment and Planning Review Tribunal Act (Chapter. 551)
The Administrative Justice Act (Chapter. 490)
The Code of Organisation and Civil Procedure (Chapter. 12)
The Data Protection Act (Chapter. 586)
Access to Justice - Right of Action for the Declaration of the Invalidity of a Law
The Constitution of Malta
4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The jurisprudence of the Court of Appeal (as is the case with all judgments) can be found here. The doctrine of judicial precedent does not apply in Malta so jurisprudence has a persuasive but not a binding effect.

The rulings regarding environmental and development cases are those made by the Court of Appeal (Inferior jurisdiction). These are judgments in appeals filed from decisions of the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal (EPRT) and most have the Planning Authority (PA) as a defendant.

The Court of Appeal acts does not re-examine the facts of a case, but only interprets the relevant legal and procedural questions relating to it. \[3\]

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Parties to administrative procedures may only rely on international agreements when these have been transposed into national law – there is no right of direct recourse.

As per Article 267 of the TFEU, which is applicable in Malta under Chapter 460, a preliminary reference may be requested at any stage of the proceedings, but if it is made at the appeal stage then the national court cannot reject it. The procedure is also regulated by Article 21 of the Court Practice and Procedure and Good Order Rules (S.L 12.09).

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

The Maltese judicial system is a two-tier system consisting of court(s) of first instance, presided over by a judge or magistrate, and the court(s) of second instance, the court of appeal.

There are also various specialised tribunals that deal with specific areas of the law. There is a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal against decisions of tribunals and awards of arbitrators.

The Environment and Planning Review Tribunal (EPRT) is the tribunal which decides upon appeals against decisions of the Planning Authority and the Environment and Resources Authority. Decisions of the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal are subject to appeal before the Court of Appeal on points of law or any matter relating to an alleged breach of the right of fair hearing before the tribunal (as per Article 50 of Chapter 551).

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Environment and Planning Review Tribunal (EPRT) Act, Chapter 551, provides that the role of the EPRT is to review ‘the decisions of the Planning Authority and the decisions of the Environment and Resources Authority’, further providing that the EPRT is to exercise any other jurisdiction and function conferred by the Act and any other law. The role of the EPRT is to ‘review’ planning and environmental decisions in terms of law and fact within the parameters set out in the EPRT Act. The decisions of the EPRT are subject to appeal before the Court of Appeal.

The Administrative Review Tribunal is set up by virtue of the Administrative Justice Act (Chapter 490 of the Laws of Malta), for the purpose of reviewing administrative acts. It consists of a Chairperson, who shall be a person who holds or has held the office of a judge or of a magistrate in Malta (Article 8(4) of Chapter 490), appointed for a period of four years by the President of Malta acting on the advice of the Prime Minister. The Tribunal is assisted by two assistants, whom the administrative review tribunal may consult in any case for its decision (Art. 10(1) of Chapter 490) however, the Tribunal is not bound to abide by the opinion given by the assistants (as per Art. 10(2) of Chapter 490). The Tribunal holds sessions in Malta and Gozo.

Administrative acts include the issuing by the public administration i.e. the government of Malta including its Ministries and departments, local authorities and any body corporate established by law of any order, licence, permit, warrant, authorisation, concession, decision or refusal of any demand from a member of the public. Any party to the proceedings before the Tribunal who feels aggrieved by a decision of the said Tribunal may appeal to the Court of Appeal. The Administrative Review Tribunal does not have a general jurisdiction to review administrative acts which are reviewable under Article 469A of the Code of Organisation and Civil Procedure. It only has jurisdiction to review those administrative acts committed by the entities listed in Chapter 490 of the Laws of Malta or any other pertinent law.

The First Hall of the Civil Court has general jurisdiction to decide on actions for judicial review filed under Article 469A of the Code of Organisation and Civil Procedure (Chapter 12). The latter allows the courts of justice of civil jurisdiction to enquire into the validity of any administrative act or declare such act null, invalid or without effect, only in cases where the act is in violation of the Constitution of Malta, or when it is ultra vires on the grounds specifically contained in subsection (1)(b).

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

The Environment and Planning Review Tribunal is the specialised environmental tribunal within the Maltese judicial system. It consists of a panel of three (3) members, all of whom are appointed by the President acting on the advice of the Prime Minister. One member within the panel shall be an advocate and the other two members shall be well-versed in development planning and environmental matters respectively. In practice, this usually translates into a panel consisting of an advocate, a planner and an architect. The EPRT may engage experts to assist it in its deliberations.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

The Court of Appeal may bring up certain issues of its own motion. These are limited to issues of public order such as those regarding prescription or jurisdiction.

The Environment and Planning Review Tribunal has wider discretionary and own motion powers than the Court of Appeal, as the latter only decides upon points of law raised by the party in its appeal. Besides accepting and/or dismissing appeals, the EPRT has the power to order a change of plans and/or variations to planning and environmental decisions or order the Planning Authority to reconsider and decide the case again.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The Environment and Resources Authority is the main regulator on the environment in Malta. The Planning Authority decides on matters which may have an environmental impact (similar to other public authorities such as Transport Malta, Regulator for energy and water services, etc).

The ERA is responsible for various permitting aspects such as waste management, industry and nature protection. Through its permitting system the Authority implements the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act and regulations set out in subsidiary legislation through the industrial, nature and waste management permitting streams using various tools. These tools consist of notifications, clearances, general binding rules, consignment permits for disposal at sea and transfer of hazardous waste, environmental & nature permits, Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC) permits, registration of producers and permitting of schemes under Extended Producer Responsibility and Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) permits amongst others.

Below is a list of permits by permitting stream:

- Industry-related: IPPC and Environmental Permits for major activities;
- Waste Management: IPPC, environmental permits, consignment permits, transfrontier shipment permits, waste registrations (carriers, brokers, etc), extended producer responsibility scheme permits and producer registrations;
Nature-related: tree and activity permits, CITES permits and clearances, GMOs, invasive alien species;
Discharges to sea: hotels, port facilities, sewage treatment plants;
Other activities: environmental permits and registrations for activities including minor industries, medium combustion plants, fuel stations, and road tankers.
All applications for an Environmental Permit are duly processed in accordance with internal procedures. The Authority’s decisions are communicated only to applicants in writing and are appealable before the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal.
It should be noted that notice of the filing of an application for certain environmental permit is not widely disseminated and that only the relevant decision is published on the ERA website. The public is not given an opportunity to participate in this permitting process, and the right to challenge the issue of the permit is severely hindered by the fact that there is no notification or publication of the permit within a certain time. As a result, constant attention to the ERA website is needed to see when the relevant decision is issued, in order to appeal within the relative time limit.
The Planning Authority (PA) established under the Development Planning Act, 2016 (Chapter 552 of the Laws of Malta) is the national agency responsible for land use planning in Malta. Its functions include the consideration and determination of applications for development and the facilitation and co-ordination of the permit-granting process for projects of common interest. The Planning Authority also has a policy-making function.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?
An appeal against decisions of the EPRT may be made to the Court of Appeal on points of law within 20 days from the date of decision by the EPRT. The appellant before the Tribunal and all other persons who participated in the appeal may appeal against decisions of the Tribunal. There is no set time limit for the Court of Appeal to give its judgment.
A request for revocation of a permit issued under the Development Planning Act may be filed with the PA within 5 years of the date of issue of the permit. A ruling for revocation may be filed on grounds of fraud, the submission of incorrect information, error on the face of the record or where public safety is concerned. The decision of the PA regarding revocation may be appealed to the EPRT and thereafter to the Court of Appeal. If the PA refuses to consider the request for revocation, that refusal may be challenged by means of an action for judicial review within six months.
An action for the judicial review of the legality of administrative action (including environmental decisions) may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court, which is the court of first instance. Such an action is based on Article 469A of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta. It must be filed within a period of six (6) months from the date when the interested person becomes aware or could have become aware of such an administrative act, whichever is the earlier.
There is no set time limit for judgment to be handed down when such an action is filed. The judgment of the First Hall of the Civil Court may be appealed by either party to the Court of Appeal.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence
There are no specialised environmental courts in Malta.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)
Whilst an action for judicial review challenging the legality of administrative action (including environmental decisions) delivered by competent authorities may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court as described above, there is also the possibility of appeal against decisions of the Environment and Planning Authority before the Environment Planning Review Tribunal. Appeals against the decisions of this tribunal may then be made to the Court of Appeal on points of law within 20 days from the date of decision EPRT. The appellant before the Tribunal and all other persons who participated in the appeal may appeal against decisions of the Tribunal.
There is no set time limit for the Court of Appeal to give its judgment.

There is no provision for extraordinary ways of appeal or rules in the environmental sector.
A request for a preliminary reference may be made before courts of all instances, however only a court of last instance is obliged to make the request if it deems it necessary. The preliminary reference procedure may not be used before tribunals – such as the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?
Under Maltese law, provision for ‘out of court settlements’ procedures is found in:
S.L. 549.127
Article 83 from Chapter 549.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?
The Ombudsman is an independent officer of Parliament whose mandate is to investigate any action taken by or on behalf of any government department or other authority of the Government, any Minister or Parliamentary Secretary and any other public officer and any statutory body and/or partnership or other body in which the Government has a controlling interest or any other body or entity subjected by law to his jurisdiction.
The Ombudsman investigates claims of maladministration, procedural irregularity, injustice or unfairness by such entities. When the Ombudsman’s investigation shows that the complaint is justified, he may recommend that complainant be given adequate redress. However, the Ombudsman’s opinion is persuasive and not enforceable and there are instances when his recommendation is ignored.
The Ombudsman institution in Malta is regulated by the Ombudsman Act which also provides for the appointment of Commissioners for Administrative Investigations in specialised areas of the public administration. One of these Commissioners is tasked with investigating environmental and planning issues.
Filing a complaint with the Ombudsman and/or the Commissioner for the Environment and Planning is free of charge and the anonymity of the complainant is maintained. Own motion investigations by the Office of the Ombudsman can also take place.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?
1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?
Physical and legal persons, including NGOs, may challenge environmental administrative decisions.
2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?
The rules regarding the possibility of challenging environmental administrative decisions are broadly the same in sectoral legislation.
3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)
In order to appeal against a decision of the Planning Authority to the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal, interested third parties (including NGOs) must have submitted written representations regarding the application for development/environmental permission during the term established by law for the public consultation process.
However, all persons having sufficient interest have access to a review procedure before the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of any decision, act or omission relating to a development or an installation which is subject to an environmental impact assessment (EIA) or an integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) permit. This applies even if they have not submitted representations within the term stipulated by law. The concept of “sufficient interest” has been interpreted widely by the Tribunal and the courts, and essentially NGOs or parties who aim to safeguard the environment are assumed to have sufficient interest.
With regard to the possibility of filing actions for judicial review of administrative decisions before the courts, although notionally the requirement of possessing juridical interest still exists, this is no longer interpreted restrictively by the courts insofar as eNGOs are concerned. Recent jurisprudence has seen eNGOs being assumed to have the necessary juridical interest and locus standi. Individuals must show legal interest, which, as defined in jurisprudence, is made up of the following three concurrent characteristics: legitimate or juridical, personal or direct and actual.

The requirement that interest must be legitimate or juridical means that it must be in conformity with the law. The second requisite requires that there must be a determinate and actionable link between the parties to the action and the third requisite implies that the interest must exist at the time of the filing of the action and it cannot be hypothetical.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

The official language of the courts is Maltese and proceedings are conducted in the Maltese language (Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta, Code of Organisation and Civil Procedure).

Chapter 189 of the Laws of Malta, the “Judicial Proceedings (Use of English Language) Act, 1965”, deals with cases where one or more parties are English-speaking. In this case, the court may order proceedings to be conducted in English.

Where any party does not understand the language in which the oral proceedings are conducted, such proceedings shall be interpreted to him either by the court or by a sworn interpreter.

Any evidence submitted by affidavit is to be drawn up in the language normally used by the person taking such an affidavit. The affidavit, when not in Maltese, is to be filed together with a translation into Maltese, which must also be confirmed on oath by the translator.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

The rules of evidence contained in Chapter 12 require, inter alia, that all evidence must be relevant to the matter at issue between the parties, and that in all cases the court shall require the best evidence that the party may be able to produce.

The parties may also bring forward witnesses, and Chapter 12 holds that all persons of sound mind, unless there are objections against their competency, shall be admissible as witnesses. As a general rule however, hearsay evidence is not permissible[4].

The court may not request evidence on its own motion. However, the court may, at any stage of the examination or cross-examination, put to a witness such questions as it may deem necessary.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

Evidence can be produced until such time as the party declares that all evidence has been produced. No new evidence or new witnesses may be introduced at the appellate stage, unless the court grants authorisation. The circumstances in which this may be allowed are listed in Article 208 of Chapter 12. This would include circumstances where it is proved on oath or otherwise, that the party submitting the evidence of such a witness had no knowledge thereof, or was unable, by the means provided by law, to produce such a witness in the court of first instance or the evidence of the witness was submitted and disallowed before the court below and the appellate court considers it admissible and relevant; or the appellate court is satisfied of the necessity or expediency of taking the evidence of such a witness.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts.

Parties to judicial proceedings may request expert opinion from “ex parte witnesses”. However, in terms of Article 563A of Chapter 12, the evidence of ex parte expert witnesses is admissible only if, in the opinion of the court, the witness is suitably qualified in the relevant matter. The party summoning the expert witness has to pay the relevant fees. The court may also request “ex officio” expert witnesses on its own motion.

According to Article 89 of Chapter 12, the Minister responsible for justice may nominate a panel, consisting of however many advocates, legal procurators and other experts he sees fit to call on, to perform the duties of experts in the courts of Malta and Gozo. This list is to be published in the Government Gazette. However, this list of experts includes architects, accountants and traffic experts rather than environmental experts.

The court may refer to these experts or others not on the list. In this case the court will decide which of the parties is to bear the costs and fees for the appointed experts. More specifically, in terms of Article 223(5) of Chapter 12, where an ex parte expert witness is produced by any of the parties in a case, the court in the definitive judgment shall establish a fair amount which can be claimed as costs for the said witness. The court also establishes how the costs are to be apportioned between the parties to the case.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

Judges are not bound by expert opinion.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court

Where a person is called as a witness, his opinion on any relevant matter on which he is qualified to give expert evidence shall be admissible in evidence only if, in the opinion of the court, he is suitably qualified in the relevant matter.

The parties to the lawsuit may challenge the appointment of the expert on grounds of impartiality.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties

In the case of an expert witness produced by the parties to a lawsuit, his opinion on any relevant matter on which he is qualified to give expert evidence shall be admissible in evidence only if, in the opinion of the court, he is suitably qualified in the relevant matter.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

Where an “ex parte” expert witness is produced by any of the parties to a case, the court shall in the definitive judgment establish a fair amount which can be claimed as costs for the said witness. In determining the said amount, the court shall take into account the seriousness of the claims and, in the case of an expert witness not resident in Malta, whether local expertise was available, and all the other circumstances of the case. The court shall also establish how the said costs are to be apportioned between the parties to the case. This is also the procedure which is adopted when the court appoints an expert witness of its own motion.

Fees for expert witnesses may be considerable.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

The Chamber of Advocates is the professional body representing lawyers practising in Malta. Its website includes a “Find a lawyer” function, for lawyers registered with the Chamber. However, the search for lawyers working in the environmental field only produces a list of 6 lawyers, which is relatively out of date, as at least one of these practitioners is now working in another sector.
The Government of Malta’s website, lawyersregister.gov.mt, provides an official list of lawyers with the names and details of warranted lawyers who have consented to have their professional details featured on the Register. This Register can be accessed publicly. However, this list does not provide the specialisation area of each lawyer.

Lawyers who work in the environmental field are usually contacted via one of the several Environmental NGOs active in this sector.

It is not mandatory to be represented by legal counsel.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance
There are lawyers who assist parties or environmental NGOs pro bono. They are usually referred to by Environmental NGOs.

There is a recently-established Law Clinic whereby law students are supervised by legal practitioners to provide legal advice. This is aimed mostly at third country nationals appealing against asylum law decisions.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)
Since the provision of pro bono assistance is relatively informal, applicants should ideally contact one of the NGOs indicated below, providing contact details and the subject of their query.

The Law Clinic may be contacted at the Cottonera Resource Centre by sending an email to crc@um.edu.mt

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?
Applicants for pro bono assistance should address the Chairperson or Administrator of the relevant NGO.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts
There are no expert registries or publicly available websites with contact details of experts in the environmental field. Malta is a very small island and references to experts/practitioners are obtained by word of mouth.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible
The following are the NGOs which are very active in this field:

Din l-Art Helwa
Friends of the Earth (Malta)
Moviment Graffitti
Futur Ambjent Wieħed: avvchristinebellizzi@gmail.com
Nature Trust Malta
Ramblers Association of Malta
Flimkien Għal Ambjent Aħjar
Birdlife Malta
Bicycle Advocacy Group (BAG Malta)

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State
The following international NGOs are active in Malta:

Birdlife Malta
Friends of the Earth (Malta)

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).
The public can challenge decisions of the Environment Resources Authority as well as those of the Planning Authority when it grants planning/development permission.

The deadline for filing an appeal to the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal is 30 days from the date of publication of the decision.

Appeals against decisions which do not need to be published shall be lodged before the Tribunal within thirty days from the date of notification of the decision (Chapter 551 Article 13 of the Laws of Malta)

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ
The Environment and Planning Law Review Tribunal is the body which decides appeals against decisions of the Planning Authority and the Environment and Resources Authority.

The time limit within which it has to deliver its decision depends on whether a request for suspension of execution of the decision is filed and upon the type of decision appealed against. The different time limits are listed below:

Time limit when a request for the suspension of the execution of the permit is not requested
In cases where an appeal is lodged but is not accompanied by a request for suspension, the Tribunal shall appoint the day and hour and hold the first hearing for the parties to appear before it, within two months from the lodging of the appeal application.

The Tribunal shall deliver its final decision on the merits of the appeal within one year from the first hearing of the appeal, which period may be extended only once by a further period of six months in exceptional cases, in the interests of justice. This is also the applicable time limit when a request for suspension has been made but not acceded to.

However, this time limit is not really enforceable. The only thing that happens when a final decision is not delivered within the time-frames indicated is that the appeal is assigned by the Secretary to another panel. It is not clear what happens if the second Tribunal panel does not deliver a decision within the time limit.

Time limits when a suspension of the execution of the permit is requested
Where the appeal is accompanied by a request for suspension of execution of a permission, the Tribunal shall notify the parties, hold its first hearing and decide on the request within thirty days from receipt of the appeal application.

The Tribunal may not grant a suspension of execution of a permit in relation to an application for a development which, in the opinion of the Minister responsible for the Planning Authority, is of strategic significance or of national interest, relates to any obligation ensuing from a European Union act, affects national security or affects the interests of the Government and/or other governments. This proviso is not applicable to applications relating to developments or installations which are subject to an environmental impact assessment (EIA) and/or integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) matters.

The Tribunal can suspend execution of the permit for one month from the date of the first hearing of the appeal before the Tribunal, in the case of an application subject to an environmental impact assessment (EIA) and/or an integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) permit, which in the opinion of the Minister responsible for the Planning Authority is of strategic significance or of national interest, relates to any obligation ensuing from a European Union act, affects national security or affects the interests of the Government and/or other governments.
The Tribunal shall suspend the execution of such a permit for three months from the date of the first hearing of the appeal before the Tribunal in the case of an application other than those described above.

Time limit for decision on the merits when the execution of a permit has been suspended
The Tribunal shall, whenever the execution of a permit has been suspended, deliver its final decision on the merits of the appeal:
within three months from the date of the first hearing of the appeal;
within one month from the date of the first hearing of the appeal in the case of an application subject to an environmental impact assessment (EIA) and/or to an integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) permit which, in the opinion of the Minister, is of strategic significance or of national interest, relates to any obligation ensuing from a European Union act, affects national security or affects the interests of the Government and/or other governments.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?
It is possible to challenge a first level administrative decision directly before the courts, when the law does not provide for the possibility of an appeal to the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal under Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta – as would be the case with certain types of development permits such as development notification orders.

In these cases, an interested third party may lodge an action for judicial review before the Civil Court to ‘enquire into the validity’ or declare such acts null in terms of Article 469A of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta due to the fact there is no alternative mode of contestation or of obtaining redress provided elsewhere.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?
There is no deadline for the national court to deliver its judgment.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)
There are time limits within which the relevant appeals or action for judicial review must be filed. However, time limits during the course of the procedure are laid down by the court and are not fixed.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?
An appeal to the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal does not have a suspensive effect. Nor does an action filed in court for judicial review challenging an administrative environmental decision or action. The suspension of the administrative decision must be specifically requested – by means of an application requesting such suspension before the EPRT, and by means of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the case of court action for judicial review.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?
When filing an appeal against a decision of the Planning Authority to grant planning/development permission one may also file an application for suspension of the execution of the permit. If acceded to by the EPRT, this would suspend execution of the permit only until such time as the EPRT decides upon the appeal – which is at most 3 months.

Similarly, when filing an appeal against a decision of the Environment and Resources Authority, one may also file an application for suspension of the appealed decision. Notably, in the case of an appeal against the approval or partial approval of a potentially irreversible action or an action that may potentially cause significant damage to the environment, the approval may be suspended by the EPRT pending its final decision, if the said Tribunal deems that this would be in the interests of avoiding any likely significant or irreversible effects or implications on the environment or for similarly justified reasons.[5]

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
The request for a suspension may only be filed concurrently with the application for appeal filed before the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal. This means it must be filed within 30 days of the date of publication of the decision appealed against.

No other requests for suspension may be filed before the EPRT. As the suspension lapses automatically when the EPRT gives its decision, a situation my arise where the EPRT decides upon the substantive merits of the appeal and decides against the appellants. As the effects of the suspension would have lapsed, the effects of the decision appealed against go into effect unless they are suspended by the filing of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction which is acceded to by the court. This results in an anomalous situation where an administrative environmental decision may become executable whilst appeal proceedings before the courts are still ongoing. This may render the court appeal process an exercise in futility, as the decision (which may include a permit for development which is environmentally deleterious and irreversible) would have become executable long before the court can reach its judgment.

According to Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta (Code of Civil Procedure). The object of a warrant of prohibitory injunction is to restrain a person from doing anything which might be prejudicial to the person suing out the warrant. The court shall not issue any such warrant unless it is satisfied that such a warrant is necessary in order to preserve a right of the person requesting it, and that prima facie such person appears to possess such right.

It should be noted that the application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction may be objected to by the other parties involved in the procedure. The latter may also file requests for revocation of the said warrant or for the appellants to provide security in the event that the warrant can be proven to have been issued on frivolous or vexatious grounds. This can be very daunting for persons or NGOs without sufficient resources.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
As explained above, there is immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of appeal proceedings unless the court accedes to the application for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction filed by appellants.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
The administrative decision is not suspended even when challenged before the court, unless the court accedes to the application for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction filed by appellants.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
The only forms of injunctive relief available are those described above – namely an application for suspension of execution of a decision to be filed before the EPRT and/or an application for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction to be filed before the courts.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.
Subsidiary Legislation 551.01, Environment and Planning (Fees) Regulations, stipulate the fees due to the Registry of the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal in respect of appeals. These are as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Type of decision</th>
<th>Appeal fee</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Against a decision of the PA for a development permission</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Against a decision of the PA under a development notification order or under a regularisation process or under a planning control application € 150

Against a decision following a request for screening of a proposed development permission € 150

Against any other decision of the PA € 150

Against any decision of the Environment and Resources Authority € 150

If one had to add the professional fees payable to lawyers, architects and other technical experts required to conduct an appeal before the EPRT, one could easily run to some 2500 to 3000 euros in the more straightforward appeals. More complex appeals which would require analysis of environmental assessments and studies and expert opinion would be far more expensive – running to costs of 10,000 euros or more.

The costs of filing an appeal to the court would be 120 euros in Court Registry fees, and a further 7.20 euros for each notification, to which professional fees for legal counsel must be added. These fees could vary widely depending on the complexity of the case and the level of background research required. It would be safe to say that there would be a starting figure in the 1200 euro range for the most simple kind of appeal.

The cost of filing an action for judicial review of administrative acts would be 120 euros in court fees and a further 7.20 euros for each notification, to which professional fees for legal counsel and expert witnesses must be added, for a starting figure which would approach the 3000 euro figure. When the case is terminated, the court registry fees amount to 650 euros.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

Injunctive relief may be available at 2 stages:

1) When filing an appeal against a decision to grant planning/development permission one may also file an application for suspension of execution of the permit. If acceded to by the EPRT, this would suspend the execution of the permit until such time as the EPRT decides upon the appeal. There is no separate registry fee for filing this application, however fees are payable to the professional practitioner (lawyer/architect) drawing up and filing the application and attending the relative Tribunal hearing to discuss this application. These costs vary depending on the practitioner in question.

No form of deposit is necessary.

2) If the Tribunal rules against the plea to request suspension of the execution of the permit, or rules against the revocation of the permit, then an appellant may file an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the civil courts. This costs 250 to 300 euros in Court Registry fees (depending on the number of parties which have to be notified). The fees due to the legal practitioners (lawyer and legal procurator) drafting and filing the relative application have to be added to this amount. The application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction must be followed by the filing of a lawsuit within 20 days.

No form of deposit is necessary, but if the request for a warrant of prohibitory injunction is not acceded to, the costs and expenses must be paid for by the losing party.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

Legal aid is available for natural persons under the Maltese legal system. The applicant should apply to the Legal Aid Malta Agency for legal aid.

This is subject to a means test. A person requesting legal aid must also pass the “merit” test and show that he has reasonable grounds for initiating or defending, continuing or being a party to proceedings.

For an applicant to qualify under the means criteria, the person must not possess property of any sort, including disposable money, with a net value above €6,988.12 for the preceding twelve months. Moreover, the applicant’s income should not, for the period of twelve months prior to the demand for the benefit of legal aid, exceed the national minimum wage for persons above the age of 18.

If granted, the legal aid covers expenses related to all court registry and lawyers’ fees until the case procedures have been exhausted. Legal Aid Malta does not cover expenses related to court expert reports.

Although legal aid is available to natural persons who satisfy the means and merit test criteria described above, it is usually withheld in domestic litigation matters and there is no record of it having been availed of in the environmental litigation sector.

Legal Aid Malta is the agency which provides legal aid and pro bono assistance in Malta. In order to qualify for legal aid, an applicant has to pass a means test and a merit test. This is assessed by the agency. Application forms can be filled in at Legal Aid Malta’s office premises or by downloading them from the website indicated below. The contents of the application have to be sworn by the applicant. The request for legal aid may also be made by filing an application before the civil court. The contact details are as follows:

Address
188-189 Old Bakery Street,
Valletta, Malta

Telephone
+356 2247 1500

Email: info.legalaidmalta@gov.mt

Website: http://www.legalaidmalta.gov.mt

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Article 926 of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta states that companies registered under the Companies Act shall not be entitled to the benefit of legal aid.

There is no specific mention of whether NGOs are eligible to receive legal aid or not. A recent request by an eNGO for legal aid has been turned down.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

There are no legally binding financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance for natural persons, associations, legal persons and/or NGOs to file appeals to the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal or the Court of Appeal or to access justice. This is a severe obstacle to access to justice as appellants must bear Tribunal Registry costs, professional costs, the costs of experts and studies as well as the costs of the other party if they lose the case.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The court has the discretion to award or apportion costs in any way it deems fit. However, the general principle is that the losing party usually pays costs.

When an appeal is decided upon by the EPRT, and the appeal is upheld, the Tribunal may order that the fees paid for filing the appeal, or part of them, shall be refunded to the appellant. When any interested person, or an environmental NGO, or an external consultant has lodged an appeal before the Tribunal, and the Tribunal finds in favour of any such appellant, the appeal fee paid by the said appellant shall be reimbursed to the appellant in equal proportions by the parties and, for the purposes of this regulation, the Tribunal decision shall be an executive title.

Website: http://www.legalaidmalta.gov.mt

Email: info.legalaidmalta@gov.mt

Telephone +356 2247 1500

Address 188-189 Old Bakery Street,
Valletta, Malta

Telephone +356 2247 1500

Email: info.legalaidmalta@gov.mt

Website: http://www.legalaidmalta.gov.mt
7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?
The court apportions costs according to the “loser pays” principle. In certain exceptional cases, such as those where the subject matter of the case is innovative or complex, the court may decide not to apportion costs in this manner. However, this is entirely at the court’s discretion.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?
The Environmental Resources Authority (ERA) is the main entity which publishes information regarding environmental access to justice. Some environmental information relating to planning applications is available on the PA’s website. However, it should be noted that this is only rudimentary information about the individual planning applications. More detailed information may only be obtained by registration on the PA’s E-App system.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?
Information regarding access to justice is provided in different ways under different environmental procedures which are described below.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?
Planning Authority (PA)
The PA is regulated by the Development Planning Act (Chapter 552 of the Laws of Malta) which incorporates the obligations found in the Aarhus Convention by providing for public access and dissemination of information on the environment, facilitating the participation of the public in decisions which affect the environment, and containing specific provisions on access to justice. The Development Planning Act provides for public participation in decision-making for any development, whether it requires an environmental impact assessment (EIA) or not. In particular the Development Planning (Procedure for Applications and their Determination) Regulations 2016 provide more detailed provisions regarding public participation where development applications, planning regularisation procedures and summary planning procedures are concerned.

For the regularisation procedure (which does not require an EIA), an application needs to be submitted, which is published in the Government Gazette, and is subject to public consultation. With respect to the summary procedure, applications are published in the Government Gazette and on the Department of Information website, and on a site notice affixed to the site, and the public is allowed to submit any comments/objections generally within 15 days. As regards planning applications, the Development Planning (Procedure for Applications and their Determination) Regulations 2016 oblige the Executive Chairperson (established under the Development Planning Act) to ensure that information about the applications are available online and at the actual site at an early stage in order to allow for members of the public to make representations.

Article 72(2) of the Development Planning Act states that in its decision on an application for development permission, the Planning Board shall have regard to representations made in response to the publication of the development proposal. According to Article 71(8) of the Development Planning Act and regulations 5(4) and 12(6) of the Development Planning (Procedure for Applications and their Determination) Regulations, 2016), when material changes in the application are proposed, or fresh/revised drawings or documents are submitted, those who had previously made representations on the original proposal are informed and are allowed to make comments.

EIA
The Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations (EIA Regulations) (S.L. 549.46) enacted under the Environment Protection Act call for public participation in the EIA process as explained below.

Under the said regulations there are various opportunities for public participation, e.g. at the scoping stage and at the review stages of the process. Members of the public are allowed 30 days to submit any issues they wish to see included in the EIA Terms of Reference. Another 30 days are given to the public to comment on the EIA Report, once this is submitted to the Authority for review. A public meeting is held for Category I projects. The public is to be informed at least 15 days before the date of the public hearing about their right to attend and make comments on the proposals during the meeting itself as well as written submissions up to 7 days after the meeting. The public will be informed of the date, time and place of the hearing through a publication in a local newspaper, in Maltese and English, as well as on Authority’s website. All submissions and comments by the public are to be collated in a report by the ERA and referred to the EIA coordinator for a response. The coordinator’s responses are referred to the ERA and are included as an Addendum to the EIA Report. At this stage, the EIA Report may be further revised should there be any material considerations.

For the comments to be included in this report, these have to reach the ERA by the stipulated deadline. The final assessment by the ERA is made publicly available on the website of the Authority. This report is also referred to the permitting authority.

Regulation 30 of the EIA Regulations obliges the competent authority to inform the public of a decision taken regarding the application – including the content of the decision, any conditions, and main reasons and considerations on which the decision is based, including information about the public participation process. The EIA Regulations also provide scope for updating an EIA or undertaking a fresh assessment (regulation 24(3)), if there are any requested changes or extensions to a development which would result in significant adverse effects on the environment. In this regard, the normal procedures in the EIA Regulations would apply, including a public consultation. In accordance with regulation 34 of the EIA Regulations, aggrieved persons may file appeals before the EPRT to challenge a decision, act or omission related to any matter regulated under the EIA regulations.
IPPC
The Industrial Emissions (Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control) Regulations (S.L. 549.77) (Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations) provides for public participation with regard to the permitting of installations.

Regulation 18 of these regulations states that the Environment Resources Authority (ERA) must ensure that the public concerned are given early and effective opportunities to participate. Details of the public participation procedure are then provided in Schedule 4.

According to Schedule 4 of the Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations (S.L. 549.77), the public consultation process shall be initiated through a notice in at least one local newspaper and on ERA’s website.

The periods for public consultation applicable to installations covered by the Regulations shall be thirty days for the procedures described in Regulation 18(1) (a) to (d) and which relate to the granting, upgrading and reconsideration of permits. The public consultation period shall be 15 days in all other cases where the competent authority deems consultation to be necessary, with the proviso that where the application for reconsideration of a permit in accordance with Regulation 18(1)(e) includes a request for a substantial change, the timeframe for public consultation shall be 30 days.

Moreover, the ERA may also require the operator to organise one or more public meetings as part of the public consultation process.

Under the Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations, regulation 18 states that the reasons on which the decision is based must be published, and these would include an explanation of how the results of public consultation were taken into account, as well as more technical points as listed in regulation 18(2).

The above-mentioned rules relating to the Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations apply to a decision on granting, reconsidering or updating a permit.

A change in the operating conditions of IPPC installations requires a variation of the permit, which in turn requires public consultation procedures as regulated by the Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations.

In accordance with regulation 20 of the IPPC Regulations, members of the public concerned having a sufficient interest shall have access to a review procedure before the EPRT to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions subject to regulation 18 of the IPPC Regulations. Notably, the interest of any NGO promoting environmental protection and meeting any requirements under national law shall be deemed sufficient. Under this regulation the competent authority (ERA) is also obliged to ensure that practical information is made available to the public on access to administrative and judicial review procedures.

Plans and Programmes
The public is given the opportunity to participate in the preparation of plans, programmes and policies relating to the environment by virtue of the following pieces of legislation: the Environment Protection Act (Chapter 549 of the Laws of Malta), the Development Planning Act (Chapter 552 of the Laws of Malta), the Strategic Environmental Assessment Regulations (SEA Regulations) (S.L. 549.61), and the Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations (S.L. 549.41).

The relevant definitions in Directive 2003/4/EC have been transposed through these Acts and Regulations, and they are all non-discriminatory as they provide all members of the public with equal rights of participation.

Under the Environmental Protection Act, the ERA is required to draw up the National Strategy for the Environment as per Article 45, which is a strategic governance document setting the policy framework for the preparation of plans, policies and programmes issued under this Act or under any other Act for the protection and sustainable management of the environment. During the preparation or review of the Strategy, the Minister responsible for the environment shall make known to the public the matters intended for consideration and shall provide adequate opportunities for individuals and organisations to make representations (within a time frame of at least six weeks). The Strategy, together with a statement of the representations received and the responses made to those representations, is then published.

The ERA may also publish subsidiary plans, defined as: a plan that deals with a specific environmental policy or matter setting out detailed specifications for its implementation, as per Article 48; as well as more detailed plans and policies as per Article 50.

In preparing or reviewing such plans, the ERA must inform the public of the matters it intends to consider and provide for public consultation on such preliminary issues. Public consultation is also provided for after the draft plan has been prepared and published (for a period of at least six weeks). The plan is formally adopted by the ERA after taking into consideration all the representations submitted to it.

The Development Planning Act contains similar provisions as regards the preparation of the Spatial Strategy for Environment and Development (SPED) and other subsidiary plans.

The former is a strategic document regulating the sustainable management of land and sea resources covering the whole territory and territorial waters of the Maltese islands; whilst the latter include subject plans, local plans, action plans or management plans and development briefs. Articles 44 and 53 of the Development Planning Act state that public consultation must be provided for during the preparation of the plan, as well as after the draft has been published in a similar manner as that described above.

Provisions for public participation are also included in the SEA Regulations (S.L. 549.61) for plans and programmes undertaken by public authorities which are likely to have significant environmental effects. The above Regulations define “the public” as one or more natural or legal persons and, in accordance with national legislation or practice, their associations, organisations or groups. In addition, the said Regulations define “make available to the public” to mean publishing in the Government Gazette or in at least one daily newspaper, in English and in Maltese, a notice indicating where the document may be viewed or obtained; the price of the said document shall not exceed the cost of its printing and distribution. This with a view to ensuring access to documentation to all interested stakeholders without any barriers.

According to these Regulations, there are opportunities for the public to be constantly informed and to comment during the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) process. Responsible authorities are obliged to ensure that their conclusions on the need or otherwise for a SEA are made available to the public. Moreover, legislation also requires that the draft plan or programme and the environmental report prepared are made available to the public. In so doing, the public is given an early and effective opportunity within an adequate time-frame, which shall not exceed sixteen weeks from the publication of the plan or programme and its environmental report, to express its opinion on the draft plan or programme and the accompanying environmental report before the adoption of the plan or programme or its submission to the legislative procedure.

In order to reach out to the public affected or likely to be affected by, or having an interest in, the decision-making (e.g. those promoting environmental protection and other organisations concerned), the notice of availability of the plan or programme and the environmental report shall be published in at least the Government Gazette together with specific details of where the documentation is available and how comments can be submitted and by which date.

As a matter of good practice, responsible authorities are also advised to make the Scoping Report available to the public and interested stakeholders. In concluding the SEA process and communicating the decisions taken, the responsible authority is obliged to ensure that, when a plan or programme is adopted, the public is informed and the following items are made available:

- the plan or programme as adopted;
- a statement summarising how environmental considerations have been integrated into the plan or programme and how the environmental report prepared, the opinions expressed and the results of consultations have been taken into account and the reasons for choosing the plan or programme as adopted, in the light of the other reasonable alternatives dealt with;
the measures that have been decided concerning monitoring. In addition to the above, the Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations (S.L. 549.41) provide for public participation in the drawing up of specific plans and programmes that relate to waste, water and air as specified in the Schedule therein. The competent authority (ERA) must ensure that the public is given early and effective opportunities to participate in the preparation, modification or review of the specified plans or programmes. The ERA must take into account the results of the public participation when making its decision and must inform the public of the final decisions along with the reasons and considerations upon which those decisions are based, including information about the public participation process.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

When the Planning Authority makes a decision regarding development applications, regulation 13 (7) of the Development Planning (Procedure for Applications and their Determination) Regulations, 2016 (S.L. 552.13) stipulates that the decision notice is to be communicated to the applicant, the architect, external consultees, any other consultees and any registered interested party, within fifteen days from the date of the decision. Article 33 of Chapter 552 obliges the PA to provide the parties with detailed information about the right to submit an appeal and the applicable legislation regulating the filing of appeals and applicable time limits.

With regard to decisions of the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal, a notice of the date of reading of the decision is usually sent to the interested parties in the appeal. This is not sent by registered post so there may be (and have been) cases where notification is not confirmed. The decision of the EPRT is read in public and a hard copy of the decision is given to the parties in the case. The decision does not contain any reference to modes of appeal.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

The working language of the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal is Maltese, and the decisions are likewise published in Maltese. However, in line with Article 21 of Chapter 12 and Article 12 of Chapter 551, where any party does not understand the language in which the proceedings are conducted, such proceedings shall be interpreted to him/her.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The Environment and Resources Authority (ERA) is the competent authority for the Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) process, which is regulated by the Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations (S.L. 549.46).

Schedule I of the EIA Regulations contains a list of development projects which may qualify for an EIA. A detailed list of criteria can be accessed on the ERA website. Once a project is deemed to fall under Schedule I, a Project Description Statement (PDS) is requested in line with the criteria laid down in Schedule II of the EIA Regulations (S.L. 549.46).

If a development proposal falls under Category I of Schedule I of the EIA Regulations (S.L. 549.46), the EIA process will commence immediately, following the submission of the PDS. Should the proposal fall under Category II, a detailed EIA screening is carried out in accordance with Schedule III of the same Regulations to identify whether the proposal is likely to have any significant impacts arising from the same proposal. If the detailed screening does not envisage any significant environmental effects, the proposal would not require the submission of an EIA Report. Should significant impacts be identified in the EIA screening document, the proposal would qualify for further EIA studies through the request on an EIA Report. There is no public participation in the EIA screening process.

2) Rules on standing related to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

In the case of EIAs, the ERA Regulations (S.L.549.46) in Malta provide an opportunity for public participation at the scoping stage. According to regulation 16 (2), Government entities, local councils responsible for the localities where the project is proposed to be sited, other local councils that may be affected, as well as the public (including NGOs), are invited by the competent authority (ERA) to make recommendations and ancillary reasoned justifications, within 30 days, on any relevant matters that they wish to see included in the EIA Terms of Reference (TOR). The TOR, which are tailor-made to the project, will determine the content of the EIA Report.

The developer is responsible for appointing an EIA coordinator and independent consultants to undertake the necessary studies and assess the likely impacts of the environmental parameters identified in the EIA TORs. The EIA findings are then incorporated through the preparation of an EIA Report. This is a coordinated report prepared by an independent EIA coordinator and a team of individual independent consultants. This report consists of a coordinated assessment, technical appendices containing the specialised studies and a non-technical summary. Once the EIA Report is complete, the developer is responsible for publishing a notification in local newspapers to inform the public that an EIA Report has been submitted to the ERA and is available for public consultation. A digital copy of the EIA is made available on the Authority’s website for a 30-day consultation period. In the meantime, consultation is also undertaken with entities of Government, the local council(s) and NGOs. Comments made by the ERA and the consultees, including the public, are referred to the EIA coordinator for a reply.

For Category I projects, a public hearing is organised by the developer within or after the 30-day consultation period stipulated above. All comments made during the public hearing and its subsequent consultation period are referred to the EIA coordinator for a reply.

At the stage, any necessary revisions are made in the EIA Report, as relevant either through the re-submission of a new EIA report or an Addendum. At the end of the process, the ERA prepares a report based on the EIA findings together with a recommendation. This report feeds into the overall decision-making process whereby a decision is taken with regard to a proposed development permit application. Should the development be approved, this would be subject to specific conditions and post-permit monitoring.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

In accordance with regulation 34 of the EIA Regulations, aggrieved persons may file appeals before the EPRT to challenge a decision, act or omission related to any matter regulated under the EIA regulations. In Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta, Article 47 also provides for an appeal to the EPRT. According to this, ‘any person may appeal any decision of the Environment and Resources Authority only in relation to environment assessments, access to environmental information and the prevention and remedying of environmental damage’.

An appeal to the EPRT may be filed on any ground including:

- that a material error as to the facts has been made;
- that there was a material procedural error;
- that an error of law has been made;
- that there was some material illegality, unreasonableness, ineffective or insufficient consideration of adverse effects, or lack of proportionality.
According to law, an appeal should be lodged before the EPRT within thirty days from the date of publication of the decision on the Department of Information website. In cases concerning appeals against decisions which do not need to be published, appeals shall be lodged before the EPRT within thirty days from the date of notification of the decision.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?
The EIA is not a permit or an authorisation. However, in accordance with regulation 34 of the EIA Regulations, aggrieved persons may file appeals before the EPRT to challenge a decision, act or omission related to any matter regulated under the EIA regulations, and furthermore, Article 47 of Chapter 551 may be invoked to challenge any decision relating to the EIA by appealing to the EPRT. According to this, any person may appeal any decision of the Environment and Resources Authority only in relation to environment assessments, access to environmental information and the prevention and remediation of environmental damage. This right of appeal to the EPRT shall be available to any party aggrieved by the decision without the need to prove its interest in the matter.

The final result of the EIA process is the publication of an EIA report which is to be taken into consideration in the decision-making process relating to the development consent or permit applied for. The development consent or permit is ultimately decided upon by the relevant permitting authority in Malta (which is the public authority responsible for issuing, refusing or otherwise regulating the development consent in question) e.g. the PA. Therefore if individuals and/or NGOs, including foreign NGOs, wish to challenge the EIA process as described above, they may resort to regulation 34 of the EIA Regulations. If the applicant, members of the public, NGOs or interested third parties wish to challenge the development consent or permit issued by the permitting authority, one must have regard to the legislation regulating the development process or regulating the permitting authority in question. For instance, in those cases where the permitting authority is the PA, Article 11(e) of Chapter 551 is applicable, which provides the opportunity for an appeal of the decision to the EPRT.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?
An action for judicial review of the legality of administrative action, decisions or omissions in the EIA process may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court (which is the court of first instance). Such an action would be based on Article 469A of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta, and must be filed within a period of six (6) months from the date when the interested person becomes aware or could have become aware of such an administrative act, whichever is the earlier.

The court may not initiate such proceedings on its own motion.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?
As stated above, an appeal to the EPRT from administrative decisions, acts or omissions must be filed within 30 days of publication or notification. An action for judicial review within the Civil Court must be filed within a period of six (6) months from the date when the interested person becomes aware or could have become aware of such an administrative act, whichever is the earlier.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Redress by means of judicial review is only available when ‘the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law.’ This means that the remedies of before the EPRT and an appeal against the EPRT’s decision to the Court of Appeal, if relevant, must have been availed of beforehand.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 7?
In order to have standing before the EPRT to appeal decisions of the ERA, no prior participation is formally required, however the Tribunal may consider the lack of participation in its decision. However in order to have standing before the EPRT to challenge certain decisions of the PA, prior participation in the form of registration as an interested third party is at times required. In terms of standing before the Civil Courts, no prior participation is required, but legal interest must be proved.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta states that the EPRT is to adhere to and apply the principles of good administrative behaviour and respect the parties’ right to a fair hearing, including the principles of natural justice, namely: (i) nemo judex in causa sua, and (ii) audi et alteram partem. The EPRT is to ensure procedural equality between the parties to the proceedings. Each party is to be given an opportunity to present its case, whether in writing or orally, or both, without being placed at a disadvantage. These principles are enshrined in the Maltese Constitution and observed by the courts.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta stipulates that the EPRT is to reach its decisions in a timely manner. However, in the case of appeals against decisions of the ERA to the EPRT, there are no time limits stipulated within which the EPRT must make its decision. There is no time limit stipulated at law within which the courts must make its judgment.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
With regard to appeals against decisions taken in the course of the EIA process, the effect of a decision shall not be suspended simply because an appeal has been lodged, unless the EPRT or the Court of Appeal, as the case may be, so orders. In the case of an appeal against the approval or partial approval of a potentially irreversible action or an action that may potentially be of significant damage to the environment, the approval may be suspended by the EPRT pending a final decision by the EPRT if the said EPRT deems that this would be in the interests of avoiding any likely significant or irreversible effects or implications on the environment or for similarly justified reasons. Injunctive relief must be requested by means of an application requesting suspension of the execution of the administrative environmental decision filed with the EPRT concurrently with the application for appeal or by means of an application for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction filed before the courts, as the case may be.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC
1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice
S. L. 549.77 Industrial Emissions (Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control) Regulations state that the competent authority shall ensure that practical information is made available to the public on administrative and judicial review procedures.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?
According to regulation 20 of S. L. 549.77 Industrial Emissions (Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control) Regulations, members of the public concerned having sufficient interest shall have access to a review procedure before the Environment and Planning Review Tribunal to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions subject to regulation.

An appeal may be lodged before the Tribunal within thirty days after a decision has been made on granting, reconsidering or updating of a permit.

For the purposes of these regulations, the interest of any non-governmental organisation promoting environmental protection and meeting any requirements under national law shall be deemed sufficient.
Moreover, Chapter 551 entitles all persons having sufficient interest to have access to a review procedure before the EPRT to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of any decision, act or omission relating to a development or an installation which is subject to an environmental impact assessment (EIA) or an integrated pollution prevention and control (IPPC) permit. A party may also file an action for judicial review challenging an administrative act within 6 months of the date of commission of the said act or omission, or within six months of when the party became aware of it – whichever is the earlier. In order to have standing, the party filing such an action must have sufficient interest. This has been interpreted widely by the Maltese Tribunal and the courts, in relation to NGOs with aims of safeguarding the environment. They are assumed to have sufficient interest. Individuals have to prove personal and direct interest.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There is no opportunity for public participation in the screening phase. However, members of the public concerned having sufficient interest shall have access to a review procedure described above to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions made at this stage.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The opportunity for public consultation is provided for during the permitting stage. This is explained in the answer to 1.7.4.2. Members of the public concerned having sufficient interest shall have access to the review procedure described above to challenge the substantive or procedural legality of decisions, acts or omissions made at this stage.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

As stated above, an appeal to the EPRT against administrative decisions, acts or omissions must be filed within 30 days of publication or notification. An action for judicial review must be filed within a period of six (6) months from the date when the interested person becomes aware or could have become aware of such an administrative act, whichever is the earlier.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

The public can challenge the final authorisation by means of an appeal filed before the EPRT within 30 days of publication of the decision or of its notification.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

An action for judicial review of the legality of administrative decisions (including environmental decisions) may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court which is the court of first instance. Such an action is based on Article 469A of Chapter 12. Administrative acts may be challenged when they are in violation of the Constitution, or when they emanate from a public authority that is not authorised to perform them, or when a public authority has failed to observe the principles of natural justice or mandatory procedural requirements in performing the administrative act or in its prior deliberations thereon, or when the administrative act constitutes an abuse of the public authority’s power in that it is done for improper purposes or on the basis of irrelevant considerations; or when the administrative act is otherwise contrary to law. An administrative act includes the issuing by a public authority of any order, licence, permit, warrant, decision, or a refusal of any demand from a claimant.

The court looks into the procedural legality of the act or omission which is being challenged. The court may annul the challenged act or omission and order redress or a remedy, however it may not substitute its discretion for that of the authority which committed the act or omission. The court may act on the advice of experts – appointed by the court itself or summoned as “ex parte” witnesses to assess the reasonableness or soundness of the act or omission which is being challenged, or the prior deliberations made thereon. However, this will only be done to see if the correct, legal procedures and level of care has been abided by, or otherwise. The court may not initiate such proceedings on its own motion.

8) At what stage are those challengeable?

An action for judicial review must be filed within a period of six months from the date when the interested person becomes aware or could have become aware of such an administrative act, whichever is the earlier.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Redress by means of judicial review is only available when ‘the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law.’

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., or meaning the requirement determined under point 9?

In order to have standing before the EPRT to appeal decisions of the ERA, no prior participation is required. However in order to have standing before the EPRT to challenge certain decisions of the PA, prior participation in the form of registration as an interested third party is at times required. In terms of standing before the Civil Courts, no prior participation is required, but legal interest must be proved.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta states that the EPRT is to adhere to and apply the principles of good administrative behaviour and respect the parties’ right to a fair hearing, including the principles of natural justice, namely: (i) nemo judex in causa sua, and (ii) audi alteram partem. The EPRT is to ensure procedural equality between the parties to the proceedings. Each party is to be given an opportunity to present its case, whether in writing or orally, or both, without being placed at a disadvantage. These principles are enshrined in the Maltese Constitution and observed by the courts.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Chapter 551 stipulates that the EPRT is to reach its decisions in a timely manner. As explained above (Answer to 1.7.1.2) there are time limits within which the EPRT should reach its decision, however these are not enforceable. There is no time limit stipulated by law within which the court must make its judgment. This leads to a situation whereby the appeal or court action becomes an exercise in futility, as if injunctive relief is not ordered by the EPRT or the court, the effects of the challenged decision become executable whilst the relative legal challenge is still ongoing.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

With regard to appeals against decisions taken in the course of granting a permit in the IPPC process, the effect of a decision shall not be suspended simply because an appeal has been lodged, unless the EPRT or the Court of Appeal, as the case may be, so orders.

In the case of an appeal against the approval or partial approval of a potentially irreversible action or an action that may potentially be of significant damage to the environment, the approval may be suspended by the Tribunal pending a final decision by the Tribunal if the said Tribunal deems that this would be in the interests of avoiding any likely significant or irreversible effects or implications on the environment or for similarly justified reasons. Injunctive relief must be requested by means of an application requesting suspension of the execution of the administrative environmental decision filed with the EPRT concurrently with the application for appeal before it, or by means of an application for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction filed before the courts, as the case may be.
14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
The Industrial Emissions (Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control) Regulations (S.L. 549.77) (Industrial Emissions (IPPC) Regulations) makes provision for information on access to justice as per response to question 1.7.4.2.

In the decision notices published by the ERA and uploaded to the ERA’s website, the possibilities of filing an appeal to that decision are included therein.
Furthermore, the decision notice sent to the applicant relating to environmental permits also includes a reference to the appeal procedure.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[6]
County-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
S.L. 549.97 Prevention and Remedying of Environmental Damage Regulations stipulate the remedies available to parties aggrieved by environmental damage or the imminent threat of such damage.

Regulation 13 states that natural or legal persons affected or likely to be affected by environmental damage, or having a sufficient interest in environmental decision-making relating to the damage, shall be entitled to submit to the competent authority (ERA) any observations relating to instances of environmental damage of which they are aware and shall be entitled to request the competent authority to take action under these regulations.

If the aggrieved party decides to challenge the ERA’s decision or lack thereof, then an appeal against that can be filed to the EPRT within thirty days from the date of publication of the decision on the Department of Information website by the Environment and Resources Authority or within thirty days from the date of notification of the decision in the case of decisions which do not need to be published. As this is a case where the decision is notified to the aggrieved party, the appeal must be lodged within 30 days of notification.

Once the EPRT has reached that decision, then the decision may be appealed against by lodging an appeal to the Court of Appeal within 20 days of the EPRT’s decision.

According to the Regulations, a person shall be deemed to have a sufficient interest if he has filed representations with regard to the issue of a permit, or if he qualifies as a consultee or an identified stakeholder under the provisions of the Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations.

Any non-governmental organisation promoting environmental protection shall be deemed to have sufficient interest for this purpose.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
If the aggrieved party decides to challenge the ERA’s decision or lack thereof, then an appeal against that can be filed to the EPRT within thirty days from the date of publication of the decision on the Department of Information website by the Environment and Resources Authority or within thirty days from the date of notification of the decision in the case of decisions which do not need to be published. As this is a case where the decision is notified to the aggrieved party, the appeal must be lodged within 30 days of notification.

Once the EPRT has reached that decision, then the decision may be appealed against by lodging an appeal to the Court of Appeal within 20 days of the EPRT’s decision.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
According to S.L. 549.97 Prevention and Remedying of Environmental Damage Regulations, natural or legal persons affected or likely to be affected by environmental damage, or having a sufficient interest in environmental decision-making relating to the damage, shall be entitled to submit to the competent authority any observations relating to instances of environmental damage of which they are aware and shall be entitled to request the competent authority to take action under these regulations.

Regulation 13(3) states that the request for action shall be accompanied by the relevant information and data supporting the observations submitted in relation to the environmental damage in question. Apart from the requirement of relevance there are no criteria set for the kind of information to be submitted.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
Although the request for action and the accompanying observations must show in a plausible manner that environmental damage exists, the regulations do not stipulate any criteria regarding “plausibility”, however such damage must fall within the definition of ‘environmental damage’ as contained in S.L. 549.97.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
S.L. 549.97 Prevention and Remedying of Environmental Damage Regulations simply stipulate that the competent authority shall, as soon as possible, inform the person(s) who submitted observations to the authority of its decision to accede to or refuse the request for action and shall provide the reasons for it. However, there is no indication as to the time limits within which the competent authority must make the notification.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
Under regulation 13 of S.L. 549.97, requests for action can be made for environmental damage caused by any of the occupational activities listed therein, and for any imminent threat of such damage occurring by reason of any of those activities.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
The competent authority in this case is the ERA.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
An action for judicial review of the legality of administrative action (including environmental decisions) may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court which is the court of first instance. Such an action is based on Article 468A of Chapter 12. However, this only available when the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law. Therefore, all other legal avenues including administrative review procedures, must have been exhausted before restoring to an action for judicial review.

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases
1) Rules on涉及other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
The Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations (Subsidiary Legislation 549.46) provide for transboundary consultations through Part VII of the said legislation. Where the Minister responsible for the environment is aware that a project in Malta is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another State, or where a State likely to be significantly affected so requests, the Minister shall notify the affected State as soon as possible and no later than when the Maltese public is informed, and shall include the following information within the notification:
information on the project and its location together with the available information on the possible transboundary impacts;
information on the nature of the possible decisions any other information which the Minister deems reasonable

The Minister shall also give the interested State thirty calendar days within which to indicate whether it wishes to participate in the environmental decision-making procedures, including the development consent procedure, the environmental impact assessment and/or scoping, as the case may be.
If another State considers that the environment under its jurisdiction is likely to be adversely affected by a project which is proposed to be carried out in Malta and which is within the scope of the EIA regulations, but no notification has taken place in accordance with the above, the Minister shall, at the request of that State, exchange sufficient information for the purpose of holding discussions on whether there is likely to be a significant adverse transboundary impact. If the interested State indicates to the Minister that it intends to participate in such consultation procedures, the Minister shall send to that State the required information as laid down in these regulations and, once it is submitted to the Environment and Resources Authority, the EIA report.

The interested State may enter into consultations with the Minister concerning, inter alia:

- the potential transboundary effects of the project;
- possible alternatives to the project, including the no-action alternative where relevant;
- measures to prevent, reduce, eliminate or offset any significant transboundary impacts;
- monitoring of the effects of such measures, and of the project;
- possible mutual assistance in preventing, reducing, eliminating or offsetting any significant adverse impact of the project; and
- any other appropriate matters as relevant to the project.

To this effect, the interested State shall agree with the Minister on a reasonable time-frame for the consultation period, taking into account the nature, scale and characteristics of the proposed project and its location. The interested State shall also promptly provide the Minister with information relating to the environment under its jurisdiction which may potentially be adversely affected, where such information is necessary or relevant for the assessment.

The interested State may arrange for the information to be made available, within a reasonable time, to the relevant authorities and the public in its territory such that they can forward their opinion within a reasonable time and participate effectively in the relevant environmental decision-making procedures before any consent for the project is granted. The interested State shall forward its opinion to the Minister within the timeframe established by the Regulations, who shall in turn forward the opinion to the ERA.

The Minister shall provide to the interested State information about the final decision on the proposed project and the reasons and considerations on which the decision was based, together with the terms and conditions attached to the decision and information about the public participation process. The interested State may make such information available in an appropriate manner to the public concerned in its own territory.

If additional information on the significant transboundary impact of a project proposed in Malta, which was not available at the time a decision was made and which could have materially affected the decision, becomes available to the Minister or to an interested State before work on the project commences, the Minister shall immediately inform the interested State and vice-versa, as relevant. In such cases any one or both parties may request that consultations be held on whether the decision needs to be revised.

Where the monitoring of a project or any other post-project analysis reveals significant adverse transboundary impacts or any factors that may result in such impacts, the Minister shall immediately inform the interested State or vice-versa, as relevant. Both parties shall then enter into consultations on the measures that should be undertaken to prevent, reduce, eliminate or offset such impact, including any mutual assistance to this effect.

The transmission of information to the interested State, and the receipt of information by such State, shall be subject to the limitations contained in any law in force in Malta.

Regulation 26 of the EIA Regulations then regulates the consultation procedure when a project occurring in another State may have potential transboundary impacts on Malta.

Regulation 27 of the EIA Regulations caters for the situation where a project or combination of projects not listed in Schedule I of the EIA Regulations (or in the respective legislative of that State) is likely to cause a significant adverse transboundary impact. In such cases, the Minister responsible for the environment in Malta may, acting on the advice of ERA, enter into discussions with such State, and the above provisions may thereby be applicable. The Strategic Environmental Assessment Regulations (S.L 549.61) also provide for transboundary consultations through regulation 8, which states that:

Where the responsible authority considers that the implementation of a plan or programme being prepared in relation to its territory is likely to have significant effects on the environment in another Member State, or where a Member State likely to be significantly affected so requests, the Member State in whose territory the plan or programme is being prepared shall, before its adoption or submission to the legislative procedure, forward a copy of the draft plan or programme and the relevant environmental report to the other Member State at the earliest stage possible.

The Prevention and Remedy of Environmental Damages Regulations (Subsidiary Legislation 549.97) also contain provisions concerning transboundary environmental damage where the environmental damage affects or is likely to affect other EU Member States. If environmental damage has occurred, Malta would need to provide sufficient information to the potentially affected EU Member States.

2) Notion of public concerned?

The notion of public concerned in a transboundary context is the same as for nationals, any person whether legal or natural, and environmental NGOs. There is no specific list of cases where individuals or NGOs could choose between courts of different countries. The choice would depend on the outcome of the courts taking cognisance of the case.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

The principle of non-discrimination is applicable, and NGOs of affected countries which are registered in the EU have standing in the same way in which local NGOs have standing. No form of procedural assistance is available to either local or foreign NGOs.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Unless it is specifically stated in the applicable law, as in the case of access to environmental information, EIA and IPPC legislation, there is no right of access to justice for individuals who do not have a direct interest. This is equally applicable to individuals of affected countries.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

The affected State is to be provided with the information as soon as possible and no later than when the Maltese public is informed.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?

There is a 30-day consultation period covering the Terms of Reference of the EIA and another 30-day period for consultation on the EIA Report.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Information regarding the public consultation exercise, consultation periods, the draft terms of reference for the EIA, assessments and the final EIA report are published on the ERA website. NGOs, local councils and other stakeholders are usually notified by electronic mail. There is no specific reference to modes of challenging the EIA process in any notification sent.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

The information is published in English and there is no provision for its translation or interpretation to foreign participants.

9) Any other relevant rules?

There are no other relevant rules.
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Decisions, acts, and omissions falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation but outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives may be challenged by means of two different legal avenues depending on which entity made the said decisions, acts or omissions.

Appeal against decisions made by ERA

The ERA is the competent authority which would be expected to make a good number of this sort of decisions or to issue regulations, orders or authorisations falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation. With regard to these types of decision taken by the ERA, an appeal procedure is provided for by Article 47 of Chapter 551.

This states that any aggrieved party may appeal against decisions of the ERA to the EPRT in accordance with the provisions of the Environment Protection Act and any regulations pursuant to it, and any person may appeal any decision of the Environment and Resources Authority only in relation to environmental assessments, access to environmental information and the prevention and remediation of environmental damage.

The above would indicate that any of the ERA’s decisions made in accordance with the Environment Protection Act or any regulations pursuant to it could be appealed against by an aggrieved party such as the applicant who has been denied a nature permit or a third party who would have objected to the issue of the said nature permit by ERA. The second limb of this provision of law allows an appeal by any person in relation to the three spheres listed therein.

An appeal to the EPRT may be filed on any ground including:

- that a material error as to the facts has been made;
- that an error of law has been made;
- that there was a material procedural error;
- that there was some material illegality, unreasonableness, ineffective or insufficient consideration of adverse effects, or lack of proportionality.

The lack of adherence to EU environmental legislation may be considered as a material procedural error or an error of law and can therefore be a ground for appeal under this provision.

It should be noted that the definition of a person under this law includes an association or body of persons, whether registered as a legal person or not. This concurs with the definition of a person under Chapter 549 of the Laws of Malta (the Environment Protection Act) which defines a “person” as a body or other association of persons, whether granted legal personality or not, and includes environmental voluntary organisations. Consequently, both individuals and associations who feel they have been affected by the decision may appeal. Appellants need not prove an interest in that appeal in terms of the doctrine of juridical interest, but are required to submit reasoned grounds based on environmental considerations to justify their appeal.

With regard to the time limits involved in order to file this appeal, an appeal should be lodged before the EPRT within 30 days from the date of publication of the decision on the Department of Information website by the ERA. Appeals against decisions which do not need to be published are to be lodged before the EPRT within 30 days from the date of notification of the decision. At present, ERA decisions are not published on the website of the Department of Information. There is no official regular system of notification of decisions, orders or authorisations made by the ERA to interested third parties, so it is not clear when the period within which to appeal lapses. Presumably the 30-day period starts from the date on which the interested third party became aware of the decision.

An appeal against the decision of the EPRT may be made to the Court of Appeal only on a point of law. This appeal must be lodged within 20 days of the EPRT reading its decision in public.

Decisions taken by other entities

If the decision to be challenged emanates from an entity other than ERA, such as a ministry or a department of government, recourse may be had by filing an action for judicial review as described below. Such an action must be instituted within 6 months from the date of the decision which is to be challenged, or from when the person filing the action could have been aware of such a decision, whichever is the earlier.

The effectiveness of access to the national courts is questionable mainly because of the limited chances of obtaining interim relief (as explained elsewhere in this fact sheet) and because of the extremely long period of time within which the national courts reach their decisions. It is not uncommon for a case for judicial review to be decided upon after 6 to 7 years, after which period, the whole point of the lawsuit would have become a purely academic exercise. A case in point is the action for judicial review in relation to the extension of the building development zones in Malta. A lawsuit requesting judicial review was filed by a local eNGO in 2007 and no judgment has been reached after 13 years. Bearing in mind that judgment is still pending before the court of first instance. Such an action is based on Article 469A of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

An appeal for administrative review before the EPRT may be filed on a wide number of grounds as explained above. These cover both procedural and substantive legality of the decision which is to be challenged.

An action for judicial review of the legality of administrative action (including environmental decisions) may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court which is the court of first instance.
Administrative acts may be challenged where they are in violation of the Constitution, or when they emanate from a public authority that is not authorised to perform them, or when a public authority has failed to observe the principles of natural justice (i.e. ‘nemo iudex in causa propria’ and ‘audi alteram partem’) or mandatory procedural requirements in performing the administrative act or in its prior deliberations thereon, or when the administrative act constitutes an abuse of the public authority’s power in that it is done for improper purposes or on the basis of irrelevant considerations; or when the administrative act is otherwise contrary to law. An administrative act includes the issuing by a public authority of any order, licence, permit, warrant, decision, or a refusal of any demand from a claimant.

The court looks into the legality of the act or omission which is being challenged. The court may annul the challenged act or omission and order redress or a remedy, however it may not substitute its discretion for that of the authority which committed the act or omission.

During the course of the hearing of the action for judicial review before the First Hall of the Civil Court, a request for a preliminary reference may be made as per Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU (TFEU) requesting the European Court of Justice to rule on the conformity of the national provision with EU law. However, only a court of last instance is obliged to make the request if it deems it necessary. Consequently, the court of first instance may turn down the request for a reference, in which case the preliminary reference may be requested during appeal procedures before the Court of Appeal. Another possible mode of judicial review would be a lawsuit filed on the grounds of the alleged violation of one’s fundamental human rights such as the right to a fair hearing within a reasonable time. The right to a fair hearing would be invoked to include applicability of the Aarhus Convention and other applicable EU norms on public participation requirements. The right to life could also be invoked to include the right to a safe and healthy environment, invoking the non-conformity of the measures sought to be challenged with Article 37 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights which requires a high level of environmental protection and improvement of the quality of the environment.

A person filing such an action must show a direct and personal juridical interest, in that the alleged or potential breach of human rights must be done “in relation to him”.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Redress by means of judicial review is only available when ‘the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law.’ This means that if there is an alternative mode of redress, this must have been resorted to before filing an action for judicial review.

When filing a constitutional case, one should have exhausted alternative remedies. However, the Constitutional Court has discretion on this matter and may choose to retain jurisdiction if the alternative remedies are not accessible, adequate and effective.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Parties may only avail themselves of the action for judicial review if they have exhausted all other remedies. The other remedy which parties must have exhausted is that of appeal. The filing of an appeal is open to all persons aggrieved by a decision – not necessarily those who participated in the administrative procedure. Consequently, it may be stated that prior participation is not a necessary requisite.

Moreover, as there are instances when there is no public consultation phase during the course of an administrative procedure, then prior participation would not have been possible. This would not be a bar to filing an action for judicial review.

There may also be cases where no appeal procedure is available (as would be the case when the administrative decision being challenged is being taken by a public authority other than ERA and/or a minister) and consequently the action for judicial review would be the only remedy available. In this case, the issue of prior participation would not arise.

In order to have standing before the EPRT to challenge certain decisions of the PA, prior participation in the form of registration as an interested third party is at times required.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

The grounds for judicial review are listed in the response to 2.2 above. They are wide-ranging – especially in view of the fact that an administrative act which is contrary to law may be challenged. This broad provision may be interpreted to mean that an administrative act which is contrary to European legislation may be challenged.

6) Fair, equitable – what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Chapter 551 of the Laws of Malta states that the EPRT is to adhere to and apply the principles of good administrative behaviour and respect the parties’ right to a fair hearing, including the principles of natural justice, namely: (i) nemo iudex in causa sua, and (ii) audi alteram partem. The EPRT is to ensure procedural equality between the parties to the proceedings. Each party is to be given an opportunity to present its case, whether in writing or orally, or both, without being placed at a disadvantage. These principles are enshrined in the Maltese Constitution and observed by the courts. There is a body of case-law relating to the equality of arms principle which has been developed across different branches of law.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

When an appeal against a decision of the ERA is filed before the EPRT, there are no deadlines stipulated for the date within which the EPRT must reach its decision. Nor is there any indication as to when the EPRT must decide upon the application for suspension of the execution of the permit, authorisation or decision which is being challenged.

There is no time limit or deadline within which the courts of law must reach their decision – which is one of the greatest obstacles to effective access to justice.

Appellants whose appeals have languished before the EPRT or the national courts for an inordinate amount of time may opt to file a lawsuit claiming that their constitutional right to have their case decided within a reasonable amount of time has been breached. However, this involves further costs in terms of financial outlay and professional resources – costs which may not easily be borne by NGOs which are not provided with legal aid.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief may be obtained by filing of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction requesting the court to restrain a person from doing anything which might be prejudicial to the person requesting the warrant. The court shall not issue any such warrant unless it is satisfied that such a warrant is necessary in order to preserve a right of the person requesting the warrant, and that prima facie this person appears to possess such a right. The Maltese courts also place great importance on the irremediable nature of the action which is sought to be prevented – or that it cannot be compensated for in a pecuniary manner. This is a very high standard of proof to overcome – as theoretically every form of action and/or decision can be reversed.

The court must also be satisfied, after hearing the explanations given, that unless the warrant is issued the prejudice that would be caused to the person requesting the warrant would be disproportionate when compared with the actual doing of the thing to be restrained.

If the court accedes to the request for the issuance of a warrant of prohibitory injunction, the claimant must file a lawsuit within twenty day in furtherance of the claims made. In this case, the lawsuit would be the action requesting judicial review. There are no special sector rules which are applicable.
9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The filing of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the Civil Courts costs 250 to 300 euros in Court Registry fees (depending on the number of parties which have to be notified).

The fees payable to the legal practitioners (lawyer and legal procurator) for drafting and filing the relevant application have to be added to this amount. Although there is an official tariff for these professional fees specified by law, this does not make reference to extra-judicial fees. These may be significant.

The application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction must be followed by the filing of a lawsuit for judicial review. The Court Registry fee for this ranges from 200 to 500 euros. There are further costs involved in the summoning of witnesses and for any expert witness summoned.

The court apportions the payment of costs, with the losing party usually being ordered to pay the costs. If there are several parties to the lawsuit, the payment of costs can be significant and run into several thousands of euros.

There is no statutory reference requiring costs not to be prohibitive. This is an obstacle which NGOs and individuals in Malta face when seeking access to environmental justice. Moreover, parties filing for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction may be required to provide a guarantee or security to cover the costs in the event of them losing the case. Again, this poses an obstacle to NGOs and individuals who are parties in this sort of public interest litigation.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[8]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The Strategic Environmental Assessment Regulations, 2010 (Legal Notice 497 of 2010, S.L. 549.61), streamline the SEA process in Malta.

According to the regulations, plan proponents in the public sector are responsible for carrying out a SEA of their plans and programmes and are legally referred to as “responsible authorities.” In their capacity as plan proponents, they determine whether an SEA is required for their own plans and programmes in accordance with the provisions of S.L. 549.61.

The regulations stipulate that the SEA Focal Point is the competent authority for the purposes of the regulations. The SEA Focal Point is composed of a chairperson and two other members. The competent authority may request the responsible authority to submit a detailed plan or programme description identifying the effects on the environment. The competent authority may then take a decision as to whether a SEA is required. This decision is final.

The regulations stipulate that they should not be construed as implying that the competent authority shall be responsible for the carrying out of any SEA and that any SEA which is required shall fall under the responsible authority.

There is no provision for administrative redress if any person wants to challenge an act or omission in the SEA process. A legal challenge requesting judicial review in accordance with Article 469A of the Civil Code may be filed before the First Hall of the Civil Court.

An action for judicial review may be filed to challenge administrative acts which are in violation of the Constitution, or which emanate from a public authority which is not authorised to perform them, or when a public authority has failed to observe the principles of natural justice or mandatory procedural requirements in performing the administrative act or in its prior deliberations thereon, or when the administrative act constitutes an abuse of the public authority’s power in that it is done for improper purposes or on the basis of irrelevant considerations; or when the administrative act is otherwise contrary to law.

An administrative act includes the issuing by a public authority of any order, licence, permit, warrant, decision, or a refusal of any demand from a claimant. In the SEA scenario, an action for judicial review could be filed against the responsible authority (the proponent entity), the competent authority (the SEA Focal Point) and any other authorities which have been involved in the process.

An action for judicial review must be filed within six months of the decision or action being challenged or within six months from when the person could have become aware of it, whichever is the earlier.

In the scenario where the responsible authority does not provide information as to whether a SEA is going to be carried out or not, persons can challenge the omission to do so. There is no time limit prescribed by law within which the responsible authority must decide whether to carry out a SEA or not. Article 469A of the Civil Code states that the absence of a decision of a public authority following a claimant’s written demand served upon it shall, after two months from such service, constitute a refusal. In these circumstances, a person may first file a judicial protest calling upon the responsible authority to take a decision regarding the carrying out of a SEA. If there is no response within two months, that will be deemed to be a refusal and may be challenged within six months from the presumed refusal.

NGOs with an interest in upholding environmental objectives are considered to have sufficient interest to file actions for judicial review. Individuals are required to have a direct juridical interest.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

When an action for judicial review is filed, the court looks into the procedural legality of the act or omission which is being challenged. The court may annul the challenged act or omission and order redress or a remedy, however it may not substitute its discretion for that of the authority which committed the act or omission.

During the course of the hearing of the action for judicial review before the First Hall of the Civil Court, a request for a preliminary reference may be made as per Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU (TFEU) requesting the European Court of Justice to rule on the conformity of the national provision with EU law. However only a court of last instance is obliged to make the request if it deems it necessary. Consequently the court of first instance may turn down the request for a reference, in which case the preliminary reference may be requested during appeal procedures before the Court of Appeal.

Another possible mode of judicial review would be a lawsuit filed on the grounds of the alleged breach of the Constitutional rights such as the right to a fair hearing within a reasonable time. The right to a fair hearing would be invoked to include applicability of the Aarhus Convention and other applicable EU norms on public participation requirements. The right to life would be invoked to include the right to a safe and healthy environment, invoking the non-conformity of the measures to be challenged with Article 37 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, which requires a high level of environmental protection and improvement of the quality of the environment[7]. A person filing such an action must show a direct and personal juridical interest, in that the alleged or potential breach of human rights must be done “in relation to him”[8].

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Redress by means of judicial review is only available when ‘the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law.’

When filing a constitutional case one should have exhausted alternative remedies. However the Constitutional Court has discretion on this matter and may choose to retain jurisdiction if the alternative remedies are not accessible, adequate and effective[9].
4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Persons and NGOs upholding environmental objectives are considered to have standing to file an action for judicial review and there is no set requirement for prior consultation during the administrative phase. Moreover, in cases where the responsible authority omits or refuses to carry out an SEA, there would have been no provision for previous participation.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

Injunctive relief may be obtained by filing a warrant of prohibitory injunction requesting the court to restrain a person from doing anything which might be prejudicial to the person requesting the warrant.

The court shall not issue any such warrant unless it is satisfied that such warrant is necessary in order to preserve a right of the person requesting the warrant, and that prima facie this person appears to possess such a right.

The court must also be satisfied, after hearing the explanations given, that unless the warrant is issued the prejudice that would be caused to the person suing out the warrant would be disproportionate when compared with the actual doing of the thing to be restrained.

If the court accedes to the request for the issuance of a warrant of prohibitory injunction, the claimant must file a lawsuit within twenty days in furtherance of the claims made. In this case, the lawsuit would be the action requesting judicial review.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The filing of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the Civil Courts costs 250 to 300 euros in Court Registry fees (depending on the number of parties which have to be notified).

The fees payable to the legal practitioners (lawyer and legal procurator) for drafting and filing the relevant application have to be added to this amount. Although there is an official tariff for these professional fees specified by law, this does not make reference to extra-judicial fees. These may be significant.

The application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction must be followed by the filing of a lawsuit for judicial review. The Court Registry fee for this ranges from 200 to 500 euros. There are further costs involved in the summoning of witnesses and for any expert witness summoned.

The court apportions the payment of costs, with the losing party usually being ordered to pay the costs. If there are several parties to the lawsuit, the payment of costs can be significant and run into several thousands of euros.

There is no statutory reference requiring costs not to be prohibitive. This is an obstacle which NGOs and individuals in Malta face when seeking access to environmental justice.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[10]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The plans and programmes not necessarily subject to the procedures in the SEA but which are still subject to public consultation procedures include the following:

The National Strategy for the Environment - a strategic governance document which sets the policy framework for the preparation of plans, policies and programmes issued under the Environmental Protection Act (Chapter 549 of the Laws of Malta) or under any other Act for the protection and sustainable management of the environment, including land and sea resources. In preparing or reviewing the National Strategy for the Environment, the Minister for the Environment shall have regard to:

- the environmental policies and the State of the Environment Report;
- the current economic and financial policies;
- the current social policies;
- the policies of the Government;
- the environmental issues and concerns of material relevance to the strategy;
- the resources likely to be available in all relevant government entities for the implementation of the strategy; and
- the European Union environmental acquis and other international environmental convention obligations to which Malta is a party.

The ERA prepares the National Strategy for the Environment after consulting with relevant entities, whether public or otherwise. During the preparation or review of the National Strategy for the Environment, the Minister shall make known to the public the matters intended for consideration and shall provide adequate opportunities for individuals and organisations to make representations. When the National Strategy for the Environment or a review thereof has been completed, the Minister shall publish the strategy together with a statement of the representations received and the responses made to those representations. Representations on the strategy are to be submitted within a specified period of not less than six weeks. At the conclusion of these consultation procedures, the National Strategy for the Environment shall be considered by the Cabinet of Ministers together with the position statement from the Environment Minister and the representations made with respect to the strategy or its review. The National Strategy for the Environment, or its revision, together with the Minister's position statement, is then to be laid before Parliament for its approval.

Public consultation is also carried out on any draft regulations issued by the Minister for the Environment under Chapter 549, as laid down in Article 55. There is a similar public consultation procedure for the enactment of subsidiary plans and policies relating to the environment, provided for by Article 51 of the Environmental Protection Act. There is a six-week consultation period during the preparation of such plans and policies or when they are altered significantly.

The Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations (Subsidiary Legislation 549.41) provide for public participation in respect of the drawing up of certain plans and programmes relating to the environment. The Regulations state that the ERA is the competent authority to ensure that the public is given early and effective opportunities to participate in the preparation and modification or review of the plans or programmes required to be drawn up under certain provisions of:

The Waste Management (Waste Batteries and Accumulators) Regulations S.L. 549.54.

The Protection of Waters against Pollution caused by Nitrates from Agricultural Sources Regulations. S.L. 549.25

The Ambient Air Quality Regulations. S.L 549.59
The ERA is to ensure that a public information and participation mechanism is in place as outlined by the Regulations to inform the public of the decisions taken and the reasons and considerations upon which those decisions are based, including information about the public participation process. As regards the possibility for administrative review of the abovementioned procedures, Article 63 of Chapter 549 states that any aggrieved party may appeal against any decision of the Authority to the EPRT in accordance with the provisions of the EPRT Act and any regulations pursuant to it. Article 47 of Chapter 551 allows for appeals by any aggrieved party, and any person may appeal a decision of ERA insofar as environmental impact assessments, access to information and prevention and remedying of environmental damage are concerned. Such an appeal would not require proof of juridical interest. An action for judicial review may be filed under Article 469A of Chapter 12.

With regard to the issue of standing, although notionally the requirement of a juridical interest still exists, this is no longer interpreted restrictively by the courts. Recent jurisprudence has seen NGOs being assumed to have the necessary juridical interest and "locus standi". Following the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case instituted by the Ramblers of Malta enGO[11], it is widely accepted that NGOs have legal standing. It is still not clear whether an individual would always be considered to possess the necessary juridical interest to pose such a challenge.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

In judicial review procedures, administrative acts may be challenged where they are in violation of the Constitution, or when they emanate from a public authority that is not authorised to perform them, or when a public authority has failed to observe the principles of natural justice or mandatory procedural requirements in performing the administrative act or in its prior deliberations thereon, or when the administrative act constitutes an abuse of the public authority’s power in that it is done for improper purposes or on the basis of irrelevant considerations; or when the administrative act is otherwise contrary to law (including EU law).

During the course of the hearing of the action for judicial review before the First Hall of the Civil Court, a request for a preliminary reference may be made as per Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU (TFEU) requesting the European Court of Justice to rule on the conformity of the national provision with EU law. However, only a court of last instance is obliged to make the request if it deems it necessary. Consequently, the court of first instance may turn down the request for a reference, in which case the preliminary reference may be requested during appeal procedures before the Court of Appeal. Another possible mode of judicial review would be a lawsuit filed on the grounds of the alleged breach of the Constitutional rights such as the right to a fair hearing within a reasonable time. The right to a fair hearing would be invoked to include applicability of the Aarhus Convention and other applicable EU norms on public participation requirements. The right to life would be invoked to include the right to a safe and healthy environment, invoking the non-conformity of the measures to be challenged with Article 37 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, which requires a high level of environmental protection and improvement of the quality of the environment[12]. A person filing such an action must show direct and personal juridical interest, in that the alleged or potential breach of human rights must be done "in relation to him"[13].

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Redress by means of judicial review is only available when the mode of contestation or of obtaining redress, with respect to any particular administrative act before a court or tribunal is not provided for in any other law. When filing a constitutional case one should have exhausted alternative remedies. However the Constitutional Court has discretion on this matter and may choose to retain jurisdiction if the alternative remedies are not accessible, adequate and effective[14].

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure — to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Although there is no form of administrative review procedure statutorily available to challenge acts or omissions of authorities during the processes laid down in the Environmental Protection Act or the Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations, there is provision for public consultation and participation as described above. As parties may only avail themselves of the action for judicial review if they have exhausted all other remedies, it may be argued that the lack of participation during the public consultation phase would exclude the possibility of judicial review.

However, judicial review may also be sought in cases where the responsible authority refuses to carry out a public consultation exercise or because of procedural irregularities pertaining to the public consultation exercise. In these cases, it is presumed that that judicial review would still be possible.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no express statutory provisions or mechanisms for obtaining injunctive relief during the process laid down in the Environmental Protection Act or the Plans and Programmes (Public Participation) Regulations. There is only the general national provision for filing for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction and, according to Chapter 551, one may request suspension of the appealed decision before the EPRT pending the outcome of the case as discussed in other parts of this sheet.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The filing of an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the Civil Courts costs 250 to 300 euros in Court Registry fees (depending on the number of parties which have to be notified).

The fees payable to the legal practitioners (lawyer and legal procurator) for drafting and filing the relevant application have to be added to this amount. Although there is an official tariff for these professional fees specified by law, this does not make reference to extra-judicial fees. These may be significant. The application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction must be followed by the filing of a lawsuit. The Court Registry fee for this ranges from 200 to 500 euros. Legal and technical counsel also has to be paid. There are further costs involved in the summoning of witnesses and for any expert witness summoned. If witnesses or parties cannot be notified in the usual fashion, this would require the publication of the notification requests in local newspapers and the Government Gazette, which are further costs to be borne by the plaintiffs. The court apportions the payment of costs, with the losing party usually being ordered to pay the costs. If there are several parties to the lawsuit, the payment of costs can be significant and run into several thousands of euros.

There is no statutory reference requiring costs not to be prohibitive. This is an obstacle which NGOs and individuals in Malta face when seeking access to environmental justice. Moreover parties filing for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction may be required to provide a guarantee or security to cover the costs in the event of them losing the case. Again, this poses an obstacle to NGOs and individuals who are parties to this sort of public interest litigation.

14. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[16]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The following are all examples of national legislation required by EU Directives and which require the drawing up of plans and programmes:
The Assessment and Management of Environmental Noise Regulations (S.L. 549.37) – require the drawing up of an action plan. The flora, Fauna and Natural Habitats Protection Regulations (S.L. 549.77) – provide for the drawing up of management plans and appropriate action for the conservation of protected habitats and species.

The Ambient Air Quality Regulations (S.L. 549.59) – provide for the drawing up of an Air Quality Action Plan.

The Waste Regulations (S.L. 549.63) – provide for the drawing up of Waste Management Plans.

The Water Policy Framework Regulations (S.L. 549.100) – provide for the drawing up of Water Catchment Management Plans.

All the above regulations include provisions allowing for information dissemination and public participation procedures during the drawing up of the relevant plans.

The only form of administrative review which can be envisaged in this case is an appeal against a decision of the competent authority (ERA) made in the course of the public consultation exercise or the preparatory exercise leading to the publication of the plan and not of the contents of the plan itself.

Article 63 of Chapter 549 states that any aggrieved party may appeal against any decision of the Authority to the EPRT in accordance with the provisions of the EPRT Act and any regulations pursuant to it. Article 47 of Chapter 551 allows for appeals by any aggrieved party, and also specifies that any person may appeal any decision of the Environment and Resources Authority only in relation to environment assessments, access to environmental information and the prevention and remediation of environmental damage.

An appeal to the EPRT may be filed on any ground including:
that a material error as to the facts has been made;
that there was a material procedural error;
that an error of law has been made;
that there was some material illegality, unreasonableness, ineffective or insufficient consideration of adverse effects, or lack of proportionality.

According to law, an appeal should be lodged before the EPRT within thirty days from the date of publication of the decision on the Department of Information website. In cases regarding appeals against decisions which do not need to be published, the appeal shall be lodged before the EPRT within thirty days from the date of notification of the decision. It is not clear when this time period starts when there is no provision for publication or notification of the decision. Any persons, including NGOs, have standing without the need to prove juridical interest. There is an appeal against the decision of the EPRT to the Court of Appeal which must be filed within 20 days of the date of the decision from the EPRT.

There is no form of judicial review procedure possible for the contents of the published plan which has the same status as a legislative act.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?
As the plan or programme constitutes an instrument having the force of law there is no judicial avenue to challenge its contents.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The scope of possible administrative review of the preparatory exercise leading to the enactment of plans and programmes is described above. There is no possibility of judicial review of the published plan or programme.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
Judicial review is not applicable.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
Judicial review is not applicable.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
Judicial review is not applicable.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[16]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

If the executive regulations or legally binding instruments take the form of legislation there is no possibility of administrative review or judicial review according to Article 469A of Chapter 12 of the Laws of Malta, as these remedies are reserved for administrative acts as defined therein.

Each executive regulation/legislation could possibly be challenged by filing an action alleging breach of fundamental human rights, or in terms of Article 46 of the Constitution. In this case, both individuals and NGOs filing the action would have to prove that the alleged breach was being done in relation to them.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
The Constitutional Court deciding on an action regarding an alleged breach of human rights would consider both the procedural and substantive legality of the claim.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
When filing a constitutional case, one should have exhausted alternative remedies. However the Constitutional Court has discretion on this matter and may choose to retain jurisdiction if the alternative remedies are not accessible, adequate and effective.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
When filing a Constitutional case, one would have ideally exhausted all other remedies. However, when claiming a breach of human rights, the issue of prior participation does not arise.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Injunctive relief may be applied for by filing an application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction in the Civil Courts. This costs 250 to 300 euros in Court Registry fees (depending on the number of parties which have to be notified).
The fees payable to the legal practitioners (lawyer and legal procurator) for drafting and filing the relative application have to be added to this amount. Although there is an official tariff for these professional fees specified by law, this does not make reference to extra-judicial fees. These may be significant. The application for a warrant of prohibitory injunction must be followed by the filing of a lawsuit. The Court Registry fee for this ranges from 200 to 500 euros. Legal and technical counsel also has to be paid. There are further costs involved in the summoning of witnesses and for any expert witness summoned. If witnesses or parties cannot be notified in the usual fashion, this would require the publication of the notification requests in local newspapers and the Government Gazette, which are further costs to be borne by the plaintiffs.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The costs involved are indicated above. The court apportions the payment of costs, with the losing party usually being ordered to pay the costs. If there are several parties to the lawsuit, the payment of costs can be significant and run into several thousands of euros.

There is no statutory reference requiring costs not to be prohibitive. This is an obstacle which NGOs and individuals in Malta face when seeking access to environmental justice. Moreover, parties filing for the issue of a warrant of prohibitory injunction may be required to provide a guarantee or security to cover the costs in the event of them losing the case. Again, this poses an obstacle to NGOs and individuals who are parties to this sort of public interest litigation.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[17]

There is no legal procedure providing for such a challenge. A party may request a preliminary reference to the CJEU at any stage of the proceedings in line with Article 267 of the TFEU, which is applicable in Malta under Chapter 460. The procedure is also regulated by Article 21 of the Court Practice and Procedure and Good Order Regulations (S.L. 12.09).

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-684/14, the Slovak brown bear Case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[3] In Cecil Herbert Jones vs Attorney General (Application no. 95/2018) decided on 15 February 2019, the First Hall of the Civil Court acting in its Constitutional jurisdiction stated that the Charter of Fundamental Rights is based on the principle of direct effect and national courts are obliged to interpret national measures in conformity with the Charter whenever they come within the scope of EU law. The judgment was not appealed.
[5] These principles were enunciated in Ryan Briffa –v– Attorney General decided on 14 March 2014.
[6] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.
[7] In Cecil Herbert Jones vs Attorney General (Application no. 95/2018) decided on 15 February 2019, the First Hall of the Civil Court acting in its Constitutional jurisdiction stated that the Charter of Fundamental Rights is based on the principle of direct effect and national courts are obliged to interpret national measures in conformity with the Charter whenever they come within the scope of EU law. The judgment was not appealed.
[9] These principles were enunciated in Ryan Briffa –v– Attorney General decided on 14 March 2014.
[10] See findings under ACCCI/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.
[11] 228/2010, Is-Socjeta' The Ramblers' Association of Malta vs. L-Awtorita' ta' Malta dwar l-Ambjent u-Ippjanar [First Hall, Civil Court] 6 March 2012 (Ramblers case, Court of First Instance). The case was appealed in Is-Socjeta' The Ramblers' Association of Malta vs L-Awtorita' ta' Malta dwar l-Ambjent u-Ippjanar et [Court of Appeal Civil, Superior] 27 May 2016. (Ramblers case, Court of Appeal)
[12] In Cecil Herbert Jones vs Attorney General (Application no. 95/2018) decided on 15 February 2019, the First Hall of the Civil Court acting in its Constitutional jurisdiction stated that the Charter of Fundamental Rights is based on the principle of direct effect and national courts are obliged to interpret national measures in conformity with the Charter whenever they come within the scope of EU law. The judgment was not appealed.
[14] These principles were enunciated in Ryan Briffa –v– Attorney General decided on 14 March, 2014.
[15] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Booxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.
[16] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.
[17] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774

[1] Article 267 of the TFEU, and if so how?
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Please note that the original language version of this page [nl] has been amended recently. The language version you are now viewing is currently being prepared by our translators.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Netherlands

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

Dutch regulation aimed at protecting the environment has been developing strongly since the early 70s. It developed as a highly fragmented accumulation of rules to protect the environment and human health, divided over a wide number of policy fields and regulations. The Dutch Constitution provides a basis for the regulation that should provide citizens with a habitable environment and allow for the protection and the improvement of the environment. The many legislative acts adopted by Parliament aim to protect the environment and often form the legal basis for executive decrees, which provide more detailed regulations and are adopted by either the Dutch Government or by a specific Minister who is responsible for a certain policy area. Protecting the environment, however, is also the responsibility of governmental bodies at the provincial and the municipal levels. Ensuring compliance and enforcement of environmental regulation is often the responsibility of these lower tiers of government as there is no national environmental protection agency in the Netherlands.

Most (sectoral) environmental laws, executive decrees and regulations have frequently been amended over time, often because of the adoption /implementation of EU environmental regulations and case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Over the years, the Dutch legislator has striven to implement coordinative measures on a procedural level and has even introduced integrative legislation. Both the regulation for adopting policy documents and the system of environmental permits have been strongly affected by these procedural and coordinative legislative efforts. However, at the moment there remain many specific (sectoral) acts in order to protect specific parts of the environment, e.g. for water, soil, air, waste, nature conservation and spatial planning. The Netherlands is now (2020) on the brink of implementing a restructured body of regulation that aims to improve environmental regulation with the introduction of the Environment and Planning Act (EPA). The EPA will (most likely) come into force in 2022. This act aims to replace and streamline many of the existing relevant sectoral acts and provide government with the instruments to both protect and improve the quality of the physical living environment in the Netherlands and regulate human activities that could be detrimental to it.

Although specific environmental legislation often provides for additional relevant articles on public participation and access to justice, the Dutch legislator has tried to implement a uniform system of general rules on public participation and access to justice in administrative decision-making, including environmental decisions. In many cases concerning environmental decision-making, the law provides that anyone has the right to state their views on a draft decision before the final decision is taken. Only those with a specific interest related to the decision taken have access to the administrative court that will provide judicial review. This includes natural persons, legal entities and NGOs. Many cases concerned with environmental legislation will be dealt with by the administrative courts. The Dutch system does not provide for environmental tribunals or environmental courts; however, the courts with general competence will provide a relevant role for environmental cases that fall outside the competence of the administrative courts. The rights of citizens in all procedures are affected by both EU regulations and international law. The same is true for the regulation on transparent government. The Netherlands offers an adequate legal framework for the promotion of a transparent government in the Netherlands as it provides anyone with the right to request access to information contained in documents held by an administrative authority that relates to an administrative matter.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

Article 21 of the Dutch Constitution (Grondwet[1]) obliges Government to guarantee its citizens a habitable environment and arrange for the protection and the improvement of the environment. Together with Article 11, which secures the right to personal integrity and Article 22, which awards a right to health, these provisions are the main (social) fundamental rights related to the environment laid down in the Dutch Constitution. Access to justice is secured by Article 17, which states that no one can be kept from the competent court against his will. These articles order the legislator to adopt legislative acts and secure these rights; however, citizens cannot rely on the national constitutional rights before the courts when discussing these legislative acts as the Netherlands does not have a Constitutional court. However, in administrative court procedures against single case administrative decisions based on such legislative acts, citizens may rely directly on rights vis-à-vis the government that are granted by the Constitution, like the duty of the government to establish a habitable environment and arrange for the protection and improvement of the environment, as long as the court does not assess the constitutionality of the legislative act itself (Article 120 Dutch Constitution). In the (near) future a new paragraph will be added to this provision in the Constitution. It will grant every citizen of the Netherlands the right to a fair trial within a reasonable time before an independent and impartial court to establish his rights and obligations or to determine the merits of any legal proceedings against him. The proposal thus establishes a new fundamental right for citizens in Chapter 1 of the Constitution. Chapter 6 of the Dutch Constitution is also relevant as it states that the law will make clear which court is competent (Article 112 of the Dutch Constitution). The Netherlands has no constitutional court and therefore relies on its parliamentary system and the Council of State as a legislative adviser to guarantee the proper functioning of the Dutch constitution. In practice, the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Aarhus Convention are more relevant in legal procedures than the Dutch Constitution.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Procedures against administrative decisions in environmental matters are governed by both the general provisions of (administrative) procedural law, which are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act (GALA, in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht), mainly chapters 6, 7 and 8 which stipulate the general provisions on access to administrative courts, and by some additional provisions in specific acts of which the most important ones are the Environmental Management Act (EMA, in Dutch: Wet milieuxche), the General Act on Environmental Permitting (GAEP, in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht), the Spatial Planning Act (SPA, in Dutch: Wet ruimtelijke ordening), the Water Act (in Dutch: Waterwet) and the Nature Conservation Act (in Dutch: Wet natuurbescherming).

After years of preparation, the Dutch legislator has recently adopted a new Environment and Planning Act (in Dutch: Omgevingswet) which will (most likely) be in force in 2022. This act will completely replace or replace relevant parts of the Environmental Management Act, the General Act on Environmental Permitting, the Spatial Planning Act, the Water Act, the Nature Conservation Act and many other environmental acts.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

Although it is not a typical case, the best known example of national case-law from the Netherlands Supreme Court is probably its decision in the Urgenda case [ECLI:NL:HR:2019:2007]. In 2015, the Hague District Court (private law sector) became the first court of law that ordered a State to adopt more measures to tackle climate change. It ruled that the State must take more action to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in the Netherlands and ordered it to ensure that Dutch greenhouse gas emissions in the year 2020 would be at least 25 per cent lower than the 1990 levels. The Urgenda Foundation, partly on behalf of 866 Dutch concerned citizens, had requested that the court issue a ruling on the basis of tort law. In late-2018, the Hague Court of Appeal confirmed the District Court's judgment, albeit on different grounds, and just before the end of 2019, the Supreme Court upheld this ruling, adding to the already extended and impressive reasoning. The Supreme Court in the judiciary system of general competence has cassation power only and provides unifying case law with regards to the application of private law.

The highest court in the Netherlands for judicial review of decisions by government bodies that concern the environment is the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State). This court provides unifying case law concerning the application of administrative and environmental laws and regulations. It is both an appellate court and a court of first instance and has reformatory competence. Recent influential judgments are concerned with the Dutch Programmatic Approach to Nitrogen [ECLI:NL:RVS:2019:1603 and ECLI:NL:RVS:2019:1604]. This approach was codified in general binding rules (executive decree/delegated regulation) on the basis of the Nature Conservation Act, and the court had to decide on its legality in several cases brought by Dutch environmental organisations and concerned with decisions on permitting and enforcement of nature conservation legislation. The regulation provided that agricultural entrepreneurs (farmers) could be allowed to expand either by applying for a permit or by way of exemption, even though their activities would be detrimental to Natura 2000 areas. These areas are protected on the basis of the Dutch Nature Conservation Act which serves as an implementation of the EU Habitats Directive. The Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State decided that the Dutch Programmatic Approach to Nitrogen could not form the legal basis for allowing economic activities as the regulation was in breach of Article 6 of the EU Habitats Directive in several respects.

Another relevant development in light of access to justice in environmental cases has been the recent judgment of the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State in which it redefined which parties qualify as an interested party and will therefore have standing in administrative court proceedings on the basis of Article 8:1, in conjunction with Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act. For many years, the courts had decided that anyone who could possibly experience the environmental effects of an environmental permit was considered an interested party. The court now reasoned that this was not in line with its own case-law in relation to zoning schemes and licenses for public events and decided that the question on standing, e.g. who is an interested party as defined in Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act, would have to be answered consistently in all cases concerning decisions that have an effect on the environment. Anyone who is directly and actually affected by an activity permitted by the decision - such as a zoning plan or a permit - is, in principle, an interested party. However, the criterion 'consequences of any significance' serves as a possibility for a correction. Consequences of any significance are missing if the effect on the applicant's interests can be determined objectively, but the consequences for the person involved are so small that a personal interest in relation to the decision is lacking. In this assessment, consideration is given to the factors of distance, visibility, spatial impact and environmental consequences (e.g. odour, noise, light, vibration, emission, risk) of the activity permitted by the decision. The nature, intensity and frequency of the actual consequences may also be important. Legal standards do not determine whether the person concerned has a personal interest in the decision. If the decision and the grounds for appeal cause to do so, the question of whether such a standard is met will be considered in the substantive assessment of the judicial review. Ultimately, it is up to the administrative court to decide who is an interested party. The litigant in question therefore does not have to prove that he is an interested party in a decision.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on International environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Once a treaty has come into force in international law, legislative, administrative and judicial authorities must accept the newly created legal situation as binding on all persons (Article 94 of the Dutch Constitution). They can also rely upon EU law if it has direct effect. Article 21 of the Dutch Constitution considers in the substantive assessment of the judicial review. Ultimately, it is up to the administrative court to decide who is an interested party. The litigant in question therefore does not have to prove that he is an interested party in a decision.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

Legal protection in the Netherlands is first of all provided by the courts of general jurisdiction that are competent to decide on private law (between private parties) and criminal law cases (Article 112 of the Dutch Constitution and Article 2 Judiciary (Organization) Act). This system has three tiers. A case is heard first by the District Court (in Dutch: Rechtbank) and if a party does not agree with the judgment, he may lodge an appeal with the Court of Appeal (in Dutch: Gerechtshof). The Court of Appeal re-examines the facts of the case and reaches its own conclusions. Thereafter, it is usually possible to refer a dispute to the highest court, the Supreme Court of the Netherlands (in Dutch: Hoge Raad). The Supreme Court of the Netherlands examines only whether the lower court(s) observed proper application of the law in reaching its judgment. At this stage, the facts of the case as established by the lower court(s) are no longer subject to discussion.
Judicial review of (single case) administrative law decisions that are concerned with the environment are adjudicated by a District Court (administrative law sector) as a court of first instance. An appeal may be lodged with one of the highest administrative law courts in the Netherlands. For environmental decisions this is the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State). This court will also hear some relevant cases (e.g. zoning schemes) as a court of first and only instance.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Netherlands is divided into 11 districts, each with its own District Court. District Courts are divided into 3 sectors: a civil law sector, a criminal law sector and an administrative law sector. The 11 districts are divided into 4 areas of jurisdiction for the Courts of Appeal for civil and criminal disputes and some specific administrative disputes (e.g. tax law). With regard to criminal and civil law, the justices of the Court of Appeal only deal with cases where an appeal has been lodged against the judgment passed by the District Court. There is no special court or tribunal for environmental matters. The law will stipulate which court is competent, so there is no relevant possibility for forum shopping; any decision by a local government (municipality, province or water board) is lodged at the district court of the district where the government is located and a decision by any other governmental authority is lodged at the district court in the district where the appellant lives. With a few exceptions, administrative disputes on governmental decisions about environmental matters (judicial review) must be lodged by an interested party and heard first by one of the eleven District Courts (administrative law sector). Although the District Courts are competent to rule on any case concerning an administrative law decision by a public authority, the competence does not include general binding rules and policy rules. Against (single case) decisions, an interested party has the right to appeal to the court for judicial review (Article 8:1 and 1:2 General Administrative Law Act). An interested party may lodge an appeal against the judgment of the District Court with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State, which is the highest administrative law court for environmental decisions.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

Usually the cases are heard by the District Court by a single-judge division, but the court can decide to appoint three judges to a case which is complex or

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

In procedures against administrative decisions, a competent court will quash (or annul) the decision if the applicant has brought forward arguments that

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Administrative environmental decisions are taken by administrative authorities of municipalities, provinces or on state level. In many cases the administrative authorities of the municipality are competent to take a decision (adopting a zoning scheme: granting a permit). For specific decisions, the provincial level is competent. Also, at the State level, a specific Minister (see https://www.government.nl) might be competent.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?
The administrative procedures in environmental matters are governed by both the general provisions on administrative procedure of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) and by some specific provisions in the General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht) and the Environmental Management Act (in Dutch: Wet milieubeheer), the Spatial Planning Act (in Dutch: Wet ruimtelijke ordening) and other special acts.

Articles 8:1 and 7:1 General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) stipulate that any interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) may bring a case against a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) made by an administrative authority (Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act) to the administrative court, but must first file an objection (in Dutch: bezwaarschrift) with the authority that took the decision. The result of this objection procedure will be a (re)new(ed) decision by the same public authority. Only that decision can be the subject of judicial review by the administrative court.

For a number of important environmental permitting decisions, such as whether or not to grant an environmental permit (e.g. the permitting system that is required on the basis of the EU Industrial Emissions Directive, IED) and the adoption of municipal zoning schemes, the law provides for a procedure that involves public participation based on a draft-decision by the public authority. In order to be able to lodge an appeal against the final decision, one has to participate in the preparatory procedure (article 6:13 GALA). This requirement has been ruled partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention by the Court of Justice of the European Union (C-JEU) in its judgment in case C-826/18.[3] When the law provides that this procedure is applicable, a decision will be drafted and will be made publicly known. The draft decision and the documents that it is based on will be available for anyone’s viewing for six weeks. During that time anyone can participate in the decision-making process by submitting their views to the competent authority. The competent authority will have to respond to these views before taking and publishing the final decision. Such a final decision has to be taken within 6 months of the application for the environmental permit. This administrative procedure is laid down in section 3.4 (uniform extensive public preparation procedure) of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) and section 3.3 of the General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht). This procedure is applicable when it is stipulated by law or when the administrative authority decides to prepare the decision using this procedure. Any decision that was prepared in this extensive procedure is subject to review by a court directly without a prior objection procedure.

Judicial review of an environmental case may take approximately a year.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

Next to the court system consisting of courts with a general competence, the Netherlands judiciary system provides special courts for specific disputes concerned with administrative decisions, such as zoning schemes or permits. There are, however, no special environmental courts or tribunals.

Administrative courts are competent to hear cases on decisions by public authorities. The term decision is defined as the written decision of an administrative authority constituting a public law act (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act). However, the administrative courts in the Netherlands are not competent to directly rule in cases concerned with general binding rules, policy rules or factual acts by government authorities (Article 8:2, 8:3 General Administrative Law Act). Those cases can be heard by (the private law sectors of) the District Courts on the basis of tort law. In those proceedings the provisions governing standing in private law will be relevant.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

Most cases against environmental administrative decisions by the competent public authorities are lodged with the District Courts unless another procedure (e.g. appeal in first and only instance with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State) is stipulated. For most cases concerning environmental permits, the District Court and thereafter the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State are competent. Cases on zoning plans go directly to the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State. For instance: a zoning plan will be adopted according to the uniform extensive public preparation procedure that has to be applied by the competent authority in preparing the decision. Judicial review of a zoning plan is a matter for the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State) in first and last instance. The approval or refusal of an application for an environmental permit that is required in light of the EU Industrial Emissions Directive (or on other grounds in accordance with Article 2.1(1) sub e of the General Act on Environmental Permitting) will also be prepared by applying the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act but will be subject to judicial review by the District Court first (no administrative review of any kind against the final decision is provided in these cases). An interested party may lodge an appeal against the judgment of the District Court with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State. In such cases on an environmental license, the courts will grant the public authority a small margin of appreciation when establishing what are the Best Available Techniques for the specific installation at hand. In all procedures of judicial review, the applicant may ask for provisional or interim measures in accordance with the general provisions on injunctive relief in administrative procedures (Articles 8:81-8:86 General Administrative Law Act).

The Dutch General Administrative Law Act (GALA) provides all procedural rules for judicial review and the administrative procedure that are to be followed before one can apply for judicial review. It also provides for extraordinary ways of lodging an appeal against decisions that concern the environment (e.g. no obligatory objection procedure when the decision has been prepared by following the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act; no obligatory objection procedure when the decision is designated in an annex to the GALA; judicial review in first and only instance with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State if the decision is designated in an annex to the GALA, etc.). The General Administrative Law Act also provides for extraordinary procedures. During the objection procedure and during all administrative law procedures for judicial review the applicant may ask for provisional or interim measures in accordance with the general provisions on injunctive relief in administrative procedures (Articles 8:81-8:86 General Administrative Law Act).

None of the legislative procedural acts in the Netherlands introduce specific provisions for instigating the preliminary reference procedure with the European Court of Justice. The District Courts and the highest administrative courts make use of the competence to give an interlocutory ruling regulated in Article 8:80a General Administrative Law Act. The competence is, however, not specifically tailored for this use.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

Some administrative courts, including the highest administrative court in environmental cases, offer parties the possibility to call in a mediator and try to settle their conflict by finding consensus and without the courts delivering judgment. Although these have proven highly efficient in a small number of cases, the administrative courts have all adopted a new way of hearing cases that allows courts to have a strong focus on procedural justice and investigate possibilities to deal with the case in other ways than by simply annulling the administrative decision in its judgment.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link (on the sites)?

The existence of a National Ombudsman is guaranteed by Article 78a of the Dutch Constitution (in Dutch: Grondwet). The Netherlands has a special National Ombudsman Act (in Dutch: Wet Nationale ombudsman). In addition, the work of the National Ombudsman’s Office is covered by the Dutch General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht). The National Ombudsman investigates complaints brought to him by members of the public. He can also launch investigations on his own initiative. There is no special Ombudsman for environmental matters. At anyone’s complaint the Dutch Ombudsman is competent to investigate the behaviour of government. The Ombudsman mostly helps individual citizens who are experiencing problems with government and explains to administrative authorities how they can do things better. Where appropriate, the National Ombudsman responds to problems or complaints by launching investigations. By law, all parties concerned have to cooperate with these. The National Ombudsman is a ‘fall-back provision’. If you have a complaint about government, the first step is to complain to the administrative authority itself. The National Ombudsman can only deal with a complaint if it was first lodged with the administrative authority itself and the complaint was not sufficiently dealt with.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

In administrative procedures, the basic rule is that an interested party, a person whose interest is directly affected by a decision (Article 1:2(1) General Administrative Law), must be able to participate in the procedure that will lead to the decision. This is the case both in the administrative procedure that is stipulated for individual decisions and for cases where the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act is applicable (even in cases where anyone is allowed to submit their views, e.g. Article 3.12, lid 5 General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht)).

Article 1:2(1) General Administrative Law Act states that an interested party is a person (or any legal entity) whose interest is directly affected by a decision. Article 1:2(3) General Administrative Law Act stipulates that with regard to legal entities, their interests are deemed to include the general (or: public) and collective interests which they particularly represent in accordance with their articles of association (bylaws) and as evidenced by their actual activities. The rule that stipulates that an interested party has the right to appeal a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) taken by a public authority (Article 8:1 and 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) is applicable for all administrative review procedures and administrative court proceedings. In 2005, the actio popularis was removed from the body of Dutch administrative procedural law. The sectoral, environmental legislation does not diverge from this general rule of legal standing; therefore it applies in cases concerned with decision for which an Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) is required on the basis of EU law and in cases concerned with decisions on the application of a permit that is required in accordance with the Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) for an installation as defined in that directive. Although sectoral legislation on environmental matters often stipulates that not just an interested party but anyone is entitled to submit his or her views on a draft decision, legal standing before an administrative court is awarded only to an interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act). Administrative authorities may also qualify as an interested party. Article 1:2(1 and 2) General Administrative Law Act reads that the interests entrusted to a public authority by the legislator are deemed to be their interests. The public tasks attributed to them and the competences they have are decisive in assessing which interests are entrusted to them. In accordance with Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act, the National Ombudsman is not deemed to be such an administrative authority.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

The Dutch legislator aims to provide uniform provisions on access to justice. In many cases, the relevant provisions of the General Administrative Law Act (GALA, in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) provide clarity as to procedures to be followed and the possibilities of judicial review against a decision. Although some sectoral legislation provides additional regulation, in most cases the rules on standing, appeal requirements, and court fees are uniform. In some environmental cases the law prescribes that an Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) report has to be drawn up by the applicant before the public authority is able to decide on an application (Chapter 7 of the Environmental Management Act) for a permit or another decision that one can appeal against with an administrative court. Any decision on EIA screening, EIA scoping or acceptance of an EIA report by the public authority can be challenged in court by filing an appeal against the decision by the public authority that allows or refuses the permit or the decision. There are no special rules on standing, forum, hearing, evidence or the extent of the review by the court. EIA is seen as an important instrument to prepare certain decisions that potentially have significant effects on the environment. It ensures those involved that the competent authority is able to respect the duty of careful preparation of the decision. In most cases, the draft-decision is made public together with the EIA report and anyone is allowed to submit views before a final decision is made. Administrative Courts will review both the procedural legality and the substantive legality of administrative decisions as long as the interested parties have made that specific part of the decision a part of the dispute (see Article 8:69(1) General Administrative Law Act).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

An interested party is anyone whose interest is directly affected by an administrative decision. Case law provides that there should be a personal, objectively determinable interest that belongs to the person filing the case. Regarding administrative authorities, the interests entrusted to them are deemed to be their interests. Regarding legal entities (Article 1:2(3) General Administrative Law Act), their interests are deemed to include the general and collective interests that they particularly represent in accordance with their rules of association (bylaws) and as evidenced by their actual activities. This is also true for foreign NGOs. An example of a general interest could be the protection of the environment in a specific area. One of the most relevant criteria for any legal entity claiming to represent a general interest is the fact that its actions should prove that the specific general interest relevant to the case has been looked after by the legal entity, e.g. by providing proof of activities aimed at protecting the environment. Whether a legal entity (e.g. an NGO) represents general interests of protecting the environment is assessed on a case-by-case basis. Lodging appeals or asking for enforcement action will not count as actual activities. However, this requirement is not applied when a collective interest is represented and the members of the association qualify as interested parties.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Discrimination based on country of origin and/or language is forbidden by the Dutch Constitution (Article 1). In general the (procedural) law demands that all lawsuits, appeals and other written documents are submitted to the court in Dutch. The judgment and other written documents of the court will also be in Dutch. One exception exists for the Dutch province of Friesland; there, the Frisian language can be used in court (Wet gebruik Friese taal). However, there are possibilities to have relevant documents that are written in another language translated. If the notice of objection or appeal is in a foreign language and a translation is necessary for the objection or appeal to be properly dealt with, the applicant must arrange for a translation and pay for the costs. Furthermore, when someone participates in a court hearing and is unable to speak the Dutch language sufficiently, he is allowed to use his own language and arrange for an interpreter and pay for the costs. Only if the court arranges for an interpreter, and this will - in environmental matters – in general not be the case, will the costs be paid by the court (see Article 8:35 and 8:36 General Administrative Law Act).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Administrative Courts will review both the procedural legality and the substantive legality of administrative decisions as long as the interested parties have made that specific part of the decision a part of the dispute (see Article 8:69(1) General Administrative Law Act). When a public authority has been granted a margin of appreciation by the legislator in weighing the different interests involved in making a specific decision, the court will allow for this margin by applying a marginal review and upholding any decisions that it finds not unreasonable (Article 3:4(2) General Administrative Law Act). In general, courts will review the administrative decision and will ascertain whether the competent authority could justifiably base the decision on the material, technical findings and calculations that were used. There are no written rules of evidence other than the rules that have to be applied when establishing the facts in the administrative procedure that leads to the decision (e.g. good governance principles). In criminal and civil court procedures, there are specific rules on how to provide evidence and who must bear the burden of proof. In civil procedures, the parties have to propose all of the evidence for their statements to the court as soon as possible. The state prosecutor prosecutes and must provide all evidence in criminal procedures concerned with environmental matters. In the rules on administrative court procedures, there are some formal rules on providing evidence but none are about which one of the parties will have the burden of proof. Case law of course provides for rules of thumb concerning substantial rules of evidence. For instance: when the challenged decision restricts a citizen in his rights or is of a punitive nature, the burden of proof is on the public authority. Another relevant rule of thumb is: who took the initiative for the administrative decision? If the administrative decision-making started with an application by the citizen involved, the first burden of proof is on the applicant. Policy documents and generally binding rules cannot be directly reviewed by an administrative court.

However, the General Administrative Law Act does provide formal rules concerning the establishment of the facts by administrative courts. For instance, the courts are competent to ask parties for written evidence and can also appoint an independent expert, like the Foundation for advising Administrative Courts in environmental and zoning schemes cases (Stichting Advisering Bestuursrechtspraak or StAB). It should be noticed with regard to gathering evidence, that Article 6:22 of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) provides that any flaw that will not harm the interests of any of the interested parties can be overlooked by the court. Also relevant in this respect is Article 8:69a GALA, which stipulates that an administrative decision will not be quashed by the court if the decision is in breach of any rule which was not written to protect the interests of the party that filed the case. In environmental matters, however, the provisions protecting the environment, nature and health are deemed to have been written to protect the clean, healthy and acceptable living conditions of citizens that live or own property nearby. Therefore, individuals could also rely on such provisions.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
Providing new evidence in court for the first time (either in the procedure of first instance or in appeal) is allowed unless the principle of due process is violated. Although the legislator once explained that administrative courts should seek the objective truth and the courts are competent to request evidence on their own motion (ex officio), the current proceedings before the administrative courts, in many ways, resemble the procedure in civil courts where the parties are expected to provide their evidence. Parties are able to present expert opinions, have an expert heard as a witness and ask the court to appoint an expert to conduct an investigation (see division 8.2.2 General Administrative Law Act on the preliminary inquiry). The court will evaluate all the evidence presented and conclude which evidence is most probably in line with the truth. When an expert opinion is presented, it is, of course, not binding on an administrative judge, although judges are likely to follow the opinion of the expert it appointed. The opinion of an expert is also not binding in cases where the court did not appoint the expert but a party presented a report. The courts are always able to assess the quality and the consistency of the report and will take into account whether the expert has reported in accordance with the principle of due care.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts
In administrative court procedures, the courts do not have the possibility to investigate parts of an administrative decision that have not been challenged by the applicant. Any court, however, has the authority to investigate the facts of the case by hearing witnesses, by asking for (written) evidence or by appointing an expert, as long as it concerns the conflict that has been brought to court by the parties in the procedure. Administrative courts will use these powers in cases where the applicant has supplied sufficient information to doubt the facts that the administrative authority has based its decision on. Case law proves that parties to the case that is before the court have the duty to provide evidence on their own motion and they are allowed to do so. This is also true in environmental matters before the courts, although the administrative authority, always has the duty to take due care in preparing any administrative decision.

In procedures about administrative decisions on environmental matters, there is the possibility that if the court appoints an independent expert it will be the Foundation for advising Administrative Courts in environmental and zoning cases (Stichting Advisering Bestuursrechtspraak or StAB). This foundation is funded by government and has a specific expertise in environmental matters. The law provides that it will write a report on any environmental case at the request of an administrative court.

There is no publicly available list or registry of experts in environmental cases. Courts may invite individual experts with expertise on specific aspects of a case before them by selecting them based on their publications about that subject matter.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
The court will establish the facts of the case even when an expert has been appointed by the court. However, a carefully prepared expert opinion delivered to the court by an independent expert will most likely be the basis for the judgment of the court, as the opinion of the expert is valuable to the court.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
The formal requirements for an expert called upon by the court are stipulated in Article 8:47 of the General Administrative Law Act. Any administrative court may appoint an expert to conduct an investigation. The appointment must state the task to be performed and set a term within which the expert must submit a written report on the investigation to him. The intention to appoint an expert must be notified to the parties and the court may give the parties the opportunity to express their wishes regarding the investigation in writing within a period of time to be determined by the court. Both the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State[4] and the (ordinary) judiciary[5] have introduced Codes of Conduct for experts that are appointed by the court to deliver an expert opinion.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
The General Administrative Law Act provides general provisions concerning the expert opinions that public authorities may use to come to its decision. In the administrative procedure leading up to the decision, section 3.3 GALA is concerned with the experts that the public authority is obliged to call upon and are called ‘advisers’. The administrative authority to which the opinion is delivered must provide the adviser, at his request or otherwise, with the information needed to enable him to discharge his duties properly and must set a term if the law does not already provide one. The decision of the public authority will state the name of the advisers. The most relevant provision is Article 3:9 GALA, which provides that when an order is based on an investigation carried out by an adviser, the administrative authority must satisfy itself that the investigation was carried out with due care. The public authority must not base its decision on the results of the investigation of the adviser if this is not the case. This basic principle is applicable for all expert opinions that decisions are based on (Article 3.2 GALA).

During the procedure before an administrative court, the parties can call upon an expert to report on a specific aspect of the case and submit the report to the court in order to convince the court. For the parties that aim to have the court annul the decision, the law does not provide any rules for experts called upon.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
When the court appoints the expert, the expert will be awarded a set payment from the judiciary for the task. Parties do not bear these costs. Article 8:38(2) of the General Administrative Law Act provides that the party who has brought or summoned a witness or an expert must reimburse the costs thereof. This also applies to the party to whom an expert's report has been issued. In connection with this, Article 1(1b) of the Decree on Administrative Procedure Costs stipulates that the costs of a witness, expert or interpreter brought in or summoned by a party or interested party may be reimbursed. This also applies to the costs of an expert who has reported to a party. According to the established case law of the highest administrative courts, the costs of engaging an expert are eligible for reimbursement if such engagement was reasonable and if the expert costs themselves are reasonable. The question is whether, in view of the facts and circumstances as they existed at the time the expert was called upon, the party that called upon the expert could assume that the expert would make a relevant contribution to the court's answering of a question that may be relevant to the outcome of the dispute.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Lawyers play an important role in judicial procedures in environmental matters as environmental law is getting more and more complex. If a case is won in administrative court, the public authority could reimburse costs for legal counsel if the court so orders. The amount that can be awarded is maximized and is usually well below the actual costs (Article 8:75 General Administrative Law Act). However, in administrative procedures, legal counsel is not obligatory. The same is true for all procedures before the administrative courts. Legal counsel is therefore not mandatory in administrative judicial procedures. In other words, the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) does not prescribe legal counsel for lodging an appeal, nor for legal representation in court proceedings. In civil court proceedings legal representation is obligatory in many cases, although there is an important exception for cases in which the financial interest of the case is no larger than EUR 25,000. The same applies for criminal court procedures. All lawyers are members of the Bar (in Dutch: Orde van Advocaten). On their website you can find lawyers through some keywords, like areas of specialization such as environmental law (in Dutch: milieurecht/omgevingsrecht). One can also visit the websites of the government at https://rechtwijzer.nl/ or https://www.juridischloket.nl/.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

Law firms could be persuaded to provide pro bono legal assistance and some of them say that they provide such assistance on a regular basis, but most law firms will probably not provide legal assistance for free in relatively normal cases.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

There are a few websites that provide information on how to get in touch with law firms or lawyers that will provide pro bono existence.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

The first line of legal aid provided by the Netherlands is online self-help. Information and support are offered on the Rechtwijzer website (Roadmap to Justice). This website provides legal information that is helpful in common legal procedures. To receive pro bono assistance will require getting in touch with a lawyer who or law firm that is willing to provide it.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

All lawyers are members of the Bar (in Dutch: Orde van Advocaten). On their website you can find lawyers through some keywords, like areas of specialization such as environmental law (in Dutch: milieurecht/omgevingsrecht). Also, the website for the Legal Services Counters provides a search engine for lawyers and similar information is available at the website that provides a roadmap to justice.

For natural scientists and other non-legal experts there are no registries or general public websites.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

There are many NGOs active in the environmental field but there is not a complete verified list available of these Dutch NGOs.

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

In some cases environmental NGOs, such as Greenpeace, The World Wide Fund for nature or Friends of the Earth Netherlands (in Dutch: Milieudefensie), will be able to help the public lodge appeals.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

An administrative environmental decision for which judicial review is possible by an administrative court must be challenged within 6 weeks after the decision has been officially notified (Article 6:7 GALA); either for lodging an administrative review (objection procedure) or a judicial review procedure by the administrative court. In most cases, one is allowed to submit a pro forma appeal which means that another term is awarded to submit grounds for the appeal.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

If an objection is lodged against a decision, the time limit for deciding on the raised objections by the administrative authority is stipulated in Article 7:10 General Administrative Law Act and is either six or twelve weeks after the term to file an objection has passed. The twelve-week term is only applicable when an external review advisory board of at least three persons is asked to provide advice on the objection(s) filed.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

If the uniform extensive public preparation procedure codified in section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act (GALA) was followed in preparing the environmental decision, the decision should be challenged by lodging an appeal directly with the District Court or with the court that is made competent by the legislator. If this preparatory procedure was not followed, it is obligatory to follow an objection procedure by filing an objection with the administrative authority that has taken the decision before an appeal may be lodged (Article 8:1 and 7:1 GALA).

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

The General Administrative Law Act sets a time limit for delivering the judgment after the hearing by an administrative court. This time limit is six weeks and can be extended for another six weeks. However, there are no sanctions against courts delivering late judgments. Usually an administrative court will need 9 to 12 months to deliver its judgment.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

There is no time limit for the court to set a date for the hearing. If a court date has been set, the parties have until ten days before the hearing to deliver new information or new grounds for their appeal, but they should be aware that the principle of due process could limit the freedom to send in new information or grounds.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

In general, an appeal against a governmental decision in the Netherlands does not have a suspensive effect (see Article 6:16 General Administrative Law Act). However, sectoral or specific legislation may diverge from this general rule. In most environmental decisions this is not the case.

2) Is there a possibility for an interim relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

If an objection has been filed with the administrative authority, the president of the District Court which has or may have jurisdiction in the proceedings on the merits may, on request, grant a provisional remedy where speed is of the essence because of the interests involved. So as soon as an objection is filed (pro forma), courts are competent to grant injunctive relief at the request of any interested party that has lodged the objection and has proved the urgent need for an injunctive relief because of the interests involved (see Article 8:31 General Administrative Law Act). The injunctive relief can consist of any court ordered action but will, in practically all cases, consist of awarding a suspensive effect or removing the suspensive effect of a decision that was taken by the administrative authority. There is no appeal against an injunction by the administrative court.
3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?
Suspended effect might be asked for under the conditions stated above and can only be requested during a procedure of legal protection such as an objection procedure or a court procedure.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
In general, administrative decisions can be immediately executed, irrespective of an appeal or a court action. Any execution of a decision that is later annulled by court, however, may lead to liability. In practice, decisions are often not yet executed and a court decision might be awaited.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
Although there are exceptions of decisions that are - on the basis of sectoral legislation - de jure suspended when an administrative decision is challenged, this is usually not the case as the General Administrative Law Act provides otherwise (Article 6:16 GALA) and that provision applies to most environmental decisions.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
If an appeal against a decision has been lodged with the District Court, the president of the District Court which has jurisdiction in the proceedings on the merits may, on request, grant a provisional remedy where speed is of the essence because of the interests involved. So, as soon as an appeal is lodged (pro forma), courts are competent to grant injunctive relief at the request of any interested party that has lodged the appeal and has proved the urgent need for a injunctive relief because of the interests involved (see Article 8:81 General Administrative Law Act). The injunctive relief can consist of any court ordered action but will, in practically all cases, consist of awarding a suspensive effect or removing the suspensive effect of a decision that was taken by the administrative authority. There is no appeal against an injunction by the administrative court.

When a suspensive effect has been ordered by the administrative court, the decision may not be executed. No one may make use of the permission that has been given by such a decision. If this occurs anyway, an interested party may ask for enforcement action by the public authority. Also, anyone who claims that the actions are to be considered a tort, may apply for an injunctive relief with the District Court (private law sector).

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms
1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.
Administrative procedures such as the preparatory procedure and the objection procedure are free of charge. For an administrative court to hear an applicant’s case, it is necessary to pay a fee. The fee for court proceedings in first instance is stipulated in Article 8:41 of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht). In general, the fee is not considered to be very high. It varies on the basis of the type of person that instigates the procedure and the type of case and substantive law that applies to the case. Article 8:41(3) General Administrative Law Act mentions the different fees explicitly. In 2020 the fee is EUR 48 for any natural person that lodges an appeal or an injunction against a decision by an administrative authority that is concerned with social security and related legislation (see Article 8:41(3) General Administrative Law Act). It is EUR 178 for a natural person in any other case and EUR 354 for any legal person lodging an injunction or an appeal. Fees for proceedings before an Administrative Court of Appeal are somewhat higher and are stipulated in Article 8:109 GALA, they are EUR 131, 265 and 532, respectively. If the appeal is successful, these costs will usually have to be paid by the administrative authority (Article 8:75 and 8:114 General Administrative Law Act). In very rare cases of abuse of the right to appeal, the court might decide that the applicant should bear the (fixed) costs of the administrative authority such as the court fees and costs for lawyers. The courts practically never make use of this competence.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?
The costs of the injunctive relief procedure before the administrative courts are the same as the court fees for the judicial review by the court.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
The courts cannot provide exemptions from court fees. The Dutch legal aid system provides legal aid to people of limited means. Anyone in need of professional legal aid but unable to (fully) bear the costs is entitled to call upon the provisions as set down in the Legal Aid Act (in Dutch: Wet op de Rechtsbijstand). Residing under the competence of the Ministry of Justice & Security, an independent governing body called the Legal Aid Board (in Dutch: Raad voor Rechtsbijstand) is entrusted with all matters concerning administration, supervision and expenditure as well as with the actual implementation of the legal aid system. This includes matching the availability of legal experts with the demand for legal aid, as well as the supervision and quality control of the actual services provided.

In general, the Dutch legal aid system can be described as a threefold model as it encompasses three lines that provide legal aid consisting of a public preliminary provision, public first-line and private second-line help. See the website of the Legal Aid Board for more information or the specific site for the system of legal aid. One could also visit the website of the judiciary that provides information on the system of legal aid.

Second, there are the Legal Services Counters that act as what is commonly known as the ‘front office’ of legal aid. Legal matters are clarified by providing information and advice either online, by telephone or at one of the 30 Legal Services Counters. Clients may be referred to a private lawyer or mediator, who act as the secondary line of legal aid. Clients may also apply for help from a subsidised lawyer or mediator directly. As a third option, such a lawyer (or mediator) submits an application to the Legal Aid Board on behalf of his client. If legal aid is granted, a certificate is issued which allows the lawyer in question to deal with the case. Lawyers and mediators are paid by the Legal Aid Board to provide their services to clients of limited means. Generally, they are paid a fixed fee according to the type of case, although exceptions can be made for more time-consuming cases. The regular fixed fee is seen as insufficient to cover the actual costs of procedures by those providing this type of legal aid. Furthermore, over time the rules on who can make use of this type of legal aid have been tightened which means fewer persons qualify for this aid.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?
There are no legal clinics dealing with environmental cases that are available to the general public. The legal aid system in the Netherlands is meant primarily for natural persons. Legal personalities often have insurance for legal services. In some cases, NGOs like Greenpeace will organize the protests against a decision by a public authority and will help interested parties with lodging appeals or will appeal themselves.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
The Netherlands provides a legal aid system to natural persons which has been described above. Also, there is the possibility to take out legal assistance insurance, but this is not provided by government.

6) Does the 'loser party pays' principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?
The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to
1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination? All Dutch legislation is available here (in Dutch). Some information on the Dutch court system is also available at https://www.government.nl/. Advice and legal aid is available online at https://rechtwijzer.nl/ and https://www.juridischloket.nl/. The latter refers to the 30 Legal Services Counters that are available throughout the Netherlands where anyone can get legal advice. Environmental information can be requested on the basis of the Government Information (Public Access) Act (WOB, Wet openbaarheid van bestuur) which provides specific provisions concerned with requests for environmental information. Also, chapter 19 of the Environmental Management Act (Wet milieubeheer) implements the specific legal regime for environmental information. More specific information about Dutch environmental law and procedures, including information on access to justice, can be found on the website of the Knowledge Centre InfoMil.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information? Rules on access to justice are codified in the General Administrative Law Act (Chapter 6, 7 and 8) and are applicable for any administrative decision. However, sectoral legislation such as the Environmental Management Act, the General Act on Environmental Permitting, the Spatial Planning Act, the Water Act, the Nature Conservation Act etc. may provide additional provisions. Information on the main additional provisions have been discussed in the questions above.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)? There are no sector-specific rules.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? It is obligatory for the administrative authority and the administrative court to provide information about the possibility to lodge either an objection procedure, a judicial review procedure or an appeal and stipulate this information in the decision or the judgment. This is stipulated in Article 3:45 GALA and Article 6:23 GALA.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? For court cases in which one of the parties does not have an adequate command of Dutch, the government has set up a register of court interpreters and sworn translators. In certain cases (involving criminal or immigration law), the courts can only use interpreters and translators whose names are listed in this register. In civil cases this is not mandatory. Using the register, litigants (such as private individuals and enterprises) and people providing legal services (such as lawyers) can easily find an interpreter or translator who fulfils the requirements of integrity and quality laid down in the Sworn Interpreters and Translators Act. The register of court interpreters and sworn translators (only in Dutch) can in fact be accessed by any member of the public.

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) There are no specific rules relating to standing and access to justice in relation to EIA. The general provisions provided by GALA and specific (environmental) legislation are applicable and explained in more detail in paragraph 1.7.4 sub 1 and 2.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) An EIA report is prepared in light of an environmental decision that will be taken by an administrative authority. Judicial review is only available against the environmental decision (permit; planning decision) and not against decisions on screening and scoping, on the conditions set by the administrative authority or on the timeframe. The (preparation of the) EIA report is considered a preparatory requirement for the decision that potentially has a detrimental effect on the environment. In all cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is applicable (section 3.4 GALA) and in that procedure anyone can state their views on the basis of a draft decision and the EIA report. In some cases there is a formal requirement for public consultation before the EIA report will be drafted but it does not stipulate which individuals of the public concerned must be allowed to state their views and in what timeframe. After the administrative authority has taken a final decision, judicial review is available only against that decision and only for an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA), as is the case in most of administrative law procedures in the Netherlands.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions? In most environmental decisions, anyone that is against the draft decision and is reasonably deemed capable and available for stating their views is supposed to do so when a draft decision is notified by the administrative authority in the uniform extensive public preparation procedure (section 3.4 GALA). There will be a six-week term to state the views. When a final decision is taken, one should apply for judicial review with the administrative court within six weeks after the official notification of the decision. Anyone who has should have stated their views against the draft decision but did not do so will not be able to lodge an admissible appeal with the district court. Also, an appeal against any part of an environmental decision that a court could annul separately from other parts will be inadmissible if the applicant did not state his views on that particular part of the decision in the administrative procedure that led to the final decision.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO? The final decision can be challenged before an administrative court by an interested party. As explained above both a natural or a legal person can be an interested party on the basis of section 1 of Article 1:2 GALA. Also, an NGO can be considered an interested party under the requirements set in section 3 of Article 1:2 GALA. Articles 8:1 and 7:1 General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) stipulate that any interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) may bring a case against a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) made by an administrative authority.
(Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act) to the administrative court, but must first file an objection (in Dutch: bezwaarschrift) with the authority that took the decision.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

This question has been answered in paragraph 1.3 sub 2 – 5 since there is no difference in standing or the scope of the judicial review between different kinds of administrative court procedures. The scope of judicial review is determined by the applicant and can include both substantive and procedural legality of decisions. On its own motion, the administrative court may review the competence of the court, the competence of the administrative authority and the adherence to time limits when lodging the objection procedure and the appeals procedure.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The administrative courts in the Netherlands are competent to decide in cases concerning decisions (see Article 8:1 and Article 1:3 GALA) or untimely decision-making when a decision was requested. In any case where an EIA report is required, the decision that can be challenged must be such a decision, e.g. granting the permit that was applied for or adopting the zoning scheme. For factual acts or omissions, interested parties may request an enforcement decision or must refer the case to the civil court.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The Dutch legal system for judicial review requires an interested party to participate in one of two possible administrative procedures before they may file a court action. If a decision is prepared by following the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 GALA, any party is obliged to state their views on the draft decision that will be notified (Article 3:15 General Administrative Law Act).

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Unless there are good reasons not to be, the appeal to the court by the interested party is inadmissible if that party did not participate in the administrative procedure (Article 6:13 General Administrative Law Act). If the uniform extensive public preparation procedure was not followed, the law requires that an interested party files an objection (Article 7:1 General Administrative Law Act) and that he states his grounds for his objections against the decision taken by the administrative authority in the objection procedure before he can lodge an appeal against the decision. This entails that every interested party must participate in the prescribed review procedure before an appeal at the court can be lodged. At the moment of writing, it is clear that this requirement is in violation of the implementation of the Aarhus Convention in the European Union. As was explained in more detail above in paragraph 1.3 sub 2.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

On the basis of Article 6 of the European Convention for Human Rights and the Fundamental Freedoms, the Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties where each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present their case under conditions that do not place them at a disadvantage vis-a-vis their opponent. The courts make sure that both parties to the proceedings know the evidence in the possession of the court and have the opportunity to comment on it with a view to influencing the outcome of the case. In administrative court procedures, the court is deemed to be active and may, if necessary, counterbalance the inequality between the individual and the administrative authority. This fundamental orientation has an impact on the law of administrative procedure as well. During the decision-making, too, an individual should be able to defend his or her position easily.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Although the Dutch administrative courts have implemented several relevant guidelines in order to be able to deliver judgments in a timely way, and also the legislator has adopted several instruments to help administrative courts achieve that goal, there is no general legally binding timeframe to deliver judgment besides the term that is codified in Article 8:66 GALA (six weeks after hearing the case). In some specific environmental cases, however, the legislation specifies that the judgment must be delivered in six months; there is no sanction if the court does not comply with this time requirement. However, case law provides that damages can be awarded if a case remains undecided in the system of administrative adjudication unreasonably long (more than four years if the objection procedure, the procedure of judicial review by the District Court and the Court of Appeal are all used).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules applicable apart from the general provisions that were discussed above.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emisions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

There are no country-specific IPPC rules in relation to access to justice in the Netherlands, although the permit on the basis of this Directive is always prepared by following the uniform extensive public preparation procedure (section 3.4 GALA) and anyone is allowed to state their views on a draft decision. As a consequence, there is no obligatory objection procedure before one can challenge the final decision in court.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

Article 8:1 GALA provides that any interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing in administrative court proceedings. Who might be considered an interested party has been described in more detail in paragraph 1.4.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Only the final decision (granting or refusal of permit) can be challenged in court.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Only the final decision (granting or refusal of permit) can be challenged in court.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

The uniform extensive public preparation procedure is applicable to the granting of a permit for an IED installation. Anyone can state their views on a draft decision. This means that the draft decision will be notified and available for six weeks and during that time one can challenge the draft decision. After a final decision has been taken and is officially notified, an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) can challenge the decision by lodging an appeal with the administrative court (District Court) within six weeks after the official notification.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

The public can challenge the final authorisation but article 8:1 GALA provides that only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing in administrative court proceedings and article 6:13 GALA provides that only those that participated in the procedures may lodge an appeal. Who might be considered an interested party has been described above (section 1.4). The CJEU has ruled that article 6:13 GALA is partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

Administrative courts are competent to review both substantive and procedural legality of the decision by an administrative authority. The court can establish the facts on its own motion and must also assess whether the administrative authority was competent to take the decision, whether the applicant has standing before the court and whether the court is competent. There are no other legal questions that the court will answer on his own motion. Challenging decisions (Article 1:3 GALA) and untimely decision-making is possible before an administrative court. Also, an interested party may ask for injunctive relief concerned with these decisions. However, the administrative courts are not competent to hear factual acts and omissions; the civil court is competent.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?
Decisions can be challenged before a court within six weeks after the decision has been officially notified (see above)

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
In many administrative law conflicts about decisions, there is an obligatory objection procedure (Article 7:1 GALA) before the interested party may bring the case to court. However, if the uniform extensive public preparation procedure was followed to take the decision, which is the case for any permit required under the IE Directive, this obligation does not exist and an interested party can file a court action with the administrative court within six weeks after the official notification of the final decision. See above.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?
Article 6:13 GALA provides that the appeal of an interested party that wants to file a court action with the administrative court and did not participate in previous administrative procedures without good reason will be inadmissible. See above.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to decisions concerning the application of the IED. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties; in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more proactive towards ‘weaker’ parties and as a result, because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters, are perhaps more inclined to ask for expert advice.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
There is no specific legislation aimed at implementing the notion of timely with regards to the IED and the EIA Directive as the General Administrative Law Act provides sufficient provisions on timely decision making and timely court procedures.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief about decisions with regards to the IED and the EIA Directive as the General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 sub 2.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?
The administrative authority will provide information on access to justice when publishing the notification that a (environmental) decision has been taken (see https://www.overheid.nl/ or http://overwbuurt.overheid.nl). The courts provide structured and accessible (online) information on access to justice. Also, the governmental websites dealing with legal aid provide information to citizens. See in more detail paragraph 1.7.4 sub 2.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?
In the Netherlands, the Environmental Liability Directive is implemented in title 17.2 of the Environmental Management Act. The scope of implementation in the Environmental Management Act is similar to the scope of the directive: strict liability for environmental damage caused by any of the activities mentioned in Annex III of the directive (mainly integrated pollution prevention and control installations), and fault-based liability for other activities.

Judicial review by an administrative court is available when application of title 17.2 Environmental Management Act (EMA) leads to a (single case) decision by an administrative authority as defined in Article 1:3(2) General Administrative Law Act. When such a decision is taken, the general provisions for access to justice will apply. This means that any natural person, legal entity, administrative authority and/or NGO considered to be an interested party as defined in Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act will have standing in an administrative court procedure against such a decision. Also, the administrative authorities mentioned in Article 17.2(3) EMA will be allowed to request for a decision on environmental remediation. A (single case) decision might be a decision at the request of a third party (interested party) for preventive or remedial action (Article 17.15(1) EMA), a decision to take preventive measures in the event of imminent environmental damage (Article 17.12(4) EMA), a decision to oblige someone to take all feasible measures in the event that environmental damage has already occurred (Article 17.13(5) EMA), a decision by the competent authority to take preventive measures or all feasible measures itself if the damage has already occurred (Articles 17.10 and 17.14(2) EMA), a decision as to whether or not to agree with the remedial measures proposed by the party causing the damage (Article 17.14(3) EMA), the decision prioritising which environmental damage is remedied first (Article 17.14(4) EMA), and a decision concerning the recovery of costs incurred by the competent authority from the party causing the damage (Article 17.16 EMA).

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?
The provisions on access to justice in the General Administrative Law Act are applicable and there are no additional special provisions provided in the Environmental Management Act. This means that the deadline is six weeks after the official notification of a decision.

The following applies to the cost recovery aspect. The competence to decide to recover costs expires after a period of five years after the day on which the preventive and remedial measures have been fully completed, by - or on behalf of - the competent authority (Article 17.17 Environmental Management Act). If the party causing the damage has only been identified after the date of completion of the measures, the five-year period starts from the moment of identification. Still, the deadline to introduce an appeal will be six weeks.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?
There are no special requirements stipulated for observations accompanying the request for action. In general, a request or application to take a decision should be done by an interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) and should be sufficiently clear and concrete to be considered a request. A request or application should furthermore be accompanied by those facts and circumstances that the applicant is able to provide (Article 4:2 General Administrative Law Act). Case law has provided that it is duty of the interested party to provide the competent authority with any leads for the investigation. It is then up to the competent authority to investigate whether action is required.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding 'plausibility' for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?
There are no special requirements stipulated regarding 'plausibility'. A request or application should furthermore be accompanied by those facts and circumstances that the applicant is able to provide (Article 4:2 General Administrative Law Act). Case law has provided that it is duty of the interested party to provide the competent authority with any leads for the investigation. It is then up to the competent authority to investigate whether action is required.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?
There are no special time limits stipulated for the notification of the decision by the competent authority. If an request/application for an administrative single case decision is filed with the administrative authority, it is legally obliged to deliver a decision within either the term provided in sectoral legislation or – if no such term is provided – within a reasonable time period, which is deemed to be eight weeks according to the Article 4:13 General Administrative Law Act. Although not stipulated by law, the administrative authority may decide that the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 GALA is applicable for a decision on the basis of title 17.2 EMA. In that case, a decision will be drafted and will be made publicly known. The draft decision and the documents on which it is based will be available for anyone’s viewing for six weeks. During that time anyone can participate in the decision-making process by submitting their views to the competent authority. The competent authority will have to respond to these views before taking and publishing the final decision. Such a final decision has to be taken within 6 months of the application.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?
Yes. See above. An interested party may request a decision on preventive measures in case of imminent threat of environmental damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?
Article 17.9 EMA stipulates which are the competent authorities. When the damage has been caused by an (industrial) installation, the administrative authority that is competent to grant the permit and is the competent enforcement agency is the competent authority. However, if the damage has occurred or will occur predominantly in water systems, the authority that is competent for that water system is the competent authority. When the damage has been caused outside an (industrial) installation, different competent authorities are designated depending on the damage being predominantly caused to soil, water, habitats, species (see Article 17.9(3) EMA). Where, in the event of environmental damage or imminent threat thereof, more than one administrative authority has been designated as the competent authority, or powers have been assigned to another administrative authority by this or any other law, consultations must be held in good time between those administrative authorities with a view to promoting the best possible coordination between the decisions to be taken or the measures to be taken. The administrative bodies must coordinate with each other (Article 17(5) EMA).

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
There are no special requirements stipulated in the implementation of the Environmental Liability Directive. Therefore, the general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable and they stipulate that procedures of administrative review (either an objection procedure or the uniform extensive public preparation procedure) must be followed before judicial proceedings can be instigated (Article 8:1 and 7:1 GALA).

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases
1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics. The general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. However, in certain cases the government of another country will be informed of the possible environmental effects by decisions, plans or programmes of the Dutch authorities (section 7.11 EMA concerning environmental impact assessment) or in the event that an installation is operated in such a way that environmental damage occurs or may occur outside the borders of the Netherlands (Article 17.13 EMA).

2) Notion of public concerned?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border effects. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act (e.g. the appellant must be an interested party (article 1:2 GALA) and must have participated in the preparatory procedure (article 6:13 GALA)) are applicable. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where NGOs of an affected country want to participate in the decision-making procedure, the procedure of administrative review or the judicial proceedings. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in article 1:2 and article 6:13 of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8. GALA. As far as we know, there are also no special regulations provided for individuals of an affected country related to legal aid and/or pro bono assistance.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where individuals of an affected country want to participate decision making, administrative review or judicial proceedings. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in article 1:2 and article 6:13 of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8. As far as we know, there are also no special regulations provided for individuals of an affected country related to legal aid and/or pro bono assistance. See above.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where individuals of an affected country want to have information. The general provisions on providing information (notification duties of decisions and plans) are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act and perhaps the Government Information (Public Access) Act (WOB, Wet openbaarheid van bestuur). Also, decisions taken by the competent authority in light of the implementation of the Environmental Liability Directive must be notified to the public in accordance with the general provisions stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act. The competent authority must oblige the party causing the damage to provide (additional) information. If the cause of the damage is an unusual event within an installation, title 17.1 EMA will provide additional safeguards to protect the environment and human health.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics. The general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. When the uniform extensive preparatory procedure is applicable, in most cases the public will have six weeks to state their views on a draft decision. Lodging an appeal procedure against the final decision is possible for an interested party during the period of six weeks after notification of the final decision.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics or for foreign applicants and non-foreign applicants. See above. This means that the decision of the administrative authority or the judgment will have to provide access to justice information.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics or for foreign applicants and non-foreign applicants. For court cases in which one of the parties does not have an adequate command of Dutch, the government has set up a register of court interpreters and sworn translators. In certain cases (involving criminal or immigration law), the courts can only use interpreters and translators whose names are listed in this register. In civil cases this is not mandatory. Using the register, litigants (such as private individuals and enterprises) and people providing legal services (such as lawyers) can easily find an interpreter or translator who fulfills the requirements of integrity and quality laid down in the Sworn Interpreters and Translators Act. The register of court interpreters and sworn translators (only in Dutch) can in fact be accessed by any member of the public. However, in most environmental cases the appellant will bear the costs of translation or interpretation. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 sub 5.

9) Any other relevant rules?
There are no other relevant rules.

[1] All Dutch legislation is available here (search for Dutch legislation).
[2] Many relevant judgments are published here (search for Dutch case law)
[6] See also case C-529/15.

Access to justice falling outside of the scope of EIA, IPPC/IED, access to information and ELD

1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. The articles 1:2 GALA on ‘interested parties’ that have standing and article 6:13 GALA are relevant. In general the level of access to national courts can be considered very effective as administrative court procedures are accessible, not expensive and allow for an active court to investigate the matter. However, recently discussed on the application of article 6:13 GALA has been triggered by the CJEU (case C826/18), because it ruled that this provision is partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention as it requires interested parties to participate in the preparatory procedure for a decision in order to have access to justice. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. The scope of administrative review (if applicable) and judicial review will cover procedural and substantive legality as long as grounds for appeal have been brought forward by the appellant.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before an appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD within. See explained in more detail paragraph 1.3 and 1.4.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD within. See explained in more detail paragraph 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase, however, when a decision consists of multiple parts that may be quashed separately, anyone bringing grounds against such a part of a decision must have brought grounds against that part in any (administrative preparatory or review) procedure to be admissible (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD within.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to decisions concerning the application of EU law outside of EIA Directive/IED. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties; in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more proactive towards ‘weaker’ parties and therefore because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters are perhaps more inclined to ask an expert advice.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There is no specific legislation concerning the notion of timely with regards to areas addressed by EU law outside the IED and the EIA Directive, as the General Administrative Law Act provides sufficient provisions on timely decision making and timely court procedures.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief concerning the issues relevant here. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in more detail in paragraph 1.7.2.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is no specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required other than the general provisions discussed above. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases, there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review available. When there is, however, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision for which a Strategic Environmental Impact Assessment is required and in most of those administrative procedure anyone has the right to state their views on a draft decision. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts as to whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required other than the general provisions discussed above. There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is no special legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no special regulation provided for access to justice whether a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or not. There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required other than the general provisions discussed above. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases, there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review available. When there is, however, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision for which a Strategic Environmental Impact Assessment is required, and in most of those administrative procedures anyone has the right to state their views. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. The scope of administrative review (if applicable) and judicial review will cover procedural and substantive legality as long as grounds for appeal have been brought forward by the appellant. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? There is no specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review, e.g. air quality plans. When there is, e.g. against a management plan for a Natura 2000 area when it implies that certain activities will not require a permit on the basis of the implementation of the Habitats Directive, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision and in most of those administrative procedures anyone has the right to state their views. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)? Relevant for the competence of the Dutch administrative courts is primarily the question whether the plan or the programme can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA that does not consist of general binding rules or policy rules. Plans and or programmes that are required by EU environmental law are often considered either policy documents to allow government to achieve a certain goal or provide an (indirect) assessment framework for assessing the applications for a permit or for adopting a zoning scheme that affect citizens (directly) and which decisions can be challenged in court. In many cases, however, the plans and programmes are not considered to be a decision against which interested parties should be awarded the possibility of judicial review.

This is not just the case because the plans and programmes will be followed by decisions that can be challenged but also because in the procedure of judicial review of these decisions, the interested party may introduce a plea of illegality concerning the plan or programme that was the basis for the decision. Only if the plan or programme itself does directly provide citizens with binding legal consequences, e.g. the management plan of a Natura 2000 area that will allow certain activities without a permit, judicial review will be open for an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA).

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision the applicant may enter a plea of illegality concerning a plan or programme and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded. It is generally thought that this assessment is done with more deference for the public authority that adopted the plan or programme and will still cover both procedural and substantive legality, although procedural flaws are considered less relevant for the effectiveness of the level of access.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. See above.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase, however, when a decision consists of multiple parts that may be quashed separately, anyone bringing grounds against such a part of a decision must have brought grounds against that part in any (administrative preparatory or review) procedure to be admissible. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. The general provisions stipulated in GALA are applicable.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to plans and programmes. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties; in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more proactive towards ‘weaker’ parties and therefore and because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters are perhaps more inclined to ask an expert advice.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
There is no specific legislation aimed at implementing the notion of timely with regards to plans and programmes required by European Law, as the General Administrative Law Act provides sufficient provisions on timely decision making and timely court procedures. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 above. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority if he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties the costs will in most cases not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases, there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review. When there is, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In cases where general binding rules are used, there is no competence of the administrative courts and the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is not applicable as there are separate provisions on the preparation of general binding rules in the Netherlands. In many other cases where a decision has to be taken, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision and in most of those administrative procedure anyone has the right to state their views. There is no direct access to administrative courts for judicial review and therefore the effectiveness is dependent on the judicial review of decisions based on the binding normative instruments (general binding rules).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision based on the general binding rules implementing European law, however, the appellant may enter a plea of illegality concerning these executive and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments, and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded. It is generally thought that this assessment is done with more deference for the public authority that adopted the normative instrument. It will still cover both procedural and substantive legality, although procedural flaws are considered less relevant for the question of whether the competent authority could apply the plan of programme to take the contested decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). However, this requirement is irrelevant here, as there is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. However, this requirement is irrelevant here, as there is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 above. There is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory act.
6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. The 'loser pays principle' does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority if he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[6]

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. Also, the preliminary reference procedure is not codified in Dutch procedural law. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision, the applicant may enter a plea of illegality concerning an EU (regulatory) act or decision and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded and whether a preliminary reference procedure with the ECJ is deemed necessary.

---

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the § Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters

[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

[3] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-126/09-C-131/09 and C-162/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschevaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

[6] For an example of such a preliminary reference see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschevaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

---

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

The sanctions for the administrative authority for not responding within the prescribed term have been described above. When a decision is not provided before the end of the term provided by law, or when no term is provided within eight weeks after the request, the applicant will have to send a notice of default and allow the administrative authority another two weeks to decide. If a decision still is not taken after those two weeks, there are two consequences.

First, for each day after that term the administrative authority will have to pay a penalty to the applicant for each day that no decision is made (with a maximum of EUR 1,442). Second, the applicant can ask the court for judicial review in order to force the administrative authority to come up with a decision.

That court procedure will be about the question of whether the administrative authority did indeed not decide within the provided time frame and the procedure must take no more than eight weeks. If the conclusion by the court is indeed that no decision was made before the deadline, the court will order the administrative authority to take the decision within a two-week period and will award a penalty for each day that a decision still has not been taken after those two weeks.

If an administrative authority does not comply with a judgment of an administrative court, it will be most likely be the case that no decision is taken. Judicial review will be available for an interested party when the time frame for taking a decision has passed (see above in paragraph 1.8.2). If a natural person or a legal person does not comply with the judgment of the administrative court, it will most likely be the case that this person acts in violation of administrative law, in accordance with a suspended permit or in violation of the conditions of his permit. Therefore, an interested party may request enforcement measures with the competent administrative authority, which is - in general - entitled to take enforcement action (either an administrative order to take physical action or other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters).

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Please note that the original language version of this page [nl] has been amended recently. The language version you are now viewing is currently being prepared by our translators.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Netherlands

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

  1. Access to justice at Member State level
  3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters.

Last update: 27/07/2021
1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Dutch regulation aimed at protecting the environment has been developing strongly since the early 70s. It developed as a highly fragmented accumulation of rules to protect the environment and human health, divided over a wide number of policy fields and regulations. The Dutch Constitution provides a basis for the regulation that should provide citizens with a habitable environment and allow for the protection and the improvement of the environment. The many legislative acts adopted by Parliament aim to protect the environment and often form the legal basis for executive decrees, which provide more detailed regulations and are adopted by either the Dutch Government or by a specific Minister who is responsible for a certain policy area. Protecting the environment, however, is also the responsibility of governmental bodies at the provincial and the municipal levels. Ensuring compliance and enforcement of environmental regulation is often the responsibility of these lower tiers of government as there is no national environmental protection agency in the Netherlands.

Most (sectoral) environmental laws, executive decrees and regulations have frequently been amended over time, often because of the adoption /implementation of EU environmental regulation and case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union. Over the years, the Dutch legislator has striven to implement coordinative measures on a procedural level and has even introduced integrative legislation. Both the regulation for adopting policy documents and the system of environmental permits have been strongly affected by these procedural and coordinative legislative efforts. However, at the moment there remain many specific (sectoral) acts in order to protect specific parts of the environment, e.g. for water, soil, air, waste, nature conservation and spatial planning. The Netherlands is now (2020) on the brink of implementing a restructured body of regulation that aims to improve environmental regulation with the introduction of the Environment and Planning Act (EPA). The EPA will (most likely) come into force in 2022. This act aims to replace and streamline many of the existing relevant sectoral acts and provide government with the instruments to both protect and improve the quality of the physical living environment in the Netherlands and regulate human activities that could be detrimental to it.

Although specific environmental legislation often provides for additional relevant articles on public participation and access to justice, the Dutch legislator has tried to implement a uniform system of general rules on public participation and access to justice in administrative decision-making, including environmental decisions. In many cases concerning environmental decision-making, the law provides that anyone has the right to state their views on a draft decision before the final decision is taken. Only those with a specific interest related to the decision taken have access to the administrative court that will provide judicial review. This includes natural persons, legal entities and NGOs. Many cases concerned with environmental legislation will be dealt with by the administrative courts. The Dutch system does not provide for environmental tribunals or environmental courts; however, the courts with general competence will provide a relevant role for environmental cases that fall outside the competence of the administrative courts. The rights of citizens in all procedures are affected by both EU regulations and international law. The same is true for the regulation on transparent government. The Netherlands offers an adequate legal framework for the promotion of a transparent government in the Netherlands as it provides anyone with the right to request access to information contained in documents held by an administrative authority that relates to an administrative matter.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

Article 21 of the Dutch Constitution (Grondwet) obliges Government to guarantee its citizens a habitable environment and arrange for the protection and the improvement of the environment. Together with Article 11, which secures the right to personal integrity and Article 22, which awards a right to health, these provisions are the main (social) fundamental rights related to the environment laid down in the Dutch Constitution. Access to justice is secured by Article 17, which states that no one can be kept from the competent court against his will. These articles order the legislator to adopt legislative acts and secure these rights; however, citizens cannot rely on the national constitutional rights before the courts when discussing these legislative acts as the Netherlands does not have a Constitutional court. However, in administrative court procedures against single case administrative decisions based on such legislative acts, citizens may rely directly on rights vis-à-vis the government that are granted by the Constitution, like the duty of the government to establish a habitable environment and arrange for the protection and the improvement of the environment, as long as the court does not assess the constitutionality of the legislative act itself (Article 120 Dutch Constitution). In the (near) future a new paragraph will be added to this provision in the Constitution. It will grant every citizen of the Netherlands the right to a fair trial within a reasonable time before an independent and impartial court to establish his rights and obligations or to determine the merits of any legal proceedings against him. The proposal thus establishes a new fundamental right for citizens in Chapter 1 of the Constitution. Chapter 6 of the Dutch Constitution is also relevant as it states that the law will make clear which court is competent (Article 112 of the Dutch Constitution). The Netherlands has no constitutional court and therefore relies on its parliamentary system and the Council of State as a legislative adviser to guarantee the proper functioning of the Dutch constitution. In practice, the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Aarhus Convention are more relevant in legal procedures than the Dutch Constitution. The Netherlands has no constitutional court and therefore relies on its parliamentary system and the Council of State as a legislative adviser to guarantee the proper functioning of the Dutch constitution. In practice, the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Aarhus Convention are more relevant in legal procedures than the Dutch Constitution.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Procedures against administrative decisions in environmental matters are governed by both the general provisions of (administrative) procedural law, which are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act (GALA, in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht), mainly chapters 6, 7 and 8 which stipulate the general provisions on access to administrative courts, and by some additional provisions in specific acts of which the most important ones are the Environmental Management Act (EMA, in Dutch: Wet milieubeheer), the General Act on Environmental Permitting (GAEP, in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht), the Spatial Planning Act (SPA, in Dutch: Wet ruimtelijke ordening), the Water Act (in Dutch: Waterwet) and the Nature Conservation Act (in Dutch: Wet natuurbescherming).

After years of preparation, the Dutch legislator has recently adopted a new Environment and Planning Act (in Dutch: Omgevingswet) which will most likely be in force in 2022. This act will completely replace or replace relevant parts of the Environmental Management Act, the General Act on Environmental Permitting, the Spatial Planning Act, the Water Act, the Nature Conservation Act and many other environmental acts.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

Although it is not a typical case, the best known example of national case-law from the Netherlands Supreme Court is probably its decision in the Urgenda-case [ECLI:NL:HR:2019:2007] (in 2015, the Hague District Court (private law sector) became the first court of law that ordered a State to adopt more measures to tackle climate change. It ruled that the State must take more action to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in the Netherlands and ordered it to ensure that Dutch greenhouse gas emissions in the year 2020 would be at least 25 per cent lower than the 1990 levels. The Urgenda Foundation, partly on behalf of 886 Dutch concerned citizens, had requested that the court issue a ruling on the basis of tort law. In late-2018, the Hague Court of Appeal confirmed the District Court’s judgment, albeit on different grounds, and just before the end of 2019, the Supreme Court upheld this ruling, adding to the already extended and impressive reasoning. The Supreme Court in the judiciary system of general competence has casassion power only and provides unifying case law with regards to the application of private law.

The highest court in the Netherlands for judicial review of decisions by government bodies that concern the environment is the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State). This court provides unifying case law concerning the application of administrative and environmental laws and regulations. It is both an appellate court and a court of first instance and has reformatory competence. Recent influential judgments are concerned with the Dutch Programmatic Approach to Nitrogen (ECLI:NL:RVS:2019:1603 and ECLI:NL:RVS:2019:1604). This approach was codified in general binding rules (executive decree/delegated regulation) on the basis of the Nature Conservation Act, and the court had to decide on its legality in several cases brought by environmental organisations and concerned with decisions on permitting and enforcement of nature conservation legislation. The regulation provided that agricultural entrepreneurs (farmers) could be allowed to expand either by applying for a permit or by way of exemption, even though their activities would be detrimental to Natura 2000 areas. These areas are protected on the basis of the Dutch Nature Conservation Act which serves as an implementation of the EU Habitats Directive. The Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State decided that the Dutch Programmatic Approach to Nitrogen could not form the legal basis for allowing economic activities as the regulation was in breach of Article 6 of the EU Habitats Directive in several respects.

Another relevant development in light of access to justice in environmental cases has been the recent judgment of the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State in which it redefined which parties qualify as an interested party and will therefore have standing in administrative court proceedings on the basis of Article 8:1, in conjunction with Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act (ECLI:NL:RVS:2017:2271). For many years, the courts had decided that anyone who could possibly experience the environmental effects of an environmental permit was considered an interested party. The court now reasoned that this was not in line with its own case-law in relation to zoning schemes and licenses for public events and decided that the question on standing, e.g. who is an interested party as defined in Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act, would have to be answered consistently in all cases concerning decisions that have an effect on the environment. Anyone who is directly and actually affected by an activity permitted by the decision - such as a zoning plan or a permit - is, in principle, an interested party. However, the criterion 'consequences of any significance' serves as a possibility for a correction. Consequences of any significance are missing if the effect on the applicant’s interests can be determined objectively, but the consequences for the person involved are so small that a personal interest in relation to the decision is lacking. In this assessment, consideration is given to the factors of distance, visibility, spatial impact and environmental consequences (e.g. odour, noise, light, vibration, emission, risk) of the activity permitted by the decision. The nature, intensity and frequency of the actual consequences may also be important. Legal standards do not determine whether the person concerned has a personal interest in the decision. If the decision and the grounds for appeal cause to do so, the question of whether such a standard is met will be considered in the substantive assessment of the judicial review. Ultimately, it is up to the administrative court to decide who is an interested party. The litigant in question therefore does not have to prove that he is an interested party in a decision.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Once a treaty has come into force in international law, legislative, administrative and judicial authorities must accept the newly created legal situation as lawful and must take it into consideration when making their decisions. They must do all that is possible to apply the terms of the treaty considering their constitutional position in the State organization. The parties have the right to invoke international treaties directly in administrative or court procedures if these rights are considered self-executing (binding on all). Domestic statutory regulations may not be applied if such application is in conflict with provisions that are binding on all persons (Article 94 of the Dutch Constitution). They can also rely upon EU law if it has direct effect. Article 21 of the Dutch Constitution could be invoked by parties in procedures against decisions by administrative authorities. In most cases, however, it will not have the desired effect because of the discretion that Government has in achieving the objective(s) of this provision. Any provision of an international treaty can be invoked in administrative and judicial proceeding after it has been published and when such a provision is of a generally binding nature (Article 93 of the Dutch Constitution). This is true for several relevant provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the Aarhus Convention, which was adopted by both the Netherlands and the European Union.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Legal protection in the Netherlands is first of all provided by the courts of general jurisdiction that are competent to decide on private law (between private parties) and criminal law cases (Article 112 of the Dutch Constitution and Article 2 Judiciary (Organization) Act). This system has three tiers. A case is heard first by the District Court (in Dutch: Rechtbank) and if a party does not agree with the judgment, he may lodge an appeal with the Court of Appeal (in Dutch: Gerechtshof). The Court of Appeal re-examines the facts of the case and reaches its own conclusions. Thereafter, it is usually possible to refer a dispute to the highest court, the Supreme Court of the Netherlands (in Dutch: Hoge Raad). The Supreme Court of the Netherlands examines only whether the lower court(s) observed proper application of the law in reaching its judgment. At this stage, the facts of the case as established by the lower court(s) are no longer subject to discussion.

Judicial review of (single case) administrative law decisions that are concerned with the environment are adjudicated by a District Court (administrative law sector) as a court of first instance. An appeal may be lodged with one of the highest administrative law courts in the Netherlands. For environmental decisions this is the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State). This court will also hear some relevant cases (e.g. zoning schemes) as a court of first and only instance.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Netherlands is divided into 11 districts, each with its own District Court. District Courts are divided into 3 sectors: a civil law sector, a criminal law sector and an administrative law sector. The 11 districts are divided into 4 areas of jurisdiction for the Courts of Appeal for civil and criminal disputes and some specific administrative disputes (e.g. tax law). With regard to criminal and civil law, the justices of the Court of Appeal only deal with cases where an appeal has been lodged against the judgment passed by the District Court. There is no special court or tribunal for environmental matters. The law will stipulate that anyone who could possibly experience the environmental effects of an environmental permit was considered an interested party. However, the criterion 'consequences of any significance' serves as a possibility for a correction. Consequences of any significance are missing if the effect on the applicant’s interests can be determined objectively, but the consequences for the person involved are so small that a personal interest in relation to the decision is lacking. In this assessment, consideration is given to the factors of distance, visibility, spatial impact and environmental consequences (e.g. odour, noise, light, vibration, emission, risk) of the activity permitted by the decision. The nature, intensity and frequency of the actual consequences may also be important. Legal standards do not determine whether the person concerned has a personal interest in the decision. If the decision and the grounds for appeal cause to do so, the question of whether such a standard is met will be considered in the substantive assessment of the judicial review. Ultimately, it is up to the administrative court to decide who is an interested party. The litigant in question therefore does not have to prove that he is an interested party in a decision.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

Once a treaty has come into force in international law, legislative, administrative and judicial authorities must accept the newly created legal situation as lawful and must take it into consideration when making their decisions. They must do all that is possible to apply the terms of the treaty considering their constitutional position in the State organization. The parties have the right to invoke international treaties directly in administrative or court procedures if these rights are considered self-executing (binding on all). Domestic statutory regulations may not be applied if such application is in conflict with provisions that are binding on all persons (Article 94 of the Dutch Constitution). They can also rely upon EU law if it has direct effect. Article 21 of the Dutch Constitution could be invoked by parties in procedures against decisions by administrative authorities. In most cases, however, it will not have the desired effect because of the discretion that Government has in achieving the objective(s) of this provision. Any provision of an international treaty can be invoked in administrative and judicial proceeding after it has been published and when such a provision is of a generally binding nature (Article 93 of the Dutch Constitution). This is true for several relevant provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the Aarhus Convention, which was adopted by both the Netherlands and the European Union.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Legal protection in the Netherlands is first of all provided by the courts of general jurisdiction that are competent to decide on private law (between private parties) and criminal law cases (Article 112 of the Dutch Constitution and Article 2 Judiciary (Organization) Act). This system has three tiers. A case is heard first by the District Court (in Dutch: Rechtbank) and if a party does not agree with the judgment, he may lodge an appeal with the Court of Appeal (in Dutch: Gerechtshof). The Court of Appeal re-examines the facts of the case and reaches its own conclusions. Thereafter, it is usually possible to refer a dispute to the highest court, the Supreme Court of the Netherlands (in Dutch: Hoge Raad). The Supreme Court of the Netherlands examines only whether the lower court(s) observed proper application of the law in reaching its judgment. At this stage, the facts of the case as established by the lower court(s) are no longer subject to discussion.

Judicial review of (single case) administrative law decisions that are concerned with the environment are adjudicated by a District Court (administrative law sector) as a court of first instance. An appeal may be lodged with one of the highest administrative law courts in the Netherlands. For environmental decisions this is the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State). This court will also hear some relevant cases (e.g. zoning schemes) as a court of first and only instance.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

The Netherlands is divided into 11 districts, each with its own District Court. District Courts are divided into 3 sectors: a civil law sector, a criminal law sector and an administrative law sector. The 11 districts are divided into 4 areas of jurisdiction for the Courts of Appeal for civil and criminal disputes and some specific administrative disputes (e.g. tax law). With regard to criminal and civil law, the justices of the Court of Appeal only deal with cases where an appeal has been lodged against the judgment passed by the District Court. There is no special court or tribunal for environmental matters. The law will stipulate which court is competent, so there is no relevant possibility for forum shopping; any decision by a local government (municipality, province or water board) is lodged at the district court of the district where the government is located and a decision by any other governmental authority is lodged at the district court in the district where the appellant lives. With a few exceptions, administrative disputes on governmental decisions about environmental matters (judicial review) must be lodged by an interested party and heard first by one of the eleven District Courts (administrative law sector). Although the District Courts are competent to rule on any case concerning an administrative law decision by a public authority, the competence does not include general binding rules and policy rules. Against (single case) decisions, an interested party has the right to apply to the court for judicial review (Article 8:1 and 1:2 General Administrative Law Act). An interested party may lodge an appeal against the judgment of the District Court with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State, which is the highest administrative law court for environmental decisions.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

Usually the cases are heard by the District Court by a single-judge division, but the court can decide to appoint three judges to a case which is complex or which involves fundamental issues. In environmental matters governed by administrative law and in a lot of other areas, appeal is a matter for the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State), which will have a case dealt with by three judges although it could decide to have a simple case heard by a single judge. In other areas Dutch administrative law provides for a special appeals tribunal, like the Central Appeals Tribunal (in Dutch: Centrale Raad van Beroep) for cases involving civil servants and social security issues, the Court of Appeal for appeals against tax assessments, and the Trade and Industry Appeals Tribunal (in Dutch: College van Beroep voor het Bedrijfsleven) for disputes in the area of social-economic administrative law and for appeals for specific laws, such as the Competition Act. The proceedings before all these courts are regulated by the provisions of Chapters 6, 7 and 8 of the General Administrative Law Act and therefore do not differ much. None of the courts are allowed to have laymen contribute to the judgments.

In many administrative disputes, the hearing by the administrative law sector of the District Court is preceded by a procedure under the auspices of the administrative authority, either by allowing (in most cases) anyone to state their views about a draft decision or by obliging an interested party to lodge an objection against a decision before one can bring a case to the administrative law court for judicial review. With regard to the requirement of participation in the administrative procedure preceding the judicial review, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) in its judgment in case C-826/18 that this requirement is partially in violation of requirements of the Aarhus Convention (ECLI:EU:C:2021:7).

When a case is being dealt with in an objection procedure or by an administrative court, the applicant has the possibility to ask the court for a provisional or interim measure in a specific procedure if there is sufficient reason and a sufficiently urgent interest (Articles 8:81-8:86 General Administrative Law Act). If the interim measures requested are allowed by the administrative court it will mean, in most cases, that the challenged decision is suspended. In procedures about administrative decisions that affect the environment, there is the possibility that the court will appoint a specific independent expert, the Foundation for Advising Administrative Courts in environmental and zoning cases (in Dutch: Stichting Advies & Raadplegingsdiensten voor Bestuursrecht). This foundation is funded by government and has a specific expertise in environmental matters. The law provides that it will write a report on any environmental case at the request of an administrative court. In administrative court procedures, the courts do not have the possibility to investigate parts of an administrative decision that have not been challenged by the applicant. Any court, however, has the authority to investigate the facts of the case by hearing witnesses, by asking for (written) evidence or by appointing an expert, as long as it concerns the conflict that has been brought to court by the parties in the procedure. Administrative courts will use these powers in cases where the applicant has supplied sufficient information to doubt the facts that the administrative authority has based its decision on. Case law proves that parties to the conflict being decided by the courts have the duty to provide evidence on their own matters, although the administrative authority of course always has the duty to take due care in preparing any administrative decision.

4) Level of control in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

In procedures against administrative decisions, a competent court will quash (or annull) the decision if the applicant has brought forward arguments that prove the decision to be in breach of the law. There are very few elements that the court will investigate on its own motion; it will annul the decision if the public authority or person that has taken decision was not competent to do so, and it will declare an appeal inadmissible if any of the formal requirements are not met. When the appeal is well-founded, the judgment will inherently lead to the annulment of the decision. An administrative court does have the competence to determine that its judgment should take the place of the annulled decision or the annulled part thereof (either deciding that the legal consequences of the annulled decision will remain valid or that the judgment provides an amended administrative decision). Exercising that authority will be justified only in cases where it is sufficiently obvious what decision the administrative body would have to take after the annulment. The administrative courts have found more and more ways to make use of this competence in cases where the administrative decision was annulled. However, by default, many cases in which the decision is annulled will lead to a new decision by the same administrative authority. Courts are able to award compensatory damages to citizens against the public authority when there are grounds to do so (on the basis of tort), a request has been made by that citizen and the challenged decision has been found in breach of the law.

The provisions on the procedural steps for hearing the case in many cases award the court some discretion; this is the case for the application of the courts discretionary powers concerning establishing the facts (expert advice; written testimony etc.). In all cases, the procedure must provide for formal public hearing and a deadline for providing evidence and statements of ten days before the formal hearing. After the formal hearing and the closing of the case, judgment will be delivered within 6 or 12 weeks.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Administrative environmental decisions are taken by administrative authorities of municipalities, provinces or on state level. In many cases the administrative authorities of the municipality are competent to take a decision (adopting a zoning scheme; granting a permit). For specific decisions, the provincial level is competent. Also, at the State level, a specific Minister (see [3] https://www.government.nl/) might be competent.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

The administrative procedures in environmental matters are governed by both the general provisions on administrative procedure of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) and by some specific provisions in the General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht) and the Environmental Management Act (in Dutch: Wet milieubeheer), the Spatial Planning Act (in Dutch: Wet ruimtelijke ordening) and other special acts.

Articles 8:1 and 7:1 General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) stipulate that any interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) may bring a case against a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) made by an administrative authority (Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act) to the administrative court, but must first file an objection (in Dutch: bezwaarschrift) with the authority that took the decision. The result of this objection procedure will be a (re)new(ed) decision by the same public authority. Only that decision can be the subject of judicial review by the administrative court.

For a number of important environmental permitting decisions, such as whether or not to grant an environmental permit (e.g. the permitting system that is required on the basis of the EU Industrial Emissions Directive, IED) and the adoption of municipal zoning schemes, the law provides for a procedure that involves public participation based on a draftdecision by the public authority. In order to be able to lodge an appeal against the final decision, one has to participate in the preparatory procedure (article 6:13 GALA). This requirement has been ruled partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) in its judgment in case C-826/18.[3] When the law provides that this procedure is applicable, a decision will be drafted and will be made publicly known. The draft decision and the documents that it is based on will be available for anyone’s viewing for six weeks. During that time anyone can participate in the decision-making process by submitting their views to the competent authority. The competent authority will have to respond to these views before taking and publishing the final decision. Such a final decision has to be taken within 6 months of the application for the environmental permit. This administrative procedure is laid down in section 3.4 (uniform extensive public preparation procedure) of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) and section 3.3 of the General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht). This procedure is applicable when it is stipulated by law or when the administrative authority decides to prepare the decision using this procedure. Any decision that was prepared in this extensive procedure is subject to review by a court directly without a prior objection procedure. Judicial review of an environmental case may take approximately a year.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence
Next to the court system consisting of courts with a general competence, the Netherlands judiciary system provides special courts for specific disputes concerned with administrative decisions, such as zoning schemes or permits. There are, however, no special environmental courts or tribunals.

Administrative courts are competent to hear cases on decisions by public authorities. The term decision is defined as the written decision of an administrative authority constituting a public law act (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act). However, the administrative courts in the Netherlands are not competent to directly rule in cases concerned with general binding rules, policy rules or factual acts by government authorities (Article 8:2, 8:3 General Administrative Law Act). Those cases can be heard by (the private law sectors of) the District Courts on the basis of tort law. In those proceedings the provisions governing standing in private law will be relevant.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)
Most cases against environmental administrative decisions by the competent public authorities are lodged with the District Courts unless another procedure (e.g., appeal in first and only instance with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State) is stipulated. For most cases concerning environmental permits, the District Court and thereafter the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State are competent. Cases on zoning plans go directly to the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State. For instance: a zoning plan will be adopted according to the uniform extensive public preparation procedure that has to be applied by the competent authority in preparing the decision. Judicial review of a zoning plan is a matter for the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State (in Dutch: Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak van de Raad van State) in first and last instance. The approval or refusal of an application for an environmental permit that is required in light of the EU Industrial Emissions Directive (or on other grounds in accordance with Article 2.1(1) sub e of the General Act on Environmental Permitting) will also be prepared by applying the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act but will be subject to judicial review by the District Court first (no administrative review of any kind against the final decision is provided in these cases). An interested party may lodge an appeal against the judgment of the District Court with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State. In such cases on an environmental license, the courts will grant the public authority a small margin of appreciation when establishing what are the Best Available Techniques for the specific installation at hand. In all procedures of judicial review, the applicant may ask for provisional or interim measures in accordance with the general provisions on injunctive relief in administrative procedures (Articles 8:81-8:86 General Administrative Law Act).

The Dutch General Administrative Law Act (GALA) provides all procedural rules for judicial review and the administrative procedure that are to be followed before one can apply for judicial review. It also provides for extraordinary ways of lodging an appeal against decisions that concern the environment (e.g. no obligatory objection procedure when the decision has been prepared by following the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act; no obligatory objection procedure when the decision is designated in an annex to the GALA; judicial review in first and only instance with the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State if the decision is designated in an annex to the GALA, etc.). The General Administrative Law Act also provides for extraordinary procedures. During the objection procedure and during all administrative law procedures for judicial review the applicant may ask for provisional or interim measures in accordance with the general provisions on injunctive relief in administrative procedures (Articles 8:81-8:86 General Administrative Law Act).

None of the legislative procedural acts in the Netherlands introduce specific provisions for instigating the preliminary reference procedure with the European Court of Justice. The District Courts and the highest administrative courts make use of the competence to give an interlocutory ruling regulated in Article 8:80a General Administrative Law Act. The competence is, however, not specifically tailored for this use.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?
Some administrative courts, including the highest administrative court in environmental cases, offer parties the possibility to call in a mediator and try to settle their conflict by finding consensus and without the courts delivering judgment. Although these have proven highly efficient in a small number of cases, the administrative courts have all adopted a new way of hearing cases that allows courts to have a strong focus on procedural justice and investigate possibilities to deal with the case in other ways than by simply amnulling the administrative decision in its judgment.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?
The existence of a National Ombudsman is guaranteed by Article 79a of the Dutch Constitution (in Dutch: Grondwet). The Netherlands has a special National Ombudsman Act (in Dutch: Wet Nationale ombudsman). In addition, the work of the National Ombudsman’s Office is covered by the Dutch General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht). The National Ombudsman investigates complaints brought to him by members of the public. He can also launch investigations on his own initiative. There is no special Ombudsman for environmental matters. At anyone’s complaint the Dutch Ombudsman is competent to investigate the behaviour of government. The Ombudsman mostly helps individual citizens who are experiencing problems with government and explains to administrative authorities how they can do things better. Where appropriate, the National Ombudsman responds to problems or complaints by launching investigations. By law, all parties concerned have to cooperate with these. The National Ombudsman is a ‘fall-back provision’. If you have a complaint about government, the first step is to complain to the administrative authority itself. The National Ombudsman can only deal with a complaint if it was first lodged with the administrative authority itself and the complaint was not sufficiently dealt with.

1.4: How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?
In administrative procedures, the basic rule is that an interested party, a person whose interest is directly affected by a decision (Article 1:2(1) General Administrative Law Act), must be able to participate in the procedure that will lead to the decision. This is the case both in the administrative procedure that is stipulated for individual decisions and for cases where the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act is applicable (even in cases where anyone is allowed to submit their views, e.g. Article 3.12, lid 5 General Act on Environmental Permitting (in Dutch: Wet algemene bepalingen omgevingsrecht). Article 1:2(1) General Administrative Law Act states that an interested party is a person (or any legal entity) whose interest is directly affected by a decision. Article 1:2(3) General Administrative Law Act stipulates that with regard to legal entities, their interests are deemed to include the general (or: public) and collective interests which they particularly represent in accordance with their articles of association (bylaws) and as evidenced by their actual activities. The rule that stipulates that an interested party has the right to appeal a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) taken by a public authority (Article 8:1 and 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) is applicable for all administrative review procedures and administrative court proceedings. In 2005, the actio popularis was removed from the body of Dutch administrative procedural law. The sectoral, environmental legislation does not diverge from this general rule of legal standing; therefore it applies in cases concerned with decision for which an Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) is required on the basis of EU law and in cases concerned with the application of a permit that is required in accordance with the Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) for an installation as defined in that directive. Although sectoral legislation on environmental matters often stipulates that not just an interested party but anyone is entitled to submit his or her views on a draft decision, legal standing before an administrative court is awarded only to an interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act). Administrative authorities may also qualify as an interested party. Article 1:2(1 and 2) General Administrative Law Act reads that the interests entrusted to a public authority by the legislator are deemed to be their interests. The public tasks attributed to them and the competences they have are decisive in assessing which interests are entrusted to them. In accordance with Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act, the National Ombudsman is not deemed to be such an administrative authority.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

The Dutch legislator aims to provide uniform provisions on access to justice. In many cases, the relevant provisions of the General Administrative Law Act (GALA, in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) provide clarity as to procedures to be followed and the possibilities of judicial review against a decision. Although some sectoral legislation provides additional regulation, in most cases the rules on standing, appeal requirements, and court fees are uniform. In some environmental cases the law prescribes that an Environmental Impact Assessment (EIA) report has to be drawn up by the applicant before the public authority is able to decide on an application (Chapter 7 of the Environmental Management Act) for a permit or another decision that one can appeal against with an administrative court. Any decision on EIA screening, EIA scoping or acceptance of an EIA report by the public authority can be challenged in court by filing an appeal against the decision by the public authority that allows or refuses the permit or the decision. There are no special rules on standing, forum, hearing, evidence or the extent of the review by the court. EIA is seen as an important instrument to prepare certain decisions that potentially have significant effects on the environment. It ensures those involved that the competent authority is able to respect the duty of careful preparation of the decision. In most cases, the draft-decision is made public together with the EIA report and anyone is allowed to submit views before a final decision is made. Administrative Courts will review both the procedural legality and the substantive legality of administrative decisions as long as the interested parties have made that specific part of the decision a part of the dispute (see Article 6:69(1) General Administrative Law Act).

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

An interested party is anyone whose interest is directly affected by an administrative decision. Case law provides that there should be a personal, objectively determinable interest that belongs to the person filing the case. Regarding administrative authorities, the interests entrusted to them are deemed to be their interests. Regarding legal entities (Article 1:2(3) General Administrative Law Act), their interests are deemed to include the general and collective interests that they particularly represent in accordance with their rules of association (bylaws) and as evidenced by their actual activities. This is also true for foreign NGOs. An example of a general interest could be the protection of the environment in a specific area. One of the most relevant criteria for any legal entity claiming to represent a general interest is the fact that its actions should prove that the specific general interest relevant to the case has been looked after by the legal entity, e.g. by providing proof of activities aimed at protecting the environment. Whether a legal entity (e.g. an NGO) represents general interests of protecting the environment is assessed on a case-by-case basis. Lodging appeals or asking for enforcement action will not count as actual activities. However, this requirement is not applied when a collective interest is represented and the members of the association qualify as interested parties.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

Discrimination based on country of origin and/or language is forbidden by the Dutch Constitution (Article 1). In general the (procedural) law demands that all lawsuits, appeals and other written documents are submitted to the court in Dutch. The judgment and other written documents of the court will also be in Dutch. One exception exists for the Dutch province of Friesland; there, the Frisian language can be used in court (Wet gebruik Friese taal). However, there are possibilities to have relevant documents that are written in another language translated. If the notice of objection or appeal is in a foreign language and a translation is necessary for the objection or appeal to be properly dealt with, the applicant must arrange for a translation and pay for the costs. Furthermore, when someone participates in a court hearing and is unable to speak the Dutch language sufficiently, he is allowed to use his own language and arrange for an interpreter and pay for the costs. Only if the court arranges for an interpreter, and this will - in environmental matters – in general not be the case, will the costs be paid by the court (see Article 8:35 and 8:36 General Administrative Law Act).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Administrative Courts will review both the procedural legality and the substantive legality of administrative decisions as long as the interested parties have made that specific part of the decision a part of the dispute (see Article 6:69(1) General Administrative Law Act). When a public authority has been granted a margin of appreciation by the legislator in weighing the different interests involved in making a specific decision, the court will allow for this margin by applying a marginal review and upholding any decisions that it finds not unreasonable (Article 3:4(2) General Administrative Law Act). In general, courts will review the administrative decision and will ascertain whether the competent authority could justifiably base the decision on the material, technical findings and calculations that were used. There are no written rules of evidence other than the rules that have to be applied when establishing the facts in the administrative procedure that leads to the decision (e.g. good governance principles). In criminal and civil court procedures, there are specific rules on how to provide evidence and who must bear the burden of proof. In civil procedures, the parties have to propose all of the evidence for their statements to the court as soon as possible. The state prosecutor prosecutes and must provide all evidence in criminal procedures concerned with environmental matters. In the rules on administrative court procedures, there are some formal rules on providing evidence but none are about which one of the parties will have the burden of proof. Case law of course provides for rules of thumb concerning substantial rules of evidence. For instance: when the challenged decision restricts a citizen in his or her rights or is of a punitive nature, the burden of proof is on the public authority. Another relevant rule of thumb is: who took the initiative for the administrative decision? If the administrative decision-making started with an application by the citizen involved, the first burden of proof is on the applicant. Policy documents and generally binding rules cannot be directly reviewed by an administrative court. However, the General Administrative Law Act does provide formal rules concerning the establishment of the facts by administrative courts. For instance, the courts are competent to ask parties for written evidence and can also appoint an independent expert, like the Foundation for advising Administrative Courts in environmental and zoning schemes cases (Stichting Advisering Bestuursrechtspraak or STAB). It should be noticed with regard to gathering evidence, that Article 6:22 of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) provides that any flaw that will not harm the interests of any of the interested parties can be overlooked by the court. Also relevant in this respect is Article 6:69a GALA, which stipulates that an administrative decision will not be quashed by the court if the decision is in breach of any rule which was not written to protect the interests of the party that filed the case. In environmental matters, however, the provisions protecting the environment, nature and health are deemed to have been written to protect the clean, healthy and acceptable living conditions of citizens that live or own property nearby. Therefore, individuals could also rely on such provisions.
2) Can one introduce new evidence?
Providing new evidence in court for the first time (either in the procedure of first instance or in appeal) is allowed unless the principle of due process is violated. Although the legislator once explained that administrative courts should seek the objective truth and the courts are competent to request evidence on their own motion (ex officio), the current proceedings before the administrative courts, in many ways, resemble the procedure in civil courts where the parties are expected to provide their evidence. Parties are able to present expert opinions, have an expert heard as a witness and ask the court to appoint an expert to conduct an investigation (see division 8.2.2 General Administrative Law Act on the preliminary inquiry). The court will evaluate all the evidence presented and conclude which evidence is most probably in line with the truth. When an expert opinion is presented, it is, of course, not binding on an administrative judge, although judges are likely to follow the opinion of the expert it appointed. The opinion of an expert is also not binding in cases where the court did not appoint the expert but a party presented a report. The courts are always able to assess the quality and the consistency of the report and will take into account whether the expert has reported in accordance with the principle of due care.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts
In administrative court procedures, the courts do not have the possibility to investigate parts of an administrative decision that have not been challenged by the applicant. Any court, however, has the authority to investigate the facts of the case by hearing witnesses, by asking for (written) evidence or by appointing an expert, as long as it concerns the conflict that has been brought to court by the parties in the procedure. Administrative courts will use these powers in cases where the applicant has supplied sufficient information to doubt the facts that the administrative authority has based its decision on. Case law proves that parties to the case that is before the court have the duty to provide evidence on their own motion and they are allowed to do so. This is also true in environmental matters before administrative courts, although the administrative authority, of course, always has the duty to take due care in preparing any administrative decision.

In procedures about administrative decisions on environmental matters, there is the possibility that if the court appoints an independent expert it will be the Foundation for Advising Administrative Courts in environmental and zoning cases (Stichting Advies Bestuursrechtspraak or StAB). This foundation is funded by government and has a specific expertise in environmental matters. The law provides that it will write a report on any environmental case at the request of an administrative court.

There is no publicly available list or registry of experts in environmental cases. Courts may invite individual experts with expertise on specific aspects of a case before them by selecting them based on their publications about that subject matter.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
The court will establish the facts of the case even when an expert has been appointed by the court. However, a carefully prepared expert opinion delivered to the court by an independent expert will most likely be the basis for the judgment of the court, as the opinion of the expert is valuable to the court.

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
The formal requirements for an expert called upon by the court are stipulated in Article 8:47 of the General Administrative Law Act. Any administrative court may appoint an expert to conduct an investigation. The appointment must state the task to be performed and set a term within which the expert must submit a written report on the investigation to him. The intention to appoint an expert must be notified to the parties and the court may give the parties the opportunity to express their wishes regarding the investigation in writing within a period of time to be determined by the court. Both the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State[4] and the (ordinary) judiciary[5] have introduced Codes of Conduct for experts that are appointed by the court to deliver an expert opinion.

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
The General Administrative Law Act provides general provisions concerning the expert opinions that public authorities may use to come to its decision. In the administrative procedure leading up to the decision, section 3:3 GALA is concerned with the experts that the public authority is obliged to call upon and are called ‘advisers’. The administrative authority to which the opinion is delivered must provide the adviser, at his request or otherwise, with the information needed to enable him to discharge his duties properly and must set a term if the law does not already provide one. The decision of the public authority will state the name of the advisers. The most relevant provision is Article 3:9 GALA, which provides that when an order is based on an investigation carried out by an adviser, the administrative authority must satisfy itself that the investigation was carried out with due care. The public authority must base its decision on the results of the investigation of the adviser if this is not case. This basic principle is applicable for all expert opinions that decisions are based on (Article 3:2 GALA).

During the procedure before an administrative court, the parties can call upon an expert to report on a specific aspect of the case and submit the report to the court in order to convince the court. For the parties that aim to have the court annul the decision, the law does not provide any rules for experts called upon.

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
When the court appoints the expert, the expert will be awarded a set payment from the judiciary for the task. Parties do not bear these costs.

Article 8:36(2) of the General Administrative Law Act provides that the party who has brought or summoned a witness or an expert must reimburse the costs thereof. This also applies to the party to whom an expert's report has been issued. In connection with this, Article 1(b) of the Decree on Administrative Procedure Costs stipulates that the costs of a witness, expert or interpreter brought in or summoned by a party or interested party may be reimbursed. This also applies to the costs of an expert who has reported to a party. According to the established case law of the highest administrative courts, the costs of engaging an expert are eligible for reimbursement if such engagement was reasonable and if the expert costs themselves are reasonable. The question is whether, in view of the facts and circumstances as they existed at the time the expert was called upon, the party that called upon the expert could assume that the expert would make a relevant contribution to the court's answering of a question that may be relevant to the outcome of the dispute.

1.6 Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures
1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field
Lawyers play an important role in judicial procedures in environmental matters as environmental law is getting more and more complex. If a case is won in the environmental field, the public authority could reimburse costs for legal counsel if the court so orders. The amount that can be awarded is maximized and is usually well below the actual costs (Article 8:75 General Administrative Law Act). However, in administrative procedures, legal counsel is not obligatory. The same is true for all procedures before the administrative courts. Legal counsel is therefore not mandatory in administrative judicial procedures. In other words, the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) does not prescribe legal counsel for lodging an appeal, nor for legal representation in court proceedings. In civil court proceedings legal representation is obligatory in many cases, although there is an important exception for cases in which the financial interest of the case is no larger than EUR 25,000. The same applies for criminal court procedures. All lawyers are members of the Bar (in Dutch: Orde van Advocaten). On their website you can find lawyers through some keywords, like areas of specialization such as environmental law (in Dutch: milieurecht/omgevingsrecht). One can also visit the website of the government at https://rechtwijzer.nl/ or https://www.juridischloket.nl/.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

https://www.juridischloket.nl/
Law firms could be persuaded to provide pro bono legal assistance and some of them say that they provide such assistance on a regular basis, but most law firms will probably not provide legal assistance for free in relatively normal cases.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

There are a few websites that provide information on how to get in touch with law firms or lawyers that will provide pro bono existence.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

The first line of legal aid provided by the Netherlands is online self-help. Information and support are offered on the Rechtwijzer website (Roadmap to Justice). This website provides legal information that is helpful in common legal procedures. To receive pro bono assistance will require getting in touch with a lawyer who or law firm that is willing to provide it.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

All lawyers are members of the Bar (in Dutch: Orde van Advocaten). On their website you can find lawyers through some keywords, like areas of specialization such as environmental law (in Dutch: milieurecht/omgevingsrecht). Also, the website for the Legal Services Counters provides a search engine for lawyers and similar information is available at the website that provides a roadmap to justice.

For natural scientists and other non-legal experts there are no registries or general public websites.

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

There are many NGOs active in the environmental field but there is no complete verified list available of these Dutch NGOs.

4) List of international NGOs, who are active in the Member State

In some cases environmental NGOs, such as Greenpeace, The World Wide Fund for nature or Friends of the Earth Netherlands (in Dutch: Milieudienstige), will be able to help the public lodge appeals.

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level)

An administrative environmental decision for which judicial review is possible by an administrative court must be challenged within 6 weeks after the decision has been officially notified (Article 8:7 GALA); either for lodging an administrative review (objection procedure) or a judicial review procedure by the administrative court. In most cases, one is allowed to submit a pro forma appeal which means that another term is awarded to submit grounds for the appeal.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

If an objection is lodged against a decision, the time limit for deciding on the raised objections by the administrative authority is stipulated in Article 7:10 General Administrative Law Act and is either six or twelve weeks after the term to file an objection has passed. The twelve-week term is only applicable when an external review advisory board of at least three persons is asked to provide advice on the objection(s) filed.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

If the uniform extensive public preparation procedure codified in section 3.4 General Administrative Law Act (GALA) was followed in preparing the environmental decision, the decision should be challenged by lodging an appeal directly with the District Court or with the court that is made competent by the legislator. If this preparatory procedure was not followed, it is obligatory to follow an objection procedure by filing an objection with the administrative authority that has taken the decision before an appeal may be lodged (Article 8:1 and 7:1 GALA).

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

The General Administrative Law Act sets a time limit for delivering the judgment after the hearing by an administrative court. This time limit is six weeks and can be extended for another six weeks. However, there are no sanctions against courts delivering late judgments. Usually an administrative court will need 9 to 12 months to deliver its judgment.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

There is no time limit for the court to set a date for the hearing. If a court date has been set, the parties have until ten days before the hearing to deliver new information or new grounds for their appeal, but they should be aware that the principle of due process could limit the freedom to send in new information or grounds.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

In general, an appeal against a governmental decision in the Netherlands does not have a suspensive effect (see Article 6:16 General Administrative Law). However, sectoral or specific legislation may diverge from this general rule. In most environmental decisions this is not the case.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

If an objection has been filed with the administrative authority, the president of the District Court which has or may have jurisdiction in the proceedings on the merits may, on request, grant a provisional remedy where speed is of the essence because of the interests involved. So as soon as an objection is filed (pro forma), courts are competent to grant injunctive relief at the request of any interested party that has lodged the objection and has proved the urgent need for a precautionary relief because of the interests involved (see Article 8:81 General Administrative Law Act). The injunctive relief can consist of any court ordered action but will, in practically all cases, consist of awarding a suspensive effect or removing the suspensive effect of a decision that was taken by the administrative authority.

There is no appeal against an injunction by the administrative court.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

Suspensive effect might be asked for under the conditions stated above and can only be requested during a procedure of legal protection such as an objection procedure or a court procedure.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

In general, administrative decisions can be immediately executed, irrespective of an appeal or a court action. Any execution of a decision that is later annulled by court, however, may lead to liability. In practice, decisions are often not yet executed and a court decision might be awaited.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Although there are examples of decisions that are - on the basis of sectoral legislation - de jure suspended when an administrative decision is challenged, this is usually not the case as the General Administrative Law Act provides otherwise (Article 6:16 GALA) and that provision applies to most environmental decisions.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

If an appeal against a decision has been lodged with the District Court, the president of the District Court which has jurisdiction in the proceedings on the merits may, on request, grant a provisional remedy where speed is of the essence because of the interests involved. So, as soon as an appeal is lodged (pro forma), courts are competent to grant injunctive relief at the request of any interested party that has lodged the appeal and has proved the urgent need for a injunctive relief because of the interests involved (see Article 8:81 General Administrative Law Act). The injunctive relief can consist of any court ordered action but will, in practically all cases, consist of awarding a suspensive effect or removing the suspensive effect of a decision that was taken by the administrative authority. There is no appeal against an injunction by the administrative court.

When a suspensive effect has been ordered by the administrative court, the decision may not be executed. No one may make use of the permission that has been given by such a decision. If this occurs anyway, an interested party may ask for enforcement action by the public authority. Also, anyone who claims that the actions are to be considered a tort, may apply for an injunctive relief with the District Court (private law sector).

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Administrative procedures such as the preparatory procedure and the objection procedure are free of charge. For an administrative court to hear an applicant’s case, it is necessary to pay a fee. The fee for court proceedings in first instance is stipulated in Article 8:41 of the General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht). In general, the fee is not considered to be very high. It varies on the basis of the type of person that instigates the procedure and the type of case and substantive law that applies to the case. Article 8:41(3) General Administrative Law Act mentions the different fees explicitly. In 2020 the fee is EUR 48 for any natural person that lodges an appeal or an injunction against a decision by an administrative authority that is concerned with social security and related legislation (see Article 8:41(3) General Administrative Law Act). It is EUR 178 for a natural person in any other case and EUR 354 for any legal person lodging an appeal or an injunction. Fees for proceedings before an Administrative Court of Appeal are somewhat higher and are stipulated in Article 8:109 GALA, they are EUR 131, 265 and 532, respectively. If the appeal is successful, these costs will usually have to be paid by the administrative authority (Article 8:75 and 8:114 General Administrative Law Act). In very rare cases of abuse of the right to appeal, the court might decide that the applicant should bear the (fixed) costs of the administrative authority such as the court fees and costs for lawyers. The courts practically never make use of this competence.

2) Cost of injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

The costs of the injunctive relief procedure before the administrative courts are the same as the court fees for the judicial review by the court.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

The courts cannot provide exemptions from court fees. The Dutch legal aid system provides legal aid to people of limited means. Anyone in need of professional legal aid but unable to (fully) bear the costs is entitled to call upon the provisions as set down in the Legal Aid Act (in Dutch: Wet op de Rechtsbijstand). Residing under the competence of the Ministry of Justice & Security, an independent governing body called the Legal Aid Board (in Dutch: Raad voor Rechtsbijstand) is entrusted with all matters concerning administration, supervision and expenditure as well as with the actual implementation of the legal aid system. This includes matching the availability of legal experts with the demand for legal aid, as well as the supervision and quality control of the actual services provided.

In general, the Dutch legal aid system can be described as a threefold model as it encompasses three lines that provide legal aid consisting of a public preliminary provision, public first-line and private second-line help. See the website of the Legal Aid Board for more information or the specific website for the system of legal aid. One could also visit the website of the judiciary that provides information on the system of legal aid.

Second, there are the Legal Services Counters that act as what is commonly known as the ‘front office’ of legal aid. Legal matters are clarified by providing information and advice either online, by telephone or at one of the 30 Legal Services Counters. Clients may be referred to a private lawyer or mediator, who act as the secondary line of legal aid. Clients may also apply for help from a subsidised lawyer or mediator directly. As a third option, such a lawyer (or mediator) submits an application to the Legal Aid Board on behalf of his client. If legal aid is granted, a certificate is issued which allows the lawyer in question to deal with the case. Lawyers and mediators are paid by the Legal Aid Board to provide their services to clients of limited means. Generally, they are paid a fixed fee according to the type of case, although exceptions can be made for more time-consuming cases.

The regular fixed fee is seen as insufficient to cover the actual costs of procedures by those providing this type of legal aid. Furthermore, over time the rules on who can make use of this type of legal aid have been tightened which means fewer persons qualify for this aid.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

There are no legal clinics dealing with environmental cases that are available to the general public. The legal aid system in the Netherlands is meant primarily for natural persons. Legal personalities often have insurance for legal services. In some cases, NGOs like Greenpeace will organize the protests against a decision by a public authority and will help interested parties with lodging appeals or will appeal themselves.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

The Netherlands provides a legal aid system to natural persons which has been described above. Also, there is the possibility to take out legal assistance insurance, but this is not provided by government.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority if he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties the costs will not be reimbursed in most cases.

In civil matters the ‘loser pays principle’ prevails. In civil court proceedings costs are a bit higher. The fee for court proceedings before a District Court is different (in most common cases in 2020 it is EUR 304 for a natural person and EUR 656 for any legal person, but could be higher when the interests of the case are bigger). When a case is concerned with claims that are either above EUR 25,000 or above EUR 100,000 the fees increase, respectively. Under specific circumstances, one could be classified as needy or poor and a special low fee applies. In all cases, other costs might be the costs for professional legal aid. These costs differ on the basis of the type of lawyer (and his specialisation) the applicant hires. If the claimant or applicant is considered needy or poor, he could ask for subsidised legal aid but will have to pay a personal contribution.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

The courts cannot provide exemptions from court fees. Articles 8:74 for court fees and 8:75 GALA for other costs of the procedure provide the legal basis for the judgment of the administrative court concerned with the legal costs. An exemption for the court fees based on case law is very rare and demands - with a reference to the right to access to court enshrined in article 6 ECHR - that an appellant proves that he is in such a specific financial condition that he unable to pay (e.g. earnings of less than 90% of the minimum social benefits scheme).

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?
All Dutch legislation is available here (in Dutch). Some information on the Dutch court system is also available at https://rechtwijzer.nl/ and https://www.juridischkloet.nl/. The latter refers to the 30 Legal Services Counters that are available throughout the Netherlands where anyone can get legal advice. Environmental information can be requested on the basis of the Government Information (Public Access) Act (WOB, Wet openbaarheid van bestuur) which provides specific provisions concerning with requests for environmental information. Also, chapter 19 of the Environmental Management Act (Wet milieubeheer) implements the specific legal regime for environmental information. More specific information about Dutch environmental law and procedures, including information on access to justice, can be found on the website of the Knowledge Centre InfoMil.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

Rules on access to justice are codified in the General Administrative Law Act (Chapter 6, 7 and 8) and are applicable for any administrative decision. However, sectoral legislation such as the Environmental Management Act, the General Act on Environmental Permitting, the Spatial Planning Act, the Water Act, the Nature Conservation Act etc. may provide additional provisions. Information on the main additional provisions have been discussed in the questions above.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

There are no sector-specific rules.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

It is obligatory for the administrative authority and the administrative court to provide information about the possibility to lodge either an objection procedure, a judicial review procedure or an appeal and stipulate this information in the decision or the judgment. This is stipulated in Article 3:45 GALA and Article 6:23 GALA.

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

For court cases in which one of the parties does not have an adequate command of Dutch, the government has set up a register of court interpreters and sworn translators. In certain cases (involving criminal or immigration law), the courts can only use interpreters and translators whose names are listed in this register. In civil cases this is not mandatory. Using the register, litigants (such as private individuals and enterprises) and people providing legal services (such as lawyers) can easily find an interpreter or translator who fulfils the requirements of integrity and quality laid down in the Sworn Interpreters and Translators Act. The register of court interpreters and sworn translators (only in Dutch) can in fact be accessed by any member of the public.

1.8 Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no specific rules relating to standing and access to justice in relation to EIA. The general provisions provided by GALA and specific (environmental) legislation are applicable and explained in more detail in paragraph 1.7.4 sub 1 and 2.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

An EIA report is prepared in light of an environmental decision that will be taken by an administrative authority. Judicial review is only available against the environmental decision (permit, planning decision) and not against decisions on screening and scoping, on the conditions set by the administrative authority or on the timeframe. The (preparation of the) EIA report is considered a preparatory requirement for the decision that potentially has a detrimental effect on the environment. In all cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is applicable (section 3.4 GALA) and in that procedure anyone can state their views on the basis of a draft decision and the EIA report. In some cases there is a formal requirement for public consultation before the EIA report will be drafted but it does not stipulate which individuals of the public concerned must be allowed to state their views and in what timeframe. After the administrative authority has taken a final decision, judicial review is available only against that decision and only for an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA), as is the case in most of administrative law procedures in the Netherlands.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

In most environmental decisions, anyone that is against the draft decision and is reasonably deemed capable and available for stating their views is supposed to do so when a draft decision is notified by the administrative authority in the uniform extensive public preparation procedure (section 3.4 GALA). There will be a six-week term to state the views. When a final decision is taken, one should apply for judicial review with the administrative court within six weeks after the official notification of the decision. Anyone who should have stated their views against the draft decision but did not do so will not be able to lodge an admissible appeal with the district court. Also, an appeal against any part of an environmental decision that a court could annul separately from other parts will be inadmissible if the applicant did not state his views on that particular part of the decision in the administrative procedure that led to the final decision.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The final decision can be challenged before an administrative court by an interested party. As explained above both a natural or a legal person can be an interested party on the basis of section 1 of Article 1:2 GALA. Also, an NGO can be considered an interested party under the requirements set in section 3 of Article 1:2 GALA. Articles 8:1 and 7:1 General Administrative Law Act (in Dutch: Algemene wet bestuursrecht) stipulate that any interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) may bring a case against a decision (Article 1:3 General Administrative Law Act) made by an administrative authority (Article 1:1 General Administrative Law Act) to the administrative court, but must first file an objection (in Dutch: bezwaarschrift) with the authority that took the decision.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

This question has been answered in paragraph 1.3 sub 2 – 5 since there is no difference in standing or the scope of the judicial review between different kinds of administrative court procedures. The scope of judicial review is determined by the applicant and can include both substantive and procedural legality of decisions. On its own motion, the administrative court may review the competence of the court, the competence of the administrative authority and the adherence to time limits when lodging the objection procedure and the appeals procedure.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The administrative courts in the Netherlands are competent to decide in cases concerning decisions (see Article 8:1 and Article 1:3 GALA) or untimely decision-making when a decision was requested. In any case where an EIA report is required, the decision that can be challenged must be such a decision, e.g. granting the permit that was applied for or adopting the zoning scheme. For factual acts or omissions, interested parties may request an enforcement decision or must refer the case to the civil court.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The Dutch legal system for judicial review requires an interested party to participate in one of two possible administrative procedures before they may file a court action. If a decision is prepared by following the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 GALA, any party is obliged to state their views on the draft decision that will be notified (Article 3:15 General Administrative Law Act).
8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Unless there are good reasons not to be, the appeal to the court by the interested party is inadmissible if that party did not participate in the administrative procedure (Article 6:13 General Administrative Law Act). If the uniform extensive public preparation procedure was not followed, the law requires that an interested party files an objection (Article 7:1 General Administrative Law Act) and that he states his grounds for his objections against the decision taken by the administrative authority in the objection procedure before he can lodge an appeal against the decision. This entails that every interested party must participate in the prescribed review procedure before an appeal at the court can be lodged. At the moment of writing, it is clear that this requirement is in violation of the implementation of the Aarhus Convention in the European Union. As was explained in more detail above in paragraph 1.3 sub 2.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

On the basis of Article 6 of the European Convention for Human Rights and the Fundamental Freedoms, the Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties where each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present their case under conditions that do not place them at a disadvantage vis-à-vis their opponent. The courts make sure that both parties to the proceedings know the evidence in the possession of the court and have the opportunity to comment on it with a view to influencing the outcome of the case. In administrative court procedures, the court is deemed to be active and may, if necessary, counterbalance the inequality between the individual and the administrative authority. This fundamental orientation has an impact on the law of administrative procedure as well. During the decision-making, too, an individual should be able to defend his or her position easily.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Although the Dutch administrative courts have implemented several relevant guidelines in order to be able to deliver judgments in a timely way, and also the legislator has adopted several instruments to help administrative courts achieve that goal, there is no general legally binding timeframe to deliver judgment besides the term that is codified in Article 8:66 GALA (six weeks after hearing the case). In some specific environmental cases, however, the legislation specifies that the judgment must be delivered in six months; there is no sanction if the court does not comply with this time requirement. However, case law provides that damages can be awarded if a case remains undecided in the system of administrative adjudication unreasonably long (more than four years if the objection procedure, the procedure of judicial review by the District Court and the Court of Appeal are all used).

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no special rules applicable apart from the general provisions that were discussed above.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

There are no country-specific IED rules in relation to access to justice in the Netherlands, although the permit on the basis of this Directive is always prepared by following the uniform extensive public procedure (section 3.4 GALA) and anyone is allowed to state their views on a draft decision.

As a consequence, there is no obligatory objection procedure before one can challenge the final decision in court.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

Article 8:1 GALA provides that any interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing in administrative court proceedings. Who might be considered an interested party has been described in more detail in paragraph 1.4.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Only the final decision (granting or refusal of permit) can be challenged in court.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Only the final decision (granting or refusal of permit) can be challenged in court.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

The uniform extensive public preparation procedure is applicable to the granting of a permit for an IED installation. Anyone can state their views on a draft decision. This means that the draft decision will be notified and available for six weeks and during that time one can challenge the draft decision. After a final decision has been taken and is officially notified, an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) can challenge the decision by lodging an appeal with the administrative court (District Court) within six weeks after the official notification.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

The public can challenge the final authorisation but article 6:1 GALA provides that only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing in administrative court proceedings and article 6:13 GALA provides that only those that participated in the procedures may lodge an appeal. Who might be considered an interested party has been described above (section 1.4). The CJEU has ruled that article 6:13 GALA is partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

Administrative courts are competent to review both substantive and procedural legality of the decision by an administrative authority. The court can establish the facts on its own motion and must also assess whether the administrative authority was competent to take the decision, whether the applicant has standing before the court and whether the court is competent. There are no other legal questions that the court will answer on its own motion. Challenging decisions (Article 1:3 GALA) and unlimited decision-making is possible before an administrative court. Also, an interested party may ask for injunctive relief concerned with these decisions. However, the administrative courts are not competent to hear factual acts and omissions; the civil court is competent.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?

Decisions can be challenged before a court within six weeks after the decision has been officially notified (see above).

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In many administrative law conflicts about decisions, there is an obligatory objection procedure (Article 7:1 GALA) before the interested party may bring the case to court. However, if the uniform extensive public preparation procedure was followed to take the decision, which is the case for any permit required under the IE Directive, this obligation does not exist and an interested party can file a court action with the administrative court within six weeks after the official notification of the final decision. See above.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12?

Article 6:13 GALA provides that the appeal of an interested party that wants to file a court action with the administrative court and did not participate in previous administrative procedures without good reason will be inadmissible. See above.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to decisions concerning the application of the IED. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties; in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more proactive towards ‘weaker’ parties and as a result, because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters, are perhaps more inclined to ask for expert advice.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There is no specific legislation aimed at implementing the notion of timely with regards to the IED and the EIA Directive as the General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 sub 2.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief about decisions with regards to the IED and the EIA Directive as the General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the purposes of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 sub 2.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

The administrative authority will provide information on access to justice when publishing the notification that a (environmental) decision has been taken (https://www.overheid.nl/ or overuwbuurt.overheid.nl). The courts provide structured and accessible (online) information on access to justice. Also, the governmental websites dealing with legal aid provide information to citizens. See in more detail paragraph 1.7.4 sub 2.

1.8.3. Environmental liability[6]

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

In the Netherlands, the Environmental Liability Directive is implemented in title 17.2 of the Environmental Management Act. The scope of implementation in the Environmental Management Act is similar to the scope of the directive: strict liability for environmental damage caused by any of the activities mentioned in Annex III of the directive (mainly integrated pollution prevention and control installations), and fault-based liability for other activities. Judicial review by an administrative court is available when application of title 17.2 Environmental Management Act (EMA) leads to a (single case) decision by an administrative authority as defined in Article 1:3(2) General Administrative Law Act. When such a decision is taken, the general provisions for access to justice will apply. This means that any natural person, legal entity, administrative authority and/or NGO considered to be an interested party as defined in Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act will have standing in an administrative court procedure against such a decision. Also, the administrative authorities mentioned in Article 17.2(3) EMA will be allowed to request a decision on environmental remediation. A (single case) decision might be at the request of a third party (interested party) for preventive or remedial action (Article 17.15(1) EMA), a decision to take preventive measures in the event of imminent environmental damage (Article 17.12(4) EMA), a decision to oblige someone to take all feasible measures in the event that environmental damage has already occurred (Article 17.13(5) EMA), a decision by the competent authority to take preventive measures or all feasible measures itself if the damage has already occurred, (Articles 17.10 and 17.14(2) EMA), a decision as to whether or not to agree with the remedial measures proposed by the party causing the damage (Article 17.14(3) EMA), the decision prioritising which environmental damage is remedied first (Article 17.14(4) EMA), and a decision concerning the recovery of costs incurred by the competent authority from the party causing the damage (Article 17.16 EMA).

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

The provisions on access to justice in the General Administrative Law Act are applicable and there are no additional special provisions provided in the Environmental Management Act. This means that the deadline is six weeks after the official notification of a decision. The following applies to the cost recovery aspect. The competence to decide to recover costs expires after a period of five years after the day on which the preventive and remedial measures have been fully completed, by - or on behalf of - the competent authority (Article 17.17 Environmental Management Act). If the party causing the damage has only been identified after the date of completion of the measures, the five-year period starts from the moment of identification. Still, the deadline to introduce an appeal will be six weeks.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

There are no special requirements stipulated for observations accompanying the request for action. In general, a request or application to take a decision should be done by an interested party (Article 1:2 General Administrative Law Act) and should be sufficiently clear and concrete to be considered a request. A request or application should furthermore be accompanied by those facts and circumstances that the applicant is able to provide (Article 4:2 General Administrative Law Act). Case law has provided that it is duty of the interested party to provide the competent authority with any leads for the investigation. It is then up to the competent authority to investigate whether action is required.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding ‘plausibility’ for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no special requirements stipulated regarding ‘plausibility’. A request or application should furthermore be accompanied by those facts and circumstances that the applicant is able to provide (Article 4:2 General Administrative Law Act). Case law has provided that it is duty of the interested party to provide the competent authority with any leads for the investigation. It is then up to the competent authority to investigate whether action is required.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

There are no special time limits stipulated for the notification of the decision by the competent authority. If an request/application for an administrative single case decision is filed with the administrative authority, it is legally obliged to deliver a decision within either the term provided in sectoral legislation or – if no such term is provided – within a reasonable time period, which is deemed to be eight weeks according to the Article 4:13 General Administrative Law Act. Although not stipulated by law, the administrative authority may decide that the uniform extensive public preparation procedure of section 3.4 GALA is applicable for a decision on the basis of title 17.2 EMA. In that case, a decision will be drafted and will be made publicly known. The draft decision and the documents on which it is based will be available for anyone’s viewing for six weeks. During that time anyone can participate in the decision-making process by submitting their views to the competent authority. The competent authority will have to respond to these views before taking and publishing the final decision. Such a final decision has to be taken within 6 months of the application.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

Yes. See above. An interested party may request a decision on preventive measures in case of imminent threat of environmental damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

Article 17.9 EMA stipulates which are the competent authorities. When the damage has been caused by an (industrial) installation, the administrative authority that is competent to grant the permit and is the competent enforcement agency is the competent authority. However, if the damage has occurred or will occur predominantly in water systems, the authority that is competent for that water system is the competent authority. When the damage has been caused outside an (industrial) installation, different competent authorities are designated depending on the damage being predominantly caused to soil,
Amended Code of Conduct for judicial experts at the Administrative Jurisdiction Division

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics. The general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. However, in certain cases the government of another country will be informed of the possible environmental effects by decisions, plans or programmes of the Dutch authorities (section 7.11 EMA concerning environmental impact assessment) or in the event that an installation is operated in such a way that environmental damage occurs or may occur outside the borders of the Netherlands (Article 17.13 EMA).

2) Notion of public concerned?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border effects. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act (e.g. the appellant must be an interested party (article 1:2 GALA) and must have participated in the preparatory procedure (article 6:13 GALA)) are applicable. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where NGOs of an affected country want to participate in the decision-making procedure, the procedure of administrative review or the judicial proceedings. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in article 1:2 and article 6:13 of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8. GALA. As far as we know, there are also no special regulations provided for individuals of an affected country related to legal aid and/or pro bono assistance.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where individuals of an affected country want to participate decision making, administrative review or judicial proceedings. The general provisions on standing in administrative procedures and judicial proceedings that are stipulated in article 1:2 and article 6:13 of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8. As far as we know, there are also no special regulations provided for individuals of an affected country related to legal aid and/or pro bono assistance. See above.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases where individuals of an affected country want to have information. The general provisions on providing information (notification duties of decisions and plans) are stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act and perhaps the Government Information (Public Access) Act (WOB, Wet openbaarheid van bestuur). Also, decisions taken by the competent authority in light of the implementation of the Environmental Liability Directive must be notified to the public in accordance with the general provisions stipulated in the General Administrative Law Act. The competent authority may oblige the party causing the damage to provide (additional) information. If the cause of the damage is an unusual event within an installation, title 17.1 EMA will provide additional safeguards to protect the environment and human health.

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics. The general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable. When the uniform extensive preparatory procedure is applicable, in most cases the public will have six weeks to state their views on a draft decision. Lodging an appeal procedure against the final decision is possible for an interested party during the period of six weeks after notification of the final decision.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics or for foreign applicants and non-foreign applicants. See above. This means that the decision of the administrative authority or the judgment will have to provide access to justice information.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?
There are no special regulations provided for administrative law cases with cross-border characteristics or for foreign applicants and non-foreign applicants. For court cases in which one of the parties does not have an adequate command of Dutch, the government has set up a register of court interpreters and sworn translators. In certain cases (involving criminal or immigration law), the courts can only use interpreters and translators whose names are listed in this register. In civil cases this is not mandatory. Using the register, litigants (such as private individuals and enterprises) and people providing legal services (such as lawyers) can easily find an interpreter or translator who fulfills the requirements of integrity and quality laid down in the Sworn Interpreters and Translators Act. The register of court interpreters and sworn translators (only in Dutch) can in fact be accessed by any member of the public. However, in most environmental cases the appellant will bear the costs of translation or interpretation. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 sub 5.

9) Any other relevant rules?
There are no other relevant rules.

[1] All Dutch legislation is available here (search for Dutch legislation).
[2] Many relevant judgments are published here (search for Dutch case law)
[6] See also case C-529/15.

Last update: 27/07/2021

water, habitats, species (see Article 17.9(3) EMA. Where, in the event of environmental damage or imminent threat thereof, more than one administrative authority has been designated as the competent authority, or powers have been assigned to another administrative authority by this or any other law, consultations must be held in good time between those administrative authorities with a view to promoting the best possible coordination between the decisions to be taken or the measures to be taken. The administrative bodies must coordinate with each other (Article 17(5) EMA).

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?
There are no special requirements stipulated in the implementation of the Environmental Liability Directive. Therefore, the general provisions of the General Administrative Law Act are applicable and they stipulate that procedures of administrative review (either an objection procedure or the uniform extensive public preparation procedure) must be followed before judicial proceedings can be instigated (Article 8:1 and 7:1 GALA).

There are no other relevant rules.
1.1. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning specific activities falling within the scope of EU environmental legislation outside the scope of the EIA and IED Directives[1]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. The articles 1.2 GALA on ‘interested parties’ that have standing and article 6:13 GALA are relevant. In general the level of access to national courts can be considered very effective as administrative court procedures are accessible, not expensive and allow for an active court to investigate the matter. However, recently discussion on the application of article 6:13 GALA has been triggered by the CJEU (case C626/18), because it ruled that this provision is partly in violation of the Aarhus Convention as it requires interested parties to participate in the preparatory procedure for a decision in order to have access to justice. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.4 and 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. The scope of administrative review (if applicable) and judicial review will cover procedural and substantive legality as long as grounds for appeal have been brought forward by the appellant.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before an appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. See explained in more detail paragraph 1.3 and 1.4.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within. See explained in more detail in paragraph 1.8.1 sub 7 and 8.

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase, however, when a decision consists of multiple parts that may be quashed separately, anyone bringing grounds against such a part of a decision must have brought grounds against that part in any (administrative preparatory or review) procedure to be admissible (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no difference between the regulation provided in an administrative law case outside the scope of EIA and IED, access to information and ELD and within.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to decisions concerning the application of EU law outside of EIA Directive/IED. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties; in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more protective towards ‘weaker’ parties and therefore and because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters are perhaps more inclined to ask an expert advice.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There is no specific legislation aimed at implementing the notion of timely with regards to areas addressed by EU law outside the IED and the EIA Directive, as the General Administrative Law Act provides sufficient provisions on timely decision making and timely court procedures.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief concerning the issues relevant here. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in more detail in paragraph 1.7.2.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is no specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[2]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required other than the general provisions discussed above. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1.3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases, there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review available. When there is, however, only an interested party (Article 1.2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.
In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision for which a Strategic Environmental Impact Assessment is required and in most of those administrative procedure anyone has the right to state their views on a draft decision. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts as to whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. The scope of administrative review (if applicable) and judicial review will cover procedural and substantive legality as long as grounds for appeal have been brought forward by the appellant. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

5) What are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no specific regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

6) What are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? The 'loser pays principle' does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law? There is no special regulation provided for access to justice whether a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or not. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review. When there is, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision for which a Strategic Environmental Impact Assessment is required, and in most of those administrative procedures anyone has the right to state their views. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. The scope of administrative review (if applicable) and judicial review will cover procedural and substantive legality as long as grounds for appeal have been brought forward by the appellant. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

5) What are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed above. There is no special regulation provided for access to justice when a Strategic Environmental Assessment is required or when it is not. See above for information on the general rules on access to justice in administrative court cases.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is no specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority when he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[4]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review, e.g. air quality plans. When there is, e.g. against a management plan for a Natura 2000 area when it implies that certain activities will not require a permit on the basis of the implementation of the Habitats Directive, only an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In most cases, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision and in most of those administrative procedures anyone has the right to state their views. In judicial appeal procedures, however, access to justice is provided only for interested parties (article 1:2 GALA). The effectiveness of the level of access is quite high as the costs and the financial risks of lodging an appeal are low and the formal requirements for standing are reasonable. Be that as it may, there are doubts whether the system provided by article 6:13 GALA that requires all interested parties to state their views against a draft decision in the preparatory procedure is in accordance with the Aarhus Convention.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

Relevant for the competence of the Dutch administrative courts is primarily the question whether the plan or the programme can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1:3 GALA that does not consist of general binding rules or policy rules. Plans and or programmes that are required by EU environmental law are often considered either policy documents to allow government to achieve a certain goal or provide an (indirect) assessment framework for assessing the applications for a permit or for adopting a zoning scheme that affect citizens (directly) and which decisions can be challenged in court. In many cases, however, the plans and programmes are not considered to be a decision against which interested parties should be awarded the possibility of judicial review. This is not just the case because the plans and programmes will be followed by decisions that can be challenged but also because in the procedure of judicial review of these decisions, the interested party may introduce a plea of illegality concerning the plan or programme that was the basis for the decision. Only if the plan or programme itself does directly provide citizens with binding legal consequences, e.g. the management plan of a Natura 2000 area that will allow certain activities without a permit, judicial review will be open for an interested party (Article 1:2 GALA).

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision the applicant may enter a plea of illegality concerning a plan or programme and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded. It is generally thought that this assessment is done with more deference for the public authority that adopted the plan or programme and will still cover both procedural and substantive legality, although procedural flaws are considered less relevant for the question whether the competent authority could apply the plan of programme to take the contested decision.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. See above.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase, however, when a decision consists of multiple parts that may be quashed separately, anyone bringing grounds against such a part of a decision must have brought grounds against that part in any (administrative preparatory or review) procedure to be admissible. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation. The general provisions stipulated in GALA are applicable.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

There is no difference between the rules provided in an administrative law case and the rules applicable to plans and programmes. Dutch courts aim to provide procedures with a fair balance between the parties: in administrative matters this may mean that the courts will be more proactive towards ‘weaker’ parties and therefore and because of the complex nature of the technical issues in environmental matters are perhaps more inclined to ask an expert advice.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

There is no specific legislation aimed at implementing the notion of timely with regards to plans and programmes required by European Law, as the General Administrative Law Act provides sufficient provisions on timely decision making and timely court procedures. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 above. There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning plans and programmes that are required by EU environmental legislation.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. See above. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority if he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties the costs will in most cases not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. This means that administrative review and judicial review is only available against the final decision when it can be considered a decision as defined in Article 1.3 GALA and is not considered a general binding rule or a policy rule (or a plan without direct binding effect for the public). In a large number of cases, there is therefore no administrative review or judicial review. When there is, only an interested party (Article 1.2 GALA) has standing, as is the case in any administrative court procedure. See above.

In cases where general binding rules are used, there is no competence of the administrative courts and the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is not applicable as there are separate provisions on the preparation of general binding rules in the Netherlands. In many other cases where a decision has to be taken, the uniform extensive public preparation procedure is followed to prepare the decision and in most of those administrative procedure anyone has the right to state their views. There is no direct access to administrative courts for judicial review and therefore the effectiveness is dependent on the judicial review of decisions based on the binding normative instruments (general binding rules).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision based on the general binding rules implementing European law, however, the appellant may enter a plea of illegality concerning these executive and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded. It is generally thought that this assessment is done with more deference for the public authority that adopted the normative instrument. It will still cover both procedural and substantive legality, although procedural flaws are considered less relevant for the question of whether the competent authority could apply the plan of programme to take the contested decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

The system of judicial review mandates that all administrative review procedures must be used and exhausted before appeal may be lodged (Article 6:13 GALA). However, this requirement is irrelevant here, as there is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Article 6:13 GALA provides for the general rule that it is necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc. However, this requirement is irrelevant here, as there is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no specific legislation concerning injunctive relief. The General Administrative Law Act provides provisions on the possibilities of injunctive relief which have been discussed in paragraph 1.7.2 above. There is no special general regulation provided for access to administrative courts concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

There is specific legislation concerning the costs of access to justice and the consequences of losing the procedure other than the general provision provided by the GALA. The ‘loser pays principle’ does not apply in administrative court cases, although the administrative authority will have to pay the court fee for the applicant in most cases when the decision is annulled. Also, in most cases, the authority will have to pay a calculated sum of legal costs (such as the costs related to lawyers representing the applicant) to the applicant if the decision is quashed by the court. The applicant will only be forced to pay for the costs of the public authority if he has obviously misused the possibility of judicial review. This is practically never the case. For third parties, in most cases the costs will not be reimbursed. There is no express statute that requires that costs should not be prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?

There is no special general regulation provided for access to justice concerning executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts. Also, the preliminary reference procedure is not codified in Dutch procedural law. In a procedure of judicial review of a decision, the applicant may enter a plea of illegality concerning an EU (regulatory) act or decision and the administrative court must assess whether that ground of appeal is well-founded and whether a preliminary reference procedure with the ECJ is deemed necessary.

[1] This category of case reflects recent case-law of the CJEU such as Protect C-664/15, the Slovak brown bear case C-240/09, see as described under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters

[2] The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

[3] See findings under ACCC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[4] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/97, Janecek and cases such as Boxus and Solvay C-128/09-C-131/09 and C-182/10, as referred to under the Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[5] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, ECLI:EU:C:2017:774.

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

The sanctions for the administrative authority for not responding within the prescribed term have been described above. When a decision is not provided before the end of the term provided by law, or when no term is provided within eight weeks after the request, the applicant will have to send a notice of default and allow the administrative authority another two weeks to decide. If a decision still is not taken after those two weeks, there are two consequences. First, for each day after that term the administrative authority will have to pay a penalty to the applicant for each day that no decision is made (with a maximum of EUR 1,442). Second, the applicant can ask the court for judicial review in order to force the administrative authority to come up with a decision. That court procedure will be about the question of whether the administrative authority did indeed not decide within the provided time frame and the procedure must take no more than eight weeks. If the conclusion by the court is indeed that no decision was made before the deadline, the court will order the administrative authority to take the decision within a two-week period and will award a penalty for each day that a decision still has not been taken after those two weeks.

If an administrative authority does not comply with a judgment of an administrative court, it will most likely be the case that no decision is taken. Judicial review will be available for an interested party when the time frame for taking a decision has passed (see above in paragraph 1.8.2). If a natural person or a legal person does not comply with the judgment of the administrative court, it will most likely be the case that this person acts in violation of administrative law, in accordance with a suspended permit or in violation of the conditions of his permit. Therefore, an interested party may request enforcement measures with the competent administrative authority, which is - in general - entitled to take enforcement action (either an administrative order to take physical action or instead impose on the offender a duty backed by a penalty payment).

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Austria

To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

* 1. Access to justice at Member State level
* 3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 27/07/2021

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level

1. Access to justice at Member State level

1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Austria is a federal republic with nine federal provinces (Bundesländer) and environmental law is divided between the federal government, the federal states and district authorities. Environmental law in Austria is largely subject to administrative law – aside from certain single provisions on environmental criminal law and environmental civil law.

According to the Austrian Federal Constitutional Law (Bundes-Verfassungsgesetz – B-VG), the power of legislation and execution in Austria is divided between the Federation and the nine different provinces. Article 10 B-VG lists all areas falling under the legislative and executive authority of the Federation, such as civil law affairs, railways and aviation or mining. Article 11 lists areas where legislation is the business of the Federation and execution that of the provinces.

According to Article 12, for certain issues, legislation as regards principles is the business of the Federation, while the issue of implementing laws and execution is the business of the provinces. All matters not expressly assigned to the Federation for legislation or also execution remain within the provinces’ autonomous sphere of competence. Environmental protection is thus a cross-sectoral issue which is distributed between the federal government and the federal provinces. Thus, to regulate environmental protection, federal legislation (e.g. Waste Management Act, Industrial Code, Environmental Impact Assessment Act, Water Act, Forestry Act) exists alongside provincial legislation (e.g. acts concerning nature protection or construction law).
The [General Administrative Procedure Act (Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz 1991 – AVG)] regulates all general administrative proceedings (e.g. in environmental matters). In certain areas, respective laws governing a particular matter provide additional or exceptional provisions. Natural or legal persons are generally granted procedural rights if their subjective or legal interests are likely to be affected by a decision. In certain legal areas, such as water, waste, clean air, nature protection or environmental impact assessment, environmental NGOs are granted specific rights, including access to justice.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

The general constitutional framework in Austria is defined in the [Federal Constitutional Law (Bundes-Verfassungsgesetz – B-VG)]. There is no constitutional right to protection of the environment as such, but Austria recognises the protection of the environment in its State Goal Resolution including, in particular, the protection of air, water, soil and the prevention of disturbances caused by noise. This resolution is laid down in the Federal Constitutional Act on sustainability, animal protection, comprehensive environmental protection, on water and food security as well as research (BVG über die Nachhaltigkeit, den Tierschutz, den umfassenden Umweltschutz, die Sicherstellung der Wasser- und Lebensmittelversorgung und die Forschung). It is a mandate for action by all state organs of legislation, administration and jurisdiction to take measures for environmental protection and sustainability. However, the resolution establishes a programmatic norm at the constitutional level that does not entail an individual right that can be taken to Court and legally enforced. Nevertheless, it can be of importance in weighing and balancing interests in a decision and is, thus, of relevance in the Court's decision-making process.

The Administrative Courts (Verwaltungsgerichte) decide on complaints against acts or omissions by administrative authorities. According to Article 132 B-VG, a complaint against the ruling of an administrative authority for illegality may be raised by someone who alleges infringement of his rights. Complaint may also be raised against the exercise of direct administrative power or compulsion by someone who alleges infringement of his rights because of these. For breach of the duty to reach a decision appeal may be raised by someone who claims as party in an administrative procedure to be entitled to get a decision. The Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH) decides, inter alia, on final complaints against the decision of an Administrative Court for illegality and motions to set a deadline for violation of the breach of the duty to reach a decision by an Administrative Court. A person who claims to have had his rights infringed by the ruling may raise final appeal. Regarding constitutional rights, Article 144 B-VG provides for individuals to make claims before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof – VGH), if their fundamental rights are infringed. Its basic requirements are interference with the individual’s “subjective right”, i.e. that the party can only object to norms that exist to protect an individual on the one hand, and an infringement of an individual’s fundamental right on the other hand. In Austria, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) has constitutional status. It protects a number of rights that can be linked to environmental protection (e.g. right to justice, the right to life, the right to respect for private and family life). Furthermore, by adopting the [Federal Constitutional Act for a Nonnuclear Austria (BVG für ein atomfreies Österreich)], Austria renounced the use of nuclear energy.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

For individuals such as neighbours or environmental organisations to participate or file an appeal against a decision in environmental matters is not specified in any single legal act. However, within the scope of some highly relevant legal acts, access to justice in environmental matters is guaranteed. On a federal level, key environmental provisions with regard to access to justice are the Environmental Impact Assessment Act (Umweltverträglichkeitsprüfungsgesetz 2000 – UVP-G 2000), the Industrial Code (Gewerbeordnung 1994 – GewO 1994), the Air Pollution Control Act (Immisionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L), the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – EG-L 2018), the Waste Management Act (Abfallwirtschaftsgesetz 2002 – AWG 2002), the Water Act (Wasserrechtsgesetz 1959 – WRG 1959), the Environmental Liability Act (Bundes-Umwelthaftungsgesetz), the Environmental Information Act (Umweltinformationsgesetz). The Aarhus Participation Act (Aarhus Beteiligungsgesetz 2018) as an amendment of WRG, AWG, and IG-L introduced provisions on access to justice in the areas of waste, water and air protection.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

The Constitutional Court assesses governmental ordinances for conformity with legislation as well as legislation for conformity with constitutional provisions. The Supreme Administrative Court, on the other hand, has control over the conformity of rulings by administrative authorities (such as permits or other decisions) with legal provisions. Both act as Courts of cassation.

Important case-law on the matter includes the Protect case, which was also subject to a preliminary ruling[2] by the European Court of Justice. Following the specifications of the ECJ, the Supreme Administrative Court granted the environmental NGO concerned access to justice in water law proceedings including party status to participate in the administrative proceedings by directly applying relevant EU legislation.[3] In further rulings[4], the Supreme Administrative Court confirmed the party status of environmental NGOs with retrospective effect, at least to the date of entry into force of the European Charter of Fundamental Rights. Nevertheless, Austrian authorities seem to consider that it applies only in a single specific case. Despite this ruling, most federal acts and the federal provinces limit retroactive effect to one or two years – some of them to back to the date of the ruling following the Protect case.

Austrian Courts have been increasingly prepared to directly grant access to justice in cases regulated by EU law, even where national legislation does not provide for any remedies. E.g. the adaptation of different federal acts within the Aarhus Participation Act 2018 was a reaction to recent case-law, such as that of the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH) on the Air Quality Plan of the province of Salzburg[5] granting an environmental organisation access to justice against omissions and to review ordinances. In its judgement, the Administrative Court also referred to the European Court of Justice (ECJ) in the Protect case.

As Administrative Courts are bound by the Supreme Administrative Court’s ruling, they followed the case-law in other areas too, e.g. within the framework of the Flora-Fauna-Habitats Directive.[6]

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

In general, parties can only rely directly on International agreements if they have constitutional or statutory status and if their content is sufficiently determined.[7] The competent bodies (Parliament, Federal Government, Federal President) can decide to what extent an international agreement is to be fulfilled by separate acts or regulations.[8]
As an exception, courts have granted environmental NGOs direct party status in certain environmental procedures, although national legislation did not provide for this standing. This was due to the ECJ ruling in the Protect case[9], which had not yet been sufficiently transferred into national law. However, the Supreme Administrative Court considers Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention itself as to be too indefinite to be directly applied,[10] so direct applicability was always limited to cases regulated by EU environmental law.

Austria ratified the Convention on Access to Information, Public Participation in Decision-Making and Access to Justice in Environmental Matters (Aarhus Convention) in 2005 without proposing to incorporate the agreement by separate acts or regulations into the Austrian legal framework. However, to date, different steps have been made to implement the Aarhus Convention on a national level based on a number of decisions of the European Court of Justice. For example, the federal Aarhus Participation Act 2018 aims to grant the public a larger say in approval procedures and subsequent review rights in certain waste, water and air-related procedures. The Environmental Information Act enhances transparency in the field of environmental information and access to environmental data.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

Generally, there are two levels in the Austrian court system. In administrative matters, decisions are made by an administrative authority, which can be appealed against before the provincial Administrative Courts (Landesverwaltungsgericht – LVwG). In specific cases such as the EIA, the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht – BvWg) decides on appeals against decisions of an administrative authority as specified in Article 102 of the Federal Constitutional Law (B-VG). An appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH) is admissible against the decision of an Administrative Court if it depends on the resolution of a legal question of fundamental importance. This is in particular the case if the ruling departs from the case-law of the Supreme Administrative Court, such case-law does not exist or the legal question to be resolved has not been answered in a uniform manner by the previous case-law of the Supreme Administrative Court. Most Aarhus Participation Acts limit the legal review of NGOs to one level. In this case, according to the prevailing view, they do not have a right of final appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court.

There is an exception to this rule regarding decisions of municipalities within their own sphere of competency. This includes areas such as land use, building control, areas constructed for traffic and disaster control. In these cases, an appeal has to be at first addressed to the municipal council or its board in accordance with Section 63 General Administrative Procedure Act (Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz 1991 – AVG). Only after the administrative action has been exhausted on a municipal level, one can make an appeal before the respective Administrative Court.

In civil and criminal procedures, the District Courts (Bezirksgerichte – BG) decide as first instance. Provincial Courts (Landesgerichte – LG) serve as courts of first instance in more severe cases and also act as appeal courts in relation to the district courts. There are four different Courts of Appeal (Oberlandesgerichte – OLG), which function as appellate courts solely vis-à-vis the district courts. The Supreme Court (Oberster Gerichtshof – OGh) is the court of final instance in civil and criminal suits.

In certain cases, the Austrian Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof – VfGH) can also be addressed regarding decisions of an Administrative Court if the complainant claims to have been infringed in his/her constitutionally guaranteed rights by the decision. Furthermore, a person who claims to be infringed in his/her rights directly by an ordinance can bring the Constitutional Court as the ordinance has become effective without a judicial decision or a ruling having been rendered.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

While ordinary courts are competent to decide on criminal and civil matters, administrative matters, including administrative penal law, fall within the responsibility of administrative authorities and courts. The material jurisdiction of courts is defined in the relevant federal or provincial acts. If no specific regulation can be found in the relevant administrative legislation, the District Administrative Authority (Bezirksverwaltungsbehörde) is responsible. If the Federal Administrative Court is not responsible, the territorial jurisdiction in administrative penal matters depends on the location of the authority that issued or did not issue the administrative decision. Otherwise, the territorial jurisdiction depends on the place in which an exercise of direct administrative power and compulsion was commenced or on the place in which the conduct occurred or activities were carried out.

According to Article 138 of the Federal Constitutional Law (B-VG), the Constitutional Court decides on conflicts of competence (1) between courts and administrative authorities, (2) between Courts of Justice and Administrative Courts or the Supreme Administrative Court as well as between the Constitutional Court itself and all other courts, and (3) between the Federation and a province or between the provinces amongst themselves.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

For large-scale proceedings, i.e. if more than 100 people are expected to be involved, there are specific administrative rules (Sections 44a-44g AVG). This structure is especially relevant in EIA procedures. In these cases, the authority may publicly announce submissions by edict. If a submission has been announced by edict, persons will lose their party standing in the relevant administrative procedure if they do not object in writing to the authority in due time. A particularity for environmental procedures is the Ombudsman for the Environment. Environmental Ombudsmen have standing rights in environmentally relevant administrative procedures as well as party rights in EIA or Waste Management procedures. Their action is especially relevant within environmental conservation procedures. Their task is to enforce observance of objective environmental law. They are a formal/official party to the procedure (Formalpartei).

As parties in the above mentioned environmental procedures they are also competent to challenge administrative decisions.[11] According to Section 19(3) Environmental Impact Assessment Act (Umweltverträglichkeitsprüfungsgesetz 2000 – UVP-G 2000), Environmental Ombudsmen are entitled to require observance of legal provisions serving to protect the environment or the public interests in their competence as a subjective right in the procedure and to complain to the Administrative Court. They are not generally entitled to file complaints with the Administrative Courts as they do not base their status on a subjective right. However, in certain cases, they have been legally given a right to complain (e.g. in EIA or waste management procedures). Environmental Ombudsmen are entitled to have access to the Administrative Court in Environmental Liability procedures. As the Environmental Ombudsmen have the status of a formal party they do not have the competence to file complaints with the Constitutional Court.

There are no special environmental tribunals and no judges explicitly responsible for environmental matters; however, all Austrian Administrative Courts have organisational units responsible for environmental matters.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion

The Federal Administrative Court as well as the Supreme Administrative Court cannot initiate a review process of the administrative decision on their own motion. If an appeal is filed, both courts can review the decision in terms of its procedural as well as substantive legality. While the court has to review all facts deemed necessary for a ruling, the scope of judicial review is usually set out by the complaints brought forward.

Provisions relevant to the proceedings before the Administrative Courts are regulated by the Proceedings of Administrative Courts Act (Verwaltungsgerichtsverfahrensgesetz – VwGvG). Regarding complaints against decisions of authorities, the Administrative Courts decide on the merits of a case if (1) the relevant facts have been established or (2) the establishment of the relevant facts by the Administrative Court itself is in the interest of fixed proceedings or results in a substantial cost saving.[12] If neither of these prerequisites is met, the Administrative Court shall decide on the merits of the case if the authority does not object when submitting the complaint. If the authority failed to carry out required investigations into the facts, the Administrative Court... can set aside the contested administrative decision by means of an order and refer the matter back to the authority for the issue of a new administrative decision. If the authority has to exercise discretion in its decision, the Administrative Court may set aside the contested administrative decision and remand the matter to the authority for the issue of a new administrative decision. In both cases, the authority is bound by the legal evaluation of the Administrative Court.

Decisions of the Administrative Courts can be appealed against before the Supreme Administrative Court, who does not decide in the matter itself. Free consideration of evidence (freie Beweiswürdigung) is the basic principle in evidence procedures. For further elaboration see section 1.5. The basic rule in administrative evidence (as well as criminal) proceedings is manifested by the states’ duty to find all relevant facts on a certain case (Officialmaxime). Thus, the authority is obliged to conduct evidence procedures on its own motion. This rule must also be followed by the Administrative Courts in appeal procedures. Evidence procedures before ordinary civil courts are governed by the principle of disposition (Dispositionsgrundsatz). Hence, it is basically up to the parties to begin a process to stop it or change the subject of proceedings they initiated.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Issues of environmental protection are mainly regulated in public administrative law with action taken by the federal or state authorities. Important environmental areas regulated on the federal level are industrial pollution, water, waste management, clean air and in horizontal issues such as EIA. The nine Federal Provinces have important legislative competences in the area of nature protection. Permits issued by public authorities are the prevailing instrument used in environmental administration law (other instruments being bans on serious environmental damage, or codes of conduct). They precede a formal application by an applicant.

In the case of federal legislation, the Governor and the provincial authorities subordinate to him generally exercise the executive power of the Federation. In matters of indirect federal administration, the Governor is bound by instructions from the Federal Government and individual Federal Ministers. In this form of “indirect federal administration”, the responsible authority is usually the District Administrative Authority. In independent cities (Statutarstädte) this is the City Administration, otherwise the District Commission (Bezirksverwaltungsbehörden). For certain environmental areas (e.g. mining, water protection and usage, or environmental impact assessments) other authorities such as the provincial Government (Landesregierung) or the responsible Federal Ministers (Bundesministerinnen/Bundesminister) or other Federal Authorities are in charge of administrative matters as well (“direct federal administration”). The legal areas in which federal direct administration can be instituted, are listed exhaustively in Article 102(2) Federal Constitutional Law (Bundes-Verfassungsgesetz – B-VG). They include demarcation of frontiers, customs, federal finances, matters pertaining to association and assembly, patent matters and the protection of designs, the traffic system, river and navigation police, mining, Danube control and conservation, fodder and fertilisers as well as plant preservatives including their admission and, in the case of seed and plant commodities or the preservation of monuments.

In the field of provincial legislation, the supreme administrative authority is the provincial Government (Landesregierung). Other key provincial administrative authorities are the District Administrative Authorities (Bezirksverwaltungsbehörden).

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

Generally, decisions of an administrative authority must be appealed against to the relevant Administrative Court within four weeks after the decision has been issued. The appeal needs to be made in written form and must include the name of the decision, the authority concerned, the reasons for appeal and actions required. Within a municipality’s own sphere of competence, appeals must be filed by the party within a two week period with the authority that issued the administrative decision of first instance.[13] The period starts for each party with the receipt of the written copy of the administrative decision, in the case of oral pronouncement simultaneously with it.

If the authority has not made a decision on a matter within six months or, if the law provides for a shorter or longer period allowed for a decision, within that period, parties can file a complaint alleging breach of the duty to reach a timely decision (Säumnisbeschwerde) with the respective Administrative Court. Unless otherwise provided in federal or provincial legislation, an Administrative Court is required to decide on requests initiating proceedings filed by parties and complaints without undue delay, however, at the latest within six months after receipt of the request or complaint. The Administrative Court can suspend proceedings on a complaint if (1) the Administrative Court has to resolve a legal issue in a considerable number of proceedings pending or expected to become pending in the near future and if, at the same time, proceedings on a final complaint against a ruling or an order by an Administrative Court are pending with the Supreme Administrative Court in which the same legal issue must be resolved, and (2) there are no rulings by the Supreme Administrative Court to resolve that legal issue, or the previous rulings by the Supreme Administrative Court do not answer the legal issue to be resolved in a uniform manner.[14]

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There is no special environmental court in Austria.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

Decisions of administrative authorities

In case of a complaint against the decision of an administrative authority, the respective authority may set aside or modify the contested administrative decision or dismiss the complaint for formal reasons or on the merits within two months (preliminary decision on a complaint). If the authority wants to dispense with issuing a preliminary decision on a complaint, the authority submits the complaint, together with the files of the administrative proceedings, to the Administrative Court.[15] Within two weeks of service of the preliminary decision on a complaint, each party can file a request with the authority that the complaint be submitted for decision to the Administrative Court (request for the Administrative Court to hear a complaint).[16]

Rulings of Administrative Courts

Final complaint (Revision) against the ruling of an Administrative Court is admissible if (1) the resolution depends on a legal question of essential importance, in particular because the ruling departs from the case-law of the Supreme Administrative Court, (2) such case-law does not exist or (3) the legal question to be resolved has not been answered in a uniform manner by the previous case-law of the Supreme Administrative Court.[17] Each Administrative Court ruling must contain information on the possibility to file an ordinary or extraordinary final complaint with the Supreme Administrative Court.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal, Rules in the environmental area, Rules for Introducing preliminary references

The federal Environmental Liability Act offers the possibility of an environmental complaint for private individuals who have been violated in their rights due to an environmental damage. The complaint is a request to the authorities to take action. If the authority does not react, there is usually no legal remedy. In certain cases, official liability (Amtschaftungsbeschwerde) can be claimed if a financial loss and the guilt of the authority can be proven.

Regarding constitutional rights, Article 144 of the Federal Constitutional Law (Bundes-Verfassungsgesetz – B-VG) provides for individuals to make claims before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof) if their fundamental rights are infringed. Its basic requirements are interference with the individual's "subjective right", i.e. that the party can only object to norms that exist to protect an individual on the one hand, and an infringement of an individual's fundamental right on the other hand. There are a number of constitutional rights that can be linked to environmental protection, e.g. the right to justice, the right to life, the right to health, the right to respect for private and family life.
The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG. In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

There is the possibility of extrajudicial dispute settlement (aussengerichtliche Streitschlichtung). Support can be provided by mediators, which are listed [here] on the website of the Ministry of Justice. Mediation is indeed used for conflict settlement in Austria. A study commissioned by the former Federal Ministry for Agriculture, Forestry, the Environment and Water Management[19] on the basis, potential and instruments of environmental mediation in Austria stated that mediation procedures are used in environmental matters and that these procedures can have quite productive outcomes.

For example, the Austrian Environmental Impact Assessment Act (EIA Act)[20] explicitly provides for an interruption of the EIA procedure for a mediation procedure at the request of the project applicant. One example of mediation in a large-scale environmental procedure was the extension of Vienna Airport.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

The ombudsman for the environment (Umweltanwaltschaft) advocates for the protection of the environment and is regulated differently in all federal states. These institutions serve as a key point of contact for citizens who notice environmental problems. They have standing rights in some environmentally relevant administrative procedures – especially they act within environmental conservation procedures. Furthermore, they have legal standing in EIA and other procedures, e.g. in the field of waste management or nature protection.[21] As a formal party to the procedure (Formalpartei), their task is to claim the observance of objective environmental law. As parties to the abovementioned environmental procedures they are competent to challenge these administrative decisions.

Burgenland
Carinthia
Lower Austria
Upper Austria
Salzburg
Styria
Tyrol
Vorarlberg
Vienna

The task of general ombudspersons (Volksanwaltschaft) is to control the actions of administrative organs. All citizens can lodge a complaint free of charge about an Austrian administrative authority. Complaints against administration authorities can be lodged throughout Austria, on any administrative issue including water or forestry legislation and other environmental issues. Complaints against provincial and local authorities can be lodged in all provinces except Vorarlberg and Tyrol, where local ombudspersons are available. Complaints about ongoing proceedings can only be lodged if they relate, for example, to the duration of the proceedings, errors with deliveries, refusal to provide information or gross discourtesy on the part of officials.

General ombudspersons: website [https://www.volksanwaltschaft.gv.at/en], Email: post@volksanwaltschaft.gv.at Local ombudspersons Tyrol: website [https://www.tirol.gv.at/en/], Email: landesvolksanwaltschaft@tirol.gv.at Local ombudspersons Vorarlberg: website [https://www.landesvolksanwalt.at], Email: buero@landesvolksanwalt.at

The public prosecutor is responsible for the public prosecution in criminal proceedings. Neither the Austrian Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch – StGB) nor the Administrative Penalty Code (Verwaltungsstrafgesetz – VStG) provide for private criminal prosecution in environmental matters. Nevertheless everyone who suspects that criminal offenses have been committed is entitled to report this to the respective law enforcement agencies.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

The general rule for standing in Administrative Courts only gives parties to administrative proceedings access to review proceedings. These are persons "who make use of the services performed by an authority or who are affected by the activity of such authority, are persons involved, and to the extent they are involved in the matter on the grounds of a legal title or a legal interest"[22] The question of who qualifies as a legal subject with such a legal right or legal interest is specified in the applicable administrative provisions – e.g. the Industrial Code (Gewerbeordnung 1994 – GewO 1994), trade regulations, the Water Act (Wasserrechtsgesetz 1959 – WRG 1959), the Waste Management Act (Abfallwirtschaftsgesetz 2002 – AWG 2002), Forestry Act (Forstgesetz 1975 – ForstG), the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L), etc.

While the plaintiff is always considered a party, legal standing is not granted to individuals and environmental associations in all areas of environmental protection. It is a general rule in the Austrian judicial system that individuals are only granted standing if and as far as their individual rights are affected. Individuals are not entitled to plead laws protecting not their personal legal interests, but the environment in general. In certain legal areas, such as environmental impact assessment, waste management, IPPC and Seveso sites, water management, clean air or nature protection, the relevant acts regulating administrative procedure also grant recognised environmental NGOs standing to challenge environmental administrative decisions.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

As there is no single legal act granting private persons and NGOs access to justice in environmental matters, the situation differs for each legal area. The question who qualifies as a legal subject is specified in the applicable administrative provisions – e.g. the Industrial Code (Gewerbeordnung 1994 – GewO 1994), trade regulations, the Water Act (Wasserrechtsgesetz 1959 – WRG 1959), the Waste Management Act (Abfallwirtschaftsgesetz 2002 – AWG 2002), Forestry Act (Forstgesetz 1975 – ForstG), the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L), etc.

On a federal level, key environmental provisions with regard to access to justice are the Environmental Impact Assessment Act (Umwelteinflussprüfungsverordnung 2000 – UVP-G 2000), the Industrial Code (Gewerbeordnung 1994 – GewO 1994), the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L), etc. The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG). In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").

The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG). In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").

The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG). In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").

The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG). In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").

The Administrative Court may find in its ruling that a final complaint is not admissible in accordance with Article 133(4) B-VG). In this case, a final complaint must separately contain the reasons for which it is deemed admissible contrary to the finding of the Administrative Court ("extraordinary final complaint").
3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

Standing rules for NGOs

The requirements for the recognition of an environmental organisation as a party are laid down in Section 19 EIA Act (UVP-G 2000). This provision requires it to be organised in the form of a non-profit organisation for at least three years, to have at least 100 members and to have environmental protection as its main objective. Federations must comprise at least five member associations. All organisations must prove every three years that they still meet the recognition requirements. A list of all recognised environmental organisations is available on the Website of the Ministry for Climate Action, Environment, Energy, Mobility, Innovation and Technology.[23]

As a party, NGOs can make objective claims regarding compliance with environmental protection regulations as subjective rights.[24] and have a right of appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH). Most acts granting NGOs standing to challenge, do not grant them full party status, but rather a kind of standing to challenge decisions – a system which was specially introduced when Austrian legislators started to implement the Aarhus Convention. In this case, according to the prevailing view, they do not have a right of final appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court.

Standing rules for citizens’ groups

Citizens’ groups (Bürgerinitiativen) have subjective standing rights exclusively in EIA proceedings. The requirement for admission to the proceedings is a statement, which needs to be signed by at least 200 people who are entitled to vote in the relevant local municipality. This statement, including a list of signatures, has to be submitted to the EIA authority during the period for public inspection. Only with this formal act is the Citizens’ group under the EIA Act established and thus granted party status in the EIA procedure. As a party, the citizens’ group can also claim in respect of objective environmental law.

Standing rules for neighbours/individuals

In specific cases such as procedures regarding plant installations (Genehmigung von Betriebsanlagen) and EIA proceedings, neighbours can be granted legal standing when they are directly affected by “smell, noise, smoke, dust, vibration or otherwise”.[25] Their legal standing can be lost if objections are not raised in due time and objections are only admissible to the extent that they concern their “subjective right”, E.g.: the Waste Management Act names landowners and neighbours as individuals that have legal standing. In the water protection process, neighbours are to be involved in the proceeding if the party’s property is affected. They are entitled to present their interests in the proceedings, but cannot raise objections.

In the nature conservation process, neighbours and citizens’ groups have no legal standing, but environmental organisations and the regional ombudsmen for the environment do in certain cases.

Although various steps have been taken, the on-going procedure before the Aarhus Convention Compliance Committee shows that, according to environmental organisations, a lack of implementation concerning access to justice in environmental proceedings remains. Apart from clean air regulation, the different acts do not provide for standing concerning plans or programmes, or omissions by authorities or private persons.

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

If a party or a person does not have sufficient command of the German language, is deaf or dumb, or their hearing is severely impaired, an official interpreter or translator available to the authority must be called in. All interpreters or translators provided are officially accredited and listed. Except for administrative penal proceedings, where according to Article 6 EHRC translation costs must not be imposed on the accused, costs of a translator are to be paid by the respective party – and ultimately by the losing party (unless the party was entitled to legal aid).

According to the Ethnic Groups Act (Volksgruppengesetz), in certain regions with Slovenian, Croatian or Hungarian minorities, proceedings must be held in the respective language or bilingually without causing translation costs for the parties.

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview on specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

Before the authority can make a legally binding decision, unless facts are already clear beforehand,[26] it must conduct an investigation. The only exception is if there is a stipulation of cash benefits according to a legal, statutory or tariff-based standard or in the event of danger of delay (Mandatsbescheid).[27]

1) Evaluation of evidence – are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

The basic rule in evidence proceedings is the State’s duty to gather all relevant facts on a given case (Offiziellemaxime). Thus, the authority is obliged to conduct evidence procedures on its own motion. Anything feasible and suitable for ascertaining the relevant facts of a case can constitute evidence.[28] This includes expert opinions.

Regarding limits to obtaining evidence, there is generally no ban on the use of illegally obtained evidence (Verwertungsverbot). However, evidence that undermines laws or other legal provisions or violates the rights of third parties (e.g. the right to privacy) is inadmissible. For example, an individual who was not allowed as a witness to the proceedings cannot instead be interviewed as a person to provide information as part of the expert evidence. Furthermore, evidence resulting from anonymous statements which are not revealed to the party is inadmissible. Costs of a translator are to be paid by the respective party – and ultimately by the losing party (unless the party was entitled to legal aid).

According to the Aarhus Convention Compliance Committee, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

Rules on gathering and evaluating evidence in administrative procedures, including expert opinions, also apply to Administrative Court procedures. Additionally, if the courts deem it necessary or a party requests so, an oral hearing must be conducted. In this case, any evidence must be directly presented in the hearing.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?

Regarding decisions of municipalities within their own sphere of competency,[30] parties can introduce new evidence in first instance administrative procedures as well as second instance procedures.[31] They have a right to provide information on all relevant aspects of the case and are entitled to request the presentation of evidence.[32] The authority is entitled to reject the request if it deems it irrelevant to the case.

If there are new facts or evidence presented in a complaint that the authority or court considers material, the authority or the court must notify the other parties without delay and give them the opportunity to acknowledge the contents and comment on them within a reasonable period of no longer than two weeks.[33]

In EIA procedures, the authority can declare the investigation procedure closed when the case is ready for decision.[34] After this declaration, no new facts and evidence may be presented at the instance in question.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts

The authority must call upon officially registered independent experts (Sachverständige) if an unclear fact of the case requires clarification. A list of all official experts and interpreters is available on the website of the Ministry of Justice.[35]
Unofficial experts may only be called upon by the authority if official experts are either unavailable or if the nature of the case requires a specific expert or a significant acceleration of the procedure is to be expected.[36]

As there are no specific rules on expert opinions within the Administrative Court procedures, the rules of the administrative procedure apply accordingly.[37]

3.1 Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?

Free consideration of evidence (freie Beweiswürdigung) is the basic principle in evidence procedures, which is why the expert opinion is not binding. However, the authority or court must not proceed arbitrarily, making decisions at their own discretion. The main difference between “free discretion” and “free consideration of evidence” is to assess any evidence based on the laws of logic and to form a will within a legal framework.

The authority or court must check the opinion on accuracy, conclusiveness and completeness. If the authority or court is not convinced of the quality of the opinion, a second expert opinion must be solicited.

3.2 Rules for experts being called upon by the court

The expert is generally appointed by the court ex officio. In general, the role of the expert is not to answer questions of law but to share his expert opinion regarding unclear facts of the case. The expert must disclose the basis (his specialist knowledge) and key facts on which the report is based in order to ensure accountability and conclusiveness. The latter is fundamental for the expert evidence to be considered in the decision-making process. Experts can gather their own evidence for their report (e.g. interrogate the parties or third parties).

A conclusive expert opinion can only be countered by an expert opinion at the same professional level. However, parties can always contest the expert opinion due to a lack of conclusiveness or incompleteness without introducing a counter-expert opinion. The authority or court must examine such an intervention and take it into consideration in the decision-making process.

Court-appointed experts must be rejected ex officio in cases of impartiality. Experts can also be rejected by a party if they can demonstrate their impartiality or lack of expertise.[38]

3.3 Rules for experts called upon by the parties

Parties to administrative and court review procedures have the right to submit their own evidence in the course of the hearing, including expert opinions, or to submit an evidence request for a court-appointed expert. A motion by the party to hear evidence can only be rejected if the evidence is assumed to be true or if the evidence is considered irrelevant or unsuitable.

It is also possible for the parties to engage “private experts” (Privatsachverständige) to provide a report on a topic. However, these reports are only treated as private documentation and prove nothing but the opinion of the author.

3.4 What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?

In general, each party involved in an administrative proceeding will bear all of its own costs.[39] Unless provided otherwise, the authority bears the costs incurred for its activities performed in the administrative proceeding ex officio. Unless provided otherwise by specific legislation, this also applies to procedures before the Administrative Courts.

For administrative procedures there is a cost category for every motion. The cost categories are stated in the Austrian Official Tax Regulation (Bundesverwaltungsabgabenverordnung 1983 – BvwAbgV). This regulation provides environmentally relevant cost categories, such as water authorisations, industrial and commercial matters, electricity, or railway issues. Furthermore, the provisions of the Public Charges Act (Gebührengesetz 1957 – GebG) apply on writings and official acts undertaken by administrative bodies and the Regulation on Commission Charges (Bundes-Kommissionsgebührenverordnung 2007 – BKommpGebV) applies on the acts set by an administrative body outside of its office. The court fees in civil procedures depend on the value in litigation the Austrian Judicial Charges Act (Gerichtsgebührengesetz – GGG).

The fee for filing an appeal with the Administrative Court is EUR 30. The fee for filing an appeal with the Supreme Administrative Court or the Constitutional Court is EUR 240.

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible Internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Legal assistance is required in certain civil and criminal procedures as well as in proceedings before the Supreme Administrative and Constitutional Court. Legal aid (Verfahrenshilfe) is solely guaranteed within civil and criminal procedures or in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR[40] in these cases as well as in administrative penal procedure. In environmental matter, this might e.g. be the case in the field of environmental criminal law.

Lawyers, however, apply only to the defendant. If the Administrative Court has decided to grant legal aid, it notifies the committee of the bar association to appoint a lawyer as a representative can be requested. An application for legal aid within regular administrative procedures is therefore usually not possible.

The federal bar associations also offer an introductory consultation free of charge (erste anwaltliche Auskunft).[41] On the website, contact details of lawyers can be accessed, also according to their specific field of expertise (e.g. environmental law).

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

The federal bar associations offer an introductory consultation free of charge (erste anwaltliche Auskunft).[42] Environmental lawyers provide a free-of-charge legal advice on environmental law for individuals, citizens’ initiatives and eNGOs.[43] There are no conditions for accessing the legal counselling – every individual person can have access, as well NGOs and the ombudsman for the environment. ÖKOBÜRO does not provide legal representation within environmental administrative and review procedures.

Furthermore, the Green Alternative Association for the support of citizens’ groups (Grüne-Alternative Verein zur Unterstützung von BürgerInnen-Initiativen – BIV) supports citizens’ initiatives financially in environmental review procedures.[44]

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.)?

If someone has a low income and is in a precarious financial situation, it is possible to apply for legal aid (Verfahrenshilfe). Part of the legal aid might be temporary exemption from the procedural costs. Legal aid must be applied for by the date of filing the complaint at the latest.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

An application for legal aid must be filed within the timeframe for the relevant submission or remedy and addressed to the responsible Court. As cases of legal aid are assigned to the responsible advocate, lawyers are usually not contacted directly by the defendant or acting individual.

2) Expert registries or publicly available websites of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

A list of all lawyers active in Austria including their contact data and filterable by legal areas is available on the website of the Federal Bar Association.[45]

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

The following environmental organisations are active in the field of access to justice:

- BirdLife Austria
- Four Paws Austria
- Global 2000 (Friends of the Earth Austria)
1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

Generally, decisions of an administrative authority must be appealed against within four weeks after the decision has been issued. However, shorter or longer time limits may be applicable based on the specific applicable law. The specific time limit for appeal is also highlighted in the decision itself. The time limit begins for each party with notification of the decision by post or with the deposit of the notice at the post office. If the decision is announced in a hearing, the time limit starts from the day of the announcement. The appeal must reach the authority within the time limit. It is sufficient for the appeal to be delivered to the post office within the given time limit. Challenging an administrative environmental decision is not possible if the party has expressly waived the complaint after the notification has been delivered.

2) Time limit to deliver a decision by an administrative organ

The authority must decide on the matter within six months unless a shorter or longer decisions period is provided by the specific applicable law. E.g., according to the Environmental Information Act (Umweltinformationsgesetz – UIG), the authority must react to requests of information within one month or, in complex cases, within two months. Official notifications rejecting request for information must be issued at latest within two months. If the authority exceeds the legally stipulated time limit to make a decision, a default complaint (Säumnisbeschwerde) can be filed by the concerned party.[47]

The expiry of the decision period must be certified. Premature default complaints will be rejected. The defaulting authority then has the option of presenting the matter to the administrative court or deciding on the matter themselves within three months. In the first case, the Administrative Court can only make a decision on relevant legal issues regarding the matter and the defaulting authority has up to eight weeks to make a decision based on the legal assessment of the Administrative Court. If the defaulting authority still does not make a decision, the Administrative Court ultimately has to decide on the matter based on the factual and legal situation at the time.

In matters within the municipalities' own sphere of competence, the concerned party must file a motion for devolution (Devolutionsantrag), but only when the responsible municipality body has exceeded its decision deadline. In this case, the responsibility to decide on the matter is transferred to the municipal authority of second instance. Only if this authority also exceeds its decision period is a default complaint admissible.

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

There is a right to appeal directly to an Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgericht) against first level administrative decisions. However, there is an exception to this principle regarding decisions of municipalities that lie within their competency. This includes areas such as land use, building control, areas constructed for traffic and disaster control. In these cases, an appeal can only be addressed to the municipal council or its board in accordance with Section 63 General Administrative Procedure Act (Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz 1991 – AVG).

The appeal to the Administrative Court against a first level administrative decision must be submitted to the authority that issued the decision in first instance. This authority then has the option of settling the complaint by means of a preliminary decision (Beschwerdeverfahrenscheidung), which has to be issued within two months. The concerned party can then file an application for submission (Vorlageantrag) within two weeks to the authority that issued the decision and ask for the complaint to be submitted to the Administrative Court for decision. The administrative court subsequently decides on the matter (unless the complaint is to be dismissed or the proceedings to be discontinued). If the authority has failed to investigate the matter sufficiently, the administrative court can overturn the contested decision and refer the matter back to the authority to issue a new decision. The authority is bound by the legal assessment on which the administrative court based its decision.

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

Generally, the administrative court must deliver its judgment without unnecessary delay and at least within six months, unless a different decisions period is provided by the specific applicable law. If the administrative court violates its decision-making obligation, an infringement application (Fristsetzungsantrag) can be filed by the lawyer representing the concerned party before the Supreme Administrative Court. Legal representation by a lawyer during the infringement proceedings is obligatory. The Supreme Administrative Court does not decide on the case itself but orders the defaulting administrative court to issue a decision within a period of grace.

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

Legal aid (Verfahrenshilfe) must be applied for at the latest when filing the complaint. If the party has applied for legal aid within the complaint period, it starts to run from the point when the decision regarding the appointment of the lawyer reached the representative and the decision to be appealed was delivered to the lawyer.

If new facts or evidence are presented during a complaint procedure which appear significant to the authority or the administrative court, the other parties must be informed immediately and given the opportunity to take note of the content of the complaint and comment on it. For this possibility to comment, parties must be granted a reasonable period of time, but not exceeding two weeks. The submission of new objections or arguments in the legal review is generally only admissible if they could not have been made during the administrative procedure. According to some provincial acts, the person or organisation may elaborate in its appeal why points in questions are raised for the first time.
The complainant must request a hearing to be held as part of the complaint or in the request for a preliminary ruling. The other parties must be given the opportunity to submit an application to hold a hearing within a reasonable period of time, but not exceeding two weeks.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Generally, an appeal has suspensive effect. As a result, the obligations imposed in the contested decision must not be provided for the time being, granted revoked rights do not apply for the time being and the decision is not yet binding. During the preliminary proceedings, the administrative authority can exclude the suspensive effect of the appeal, if – after weighing public interests and interest of other parties concerned – early enforcement of the decision is required due to the risk of delay. The Administrative Court can rule out the suspensive effect for the same reason.

However, some material laws provide explicit legal exclusions from the suspensive effect.

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

In case of measures that cannot be postponed because of imminent danger, the authority may issue an administrative decision without any prior investigation procedure. Against such an administrative decision, an appeal may be lodged with the issuing authority within two weeks. The appeal does not have suspensive effect. Within two weeks after receipt of the appeal, the authority must institute the investigation procedure, otherwise the administrative decision becomes ineffective.

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

There is no possibility to apply for injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?

Unless the appeal leads to a suspensive effect (see 1.), the administrative decision comes into force once the deadline to appeal has expired and no further legal remedies are permitted.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?

Generally, decisions of an administrative Court can be challenged (“asked to be revised”) before the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH). Such appeals (Revision) usually do not have suspensive effect. However, if the execution of the contested decision threatens the appealing party to suffer a disproportionate disadvantage, a suspensive effect can be granted on request.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?

There are no national regulations to this regard.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure – administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts’ fees, lawyers’ fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Legal costs and fees consist of court fees (to be paid when filing a claim or appeal), lawyers’ fees and actual expenses such as expert/translator costs and travel costs of witnesses. The parties’ own costs, such as internal investigation costs or the costs to prepare for the proceedings, are not considered as reimbursable. For administrative procedures, there is a cost category for every motion. The cost categories are stated in the Austrian Official Tax Regulation (Bundesverwaltungsabgabenverordnung 1983 – BvwAbgV).

In general, each party involved in an administrative or judicial review proceeding shall bear all its costs incurred. [49] Unless provided otherwise, the authority bears the costs incurred for its activities performed in the administrative proceedings ex officio.

There are no administrative review procedures, as complaints against decisions must be addressed to the Administrative Courts. The Attorney’s Tariff Act (Rechtsanwaltstarifgesetz) regulates lawyer’s fees. Lawyers have to be paid for each individual performance which the lawyer makes in the course of the proceeding.

As general rule in all Administrative Court procedures, also in relation to the environment, the court may call in official experts (Amtssachverständige) to gather evidence on a specific matter. However, the parties are free to appoint a private expert at their own expenses in order to obtain the relevant expert knowledge they wish in order to be able to argue in the procedure. The private experts are not experts within the meaning of the General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG), but the opinion of private experts can be presented to the court as evidence to support the legal position of the parties.

Private expert fees are subject to wide fluctuations, depending on every individual case. The expert fees for evaluation of major projects in different fields (e. g. a project with an area of 10 acres or transport infrastructure at least 10 km in length) without detailed on-site research can range up to EUR 50.000.

The fee for filing an appeal with the Administrative Court is EUR 30. The fee for filing an appeal with the Supreme Administrative Court or the Constitutional Court is EUR 240.

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/interim measure, is a deposit necessary?

There are no regulations on deposits regarding injunctive relief or interim measures.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?

If someone has a low income and is in a precarious financial situation, it is possible to apply for legal aid. Part of the legal aid might also be temporary exemption from procedural costs. Legal aid must be applied by the date of filing the complaint at the latest. Pro bono legal assistance is solely guaranteed within civil and criminal procedures as well as in administrative penal procedure and in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR: if a defendant in a criminal administrative procedure before an Administrative Court is not able to bear the costs of his defence without impediment to the requirements for the basic necessities of life, the Administrative Court may assign a defence lawyer to the defendant whose costs do not have to be borne by the defendant if this is required in the interest of dispensing justice, in particular in the interest of adequate defence, and pursuant to Article 6(1)(3)(c) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR [50].

Forms for the application for legal aid can be access on the websites of the Federal Ministry for Justice,[51] the Federal Administrative Court,[52] the Supreme Administrative Court,[53] the Constitutional Court.[54]

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?

Pro bono legal assistance (Verfahrenshilfe) is solely guaranteed within civil and criminal procedures in these cases as well as in administrative criminal procedures, in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR and in final complaint procedures before the Supreme Administrative Court. This might e.g. be the cases in the field of environmental criminal law. In these cases, it is possible to apply for legal aid if someone has a low income and is in a precarious financial situation. Part of the legal aid might be as well the temporary exemption from procedural costs. Legal aid must be applied for by the date if filing the complaint at the latest.

Legal persons can be granted legal aid mutatis mutandis, if bearing the costs of conducting proceedings is not possible without impediment to the requirements for the basic necessities by the party or a person with a financial involvement in the proceedings. [55]
Apart from this, in environmental matters, no legal aid can be requested. An application for legal aid within regular administrative procedures is therefore not possible.

The federalbar associations offer an introductory consultation free of charge (erste anhaltliche Auskunft)[1]. The association ÖKOBÜRO (Alliance of the Austrian Environmental Movement) is the only Austrian environmental NGO and public interest environmental law organisation that provides legal counselling on environmental matters. Environmental lawyers provide a free-of-charge legal advice on environmental law for individuals, citizens’ initiatives and eNGOs.[57] There are no conditions for accessing the legal counselling – every individual person can have access as well NGOs and the ombudsman for the environment. ÖKOBÜRO do not provide legal representation within environmental procedures.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?

The Green Alternative Association for the support of citizens’ groups (Grün-Alternativer Verein zur Unterstützung von BürgerInnen-Initiativen – BIV)[58] supports citizens’ initiatives financially in environmental procedures.

6) Does the “loser party pays” principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?

The “loser party pays” principle applies only in civil proceedings. Under this principle, the defeated party has to bear all costs including experts/witnesses/lawyers costs (as far as those costs were reasonable and necessary) as well as all other costs of the litigation at the end of the proceeding. In the case of partial success, the costs are divided aliquot.

In administrative proceedings each party shall bear all its costs incurred.[59] Apart from administrative penal proceedings, this principle applies to Administrative Court proceedings accordingly. Unless provided differently, the authority or court bears the costs incurred for its activities performed in the administrative proceeding ex officio.

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

Part of the legal aid in administrative penal procedures as well as in procedures before the Supreme Administrative Court can be temporary exemption from procedural costs such as special handling charges, cash expenses or administrative charges.

If a defendant in a criminal administrative procedure before an Administrative Court is not able to bear the costs of his defence without impediment to the requirements for the basic necessities of life, the Administrative Court, may assign of a defence lawyer to the defendant whose costs do not have to be borne by the defendant if this is required in the interests of dispensing justice, in particular in the interest of adequate defence, and pursuant to Article 6(1)(3)(c) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR [60].

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination?

The government of Austria provides a legal information system (Rechtsinformationssystem – RIS) online, where all legal provisions including case law can be accessed. A selection of Austrian Laws in English can be found here, including the Federal Constitutional Law, the Environmental Impact Assessment Act and the General Administrative Procedure.

The Federal Ministry of Climate Action, Environment, Energy, Mobility, Innovation and Technology provides structured information regarding EIA, see here. Practical information on SEA and EIA is available at http://www.partizipation.at/. The Austrian public administration also provides a Business Service Portal (Unternehmensserviceportal) which offers information for businesses regarding environmental legal issues including the Environmental Information Act and the EIA procedure.

Structured dissemination focusing on environmental access to justice for affected individuals, NGOs and other third-parties is mainly provided by the ombudsman for the environment in the federal states as well as NGOs such as the environmental umbrella organisations ÖKOBÜRO – Alliance of the Austrian Environmental Movement and Umweltbeiratverband.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information?

The specific rules on public participation in environmental procedures are determined in the respective material laws. Generally, any planned project must be publicised in an appropriate and timely manner (e.g. official notice in the municipality, advertisement in newspapers, information on the website of the respective authorities). An applicant is advised to access information at the respective authority, where the application has to be filed as well.

For large-scale proceedings, i.e. if more than 100 people are expected to be involved, there are specific administrative rules regarding access to information. [61] This structure is especially relevant in the case of EIA procedures. In these cases, the authority may publicly announce submissions by edict.

Within the implementation of Article 9(3) Aarhus Convention, different electronic online platforms have been introduced, both on Federal and Provincial level.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)?

There must be a period for public inspection of the application as well as all relevant documents relating to the planned project, where objections to the planned project can be raised. The public has the right to comment on the project or to put forward counter-opinions. These comments must be taken into account in EIA procedures when preparing the environmental impact assessment and in EIA and IPPC procedures when deciding on the application for approval. The decision including the taken measures and the discussions regarding the comments must be made public.

In EIA procedures a timetable for the procedure must be published online. The authority as well as the affected municipality or municipalities must make the application available for at least six weeks and, if possible, electronically. Additionally, they must publish information on the internet, in a widely-read newspaper in the region and in another regular newspaper. Large-scale proceedings include stricter rules on access to information. Official documents must be delivered by edict[62] and the authority must make clear that all documents are accessible at the authority’s office.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice information in the administrative decision and in the judgment?

As a general rule, all administrative decisions or court rulings must contain the operative part and the information regarding appeals (Rechtsmittelbelehrung).

[63] The instructions on the right to appeal must indicate whether or not an appeal may be filed against the decision, and, if so, indicate the contents and form that the appeal must have and the authority to which and the period by which it must be submitted. [64]

Regarding EIA procedures, the administrative decision and judgment must be made public and must include information regarding access to justice (e.g. regarding the possibility to appeal).

Decisions by the Federal Administrative Court on EIA cases must be published on the website for at least eight weeks and must be made publicly and physically available at the local authority during the office hours for public inspection. This possibility must be pointed out at the public municipality’s official board.[65]

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice
The Environment Agency Austria (Umweltbundesamt GmbH) provides an overview of all relevant published information regarding EIA procedures on its website. In Austria, the EIA procedure is structured as a “concentrated approval procedure” (konzentiertes Genehmigungsverfahren) for a project. There is only a single approval procedure, deciding on all the necessary authorisations for a project. This applies to all permits required under federal or state law and covers a wide range of materials, such as water law, nature conservation law, building law, protection of historical monuments, etc.

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

The purpose of a screening process (Feststellungsverfahren) is to estimate the environmental impact of a project and to determine whether or not an environmental impact assessment is necessary. The screening can be done ex officio by the authority. In some cases, e.g. regarding individual case examinations (Einzelfallprüfungen), a screening is required by law. The project applicant, a cooperating authority and the ombudsman for the environment can also request a screening. In certain procedures (e.g. federal highways/high-speed railways) the local municipalities are also entitled to request a screening.

During the screening process, only the cooperating authority and the water management planning body have the right to be heard. The authority has to issue a decision regarding the results of the screening (Feststellungsbescheid) within six weeks. In case of a decision stating that no EIA procedure is needed, recognised environmental NGOs and neighbours have a right to appeal within four weeks, starting on the day the decision was made public online. However, the right to appeal does not imply a right to apply for a screening process or grant legal standing in a screening process. Citizens’ groups do not have the right to appeal.

According to Section 19(1) EIA Act (UVP-G 2000), neighbours are “persons who might be threatened or disturbed or whose rights in rem might be harmed at home or abroad by the construction, operation or existence of the project as well as the owners of facilities in which persons stay temporarily on a regular basis with regard to the protection of such persons.” This definition does not include persons who stay temporarily in the vicinity of the project and do not have rights in rem.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

A preliminary scoping procedure (Vorverfahren) can be initiated at the request of the project applicant. The application must include an outline of the project as well as a concept regarding the environmental impact declaration (Umweltverträglichkeiterklärung). The goal of a preliminary scoping procedure is to ensure a time-efficient EIA procedure, identifying any deficiencies in the project or submitted concept or other obstacles regarding the actual EIA procedure. The authority must react to the application within three months after consulting the participating authorities and, if necessary, also third parties. Other parties aside from the project applicant, including the public, cannot request a preliminary scoping procedure nor challenge a lack thereof.

3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?

Neighbours, citizens’ groups, officially recognised environmental NGOs, the Ombudsman for the Environment (see details under 1.2.3.), the Ombudsman for Economic Location, affected municipalities and the water management planning body have party status in EIA procedures. Other parties may be determined based on the applicable material law in an EIA procedure. As parties, they have the right to file a complaint with the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht – BVwG) or, if necessary, a final appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH). The administrative decision from the EIA authority must be made public for at least eight weeks. Access to information regarding the decision must be provided online as well. Two weeks after publishing the decision, it is considered to be delivered to those persons who did not also participate in the EIA procedure (or not in time).

The complaint against the administrative decision from the EIA authority must be submitted to the authority within four weeks after the decision was made public. Otherwise the decision is final and legally binding. An appeal can also be filed with the Federal Administrative Court against administrative decisions regarding whether or not the project falls under the requirements of an EIA procedure (Feststellungsbescheid).

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?

The administrative decision must be appealed against within four weeks, otherwise the decision is final and legally binding. The right to appeal also applies to neighbours and officially accredited NGOs. The decision by the Federal Administrative Court (Bundesverwaltungsgericht – BVwG) can be challenged by neighbours, citizens’ groups and officially recognised environmental NGOs before the Supreme Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof – VwGH). An appeal before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof – VGH) is only possible if individual rights are violated. For neighbours and local citizens’ groups, this is usually easier to prove than for NGOs.

With regard to individuals abroad, according to Section 19(1) EIA Act (UVP-G 2000), the principle of reciprocity applies to neighbours in states not parties to the Agreement on the European Economic Area. According to Section 19(11) EIA Act (UVP-G 2000), an environmental organisation from another state may exercise the rights of a party if this state has been notified pursuant to the regulations on cross-border procedures, if the effects impact that part of the environment in the foreign state whose protection is pursued by the environmental organisation and if the environmental organisation could participate in an EIA procedure or a development consent procedure if the project was implemented in the respective state.

5) Scope of judicial review — control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?

The Federal Administrative Court as well as the Supreme Administrative Court cannot initiate a review process of the administrative decision on their own motion. If an appeal is filed, both courts can review the decision in terms of its procedural as well as substantive legality. While the court has to review all facts deemed necessary for a ruling, the scope of judicial review is usually set out by the complaints brought forward.

A review of decisions of Administrative Courts before the Constitutional Court is only possible with regard to violations of constitutionally guaranteed rights or a violation in the form of an illegal act alleged by the complainant. An individual application (Individualantrag) is possible when the applicant can claim that his/her fundamental rights are directly violated by law. This is the case if the law, for example, has become effective for an individual without the basis of a judicial decision.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?

The official EIA procedure starts with the submission of the application by the project applicant. The project applicant must submit an environmental impact statement (Umweltverträglichkeiterklärung) along with the application, where the main alternatives examined, the environmental impact of the project and the measures to avoid or reduce these effects are described. This application must be made public for at least six weeks (see 1.7.4.3.). During this period, the public is entitled to comment on the submitted application documents and the project applicant’s environmental impact statement.

Further points of intervention of the public are the right to inspect the EIA report as well as the right to comment in hearings. As pointed out above, an appeal from affected neighbours or a recognised environmental organisation can be made to the Federal Administrative Court against administrative decisions as to whether the project falls under the requirements of an EIA procedure (Feststellungsbescheid). The environmental report as part of the final EIA decision can be challenged before the Federal Administrative Court (see Section 1.8.1.4.). Furthermore, an appeal can be filed with the Federal Administrative Court if decisions are not made within the given deadline (Säumnisbeschwerde).
7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? Decisions as to whether or not the project falls under the requirements of an EIA procedure as well as final administrative EIA decision can (only) be challenged directly at the Federal Administrative Court, which serves as the administrative review body in EIA procedures.

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation stage of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? The EIA procedure binds the party status to participation during the administrative procedure. This includes participation during the public consultation phase as well as participation in hearings, which can be scheduled ex officio or at the request of a party. Parties must submit interventions during the public consultation phase in order to be granted standing.

Except for the project applicant, any party loses its party status if it does not raise any objections until at least one day before the hearing or during the hearing (Präklusionswirkung). However, preclusion can only occur if the hearing was published properly as determined in Section 42 (2) General Administrative Procedure Act (Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz 1991 – AVG). (See details for publication also under 1.7.4.2.) If the party can demonstrate that an unforeseen or inevitable event prevented it from raising objections in due time and that it is not at fault or only by a minor oversight, it can apply for reinstatement of its party status (Antrag auf Wiedereinsetzung). This application has to be filed within two weeks after the cause preventing the party to raise objections has been removed.

Regarding the EIA procedure before the Administrative Courts: If objections are put forward for the first time in the complaint, they are only admissible if the complaint justifies why they could not have been raised earlier during the objection period in the administrative procedure and the complainant demonstrates that he or she is not at fault or only due to a minor failure to object during the objection period.

9) Fair, equitable – what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? The right to a fair trial derives from Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), which has constitutional status in Austria. This includes the right to a fair trial in administrative justice. Furthermore, the right to party status derives from the constitutional principle of equality.[73] The guarantee of equality of arms within procedures is also embedded in the obligation to provide necessary guidance (Manuduktionspflicht). Authorities and courts are required to give persons not represented by professional counsel instructions on steps they need to take in the proceedings and to instruct them on the legal consequences connected directly with such acts or the failure to perform them.[74] This obligation can be regarded as general procedural principle.[75] Access to justice for members of the public aims to grant standing to all actors who are perceived as having a substantial interest in the respective case. They have the possibility to make known the elements on which their claim is based and can discuss any claim, evidence or document presented to the judge through an intervention mechanism. However, the economic inequalities between parties (despite pro bono legal assistance) as well as newly introduced counterweights such as the Ombudsman for Economic Location (Standortanwalt) as a party in EIA procedures, have raised concerns regarding the equality of arms within civil society.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? Regarding interventions by parties, the notion of “timely” is interpreted as “submitted within the legal timeframe”, or in case of a hearing, until the hearing. Regarding the decision-making obligation, authorities and Courts are generally asked to issue decisions as soon as possible and “without unnecessary delay” (ohne unnötigen Aufschub), latest until the given deadline.[76] Administrative Courts must decide within a timeframe of at maximum 6 months.[77]

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions? Details on the general rules regarding injunctive relief can be found under 1.7.2. The EIA Act (UVP-G 2000) does not provide specific rules for EIA procedures. In general, the appeal against administrative decisions has a suspensive effect unless the Federal Administrative Court ruled out the possibility in an individual case.

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

The authorisation procedure for IPPC sites is regulated in the Industrial Code (Gewerbeordnung 1994 – GewO 1994), the Waste Management Act (Abfallwirtschaftsgesetz 2002 – AWG 2002), the Emission Protection Act for Steam Boilers (Emissionsschutzgesetz für Kesselanlagen) and the Mining Act (Mineralrohstoffgesetz – MinRoG). According to these acts, neighbours and environmental organisations, including foreign NGOs are provided party status (legal standing) and full legal review in IPPC/IED procedures.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

Neighbours are defined as persons who might be threatened or disturbed or whose rights in rem might be harmed as well as the owners of facilities in which persons stay temporarily on a regular basis with regard to the protection of such persons. Following the principle of reciprocity, neighbours are also owners of nearby land outside the Austrian territory. Regarding environmental NGOs, these acts all refer to Section 19 EIA Act (UVP-G 2000) which requires them to be organised in the form of a non-profit organisation for at least three years, to have at least 100 members and to have environmental protection as their main objective. Federations must comprise at least five member associations. All organisations must prove every three years that they still meet the recognition requirements.

Foreign NGOs are granted party status to the extent they raised written complaints during the period for public inspection, if (a) there has been an official cross-border notification of the respective state, (b) the project is likely to have significant effects on the area of the state for which the environmental organisation advocates, and (c) the organisation is entitled to participate in similar procedures in its state of origin. In the regular EIA procedure, neighbours and environmental NGOs have the status of a party and thus are entitled to participate in the procedure and challenge possible procedural decisions (such as the appointment of an expert) as well as the final EIA decision. In their respective area of recognition, in procedures concerning IPPC/IED waste treatment plants, mining facilities, steam boilers >50 MW and industrial sites, environmental organisations are entitled to claim the observance of environmental provisions in the procedure and to resort to remedies if and to the extent they raised written complaints during the period for public inspection. If objections are raised for the first time, they are permissible only if the complaint gives reasons why it has not been possible to raise them already during the objection period in the application procedure and if the complainant demonstrates that the fact that he failed to raise the objections during the objection period is not or only to a minor degree his fault.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

Only the project applicant – in waste management procedures also the Ombudsman for the Environment – has party status in the screening procedure. There are no rules on access to justice of members of the public within screening procedures.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

There are no rules on access to justice for members of the public within scoping procedures.
5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions? Environmental NGOs and neighbours can challenge decisions to permit or significantly change a waste treatment permit, mining facilities, steam boilers >50 MW and industrial sites within the IED regime.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation? Environmental NGOs and neighbours are entitled to challenge the final authorisation of waste treatment, mining facilities, steam boilers >50 MW and industrial sites within the IED regime.

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions? Foreign and Austrian environmental NGOs are entitled to judicial review regarding permitting decisions or decisions significantly amending a site to the extent they raised written complaints during the period for public inspection. There are no general provisions granting members of the public the option to challenge omissions. If the authority has not made a decision on a matter within six months or, if the law provides for a shorter or longer period allowed for a decision, within that period, parties can file a complaint alleging breach of the duty to reach a timely decision (Säumnisbeschwerde) with the respective Administrative Court. Parties to the procedure may also challenge the omission to serve or issue a permit.

The Federal Administrative Court as well as the Supreme Administrative Court cannot initiate a review process of the administrative decision on their own motion. If an appeal is filed, both courts can review the decision in terms of its procedural as well as substantive legality. While the court has to review all facts deemed necessary for a ruling, the scope of judicial review is usually set out by the complaints brought forward.

8) At what stage are these challengeable? Procedural decisions or omissions by the responsible authority may be challenged at any stage during the authorisation procedure.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement for exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? The administrative decision can (only) be challenged directly at the Federal Administrative Court, which serves as the administrative review body in IPPCIED procedures.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? In general, the principle of preclusion applies. If an oral hearing has been properly announced, a person may lose party standing unless he or she raises an objection with the authority by the day preceding the hearing or during the hearing itself. A person presenting prima facie evidence of having been prevented to raise objections in due time by an unforeseeable or unavoidable event, may raise objections within two weeks after the reason for being prevented has ceased to exist, at the latest however by the date of the legally effective decision of the subject matter (see also answer 1.8.2.2). Foreign and Austrian environmental NGOs are entitled to judicial review to the extent they raised written complaints during the period for public inspection. In procedures according to the Waste Management Act, their right to challenge decisions is limited to violation of environmental protection provisions set under Union law (Section 42(3) AWG 2002).

11) Fair, equitable – what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction? The right to a fair trial derives from Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), which has constitutional status in Austria. This includes the right to a fair trial in administrative justice. Furthermore, the right to party status derives from the constitutional principle of equality.

Public access to justice in environmental procedures aims to grant standing to all actors who are perceived as having a substantial interest in the respective case. They have the possibility to make known the elements on which their claim is based and can discuss any claim, evidence or document presented to the judge through an intervention mechanism.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation? Regarding interventions by parties, the notion of “timely” is interpreted as “submitted within the legal timeframe”, or in case of a hearing, until the date of the hearing.

Regarding the decision-making obligation, authorities and courts are generally asked to issue decisions as soon as possible and “without unnecessary delay” (ohne unnötigen Aufschub), latest until the given deadline.

If the authority has not made a decision on a matter within six months or, if the law provides for a shorter or longer period allowed for a decision, within that period, parties can file a complaint alleging breach of the duty to reach a timely decision (Säumnisbeschwerde) with the respective Administrative Court. Administrative Courts must decide within a timeframe of at maximum 6 months.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions? There is no injunctive relief, but an appeal generally has suspensive effect according to the general administrative rules of procedure. During the preliminary proceedings, the administrative authority may exclude the suspensive effect of the appeal, if – after weighing public interests and interest of other parties concerned – early enforcement of the decision is required due to the risk of delay. The Administrative Court can rule out the suspensive effect for the same reason.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner? Regarding IPPC/IED procedures, the administrative decision and judgment must be made public and must include information regarding access to justice (e.g. regarding the possibility to appeal). As of the expiry of a period of two weeks following announcement on the authority’s website – according to some procedure also in a common newspaper – the official notice is considered as delivered vis-à-vis environmental organisations entitled to take legal action.

1.8.3. Environmental liability

County-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD? According to Section 13 of the Federal Environmental Liability Act (Bundes-Umwelthaftungsgesetz – B-UHG), natural and legal persons have the right to appeal a decision on environmental remediation if they are parties to the procedure. They can be parties to the procedure if they have filed an environmental complaint (Umweltbeschwerde) according to Section 11 B-UHG or requested in writing to be a party to the procedure on remediation measures within two weeks after its publication.

The right to file an environmental complaint is granted to environmental organisations recognised according to Section 19 EIA Act (UVP-G 2000) as well as natural and legal persons whose individual rights or interests might be infringed by environmental damage. Relevant individual rights or interests are considered to be the protection of human life and health, individual rights to use certain water bodies, fishing rights, property and other rights in rem related to real estate.
1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?

In cross-border EIA procedures, the affected foreign parties need to be informed of the proposed activity, the possible cross-border environmental impacts, and the nature of possible decisions that can be taken in the EIA procedure. The competent authority is obliged to send this information to the affected foreign parties. The EIA documentation has to include a description of the project, reasonable alternatives, a description of the actual environmental conditions at the project site, and an enumeration of mitigation measures. The notification must be given as early as possible, if adequate already during the scoping procedure and latest at the time of notification of the public in Austria.[83]

If an IPPC/IED project or a major change thereto may significantly affect the environment in another state or if a state likely to be concerned requests it, the responsible authority must notify the respective state. The notification must be given no later than the date of the national notification. It must include relevant information on possible cross-border impact as well as the relevant administrative procedure. The authority must set an appropriate timeframe to express the desire to participate in the procedure.

In case of cross-border environmental damage, the concerned state must be notified. An environmental organisation recognised pursuant to Section 19(7) EIA Act has locus standi and is entitled to claim the observance of environmental provisions in the procedure if and to the extent it filed written complaints during the period for public inspection. It is also entitled to lodge a complaint with the Federal Administrative Court and to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court.[84] An environmental organisation from a foreign state may exercise the same rights, if this state has been notified, if the effects impact that part of the environment in the foreign state whose protection is pursued by the environmental organisation and if the environmental organisation could participate in an EIA procedure and a development consent procedure if the project were implemented in this foreign state.[85]

2) Notion of public concerned?

The notion of the public concerned is similar to that of the public in Austria. Individuals must meet the criteria of “neighbours”: i.e. persons who might be threatened or disturbed or whose rights in rem might be harmed as well as the owners of facilities in which persons stay temporarily on a regular basis with regard to the protection of such persons. Environmental organisations must meet the criteria applicable to participate in the respective environmental procedures in their state.

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

On the basis of reciprocity, NGOs have standing in Austrian EIA procedures, subject to certain conditions which also apply to their Austrian “counterparts”: NGOs of the affected country have legal standing according to Section 19(11) EIA Act (UVP-G 2000) if (1) the foreign state has been notified of the planned activity, (2) the environment in the relevant area of the foreign state might be affected by the proposed activity and its protection is pursued by the NGO, and (3) if the NGO could participate in an EIA procedure if the project was implemented in this foreign state.

If an NGO has expressed its wish to participate in the procedure, it may submit statements and, to this extent, file an appeal to the Administrative Court within four weeks. The decision by the competent authority must contain information on the possibility to appeal, including timeframe and the institution to which it must be addressed.

There is no legal aid granted or pro bono assistance in environmental administrative procedures in Austria.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

On the basis of reciprocity, neighbours in the affected country have standing in Austrian EIA and IPPC/IED procedures if they meet the criteria of “neighbours”. Neighbours are considered persons who might be threatened or disturbed or whose rights in rem might be harmed as well as the owners of facilities in which persons stay temporarily on a regular basis with regard to the protection of such persons. Foreign neighbours and municipalities (acting as neighbours) are guaranteed legal standing according to Section 19(11) EIA Act (UVP-G 2000). The above-mentioned parties will enjoy the same party rights as Austrian NGOs or neighbours do.

Foreign citizens’ groups do not have legal standing in cross-border EIA as they do not fulfil the criteria established for national citizens’ groups – namely the foreign individuals lack the right to vote in Austria.[86]

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

Information must be provided as early as possible, if adequate already during the EIA scoping procedure and latest at the time of the notification of the public in Austria.[87]

6) What are the timeframes for public involvement including access to justice?
A copy of the application, of the other relevant documents and of the environmental impact statement must be available for public inspection for at least six weeks. Decisions can be appealed within four weeks after delivery of the decision. For persons who did not become party to the procedure, decisions are considered delivered two weeks after publication of the decision.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

Information on access to justice is provided within the decision/official notice by the responsible authority.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

If a party or a person does not have sufficient command of the German language, an interpreter (official interpreter) or translator available to the authority must be called in. All interpreters or translators provided are officially accredited and listed. Interpretation costs and costs of a translator are to be paid by the party needing interpretation.

9) Any other relevant rules?

If the party can demonstrate that an unforeseen or inevitable event prevented it from raising objections in due time and that it is not at fault or only by a minor oversight, they can apply for reinstatement of their party status (Antrag auf Wiedereinsetzung). This application has to be filed within two weeks after the cause preventing the party to raise objections has been removed.

---

[1] See Article 3 leg cit.
[8] Article 50(2) 2 BV-G.
[11] As their role is not foreseen by EU law, however, one federal province (Upper Austria) excludes in its Aarhus Participation Act the Ombudsman for the Environment from procedures concerning European environmental law.
[14] Section 34 VwGVG.
[16] Section 15 VwGVG.
[20] Section 16(2) EIA Act (UVP-G).
[21] However, as mentioned in footnote 11, according to the Upper Austrian Aarhus Participation Act, Environmental Ombudsmen are excluded from procedures concerning European environmental law.
[22] Section 8 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[23] Liste der anerkannten Umweltorganisationen (23 July 2020).
[25] Section 72(2) Industrial Code (GewO).
[26] Section 56 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG). NR26
[27] Section 57 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[28] Section 46 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[31] Section 65 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[32] Section 43 (4) General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[33] Section 10 Proceedings of Administrative Courts Act (VwGVG).
[34] Section 16 (3) EIA Act (UVP-G).
[36] Section 52(2) and (3) General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[37] Section 17 Proceedings of Administrative Courts Act (VwGVG).
[38] Section 53 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[39] Section 74 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[40] Section 8a Proceedings of Administrative Courts Act (VwGVG).
[48] Section 57 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[49] Section 74 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).
[50] Section 40 Proceedings of Administrative Courts Act (VwGVG).

On the provincial level, main provisions on access to justice can be found in the different Nature Protection Acts of the federal provinces. Apart from Styria and Upper Austria, provinces have also introduced provisions on access to justice in their hunting legislation (Jagdgesetze). Burgenland, Carinthia, Salzburg, Tyrol, and Vorarlberg have additionally introduced similar provisions in their Fisheries Acts (Fischereigesetze). The province of Vienna has recently sent out for public consultation a draft law amending its corresponding legislation [87] Vienna Nationalparkgesetz, [87] Wiener Naturschutzgesetz, [87] Wiener Fischereigesetz and [87] Wiener Jagdgesetz.

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission and its content (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time-limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The appeal against the first level administrative decision must be submitted to the authority that issued the decision in first instance. This authority then has the option of setting the complaint by means of a preliminary decision (Beschwerdevorverteidigung), which has to be issued within two months. The concerned party can then file an application for submission (Vorlageantrag) within two weeks to the authority that issued the decision and ask for the complaint to be submitted to the administrative court for decision. The administrative court subsequently decides on the matter (unless the complaint is to be dismissed or the proceedings discontinued). If the authority has failed to investigate the matter sufficiently, the Administrative Court can overturn the contested decision and refer the matter back to the authority to issue a new decision. The authority is bound by the legal assessment on which the administrative Court based its decision.

The requirements for the recognition of an environmental NGO as being entitled to appeal are laid down in Section 19 EIA Act. [2] This provision requires it to be organised in the form of a non-profit organisation for at least three years, to have at least 100 members and to have environmental protection as its main objective. Federations must comprise at least five member associations. All organisations must prove every three years that they still meet the recognition requirements.

Individuals are entitled to review procedures if their subjective rights are affected by a decision. This can be the case in water, clean air, waste management or hunting and fishing procedures.

Generally, decisions of an administrative authority must be appealed against within four weeks after the decision has been issued. The appeal needs to be made in written form and must include the name of the decision, the authority concerned, the reasons for appeal and actions required.

Even before the entry into force of the Aarhus Participation Act, national courts were inclined to grant access to justice by direct application of EU legislation with reference to European case-law.[3] Recent cases show that this practice remains in areas not regulated by the Aarhus Participation Act, such as the Forestry Act (Forstgesetz 1975 – ForstG).[4]

Although authorities may not directly grant access to justice where it is not provided by national law, for cases determined by European law access to justice rights are mainly granted before regional Administrative Courts. There are however still decisions by these courts, even within the realm of EU law, denying legal standing and access to justice or restricting it.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

If an appeal is filed, Administrative Courts can review the decision in terms of its procedural as well as substantive legality. While the court has to review all facts deemed necessary for a ruling, the scope of judicial review is usually set out by the complaints brought forward.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Administrative decisions in environmental law can (only) be challenged directly at the Federal Administrative Court, which serves as the administrative review body in environmental procedures. The appeal, however, must first be submitted to the authority that issued the decision in first instance. This authority then has the option of settling the complaint by means of a preliminary decision (Beschwerdevorentscheidung; see 2.1.1.).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

In general, the principle of preclusion (Präklusion) applies:[5] Except for the project applicant, any party loses its party status and thus standing if it does not raise any objections until at least one day before the hearing or during the hearing. However, preclusion can only occur if the hearing was published properly as determined in Section 42 General Administrative Procedure Act (Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz 1991 – AVG) and in the area-specific legislation (in most environmental, an electronic online platform is used).

Regarding environmental organisations, the preclusion rules differ in each legislative act. Sometimes it is sufficient for the NGO to elaborate in its appeal why the points in question are being raised for the first time; in other cases it is not possible to file an appeal if the NGO has not submitted a statement in the preceding administrative procedure.[6]

5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

Individuals, apart from the project applicant, must allege interference with the subjective publicly granted rights.

In water procedures, environmental organisations may only raise arguments concerning potentially significant adverse effects on water quality. In waste management procedures, access to justice for environmental organisations is limited to breaches of EU environmental law. In procedures regarding air quality plans or national air pollution control programmes, persons need to be directly concerned. Similar limitations can be found in most provincial provisions.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

The right to a fair trial derives from Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), which has constitutional status in Austria. This includes the right to a fair trial in administrative justice. Furthermore, the right to party status derives from the constitutional principle of equality.[10]

Access to justice by the public in environmental trials aims to grant standing to all actors who are perceived as having a substantial interest in the respective case. They have the possibility to make known the elements on which their claim is based and can discuss any claim, evidence or document presented to the judge through an intervention mechanism. However, economic inequalities between parties (despite pro bono legal assistance), e.g. because of costly expert opinions, remain.

7) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

Regarding interventions by parties, the notion of “timely” is interpreted as “submitted within the legal timeframe”, or in case of a hearing, until the date of the hearing. This is mostly decided on a case-by-case basis. E.g. if there are new facts or evidence presented in a complaint, the authority or the court must notify the other parties thereof without delay and give them the opportunity to comment within a reasonable period of no longer than two weeks, or in case of a hearing, until the hearing.

Regarding the decision-making obligation, authorities and courts are generally asked to issue decisions as soon as possible and “without unnecessary delay” (ohne unnötigen Aufschub), no later than the given deadline.[11] If the authority or court has not made a decision on a matter within six months or, if the law provides for a shorter or longer period allowed for a decision, within that period, parties can file a complaint alleging breach of the duty to reach a timely decision. In case of authorities the respective Administrative Court decides on the complaint (Säumnisbeschwerde), in case of Administrative Courts (Fristsetzungsantrag), the Supreme Administrative Court. The complaint is first filed with the court or authority who has the chance to make up for its omission within two weeks.

Administrative courts must decide within a timeframe of at maximum 6 months.[12]

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no injunctive relief system, but an appeal generally has suspensive effect according to the general administrative rules of procedure. During the preliminary proceedings, the administrative authority may exclude the suspensive effect of the appeal, if – after weighing public interests and interest of other parties concerned – early enforcement of the decision is required due to the risk of delay. The Administrative Court can rule out the suspensive effect for the same reason. According to certain provisions such as Section 43a of the Upper Austrian Nature and Landscape Protection Act (Oö. Natur- und Landschaftsschutzgesetz 2001 – Oö. NSchG 2001), the suspensive effect of appeals is excluded unless the authority grants it upon application.

What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

Legal costs and fees in judicial review consist of court fees (to be paid when filing a claim or appeal), lawyers’ fees and actual expenses such as expert /translator costs and travel costs of witnesses. Lawyers have to be paid for each individual performance which the lawyer makes in the course of the proceeding. The parties’ own costs, such as internal investigations costs or the costs to prepare the proceedings, are not considered as reimbursable.
There are no administrative review procedures, as complaints against decisions must be addressed to the Administrative Courts. In review proceedings before the administrative Courts each party shall bear all its costs incurred. Unless provided differently, the authority bears the costs incurred for its activities performed in the administrative proceeding ex officio.

For administrative procedures there is a cost category for every motion. The cost categories are stated in the Austrian Official Tax Regulation (Bundesverwaltungsabgabenverordnung 1983 – BwAbG).

The most costly part of filing an administrative appeal is usually the submission of expert opinions. Expert fees are subject to wide fluctuations, depending on every individual case. The expert fees for the evaluation of major projects in different fields (e.g. a project with an amplitude of 10 acres or transport infrastructure of at least 10 km length) without detailed on-site research can range up to EUR 50,000.-. It is also possible that the parties engage “private experts” to provide a report on a topic. However, these reports are only treated as private documentation and prove nothing but the opinion of the author.

There are no statutory provisions avoiding prohibiting costs of expert opinions.

10) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic?

If someone has a low income and is in a precarious financial situation, it is possible to apply for legal aid. Legal aid may be granted if it is covered by Article 6 ECHR or Article 47 ECFR. Part of the legal aid might be as well be temporary exemption from procedural costs. Legal aid must be applied for by the date of filing the complaint at the latest. Part of the legal aid might be temporary exemption from the procedural costs.

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[14]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

Implementing provisions to the SEA Directive on Federal and Provincial level currently do not grant members of the public access to review procedures. There is no option to challenge either the substance or procedural issues such as ineffective or missing public participation.

The only option to challenge a plan or programme exists if it was issued as a law[15] or ordinance[16]. This right to review before the Constitutional Court, however, is limited to a small number of persons (see 2.2.2.)

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Regarding constitutional rights, Article 144 of the Federal Constitutional Law provides for individuals to make claims before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof – VfGH) if their fundamental rights are infringed. Its basic requirements are the interference with the individual’s “subjective right”, i.e. that the party can only object to norms that exist to protect an individual on the one hand, and an infringement of an individual’s fundamental right on the other hand. Constitutional rights that can be linked to environmental protection are, for example, the right to justice, the right to life, the right to health, the right to respect for private and family life.

The scope of review if the Constitutional Court includes the conformity of ordinances with constitutional or legal provisions as well as with provision of underlying ordinances – from a procedural as well as a substantive aspect[17]. If the Constitutional Court pronounces an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional or illegal, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is exempted from this rule.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

For an application to the Constitutional Court, administrative review procedures must be exhausted in case of administrative decisions. However, as pointed out above under 2.2.1, SEA legislation in general does not provide for administrative review of members of the public.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts, is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

As there are no specific regulations on access to justice in the area of SEA, there are no relevant requirements.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There are no rules on injunctive relief in this regard.

If the Constitutional Court pronounces an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is exempted from this rule.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

The fee for filing an appeal with the Constitutional Court is EUR 240. Legal assistance is required. Legal aid or pro bono legal assistance (Verfahrenshilfe) can be granted in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR.

Apart from the regulated lawyer’s fees according to the Attorney’s Tariff Act (Rechtsanwaltsstarrifgesetz) (see 2.1.9), there are no statutory guarantees that costs are not prohibitive.

1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[18]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There are no general provisions granting members of the public access to review procedures according to Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention. There is neither an option to challenge the substance nor procedural issues such as ineffective or missing public participation.

The only option to challenge a plan or programme exists if it was issued as a law[19] or ordinance[20]. This right to review before the Constitutional Court, however, is limited to a small number of persons.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Regarding constitutional rights, Article 144 of the Federal Constitutional Law provides for individuals to make claims before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof – VfGH) if their fundamental rights are infringed. Its basic requirements are the interference with the individual’s “subjective right”, i.e. that the party can only object to norms that exist to protect an individual on the one hand, and an infringement of an individual’s fundamental right on the other hand. Constitutional rights that can be linked to environmental protection are, for example, the right to justice, the right to life, the right to health, the right to respect for private and family life.

The scope of review if the Constitutional Court includes the conformity of ordinances with constitutional or legal provisions as well as with provision of underlying ordinances – from a procedural as well as a substantive aspect.[21] If the Constitutional Court pronounces an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional or illegal, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is exempted from this rule.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? For an application to the Constitutional Court, administrative review procedures must be exhausted. However, as pointed out above under 2.3.1.1, SEA legislation in general does not provide for administrative review of members of the public.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? As there are no specific regulations on access to justice in the scope of Article 7 Aarhus Convention, there are no relevant requirements.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions? There are no rules on injunctive relief in this regard. If the Constitutional Court pronounces an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is exempted from this rule.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive? The fee for filing an appeal with the Constitutional Court is EUR 240. Legal assistance is required. Legal aid or pro bono legal assistance (Verfahrenshilfe) can be granted in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR. Apart from this option and from the regulated lawyer’s fees according to the Attorney’s Tariff Act (Rechtsanwaltstarifgesetz), there are no statutory guarantees that costs are not prohibitive.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation[22]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

The only regulatory framework currently granting access to justice regarding plans or programmes are the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L) and the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – EG-L 2018). When filing such application, natural persons must demonstrate that they are directly concerned. A person is directly concerned if their health may be endangered as a result of the breach of a limit value. Environmental organisations must apprise information and data supporting their official recognition pursuant to Section 19 EIA Act.[23]

To date, it is not clear how effective access to justice in this area is, as these rights have only been introduced recently and practical experience has still to be gained. However, already existing case law shows that the effectiveness of an appeal crucially depends on its timing as breaches of limit values are either diminishing or subject to meteorological circumstances which lead to years with breaches followed by years where limit values are met. It should be noted that even before the entry into force of the amendments to the IG-L and the EG-L 2018 introducing access to justice, access to justice has been granted by direct application of EU law in conjunction with the Aarhus Convention in the area of air protection.[24] It therefore could be possible that national courts directly apply other EU environmental provisions in conjunction with the Aarhus Convention in a similar way.[25] From the existing case-law it can be assumed that environmental organisations should be recognised according to Section 19 of the EIA Act and individuals should be affected in the subjective publicly granted rights.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?

Applications to the Constitutional Court to challenge a plan or programme are only admissible if they are adopted in the form of an act or ordinance.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? According to the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L) and the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – EG-L) the application or the complaint must be established in a clearly and well-argued fashion explaining why the requirements for the establishment or the revision of an air quality plan or the National Air Pollution Programme are met or why, in their entirety, the measures provided for in the plan or programme are inappropriate to ensure compliance with the relevant limit values or emission reduction commitments.

The Administrative Court may review the plan or programme in terms of its procedural and substantive legality. While the court has to review all facts deemed necessary for a ruling, the scope of judicial review is usually set out by the complaints brought forward.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Within a period of eight weeks following the announcement of a national air pollution control programme or air quality plan, natural persons directly concerned by the breach of a limit value as well as environmental organisations recognised pursuant to Section 19 EIA Act (UVP-G 2000), within their relevant geographical scope of recognition, must file a reasoned application for examination of the programme or plan with respect to the appropriateness of the measures it sets out in their entirety, to ensure compliance with the emission reduction commitments in due time or limit values as soon as possible, with the Provincial Governor (air quality plan) or the Federal Minister for Climate Action, Environment, Energy, Mobility, Innovation and Technology (national air pollution control programme). The responsible authority must decide on this application by way of official notice. It is also possible to file a reasoned application for the establishment of a plan or programme or, if a plan or programme has already been established, an application for its revision with the Provincial Governor or Federal Minister.

Subsequently, the entitled members of the public may file a complaint against official notices issued in the matters described above at the Provincial Administrative Court (in case of national air pollution control programmes with the Administrative Court of Vienna).

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? According to the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L) and the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – EG-L 2018) it is not necessary to participate in the public consultation phase in order to have standing to challenge a plan or programme.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?

In order to be admissible, an application or complaint according to the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L) or the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – EG-L 2018) must establish the reasons in a clearly and well-argued fashion of why the requirements for the establishment or the revision of a plan or programme are met or why, in their entirety, the measures provided for in the plan or programme are inappropriate to ensure... compliance with the relevant limit values or emission reduction commitments. These are the only arguments that can be brought by environmental NGOs. Individuals may only file a complaint on the grounds that they are directly affected by the relevant plan or programme.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
The right to a fair trial derives from Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR), which has constitutional status in Austria. This includes the right to a fair trial in administrative justice. Furthermore, the right to party status derives from the constitutional principle of equality.[26]
Access to justice by the public in environmental trials aims to grant standing to all actors who are perceived as having a substantial interest in the respective case. They have the possibility to make known the elements on which their claim is based and can discuss any claim, evidence or document presented to the judge through an intervention mechanism.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
The general rules on administrative procedures apply: If a member of the public applies for a review of an air quality plan according to the Air Pollution Control Act (Immissionsschutzgesetz – Luft – IG-L) or a national air pollution control programme according to the Air Emission Act (Emissionsgesetz-Luft 2018 – E-G-L 2018), the Provincial Governor or Federal Minister must react by official notice within 6 months from the date of the application. In case of an appeal to the Administrative Court, the Court must decide within another 6 months.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no provisions on injunctive relief in this regard.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
The fee for filing an appeal with the Administrative Court is EUR 30. There are no statutory provisions to ensure that costs are not prohibitive. Apart from optional fees for expert opinions or legal assistance, however, there should generally not be any relevant additional costs.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts[27]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts may, under certain circumstances, be challenged before the Constitutional Court, if they have the legal form of an act or ordinance.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
Regarding constitutional rights, Article 144 of the Federal Constitutional Law provides for individuals to make claims before the Constitutional Court (Verfassungsgerichtshof) if their fundamental rights are infringed. Its basic requirements are the interference with the individual’s “subjective right”, i.e. that the party can only object to norms that exist to protect an individual on the one hand, and an infringement of an individual’s fundamental right on the other hand. Constitutional rights that can be linked to environmental protection are, for example, the right to justice, the right to life, the right to health, the right to respect for private and family life.
The Constitutional Court can also be addressed regarding decisions of an Administrative Court if the complainant claims to have been infringed in his/her constitutionally guaranteed rights by the decision. Furthermore, a person who claims to be infringed in his/her rights directly by an ordinance contrary to law, may address the Constitutional Court if the ordinance has become effective without a judicial decision having been rendered or without a ruling having been rendered.

The scope of review if the Constitutional Court includes the conformity of ordinances with constitutional or legal provisions as well as with provision of underlying ordinances – from a procedural as well as a substantive aspect.[28] In case of administrative decisions, the Constitutional Court has full competency of cognation (volle Kognitionsbefugnis) and may also collect new evidence.[29]
If the Constitutional Court pronounces an administrative decision, an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional or illegal, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is exempted from this rule.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
For an application to the Constitutional Court, administrative review procedures must be exhausted.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
As the procedure before the Constitutional Court is of exceptional character, there are no relevant requirements apart from the exhaustion of administrative review.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
There are no rules on injunctive relief in this regard.
If the Constitutional Court pronounces an act or ordinance to be unconstitutional, all courts and administrative authorities are bound by the Constitutional Court’s decision. The law or ordinance continues to apply to the circumstances affected before the ruling. Only the case in point is excepted from this rule.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
The fee for filing an appeal with the Constitutional Court is EUR 240. Legal assistance is required. Legal aid or pro bono legal assistance (Verfahrenshilfe) can be granted in the scope of applicability of Article 6(1) ECHR or Article 47 ECFR. Apart from this option and from the regulated lawyer’s fees according to the Attorney’s Tariff Act (Rechtsanwaltsanfallgesetz), there are no statutory guarantees that costs are not prohibitive.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[30]
Administrative Courts must issue a preliminary request according to Article 267 TFEU if they deem it adequate. The Supreme Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court as final instance are obliged to do so if they have doubts regarding the application or interpretation of EU law. An applicant may suggest a preliminary procedure in the appeal.
The expiry of the decision-making period must be certified. Premature default complaints will be rejected. The defaulting authority then has the

ACC/C/2010/54 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of

Section 74 General Administrative Procedure Act (AVG).

The SEA Directive relates to plans and programmes. These are also covered by Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention.

Article 271(1) (3) Federal Constitutional Law (B-VG); Section 271a Federal Administrative Procedure Act (VfAL).

if a third party's interest is likely to be harmed. See also the ECLI:EU:C:2017:774 case-law of the Court of Justice of the European

The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission services. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the official language version of this page as the authoritative version. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

If the authority violates the legally stipulated time limit to make a decision, a default complaint (Stellungnahmebeschwerde) can be filed by parties to the relevant procedure.[1] The expiry of the decision-making period must be certified. Premature default complaints will be rejected. The defaulting authority then has the option of presenting the matter to the Administrative Court or deciding on the matter themselves within three months. In the first case, the Administrative Court can only make a decision on relevant legal issues regarding the matter and the defaulting authority has up to eight weeks to make a decision based on the legal assessment of the Administrative Court. If the defaulting authority still does not make a decision, the Administrative Court ultimately has to decide on the matter based on the factual and legal situation at the time.

If public organs enforce the law through illegal or culpable behaviour or omission, there is the possibility of suing the Federation, the Provinces, municipalities, or other bodies of public law and the institutions of social insurance. This official liability (Amtshaftung) is the liability of the state (e.g. the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities). According to the Liability of Public Bodies Act (Amtshaftungsrecht – AHG) the legal entities are liable under the provisions of civil law for any damage to any person or any property caused by unlawful acts of persons at fault when implementing the law on behalf of them. The persons implementing the law themselves are not liable vis-à-vis the persons injured. The state can only replace the damage in money. The legal process must be exhausted before an official liability claim can be asserted. The injured party must therefore first try to avert the damage through legal remedies/complaints/revision.

If the official authority deliberately abuses its power (Amtsmissbrauch), the individual may face severe legal consequences under criminal law[2]

Apart from the above-mentioned constellations, there is no general rule on remedies against omissions, e.g. against lack of inspections or lack of appropriate measures to address breach of environmental laws.

If an individual does not comply with a judgement, an execution procedure will be initiated by the court. Even in cases of financial penalties, e.g. an administrative penalty, failed execution attempts can lead to imprisonment.

3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Under Polish law, individual decisions concerning the environment may be challenged by:

- natural and legal persons who are considered “parties to the administrative proceedings”,
- entities (such as NGOs, the public prosecutor or the Ombudsman) who participate in the proceedings “with the rights of a party”.

The possibilities to challenge plans or programmes relating to the environment are more limited: certain natural or legal persons may challenge them to some extent (there are no special rights for NGOs to have standing here).

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

Provisions of the Polish Constitution relating to environment are:

- Article 68 para 4 states that public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.
- Article 303 para 8 states that public authorities shall support the activities of citizens to protect and improve the quality of the environment.
- Article 304 para 1 states that Protection of the environment shall be the duty of public authorities.
- Article 305 para 1 states that Public authorities shall pursue policies ensuring the ecological security of current and future generations.
- Article 306 para 1 states that Public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.

2) Access to justice at Member State level

1. Access to justice at Member State level

1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Under Polish law, individual decisions concerning the environment may be challenged by:

- natural and legal persons who are considered “parties to the administrative proceedings”,
- entities (such as NGOs, the public prosecutor or the Ombudsman) who participate in the proceedings “with the rights of a party”.

The possibilities to challenge plans or programmes relating to the environment are more limited: certain natural or legal persons may challenge them to some extent (there are no special rights for NGOs to have standing here).

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

Provisions of the Polish Constitution relating to environment are:

- Article 68 para 4 states that public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.
- Article 303 para 8 states that public authorities shall support the activities of citizens to protect and improve the quality of the environment.
- Article 304 para 1 states that Protection of the environment shall be the duty of public authorities.
- Article 305 para 1 states that Public authorities shall pursue policies ensuring the ecological security of current and future generations.
- Article 306 para 1 states that Public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.

2) Access to justice at Member State level

1. Access to justice at Member State level

1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law

1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order

Under Polish law, individual decisions concerning the environment may be challenged by:

- natural and legal persons who are considered “parties to the administrative proceedings”,
- entities (such as NGOs, the public prosecutor or the Ombudsman) who participate in the proceedings “with the rights of a party”.

The possibilities to challenge plans or programmes relating to the environment are more limited: certain natural or legal persons may challenge them to some extent (there are no special rights for NGOs to have standing here).

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights

Provisions of the Polish Constitution relating to environment are:

- Article 68 para 4 states that public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.
- Article 303 para 8 states that public authorities shall support the activities of citizens to protect and improve the quality of the environment.
- Article 304 para 1 states that Protection of the environment shall be the duty of public authorities.
- Article 305 para 1 states that Public authorities shall pursue policies ensuring the ecological security of current and future generations.
- Article 306 para 1 states that Public authorities shall combat epidemic illnesses and prevent the negative health consequences of degradation of the environment.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. – main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

1) The general provisions regarding administrative review are provided for by Administrative Procedure Code of 14 June 1960; codified text J.L. 2020 item 256 as amended (Ustawa z dnia 14 czerwca 1960 r. Kodeks postępowania administracyjnego; tekst jedn. Dz. U. z 2020 r. poz. 256 ze zm.) - APC (available in [Polish].

The APC provides e.g. for basic rules on:

- who shall be regarded as a “party to the proceedings” and hence entitled to challenge an administrative decision, including a decision concerning the environment (these rules may however be modified by specific acts regarding the environment (listed below)),
- filing an administrative appeal against an administrative decision (competent authorities, timeframes etc.),
- NGOs’ rights to participate in the proceedings in which public participation is NOT required and to challenge administrative decisions (see point 1.1.1 above).

2) The general provisions regarding judicial review in administrative cases are provided for by Proceedings before Administrative Courts Law Act of 30 August 2002; codified text J.L. of 2019 item 2325 as amended, (Ustawa z dnia 30 sierpnia 2002 r. Prawo o postępowaniu przed sądami administracyjnymi; tekst jedn. Dz. U. z 2019 r. poz. 2325 ze zm.) - PACLA (available in [Polish].

The PACLA provides e.g. for basic rules on:

- who has standing before administrative court,
- filing a complaint to the administrative court (timeframes, costs etc.),
- certain general aspects of the courts activity are provided also by:

4) Standing regarding plans and programmes adopted by various levels of self-governmental authorities is regulated by:

5) Standing regarding plans and programmes adopted by governmental authorities:

6) The Act of 3 October 2008 on access to environmental information, public participation in environmental protection and on environmental impact assessments; codified text J.L. 2021, item 247 (Ustawa z dnia 3 października 2008 r. o udostępnianiu informacji o środowisku i jego ochronie, udziale społeczeństwa w ochronie środowiska oraz o ocenach oddziaływania na środowisko: tekst jedn.: Dz. U. z 2021 r. poz. 247) - EIA Act (available in [Polish]).

The EIA Act specifies, among other things:

who shall be regarded as a party to the proceedings regarding EIA decisions and hence entitled to challenge these decisions, NGOs' who participate in the proceedings in which public participation is required and to challenge administrative decisions.

The EPLA specifies:

who shall be regarded as a party to the proceedings regarding permits for emissions of gases into the air and permits for waste generation - and hence entitled to challenge these decisions, excludes participation of NGOs in the proceedings regarding permits for emissions into the air and permits for waste generation and challenges against such permits.

The WLA specifies:

who shall be regarded as a party to the proceedings regarding decisions authorizing the use of water (e.g. water permits) and hence entitled to challenge these decisions, excludes participation of NGOs in the proceedings regarding the aforementioned decisions and challenges against such permits.

The GMLA specifies:

who shall be regarded as a party to the proceedings regarding geological concessions and hence entitled to challenge these concessions.

The BLA specifies:

who shall be regarded as a party to the proceedings regarding construction permits and hence entitled to challenge these permits.

Apart from the Building Law Act there are a number of so called "special Acts" regulating the investment process for specific kinds of projects such as roads, railways, flood-control projects etc. These Acts introduce special rules for access to justice regarding permits (development consents) for construction of these projects.

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases

There are a number of verdicts concerning environmental cases, standing etc. The verdicts are however always strictly related to a given case and legal acts covering the situation. Therefore it would be misleading to cite them here, as they have no generally applicable nature.

As explained below, the administrative courts in Poland are divided into two instances - the second (and highest) instance is the Supreme Administrative Court. The Supreme Administrative Court, when annulling the verdict of a voivodship (regional) administrative court, may send the case back to that court (cassation power; Art. 185 PACLA) or may decide on the merits of the case (reformatory power; Art. 188 PACLA). In practice, the cassation verdicts prevail.

The Supreme Administrative Court may adopt resolutions (cassation power; Art. 185 PACLA) or may decide on the merits of the case (reformatory power; Art. 188 PACLA). In practice, the cassation verdicts prevail.

Court judgements in Poland are not recognised as formal sources of law and are used only for interpretation purposes.

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

One may invoke international agreements directly in judicial and administrative proceedings as according to Article 91 paras 1 and 2 of the Constitution, ratified international agreements, after their promulgation in the Official Journal of Laws, once they become part of the domestic legal order and are applied directly. In the verdict of the Voivodship Administrative Court in Warsaw of 20 March 2020 (IV SA/Wa 1248/19) the Court acknowledged the primacy of the Aarhus Convention over national law which was in non-compliance with the Convention. However, it must be stressed that: (a) the Court justified the supremacy of the Convention by the fact that it forms a part of EU law and (b) at the time of finalizing this study (January 2021) the verdict was not final yet (it is subject to review procedure by the Supreme Administrative Court).

In practice however, it is recommended to invoke not only the international agreement but also the relevant national law, as this gives better chances for the arguments presented to be acknowledged by court.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

According to Article 175 para 1 of the Constitution, the Polish judicial system consists of the following main types of courts:

So-called general (common) courts, further divided into:

a) Civil courts, within which - apart from "general" civil branches - exist i.e. commercial, family and labour branches;

b) Criminal courts;

Administrative courts:

Military courts.
The above courts are divided into levels (instances). Basically there are two instances of common courts, however in certain cases the Supreme Court (Sąd Najwyższy) is competent to examine extraordinary appeals against final judgments of second instance courts (not all the cases may go to the Supreme Court). Moreover, the Supreme Court supervises the activities of common and military courts in the area of adjudication.

The administrative courts are divided into two instances - the second (and highest) instance is the Supreme Administrative Court (Naczelnym Sąd Administracyjny). According to Article 184 of the Constitution, their role is to provide judicial review over activities of public administration.

In practice most cases related to the environment are subject to administrative court jurisdiction (as the environmental issues are usually decided by an administrative decision or other administrative acts).

Civil courts examine cases in the private law domain (disputes between two private parties) including cases involving environmental damage to property.

Criminal courts examine cases related to environmental offences or petty offences covered by the Criminal Code or environmental legislation.

2) Rule of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

Polish administrative courts are always competent to examine decisions and other acts or omissions by Polish administrative authorities and are never competent to examine acts or omissions by foreign authorities. Thus, the issue of conflict between different tribunals in different Member States is irrelevant for administrative courts (it may be relevant for private (civil) law).

The territorial jurisdiction of a given regional administrative court depends on where the seat of the authority whose act or omission are subject to a complaint is located. For example, where the second instance authority is located in Warsaw, the Warsaw Regional Administrative Court will be competent.

3) Specialities as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

In Poland the environmental cases are decided by bodies and courts of general competence, there are no special environmental courts or boards. There are no expert judges nor laymen contributing neither.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

The administrative courts of the first instance (voivodship administrative courts) are not bound by the allegations presented in the complaint. They examine the legality of the acts or omissions by the administrative authorities in a given case (Arts. 134 and 135 PACLA). However, as it will be explained under point 1.5, the administrative courts in Poland (unlike civil courts) have no competence to call expert witnesses, so the assessment of merits is based on the documents.

The Supreme Administrative Court, which examines the legality of the first instance court verdict, is in principle bound by the allegations presented in the complaint. However, the Court takes into account certain serious infringements, even if they were not raised by the claimant. These infringements are listed in Art. 183(2) PACLA:

- the court proceedings were inadmissible;
- the party had no judicial or procedural capacity, an authority appointed to represent him or a legal representative, or if the party's representative was not duly authorised;
- the same case is the subject of proceedings previously brought before an administrative court or if the case has already been finally judged;
- the composition of the court adjudicating the case was contrary to the provisions of law or if a judge excluded by law participated in the case;
- the party was deprived of the opportunity to defend its rights;

the voivodship administrative court adjudicated in a case in which the Supreme Administrative Court has jurisdiction.

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

Individual administrative decisions, including those regarding the environment, may be issued either by self-governmental authorities or by governmental authorities.

The self-governmental authorities competent to issue individual decisions are:

- mayor of a town or a village / head of the community (wójt, burmistrz, prezydent miasta),
- starost (starosta) - head of a poviat (district, powiat)
- marshal of the voivodship (marszałek województwa) - head of the self-governmental authorities in the voivodship (województwo).

For example, the EIA decisions are issued mainly by the head of the community. Integrated permits and decisions relating to waste management are issued by the starost or a marshal of the voivodship, depending on the type of installation / activity.

The governmental authorities competent to issue individual decisions are e.g.:

- Regional Director for Environmental Protection (regionały dyrektor ochrony środowiska),
- Director of the Regional Board of Water Management (dyrektor regionalnego zarządu gospodarki wodnej Wód Polskich) and other Polish Waters authorities,
- Voivodship Inspector of Environmental Protection (wojewódzki inspektor ochrony środowiska),
- relevant ministers: Minister of Climate and Environment, Minister of Infrastructure.

For example, in the case of certain projects, the EIA decisions are issued by the Regional Director for Environmental Protection; the Director is also competent in the field of environmental liability and nature conservation. The Polish Waters authorities are responsible for water management, including for issuing the water permits. Voivodship Inspectors of Environmental Protection are responsible for compliance control and imposing sanctions for non-compliance with the environmental requirements.

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

In order to appeal an administrative environmental decision before the court one has to file an appeal to the administrative authority of the second instance first. The appeal to the administrative court may be filed only after the second instance authority issues its decision (see point 1.3.4) for details).

The second instance authority shall in principle issue its decision within one month or, when the case is particularly complicated, within two months. In practice this stage may take up to three to five months. There are no deadlines for administrative courts. In practice it takes usually about five to nine months before the administrative court of the first instance and about one to one and a half year before the Supreme Administrative Court.

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

In Poland the environmental cases are decided by bodies and courts of general competence, there are no special environmental courts or boards. There are no specific judicial procedures applicable to environmental matters neither.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

In the case of administrative decisions (including decisions in environmental cases), the ordinary appeal process consists of three steps:

- filing a complaint to the administrative authority of the second instance (superior over the authority which issued a challenged decision). For example for the self-governmental authorities the second instance authority would be the Self-governmental Appeal Board (Samorządowe Kolegium Odwoławcze), for governmental authorities - a relevant higher instance authority (for the Regional Director for Environmental Protection - the General Director for Environmental Protection; for the Voivodship Inspector of Environmental Protection - the Chief Inspector of Environmental Protection etc.)
when the decision of the second instance authority is not in favour of the claimant, he/she may file a complaint to the administrative court of first instance, i.e. to the voivodship administrative court (wojewódzki sąd administracyjny)

when the court's verdict is not in favour of the claimant, he/she may file a complaint to the administrative court of second instance, i.e. to the Supreme Administrative Court (Naczelný Sąd Administracyjny).

The court has no right to amend the decision by itself. Where the administrative court finds that the complaint against an administrative decision was justified, it annuls the decision, which means that the proceeding goes back to the administrative authority which issued it. Then the authority, in re-examining the case, will be bound by the interpretations provided by the court.

During the court proceedings, the voivodship administrative courts may issue orders, e.g. on interim measures. These orders may be appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court.

5) Extraordinary ways of appeal. Rules in the environmental area. Rules for introducing preliminary references

The extraordinary remedies may be taken in administrative proceedings (i.e. before the administrative authorities) where (both conditions have to be fulfilled): the administrative decision is already final (there is no possibility to challenge it within the ordinary scheme) and the decisions has certain, serious flaw - one of those listed in Articles 145, 145a, 145b or 156 of the APC (Articles 145-145b list grounds for the “reopening of proceedings” and Article 156 for the “invalidation of decision”):

a) Article 145

§ 1. In a case which has been closed with a final decision, proceedings shall be reopened if:
the evidence on the basis of which the relevant facts were established is proved to be false;
the decision was issued as a result of an offence;
the decision was issued by an employee or public administration body which is subject to exclusion pursuant to Articles 24, 25 and 27;
the party did not participate in the proceedings through no fault of its own;
new facts or new evidence relevant to the case or new evidence existing on the date of the decision, unknown to the authority which issued the decision, come to light;
the decision was issued without obtaining the legally required position of another authority;
the preliminary issue has been resolved by a competent authority or a court in another way other than the assessment adopted when issuing the decision (Article 100 § 2);
the decision was issued on the basis of another decision or court ruling, which was subsequently revoked or amended.

b) Article 145a

§ 1. Reopening of proceedings may also be demanded if the Constitutional Tribunal has ruled that a normative act, on the basis of which the decision was made, is inconsistent with the Constitution, an international agreement or a law.

c) Article 145aa

§ 1. A reopening of proceedings may also be demanded in case of a judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union that affects the substance of the decision taken.

d) Article 145b

§ 1. Reopening of proceedings may also be demanded also in case when a court verdict stating that the principle of equal treatment has been breached has been issued, in accordance with the Act of 3 December 2010 on the implementation of certain provisions of the European Union in the field of equal treatment (Journal of Laws of 2016, item 1219), if the breach of this principle had an impact on the resolution of the case ended with a final decision.

e) Article 156

§ 1. A public administration authority shall annul the decision which:
was issued in violation of the provisions on jurisdiction;
was issued without legal basis or with a gross violation of law;
concerns a case previously resolved by another final decision or a case which has been tacitly resolved;
was addressed to a person who is not a party in the case;
was unenforceable on the date of its delivery and its unenforceability is permanent;
if executed, it would give rise to a criminal offence;
it contains a defect which makes it legally invalid.

Decisions issued by the administrative authorities within the aforementioned extraordinary proceedings may be challenged before the administrative courts on the general rules. There are no extraordinary ways of appeal to be applied directly before courts.

Administrative courts may refer the case to the Court of Justice of the European Union for a preliminary ruling. There are no special regulations for this reference in Polish law - the relevant EU regulations do apply here. Parties may ask the administrative court to request the preliminary ruling from the CJEU, however it is up to the Polish court if it exercises this right. In case the court decides not to refer to the CJEU, no special order denying this request is issued and the parties have no special legal measures to challenge such a negative decision.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

The PACLA provides for a “mediation procedure” to be carried out before the administrative court. However, this procedure is hardly used at all and practically never in environmental cases. The reason for that is that the purpose of mediation is to explain and consider the factual and legal circumstances of the case and to adopt arrangements by the parties as to how to settle it within the limits of applicable law (Art. 115 § 2 PACLA). As environmental law consists mostly of provisions which are binding, the scope of possible mediation is extremely small.

Other remark concerns administrative proceeding. The APC allows for mediation, however this may be conducted in the course of the proceedings if the nature of the case allows it (Art. 96a § 1 APC). That means that also in administrative proceeding the scope of possible mediation is very small.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsperson (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

According to Article 5 of the Act of 28 January 2016, Law on the public prosecutor's office (codified text: J.L. of 2019, item 740, as amended), the public prosecutor may participate as a party or participant in any proceedings conducted by public authorities and administration bodies, courts and tribunals, unless the acts provide otherwise.

This right is reflected in Arts. 182 - 183 APC, according to which public prosecutors have standing in administrative proceedings: they may either initiate the proceedings or intervene in on-going proceedings, including challenging decisions. It is reflected also in Art. 8 § 1 PACLA which repeats the general rule of the Law on the public prosecutor's office.

The Ombudsman enjoys the same rights under Art. 14 § 6 of the Act of 15 July 1987 on the Ombudsman (codified text: J.L. of 2020 item 627) and under Art. 8 § 1 PACLA.
In the case of EIA decisions (decisions concluding the procedure of environmental impact assessment) and the decisions concluding proceedings where the habitat assessment was carried out, similar rights are granted to the regional director for environmental protection, as well as to the General Director for Environmental Protection (Art. 76 of the EIA Act).

Although the above-mentioned actors act ex officio, they often undertake their action after having received information/complaints from an individual or NGO.

Ombudsman’s office

Prosecutor’s office

General Director for Environmental Protection

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Under Polish law, individual decisions relating to the environment may be challenged by: (a) natural and legal persons who are considered as “parties to the administrative proceedings”, (b) entities (such as NGOs, the public prosecutor or the Ombudsman) who participate in the proceedings “with the rights of a party”.

According to the general rule provided by Article 28 of the Administrative Procedure Act (APC), “parties to the administrative proceedings” are persons having sufficient legal interest in the case. They are entitled to challenge decisions before the second instance authority first and then before the administrative court.

Environmental NGOs are granted specific rights to participate in the proceedings in which public participation is required - and to challenge the decision issued within these proceeding. These proceedings are those regarding: EIA decisions, habitat assessments, integrated permits, permits regarding GMO.

The specific rights are granted by Art. 44 of the EIA Act.

In proceedings not requiring public participation, NGOs may apply to be admitted to the proceedings with the rights of a party (the legal basis for this is Art. 31 of the APC). Such application may be refused by the authority, if it considers that the conditions set by Article 31 of the APC are not met (these conditions are described in detail under question 1.4.2 below). The refusal may be challenged before the authority of the second instance and then before the court.

The possibilities and conditions for such participation are however limited comparing to those granted by Art. 44 of the EIA Act.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/IED, etc.)?

Specific provisions, such as those on EIA or integrated permits, provide for rules on who shall be considered as a party in a given case and - automatically - who is entitled to challenge relevant decisions:

According to Article 74(3(a)) of the EIA Act, the status of a party in proceedings concerning EIA decisions is granted to the developer and owners of properties located in the area which will be affected by the proposed project. This area is understood as: (1) the anticipated area on which the project will be carried out and the area located within 100 m of the borders of that area; (2) the plots on which, as a result of implementation, exploitation or use of the project, the environmental quality standards would be exceeded, or (3) plots located within the range of a significant impact of the project, which may introduce restrictions on the development of the real estate.

Article 185(1) EPLA limits the parties in the proceedings regarding integrated permits, permits for emissions of gases into the air and permits for waste generation to the operator of the installation subject to the permit. Only in very exceptional cases - when a so-called “restricted use area” is to be created around the installation – are certain neighbours also regarded as parties to the proceedings.

Article 401(1) WLA specifies that parties to the proceedings regarding decisions authorizing use of water (e.g. water permits) and hence entitled to challenge these decisions are: the project proponent and the persons who will be affected by the intended use of water or the entities within the range of impact of the planned water facilities. Art. 402 WLA excludes the participation of NGOs in these proceedings and their right to challenge the decisions issued.

Article 41 GMLA specifies that parties to proceedings regarding concessions for extraction of mineral resources are only the owners of properties on which the mining activity is to be carried out.

Article 28(2) BLA specifies that parties to proceedings regarding construction permits are only investors and owners, perpetual usufructuaries or managers of properties located in the area of impact of the building object. The term “impact of the building object” is defined by Article 3(20) BLA as “an area designated in the vicinity of a building object on the basis of specific regulations, introducing restrictions on development, including buildings, of that area”.

Article 28(3) BLA excludes the participation of NGOs in these proceedings and their right to challenge the decisions issued (NGOs may participate only in proceedings regarding construction permits within which so-called a repeated EIA (ponowna ocena oddziaływania na środowisko) is carried out (Art. 28(4) BLA).

Apart from the Building Law Act there are a number of so called “special Acts” regulating the investment process for specific kinds of project such as roads, railways, flood-control projects etc. These special Acts introduce special rules for access to justice regarding permits (development consents) for construction of these projects.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

Administrative proceedings

As mentioned above, in administrative proceedings regarding individual administrative decisions, standing is granted to “parties” to the proceedings, while a party according to Article 28 of the APC - is a “person whose legal interest or duty is affected by the proceedings or who demands activities of authority because of this legal interest or duty”. The definition of “party to the administrative proceedings” is therefore crucial to understanding who can challenge decisions of the administration.

Therefore, according to the general rules provided by the APC, standing is granted to those individuals (whether natural or legal persons) who have a “legal interest” (which includes also administrative duties). A person has a legal interest in the case when that interest is protected by any provision of (administrative, civil or other) law. For example, when an administrative decision may affect one’s property (e.g. in case of construction of a new object the owners of the adjoining properties may be affected). A person who filed an application for an administrative decision and a person to whom a decision was addressed always have a “legal interest” in the case and thus have standing. Such persons are considered to be “parties” to the administrative procedure.

As indicated above under question 1.4.3, there are a number of legal Acts amending or specifying these general rules with regard to particular administrative decisions.

Proceedings before administrative courts

As proceedings before administrative courts in the case of individual administrative decisions are a follow-up to proceedings before the authority of the second instance, the circle of persons entitled to file a complaint to the court of the first instance is determined by the administrative phase of proceedings.[3]

However, a person who did not take part in the administrative proceedings but whose legal interest is affected by the proceedings may also file a complaint to the administrative court (Article 50 § 1 PACLA).

Apart from the right to file a complaint, the right to participate in the court proceedings with the status of a party is granted to the following individuals:
persons who participated in the preceding administrative proceedings (both parties to the administrative proceedings and organisations with the rights of a party) but failed to file a complaint to the administrative court (participation of those persons is granted ex officio, without them having to file any motion - Article 33 § 1 PACLA); persons whose legal interest is affected by the judicial-administrative proceedings, but who have not taken part in the preceding administrative proceedings (participation of those persons may be granted by the court upon their motion; the courts’ refusal may be challenged before the administrative court of second instance - Article 33 § 2 PACLA); this situation may concern for example a spouse of a person who challenged the tax decision of the administrative authority of the second instance, in case when that decision was originally addressed to both spouses; it rather does not apply to environmental cases.

National NGOs

As indicated above, there are two different legal bases for NGOs’ participation in the proceedings, and for their right to challenge the decision: Article 44 of the EIA Act encompassing certain environmental proceedings (those requiring public participation), or Article 31 of the APC encompassing all other administrative proceedings concluded with an administrative decision.

Article 31 APC

According to the general rule provided by Article 31 APC, social organisations enjoy standing in cases regarding individual administrative decisions where they represent a common interest. The organisation may participate in the proceedings with the rights of a party, which means that it enjoys the same rights as a party to the proceedings, including a right to appeal. In order to be admitted to participate, an organisation must file a relevant motion. In this case an NGO has to prove that:

it is registered in a Court register or in a register maintained by the Starost (head of self-governmental authority in the district), as ad hoc groupings do not have standing;

its participation in the proceedings is justified by the objectives established in the by-laws of the organisation (in other words if the subject matter of the case is in conformity with the organization’s objectives); its participation in the proceedings is justified by the “public interest”.

The public authority then assesses the motion and decides whether it considers it justified. The assessment is not limited to verification of formal requirements, but concerns also the merit justification (need) for participation by the organisation in a given case (in other words: the authority decides whether it considers it useful, from the point of view of the “public interest”, to allow the organisation to participate). A refusal may be challenged by the organisation to the authority of second instance and then - subsequently - to the administrative court.

The organisation which took part in the preceding administrative proceedings on the basis of Article 31 APC has standing also before the administrative courts. An NGO which has not taken part in the preceding administrative proceedings is not entitled to challenge the decision of the second instance authority, i.e. has no right to file a complaint to the administrative court (Article 50 § 1 PACLA).

However, if the judicial-administrative proceedings, initiated by another party, concern the scope of the NGO’s activity, participation of the organisation may be granted by the court of its own motion; the courts’ refusal may be challenged before the administrative court of second instance (Article 33 § 2 PACLA).

According to case law, the court also has to verify whether the “public interest” speaks for the participation of the NGO.

Article 44 EIA Act

According to the special provisions provided by Article 44 of the EIA Act, environmental NGOs may:

take part in the proceedings with a right of a party and then challenge the decision before the authority of the second instance; challenge the decision before the authority of the second instance even if it did not take part in the first instance administrative proceedings; challenge the decision of the second instance authority before the administrative court even if it did not take part in the administrative proceedings.

In this case the NGO has to prove that:

it is registered in a Court register or in a register maintained by the Starost (head of self-governmental authority in the district), as ad hoc groupings do not have standing;

it has been registered for at least 12 months before the proceedings it wants to intervene in were initiated; its statutory purpose is related to environmental protection.

Contrary to the proceedings carried out on the basis of Article 31 APC, NGOs do not need to prove that “public interest requires their participation”. In other words: in this case the authority only examines whether an environmental organisation fulfils formal requirements but is not entitled to decide whether the participation of such organisation is “needed” and “justified” from the point of view of public interest. This means that an NGO which fulfils the aforementioned requirements and expresses its intention to participate in a given procedure participates in it by virtue of law.

Foreign NGOs enjoy the same rights as Polish NGOs and have to meet the same conditions, including - in the case of the proceedings regulated in Article 31 APC - proving that their participation is justified (that it protects the common interest in a given case).

Ad hoc groupings have no standing. As indicated above, in order to take part in the proceedings, an organisation has to be registered in the Court or in the register maintained by the Starost (head of self-governmental authority in the district).

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

All administrative and judicial proceedings are to be conducted out in Polish.

The proceedings before the authority of the second instance are conducted mainly in writing. The foreign party is then responsible for preparing its appeal, motions etc. in Polish.

In proceedings before the administrative court, the foreign party may ask the court to provide the services of an interpreter (Article 5 § 2 of the Act on the common courts system in conjunction with Article 49 § 1 of the Act of 25 July 2002 on the administrative courts system). If the court grants it, the services of an interpreter are free to the party (the costs are borne by the State).

1.5. Evidence and experts in the procedures

Overview of specific rules in administrative environmental matters, control of judge, calling for an expert in the procedure

1) Evaluation of evidence — are there any limits in obtaining or evaluating evidence, can the court request evidence on its own motion?

Pursuant to Art. 77 § 1 APC, a public administration body is required to collect and consider all possible evidence. According to Art. 75 § 1 of the APC, everything that can help to clarify the case and is not illegal should be considered as evidence. In particular, evidence may include documents, witness statements, expert reports and visual inspections.

The administrative authority of the second instance examines all the aspects of the case. According to Article 136 APC, the second instance authority may take evidence on its own (as well as examining the evidence gathered by the first instance authority). At this stage the parties may submit their evidence too.

The evidence is subject to assessment by the administrative authority of the second instance.

At the stage of court proceedings, the possibility of taking and examining new evidence is strictly limited. The administrative court of the first instance examines in principle the legality of the acts or omissions of the administrative authority. This includes verifying whether the authority has correctly established or assessed the facts (merits) of the case. This means that the parties cannot introduce new evidence at this stage.
The verification by the court consists in examining the proceedings before the administrative authorities (of both instances), including determining whether the authorities had correctly taken into account and assessed the evidence available in the case, including the technical documents.

According to Article 133 § 1 PACLA, the verification by the administrative court shall be based on the documents available in the file on the case; the court has no mandate to take evidence on its own (the main role of administrative courts is not to carry out evidence proceedings, but to check whether evidence proceedings have been properly and exhaustively carried out by the administrative authority). The only exemption from this general rule is provided by Article 106 § 3 PACLA, according to which the court may examine additional documents as evidence, but only when this will not “excessively” prolong the proceedings, which in practice means that there will be no need to adjourn the trial. According to jurisprudence a document admitted as evidence before the regional administrative court on the basis of Article 106 § 3 PACLA may not “have a nature of an experts’ opinion”.

2) Can one introduce new evidence?
As explained above, at the stage of the administrative appeal - yes; at the stage of the administrative court proceedings - in principle no.

3) How can one get expert opinions in the procedures? Publicly available lists and registries of experts
The administrative courts, unlike the civil courts, have no competence to call expert witnesses. As explained above, the administrative courts base their judgement on the documents available in the files on the case.

3.1) Is the expert opinion binding on judges, is there a level of discretion?
N/A

3.2) Rules for experts being called upon by the court
N/A

3.3) Rules for experts called upon by the parties
N/A

3.4) What are the procedural fees to be paid and when in relation to expert opinions and expert witnessing?
N/A

1.6. Legal professions and possible actors, participants to the procedures

1) Role of lawyers, compulsory or not, how to contact, publicly accessible internet link to registry or website of the bar, perhaps of specialised lawyers in the environmental field

Only the cassation complaints addressed to the administrative court of second instance (Supreme Administrative Court) have to be prepared and signed by a lawyer: an advocate (adwokat) or an attorney at law (radca prawny) representing the claimant[4]. There is no such requirement before the administrative authorities and before the administrative court of first instance.

The list of advocates is available on the Advocates’ Bar webpage.

The list of attorneys at law is available on the Attorneys’ Bar webpage.

A list of some lawyers specialising in environmental law has been published by ClientEarth.

Other lawyers specialising in environmental law have to be sought out on a case-by-case basis.

The conditions for co-operation with them (including pro bono assistance) have to be negotiated with them on an individual basis.

1.1 Existence or not of pro bono assistance

There is no systematic form of pro bono assistance consisting in initiation of or representation in court proceedings. Certain lawyers or law firms may offer such assistance on a case-by-case basis.

1.2 If pro bono assistance does exist, what are the main elements of the procedure to receive it (perhaps links to forms, court or agency in charge, address, telephone, email, ways to contact, etc.?)

There is a systemic type of pro bono assistance consisting in informing citizens about their rights and obligations, about the law in force and about the possible ways of resolving legal problems (as mentioned above, this does not include court proceedings). This type of assistance is provided for on the basis of the Act of 5 August 2015 on free legal assistance, free citizen counselling and legal education, codified text J.L. of 2020, item 2232, Ustawa z dnia 5 sierpnia 2015 r. o nieodpłatnej pomocy prawnej, nieodpłatnym poradnictwie obywatelskim oraz edukacji prawnej, i.e. Dz. U. z 2020 r. poz. 2232.

The free assistance is available to natural persons who claim that they cannot afford a lawyer.

1.3 Who should be addressed by the applicant for pro bono assistance?

The legal assistance referred to in the Act on free legal assistance is provided by lawyers (advocates or attorneys at law) appointed by self-governmental district (powiat) authorities. The lawyers consult clients in “free assistance offices ” (punkty nieodpłatnej pomocy prawnej).

Further information, including the list of offices, is presented on this webpage.

2) Expert registries or publicly available lists of bars or registries that include the contact details of experts

There are no complex registers of experts; rather, they have to be looked for on a case-by-case basis. However, one may wish to check e.g. the list of experts held by Polska Izba Ekologii (the Polish Ecology Chamber).

3) List of NGOs who are active in the field, links to sites where these NGOs are accessible

ClientEarth, Prawnicy dla ziemi, WWF Polska, Greenpeace Polska, Pracownia na rzecz Wszystkich Istot, Fundacja Greenmind, Fundacja Ekorozwoju

4) List of International NGOs, who are active in the Member State

Some international NGOs have their offices (branches) registered in Poland. Formally such a branch is treated as a Polish NGO. These NGOs are:

ClientEarth, Prawnicy dla ziemi, WWF Polska, Greenpeace Polska

1.7. Guarantees for effective procedures

1.7.1. Procedural time limits

1) Time limit to challenge an administrative environmental decision (not judicial) by an administrative body (either superior or same level).

Regular appeal

An appeal against the decision of the authority of the first instance to the authority of the second instance shall be filed within 14 days from the date when the decision of the first instance authority has been delivered to the appealing party.
In some cases (such as EIA decisions where there are more than 10 parties to the proceedings) the decision is not to be delivered to each party by post, as is the normal principle, but by way of public announcement. In such cases it is assumed that delivery occurs on the 14th day after that announcement (Article 49 APC). Then, any party to the proceedings (as well as NGOs having standing) has the next 14 days to lodge an appeal.

Extraordinary appeal

In case of extraordinary appeal based on Article 145 APC[5], a party may file a motion to reopen the proceedings within one month from the date when the party became aware of the circumstance constituting the basis for reopening of proceedings.

In case of extraordinary appeal based on Article 145a APC (reopening of proceedings in cases where the Constitutional Tribunal ruled that a normative act, on the basis of which the decision was made, is inconsistent with the Constitution, an international agreement or a law), a party may file a motion to reopen the proceedings within one month from the date of entry into force of the decision of the Constitutional Tribunal.

In case of extraordinary appeal based on Article 145aa APC (reopening of proceedings in case of a judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Union that affects the substance of the decision taken), a party may file a motion to reopen the proceedings within one month from the day when the CJEU judgement has been published.

In the case of extraordinary appeal based on Article 156 § 1 APC[6], a motion to annul a decision may be lodged at any time, however the decision shall not be annulled on the grounds set out in Article 156 §1 items 1, 3, 4 or 7 where ten years have elapsed since its delivery or publication and if the decision has had irreversible legal effects.

2) Time limit to deliver decision by an administrative organ

As a rule, the administrative authority of the first instance should deliver its decision within a month or, in a particularly complex case, no later than within two months from the date of initiation of the proceedings (Article 35 § 3 APC). This time limit may be extended if necessary - according to Article 36 APC, any extension of the proceedings shall be reasonably justified and the parties shall be informed; in the case of excessive length of proceedings or administrative inaction, the party may lodge a complaint to the administrative court. The proceedings may also be suspended if specific provisions so require (for example in EIA-related cases, for the period of preparation of the EIA report) or in some cases listed in Articles 97 and 98 APC (e.g. death of one of the parties to the proceedings and pending inheritance case).

The administrative authority of the second instance should deliver its decision within a month after it receives the appeal (Article 35 § 3 APC). The appeal is however to be filed not directly to the authority of the second instance but via the authority of the first instance - which, within 7 days of reception of the appeal, shall transfer it together with the entire documentation of the case to the authority of the second instance (Article 129 § 1 and Article 133 APC). The time limit to deliver the administrative decision is however called “instructional” for the authority which means that in practice this may take longer, although here too the authority has to justify the extension and inform the parties of it (Article 36 APC applies).

3) Is it possible to challenge the first level administrative decision directly before court?

As a rule this is not possible.

There is one exception to this rule, namely when the decision has been issued in the first instance by a Minister (or another central authority which has no higher instance over it) or a Self-Governmental Appeal Board (authorities which have no “higher instance” over them). In such cases, a party dissatisfied with the decision may request the authority to reconsider the case (Art. 127 § 3 APC). In such situations, the party may decide not to exercise the right to request reconsideration, but to lodge a complaint directly to the administrative court instead (Art. 52 § 3 PACLA).

4) Is there a deadline set for the national court to deliver its judgment?

According to the general rule, there is no deadline set for the administrative court to deliver its judgment. The exception concerns cases regarding access to environmental information: in the case of decisions refusing such information, the court shall issue its judgement within 30 days after receipt of the complaint (Article 20(2) of the EIA Act). The complaint is to be filed not directly to the court but via the administrative authority of the second instance - which, within 15 days of receipt of the appeal, shall transfer it together with the entire documentation of the case to the court (in other cases the second instance authority has 30 days to transfer the documentation).

5) Time limits applicable during the procedure (for parties, submitting evidence, other possible deadlines, etc.)

The authorities or courts may summon parties e.g. to submit documents, complete their motions or undertake other activities. The deadlines for those fulfilling these orders are indicated by the authority or the court respectively.

1.7.2. Interim and precautionary measures, enforcement of judgments

1) When does the appeal challenging an administrative decision have suspensive effect?

Filing an appeal to the administrative authority of the second instance has suspensive effect, which means that the decision cannot be executed. However, the competent authorities sometimes grant “immediate enforceability” (“rygor natychmiastowej wykonalności”) of the decision, which means that it may be executed immediately. Immediate enforceability may be included into the decision itself or issued in the form of a separate order (postanowienie). Immediate enforceability may be challenged before the authority of the second instance and then before the administrative court: either in the appeal against the entire decision or against the order, as the case may be.

Filing a motion within the extraordinary administrative appeal does not have an automatic suspensive effect, however the competent authority may suspend the execution of the decision ex officio or on the motion of a party (Article 152 and Article 159 APC).

2) Is there a possibility for an injunctive relief during the administrative appeal by the authority or the superior authority?

In a regular administrative appeal procedure there is no need for injunctive relief, as filing an appeal to the administrative authority of the second instance has a suspensive effect.

In an extraordinary administrative appeal, the competent authority may suspend the execution of the decision ex officio or on the motion of a party (Article 152 and Article 159 APC).

3) Is there a possibility to introduce a request for such a measure during the procedure and under what conditions? Possible deadline to submit this request?

As indicated above, in a regular administrative appeal procedure, there is no need for injunctive relief, as filing an appeal to the administrative authority of the second instance has a suspensive effect. In cases where “immediate enforceability” has been granted, it is possible to challenge its legitimacy. This cannot however be regarded as injunctive relief, as the issue is examined together with the main appeal and not earlier and separately.

In an extraordinary administrative appeal, a party may file a motion for suspension of the execution of the decision (Article 152 and Article 159 APC). The motion shall be filed along with the motion for reopening the proceedings or annulment of the decision, or later, during the extraordinary proceedings.

4) Is there immediate execution of an administrative decision irrespective of the appeal introduced? Under what conditions?
As indicated above, the competent authorities may grant “immediate enforceability” of the decision, which means that it may be executed immediately irrespective of any appeal introduced. The conditions for this are provided for by Article 108 APC: where it is necessary for the protection of human health or life, or to protect national farming from heavy losses, or for any other public interest or an extremely important interest of a party.

5) Is the administrative decision suspended once challenged before court at the judicial phase?
Filing a complaint to the administrative court of first instance does not automatically suspend execution of the administrative decision subject to complaint. However, after the complaint has been filed to the second instance authority (and before it is forwarded to the administrative court), the authority may suspend, ex officio or at the request of the complainant, the execution of the decision (Article 62 § 2(1) PACLA). The administrative court may also suspend the execution of the decision, upon the motion of the claimant, in cases where there is a threat that execution may cause a significant damage or effects hard to reverse. In such cases the claimant has to demonstrate that the threat is plausible.

6) Is there a possibility for the national tribunals to provide injunctive relief (conditional upon a financial deposit)? Is there separate appeal against this order on the injunctive relief or the financial deposit?
The administrative court of first instance may suspend execution of the administrative decision subject to complaint - ex officio or on the motion of a party (Article 61 § 2 PACLA). There is a possibility for separate appeal against this order on this injunctive relief (Article 194 § 1 point 2 of the PACLA).

According to the general rules, the injunctive relief is not conditional upon a financial deposit. However, in the case of a motion for injunctive relief regarding a complaint against a construction permit, the court may make it conditional upon a financial deposit (Article 35a BLA). The amount of this deposit is not set by law, however Article 35a(3) BLA states that the deposit shall be used to satisfy the investor's claims, so it may be assumed that it could be high. There is a right of appeal against the court order on financial deposit.

1.7.3. Costs - Legal aid - Pro bono assistance, other financial assistance mechanisms

1) How can one calculate what costs will be involved when one intends to initiate a procedure - administrative costs, judicial costs, costs for filing a case, experts' fees, lawyers' fees, cost of appeal, etc.

Administrative and court fees:
Filing an appeal with the administrative authority at second instance (and at the same time, the appeal procedure) is free of charge, according to Annex, part I item 53, column 4 to the Stamp Duty Act[7].

As far as the court fees are concerned, it should be noted that in Poland court fees vary according to “the value of the case”, but only in cases where the value of the case at stake can be measured (i.e., if the case concerns a monetary obligation, for example the payment of a fee for the use of the environment or an administrative fine for non-compliance with the environmental requirements).

However, it is recognised that in environmental cases concerning typical administrative decisions (such as environmental permits, EIA decisions etc.) the value of the case at stake cannot be measured. In such cases, the court fee is fixed at PLN 200 (currently about EUR 44) for the court of first instance and PLN 100 (about EUR 22) for the court of second instance.

Attorneys' fees:
Attorneys’ fees depend in practice on the contract between the attorney and his client. Therefore the costs of legal representation may differ depending on the law firm, the experience of the lawyer etc. As a rough guide, they may vary from PLN 150 to 600 (EUR 33 to 135) per hour. The number of hours depends on the complexity of a case, number of appeal instances etc.

Experts' fees:
As indicated above, the administrative courts decide on the basis of the documents that have been collected in the course of the administrative review procedure and may only admit new evidence in exceptional cases, and only in the form “of documents” (Article 106 PACLA). Thus, expert opinions would be commissioned by parties to the proceedings mainly during proceedings before administrative authorities of first or second instance. The average cost of an expert’s report would be around PLN 7,000 (EUR 1,540).

2) Cost of Injunctive relief/in interim measure, is a deposit necessary?
According to the general rules, the injunctive relief is not conditional upon a financial deposit. However, in case of a motion for injunctive relief regarding a complaint against a construction permit, the court may make it conditional upon a financial deposit (Article 35a BLA). The amount of this deposit is not set by law, however Article 35a(3) BLA states that the deposit shall be used to satisfy the investor's claims, so it may be assumed that it could be high. There is a right of appeal against the court order on a financial deposit.

3) Is there legal aid available for natural persons?
Persons (both natural and legal, including NGOs) who are unable to fund the costs of the court or hiring attorney may apply to the administrative court for legal aid, which in Poland is called “right of aid” prawo pomocy (Articles 243 - 263 PACLA). The application must be lodged with the court and accompanied by evidence of the financial status of the applicant. There is no fixed level of income or assets below which the legal aid is provided. It is up to the court’s discretion to determine whether legal aid would be justified or not.

The right to aid encompasses an exemption from payment of the court fees and covers the costs of appointment of an attorney who will represent the claimant in court. The right to aid may be reversed if the grounds for granting the aid cease to apply. There are however no statistics on the frequency of granting or refusal of aid by the courts.

4) Is there legal aid available for associations, legal persons, NGOs with legal personality and without legal personality? If yes, how to request legal aid? Is there pro bono assistance?
See above.

5) Are there other financial mechanisms available to provide financial assistance?
Environmental NGOs may receive public funding for the projects they carry out. The public funding may also cover the costs connected with legal proceedings (usually the NGOs have to include this type of expense in the project’s budget). Certain NGOs also carry out advocacy for other NGOs or individuals, including assistance in legal proceedings, and may receive public money for this.

6) Does the ‘loser party pays’ principle apply? How is it applied by courts, are there exceptions?
Within the administrative review procedure, each party bears its own costs, which means that the winning party does not recover its costs (the second instance authority does not decide on costs). Filing an appeal before the administrative authority of the second instance is however free of charge. According to Article 200 PACLA, before the administrative court of first instance, if the authorities lose the case, they have to pay the claimant’s costs. This includes:

- the court fees.
- the costs of legal representation, which are however limited to the cap set by specific provisions[8]. In cases in which no financial value is set (and the majority of environmental cases belong to this category[9]) this cap is PLN 480 which is about EUR 107 (normally these are not the real costs which the claimant paid, as these costs are market-based and not regulated by law).
If the authority wins, it is not entitled to claim its costs. Other participants in the court proceedings (persons referred to in Art. 33 PACLA) bear their own costs; the losing party is not obliged to cover them.

Articles 203 and 204 PACLA lay down rules on the distribution of costs in proceedings before the court of second instance. This includes the court fees and also the costs of legal representation but only up to the cap of PLN 480 which is about EUR 107.

Article 203 regulates the situation where the court of second instance allowed the appeal. According to this provision: in cases where the court of first instance dismissed the complaint and the court of second instance annulled the first instance court’s judgement, the authority whose decision was subject to proceedings before the court of first instance has to pay the costs of the person who filed the appeal, in cases where the court of first instance allowed the complaint and the court of second instance annulled the first instance court’s judgement, the claimant in the proceedings before the court of first instance has to pay the costs of the person/authority who filed the appeal.

Article 204 regulates the situation where the court of second instance dismissed the appeal. According to this provision: in cases where the court of first instance dismissed the complaint and the court of second instance sustained the first instance court’s judgement, the person who filed the appeal has to pay the costs of the authority whose decision was subject to proceedings before the court of first instance, in cases where the court of first instance allowed the complaint and the court of second instance sustained the first instance court’s judgement, the person who filed the appeal has to pay the costs of the claimant in the proceedings before the court of first instance.

However, if an appeal was filed by an NGO acting in the public interest, the courts in practice do not order the NGO to reimburse the costs to another party (i.e., they exempt the NGO from payment of costs).

7) Can the court provide an exemption from procedural costs, duties, filing fees, taxation of costs, etc.? Any other national characteristics linked to this topic? As indicated above, a person who is granted the “right of aid” is exempted from payment of the court fees.

1.7.4. Access to information on access to justice - provisions related to Directive 2003/4/EC

1) Where are the national rules on environmental access to justice available? Internet link to be provided. Are there other forms of structured dissemination? No official webpages concerning environmental access to justice have been identified.

2) During different environmental procedures how is this information provided? From whom should the applicant request information? Any decision issued during administrative proceedings, including that of the second instance authority, shall include information on possibilities to challenge it. During court hearings, where a party is not represented by a lawyer, the court has to inform the party about the remedies available (Article 140 § 1 PACLA). See also point 4) below.

3) What are the sectoral rules (EIA, IPPC/IED, regarding plans and programmes, etc.)? There are no special sectoral rules regarding information for the applicants.

4) Is it obligatory to provide access to justice Information in the administrative decision and in the judgment? It is obligatory to provide access to justice information, in the case of an administrative decision (Article 107 § 1 point 7 APC) and if a judgement (Article 140 § 2 PACLA).

5) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable? Administrative decisions and judgements, including information about available remedies, are delivered in Polish. During the hearing before the foreign party may ask the court to provide the services of an interpreter to translate also the information about remedies provided during the hearing (Article 5 § 2 of the Act on the common courts system in connection with Article 49 § 1 of the Act of 25 July 2002 on the administrative courts system). If the court grants it, the services of an interpreter are free to the party (the costs are borne by the State).

1.8. Special procedural rules

Country-specific EIA rules related to access to justice

1) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) Under Polish law (the EIA Act[10]), the EIA procedure, or - in case of a negative screening decision - the screening procedure, is concluded by the separate so-called “EIA decision” (Poland established a special “procedure to comply with the aims of the Directive”, as referred to in Article 2(2) of the EIA Directive).

Negative screening In the case of a negative screening decision, the EIA decision states that the EIA procedure is not needed and provides the reasoning for that. Polish law provides for a possibility to challenge the EIA decision (negative screening decision) itself. This possibility is always granted to individuals (parties to the proceedings).

Environmental NGOs however have limited possibilities to challenge the negative screening decision. In such cases they are unable to use the provisions granting them access to justice in the case of EIA decisions concluding the full EIA procedure (Article 44 of the EIA Act). Instead, they may only try to enter into the administrative proceedings - and then to challenge the decision - on the basis of the more general Article 31 APC. As explained above, this Article is however less favourable to organisations than Article 44 of the EIA Act, because Article 31 foresees that the public authority has to assess whether “the interest of society requires” it to allow the organisation to participate - while under Article 44 of the EIA Act the authority only examines whether an environmental organisation fulfils formal requirements (is registered etc.) but does not assess whether the participation of such an organisation is “needed” and “justified” from the point of view of public interest. Depriving organisations of the right to participate in administrative proceedings on the basis of Article 31 APC means that they will not be entitled to participate in appeal proceedings either.

In any case, an EIA decision stating a negative result of screening may be challenged before a second instance authority within 14 days after the date when decision has been delivered to a given party (see point 1.7.1).

Positive screening In the case of positive screening, the competent authority issues a separate order (postanowienie) stating that EIA is necessary and setting the scope of environmental report (which means that this order covers both screening and scoping). This order may be challenged by the parties to the proceedings as well as by NGOs participating in the proceedings. An appeal against the positive screening order shall be challenged within 7 days after the date when it has been delivered to a given party.

2) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned) In the case of projects always requiring a full EIA (under Polish law, these are all projects listed in Annex I to the EIA Directive plus some projects falling under Annex II to the Directive) in principle there is no separate scoping order (postanowienie). For these projects, such an order shall be issued only if the developer requires so, or if the project could have a transboundary impact.

In case of projects subject to individual screening, the order by the competent authority stating that an EIA is required (positive screening order) also sets the scope of environmental report (which means that this order covers both screening and scoping). This order may be challenged by the parties to the proceedings as well as by NGOs participating in the proceedings. An appeal against the positive screening order shall be challenged within 7 days after the date when it has been delivered to a given party.
3) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Deadline to challenge decisions?
As explained above, under Polish law, an EIA decision is a decision concluding the EIA procedure and setting environmental conditions for a decision giving final authorisation of the project (for the development consent). The EIA decision may be challenged by the parties to the proceedings. According to Article 74(3a) of the EIA Act, the status of party to proceedings concerning the EIA decisions is granted to the developer and owners of (and holders of some other rights) to the properties located in the area which will be affected by the proposed project. This area is understood as:
the anticipated area on which the project will be carried out and the area located within 100 m of the borders of that area;
the plots on which, as a result of implementation, exploitation or use of the project, the environmental quality standards would be exceeded, or plots located within the range of a significant impact of the project, which may introduce restrictions on the development of the real estate.
The EIA decision may also be challenged by NGOs which are admitted to participate in the proceedings with rights of a party.
An EIA decision may be challenged before the authority of second instance within 14 days after the date when decision has been delivered to a given party or NGO (see point 1.7.1). The decision of the second instance authority may be challenged before the administrative court within 30 days after the date when the decision has been delivered to a given party or NGO. The verdict of the voivodship administrative court may be challenged before the Supreme Administrative Court within 30 days after the verdict along with its written justification has been delivered to a given party.

4) Can one challenge the final authorisation? Under what conditions, if one is an individual, an NGO, a foreign NGO?
The right to challenge a final authorisation (decision subsequent to the EIA decision), depends on the specific provisions regulating particular types of final authorisations (construction permits, water permits, concessions for extraction of minerals etc.). These specific provisions may amend the general rules regarding the scope of parties to the proceedings and hence the scope of persons entitled to challenge the decision; they also may limit the rights of NGOs. See answer to question 1.4.2) for details.

5) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion?
In an appeal lodged with the administrative court, the claimant may raise both procedural and substantive issues.
The administrative court of first instance is not bound by the limits of the appeal which means that it may find other flaws in the challenged decision than those presented by the claimant (so in this sense the court may act on its own motion). The Supreme Administrative Court is in principle bound by the appeal save for certain serious errors of the proceedings listed in Article 183 § 2 PACLA.
However, at the stage of court proceedings, the possibility to take and examine new evidence is strictly limited. The administrative court of first instance examines in principle the legality of the acts or omissions of the administrative authority, which includes verifying whether the authority has correctly established or assessed the facts (merits) of the case. The verification by the court consists in examining the proceedings by the administrative authorities (of both instances), including determining whether the authorities had correctly taken into account and assessed the evidence available in the case, including the technical documents.
According to Article 133 § 1 PACLA, the verification by the administrative court shall be based on the documents available in the file on the case and the court has no mandate to take evidence on its own. The only exception from this general rule is provided by Article 106 § 3 PACLA, according to which the court may examine additional documents as evidence, but only when it will not “excessively” prolong the proceedings, which means that there will be no need to adjourn the trial.
Administrative courts, unlike civil courts, have no competence to call expert witnesses.
Consequently, the assessment of substantive issues raised by the parties is limited by the lack of scientific (technical etc.) knowledge of the judges. In practice, the administrative courts rely on the assessment by the administrative authorities, examining only whether the authorities took into account all evidence available, and whether proved it in the reasoning of the decision.

6) At what stage are decisions, acts or omissions challengeable?
See answers to questions 1.8.1) - 1.8.4) above.

7) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.
There is one exception to this rule, namely when the decision has been issued in the first instance by a Minister (or another central authority which has no higher instance over it). In EIA-related cases such an exception concerns only the EIA decision for a nuclear power plant, as this decision is to be issued by the General Director for Environmental Protection. In this case, a party dissatisfied with the decision may request the authority to reconsider the case (Art. 127 § 3 APC). In this situation, the party may decide not to exercise the right to request reconsideration, but to lodge a complaint directly to the administrative court instead (Art. 52 § 3 PACLA).

8) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 127?
There is no requirement to participate actively in the administrative proceedings.

9) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
Although there is no separate provision transposing this requirement, the legal system in its entirety as described in this document, including provisions on legal aid, may be considered to provide for fair and equitable review proceedings.
Moreover, it should be mentioned that neither the authority of the second instance, nor the administrative court of the first instance (the Regional Administrative Court) are bound by the scope of the appeal and arguments presented by the claimant. The Supreme Administrative Court is in principle bound by the appeal save for certain serious errors of the proceedings listed in Article 183 § 2 PACLA. However, the Supreme Administrative Court may act on its own motion if it finds that the parties have not been sufficiently heard.

10) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
As explained under points 1.7.1) and 1.7.2), the administrative authority of the second instance should deliver its decision within a month after it receives the appeal (Article 35 § 3 APC). The appeal is however to be filed not directly to the authority of the second instance but via the authority of the first instance - which, within 7 days after receipt of the appeal, shall transfer it together with the entire documentation of the case to the authority of the second instance (Article 129 § 1 and Article 133 APC). The time limit to deliver the administrative decision is however called “instructional” for the authority, which means that in practice this may take longer (according to Article 36 APC, any extension of the proceedings shall be reasonably justified and parties shall be informed; in case of excessive length of proceedings or administrative inaction the party may lodge a complaint to the administrative court). There no deadline set for the administrative court to deliver its judgment in EUR-related cases.

11) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?
In theory, rules on injunctive relief as described under point 1.7.2) apply also to EIA decisions. However, in practice, administrative courts can refuse to suspend the execution of EIA decision, justifying this by the fact that the EIA decision does not give the right yet to commence the development of the project (as the developer needs to obtain another decision(s)) - see verdict of the Supreme Administrative Court.
At the same time, at the stage of certain 'subsequent decisions' both the circle of parties and the possibility for environmental organisations to participate are limited (see remarks above) and thus often there is no one who could challenge a subsequent decision (e.g. a construction permit) and file a motion for suspension of its execution (apart of course from the developer who initiated the proceedings but he is normally not interested in challenging a positive decision he has received).

1.8.2. Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control (IPPC)/Industrial Emissions Directive (IED) - provisions related to Directive 2003/35/EC

1) Country-specific IPPC/IED rules related to access to justice

See answers below.

2) Standing rules, at what stages can one challenge decisions (if one is an NGO, a foreign NGO, a citizen)? Is the final decision challengeable?

According to the general rules, integrated permits issued on the basis of provisions transposing the IED may be challenged by parties to the proceedings and by environmental NGOs (including foreign ones) enjoying the rights of a party on the basis of Article 44 of the EIA Act (see answers under points 1.4.1) and 1.4.2).

The scope of parties to the proceedings regarding permits is however very limited by Article 185(1) and (1a) of the EPLA. According to Article 185(1), the status of a party is granted only to the operator of the installation subject to the permit and - in very exceptional cases, i.e. when a so-called “restricted use area” is to be created around the installation - to owners of properties included into the restricted use area. The Supreme Administrative Court stated in a verdict of 24 April 2018 (II OSK 2743/17) that this limitation of the circle of parties is in non-compliance with the IED. The Court verdict is however binding with regard to a given case only. According to Article 185(1a), where the integrated permit regulates water taking or discharge of waste water, the following entities also shall be parties to the proceedings: the Polish Waters authorities, - for inland flowing waters and groundwater; the minister responsible for maritime economy, for waters of the territorial sea and internal sea waters.

3) Rules on standing and access to justice relating to screening (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

In Poland procedures related to IED are separate from EIAs so there is no screening phase.

4) Rules on standing relating to scoping (conditions, timeframe, public concerned)

In Poland procedures related to IED are separate from EIAs so there is no scoping phase.

5) At what stage(s) can the public challenge the administrative decisions on environmental projects? Is there a deadline to challenge decisions?

The “Decision on environmental project” under the IED is the integrated permit. It may be challenged before the second instance authority within 14 days after it is delivered to a given party. The decision of the second instance authority may be challenged before the administrative court within 30 days after the date when the decision has been delivered to a given party or NGO. The verdict of the regional administrative court may be challenged before the Supreme Administrative Court within 30 days after the verdict along with its written justification has been delivered to a given party.

6) Can the public challenge the final authorisation?

The “final authorisation” here is the integrated permit. It may be challenged according to the rules described under points 1.8.2.2) and 1.8.2.5).

7) Scope of judicial review – control on substantive/procedural legality. Can the court act on its own motion? Is it possible to challenge decisions, acts or omissions?

In an appeal lodged with the administrative court the claimant may raise both procedural and substantive issues. The administrative court of first instance is not bound by the limits of the appeal, which means that it may find other flaws in the challenged decision than those presented by the claimant (so in this sense the court may act on its own motion). The Supreme Administrative Court is in principle bound by the appeal save for certain serious errors of the proceedings listed in Article 183 § 2 PACLA.

However, at the stage of court proceedings, the possibility to take and examine new evidence is strictly limited. The administrative court of first instance examines in principle the legality of the acts or omissions of the administrative authority which includes verifying the authority has correctly established or assessed the facts (merits) of the case. The verification by the court consists in examining the proceedings by the administrative authorities (of both instances), including determining whether the authorities had correctly taken into account and assessed the evidence available in the case, including the technical documents.

According to Article 133 § 1 PACLA, the verification by the administrative court shall be based on the documents available in the file on the case and the court has no mandate to take evidence on its own. The only exception from this general rule is provided by Article 106 § 3 PACLA, according to which the court may examine additional documents as evidence, but only when it will not “excessively” prolong the proceedings, which means that there will be no need to adjourn the trial.

Administrative courts, unlike civil courts, have no competence to call expert witnesses. Consequently, the assessment of substantive issues raised by the parties is limited by the lack of scientific (technical etc.) knowledge of the judges. In practice, the administrative courts rely on the assessment by the administrative authorities, examining only whether the authorities took into account all evidence available, and whether proved it in the reasoning of the decision.

8) At what stage are these challengeable?

Permits issued under provisions transposing the IED are challengeable after they have been issued by the competent authority, within 14 days after the permit is delivered to a given party.

9) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? There is a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures.

10) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc., not meaning the requirement determined under point 12? There is no requirement for the parties to participate actively in the administrative proceedings.

11) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?

Although there is no separate provision transposing this requirement, the legal system in its entirety as described in this document, including provisions on legal aid, may be considered to provide for fair and equitable review proceedings.

12) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?

As explained under point 1.7.1) and 1.7.2), the administrative authority of the second instance should deliver its decision within a month after it receives the appeal (Article 35 § 3 of APC). The appeal is however to be filed not directly to the authority of the second instance but via the authority of the first instance - which, within 7 days after receipt of the appeal, shall transfer it together with the entire documentation of the case to the authority of the second instance (Article 129 § 1 and Article 133 APC). The time limit to deliver the administrative decision is however called “instructional” for the authority which means that... in case of excessive length of proceedings or administrative inaction the party may lodge a complaint to the administrative court). There no deadline set for the administrative court to deliver its judgment in IED-related cases.

13) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to this sector apart from the general national provisions?

Rules on injunctive relief as described under point 1.7.2. apply also to permits issued under provisions transposing the IED.

14) Is information on access to justice provided to the public in a structured and accessible manner?

It is obligatory to provide access to justice information, in the case of an administrative decision (Article 107 § 1 point 7 APC) and of a judgement (Article 140 § 2 PACLA).

1.8.3. Environmental liability[12]

Country-specific legal rules relating to the application of the Environmental Liability Directive 2004/35/EC, Articles 12 and 13

1) Which requirements need to be fulfilled for natural or legal persons (including environmental NGOs) to have the decision taken on environmental remediation by the competent authority reviewed by a court or another independent and impartial body in accordance with Article 13(1) ELD?

Under Polish law, everyone is entitled to a “request for action” as regulated by Article 12 of the ELD and if the authority refuses to take action (considering the request unjustified), every person whose request was denied may challenge this refusal to the authority of the second instance and then to the court (Article 24 of the Act of 13 April 2007 on Prevention and Repair of Environmental Damage[13]). However, where the authority issued a decision on remedial or prevention measures, only the environmental NGO which made the request for action - and not other persons who had made the request - is entitled to challenge this decision. Apart from the NGOs, the addressee of the decision and owner of the land on which the damage occurred and where the measures are to be undertaken are regarded as parties to the proceedings and therefore entitled to challenge the decision.

2) In what deadline does one need to introduce appeals?

The deadline to challenge a decision on remedial / preventive measures before the administrative authority of the second instance is 14 days after the date when the decision has been delivered (this is the normal deadline applicable for all administrative decisions).

The final decision of the second instance authority may be appealed against to the administrative court within 30 days of its delivery to the complainant.

3) Are there requirements for observations accompanying the request for action pursuant to Article 12(2) ELD and if yes, which ones?

According to Article 24(3) of the Act on Environmental Damage, the request for action shall contain:

- the name of the person reporting an imminent threat of environmental damage or environmental damage and their address;
- information about the place where the environmental damage or threat of environmental damage has occurred - if possible by providing the address or number of the parcel of land;
- information on the time when the damage or threat has occurred - if possible by indicating the date of its occurrence;
- a description of the situation identified indicating the existence of the damage or threat, including, where possible, its nature.

According to Article 24(4) of the Act on Environmental Damage, the notification should, as far as possible, contain documentation confirming the occurrence of the environmental damage or threat of damage and the identity of the responsible person. Moreover, in the case of damage to land, the notification should, as far as possible, include the names of the harmful substances and contamination tests carried out by a certified laboratory.

4) Are there specific requirements regarding 'plausibility' for showing that environmental damage occurred, and if yes, which ones?

There are no specific regulations on how, and to what extent, plausibility must be proven, but the aforementioned Article 24(4) of the Act on Environmental Damage requires proof of the damage or threat “as far as possible”.

5) Is a certain manner required and/or time limits set, and if yes, which ones, as regards the notification of the decision by the competent authority to the entitled natural or legal persons (including the entitled environmental NGOs)?

According to the APC, every administrative decision has to be delivered to the parties to the proceedings and to the persons with the status of a party. The APC does not set any deadline for delivery, but the common assumption is that it should happen as soon as possible.

In principle, a decision is to be delivered by post (or – if the parties so wish– electronically). However, in the case of decisions related to environmental liability cases (i.e. issued on the basis of the Act on Environmental Damage), when there are more than 20 parties to the proceedings, the “delivery” of the decision takes the form of a public announcement (Art. 20a of the Act on Environmental Damage and Art. 49-49a APC). The public notice is to be placed on the Internet (in the official Public Information Bulletin from the authority) as well as on noticeboards and in other places commonly used for notices in towns where the parties live. The public notice does not contain the decision itself, but states that the decision has been issued and provides information where the parties can make themselves acquainted with it.

6) Does the MS apply an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage?

The MS applies an extension of the entitlement to request action by competent authority from damage to the environment in cases of imminent threat of such damage.

7) Which are the competent authorities designated by the MS?

The main authority competent in cases of environmental damage and the threat of environmental damage is the Regional Director of Environmental Protection (governmental authority). There are 16 Regional Directors, one in each region. Only in cases of damage / threat caused by GMOs is, the competent authority the Minister of Climate and Environment.

The General Director of Environmental Protection is the second instance authority for Regional Directors of Environmental Protection and for maintaining the national register of environmental damage and threats of damage.

8) Does the MS require that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings?

The MS requires that the administrative review procedure be exhausted prior to recourse to judicial proceedings. There is one exception to this rule, namely when the decision has been issued in the first instance by a Minister. In cases related to environmental liability, this exception may concern only the damage caused by GMOs, as only then is the Minister the authority competent in the first instance. In this case, a party dissatisfied with the decision may request the authority to reconsider the case (Art. 127 § 3 APC). In this situation, the party may decide not to exercise the right to request reconsideration, but to lodge a complaint directly to the administrative court instead (Art. 52 § 3 PACLA).

1.8.4. Cross-border rules of procedures in environmental cases

1) Rules on involving other countries? At which stage of the procedure is there a possibility to challenge environmental decisions?
Where the transboundary procedure is required according to provisions transposing the EIA Directive (and the Espoo Convention) or the IED, other countries are involved in an intergovernmental process. This process is to be carried out within the proceedings concerning EIA decisions or integrated permits respectively. The intergovernmental process itself does not mean granting access to justice to the foreign public, but may help to identify the public concerned in an affected country and to inform the public about the decision issued - as the authorities of the affected country are involved then. The rules for granting standing to foreign persons (individuals and NGOs) will be explained below.

The problem is however that they may not receive proper information about the decision. This problem is relevant in particular for decisions issued on the basis of provisions transposing the ELD. Although there is an obligation to inform the affected country about the environmental damage, there is no “Espoo-like” procedure which might involve the public from the affected country.

2) Notion of public concerned?

Polish law does not use the notion of public concerned in the meaning of persons entitled to express their comments and opinions during the public participation procedure (concerning EIAs or integrated permits), as this possibility is granted to every person.

The scope of the “public concerned having a sufficient interest”, i.e. persons having standing, is described below under questions 3) and 4).

3) Do NGOs of the affected country have standing? When and to what court should they submit their appeals? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

Administrative review proceedings

The APC does not contain any specific provisions regarding the foreign public (i.e. individuals living abroad in affected countries or legal persons, including NGOs, based in these countries) but does not exclude them either. This means that there are no legal obstacles for them to enjoy the same rights as persons living or based in Poland, provided that they fulfil the same conditions as Polish citizens or NGOs respectively. Consequently, the same limitations will apply to them. As far as NGOs are concerned, it should be assumed that public authorities and courts will check whether they are registered in their own respective countries (i.e. whether they are not ad hoc informal groups). These NGOs should submit proof of registration (inclusion in relevant registers) in their own respective countries.

Court review proceedings

Article 300 PACLA refers to the Civil Procedure Code provisions on participation of foreign persons. According to Article 1117 § 1 and 2 of the Civil Procedure Code, the capacity of foreign persons to take part in civil proceedings (proceedings capacity) shall be assessed according to their domestic law. This means that where an NGOs has a right to participate in its own country, it will also enjoy that right before the Polish courts.

According to Article 299 PACLA, foreign persons participating in the proceedings, living or based abroad and outside the European Union, Switzerland or EFTA countries, are obliged to nominate a person in Poland entitled to pick up correspondence from the court.

Foreign NGOs fulfilling the conditions for standing are entitled to the same procedural assistance as is available to Polish NGOs (there are no legal obstacles to that). However, there is no practice in this regard (no cases of foreign NGOs applying for this kind of assistance were identified), so it is impossible to say how the situation would look in practice.

4) Do individuals of the affected country have standing? What procedural assistance are they eligible for (legal aid, request for injunctive relief, interim measures, pro bono)?

The main condition for individual persons to become a party to the proceedings and thereby to acquire the right to challenge a decision would be to have legal interest in a case, for example to be the owner of a property affected by the activity authorised by the decision. The concept of legal interest has been described under question 4.1.3). Also the same limitations of the circle of parties as described 1.4.2) and 1.8 apply to foreign individuals.

The problem with their access to justice is that in Poland there is no practice to identify the public concerned abroad and to inform them (see answer to question 5) below).

Administrative review proceedings

The APC does not contain any specific provisions regarding the foreign public (i.e. individuals living abroad in affected countries) but does not exclude them either. This means that there are no legal obstacles for them to enjoy the same rights as persons living or based in Poland, provided that they fulfil the same conditions as Polish citizens. Consequently, the same limitations will apply to them.

Court review proceedings

Article 300 PACLA refers to the Civil Procedure Code provisions on participation of foreign persons. According to Article 1117 § 1 and 2 of the Civil Procedure Code, the capacity of foreign persons to take part in civil proceedings (proceedings capacity) shall be, in principle, assessed according to their domestic law. This means that where an individual or an NGOs has a right to participate in its own country, it will also enjoy that right before the Polish courts. However, according to Article 1117 § 3 of the Civil Procedure Code, an individual who would not have the capacity to take part in proceedings in his own country but fulfils the requirements to have this capacity under Polish law, would have this capacity before the Polish courts (this rule applies to natural persons, so not to NGOs).

According to Article 299 PACLA, foreign persons participating in the proceedings, living or based abroad and outside the European Union, Switzerland or EFTA countries, are obliged to nominate a person in Poland entitled to pick up correspondence from the court.

Foreign citizens fulfilling the conditions for standing are entitled to the same procedural assistance as available for Polish citizens or NGOs respectively. Consequently, the same limitations will apply to them. As far as NGOs are concerned, it should be assumed that public authorities and courts will check whether they are registered in their own respective countries.

5) At what stage is the information provided to the public concerned (including the above parties)?

In cases when the Espoo-based transboundary procedure is carried out, the competent authorities of the affected country will receive a translated decision issued by the Polish authorities. The decision is always accompanied by information on the remedies available. Usually, the foreign authorities take the responsibility for informing their own public about the decision issued and how to make themselves acquainted with it. Where no Espoo transboundary procedure takes place, the foreign public is neither identified nor informed by Polish authorities.

6) What are the deadlines for public involvement including access to justice?

There are no special regulations on this. It should be assumed that the deadlines for filing an appeal by foreign persons having standing will be counted in the same way as those foreseen for the Polish public.

7) How is information on access to justice provided to the parties?

See answer to question 5) above.

8) Is translation, interpretation provided to foreign participants? What are the rules applicable?

All administrative and judicial proceedings are to be conducted out in Polish. The proceedings before the authority of the second instance are conducted out mainly in writing. The foreign party is then responsible for preparing its appeal, motions etc. in Polish. In proceedings before the administrative court, the foreign party may ask the court to provide the services of an interpreter (Article 5 § 2 of the Act on the common courts system in conjunction with Article 49 § 1 Act of 25 July 2002 on the administrative courts system).
9) Any other relevant rules?
There are no other relevant rules.

[1] See data available [here].
[2] There is one exception to the rule that a complaint to the administrative authority of second instance is required, namely when the decision has been issued in the first instance by a Minister or a Self-governmental Appeal Board (authorities which have no “higher instance” over them). In such cases, a party dissatisfied with the decision may request the authority to reconsider the case (Art. 127 § 3 APC). In such situations, the party may decide not to exercise the right to request for the reconsideration, but to lodge a complaint directly to the administrative court instead (Art. 52 § 3 PACLA).
[3] Although the proceedings before the administrative court are separate from the administrative proceedings (formally, it is not the next stage of the administrative proceedings).
[4] There are some exceptions to this rule indicated in Art. 175 § 2, Art. 175 § 2a and Art. 175 § 3 PACLA - the most important of them is the situation where the cassation appeal is lodged by the prosecutor or the Ombudsman.
[5] The evidence on the basis of which the relevant facts were established is proved to be false; the decision was issued as a result of an offence; the decision was issued by an employee or public administration body which is subject to exclusion; the party did not participate in the proceedings through no fault of its own; new facts or new evidence relevant to the case or new evidence existing on the date of the decision, unknown to the authority which issued the decision, come to light; the decision was issued without obtaining the legally required position of another authority; the preliminary issue has been resolved by a competent authority or a court in another way other than the assessment adopted when issuing the decision; the decision was issued on the basis of another decision or court ruling, which was subsequently revoked or amended.
[6] A decision: was issued in violation of the provisions on jurisdiction; was issued without legal basis or in gross breach of the law; concerns a case previously resolved by another final decision or a case which has been tacitly resolved; was addressed to a person who is not a party in the case; was unenforceable on the date of its delivery and its unenforceability is permanent; if executed, it would give rise to a criminal offence; it contains a defect which makes it legally invalid.
[8] Regulation of the Minister of Justice of 22 October 2015 on advocates’ fees (J.L. of 2015, item 1800 as amended) and Regulation of the Minister of Justice of 22 October 2015 on attorneys’ fees (codified text J.L. of 2018 item 265).
[9] For example, complaints against permits for emissions, EIA decisions other decisions allowing for the use of the environment are considered as cases in which no financial value is set. The financial value may be attributed to complaints against decisions imposing environmental fees or fines but in such cases only the company or other entity obliged to pay the fees or fines has standing (citizens or environmental NGOs have no standing here).
[10] The EIA Act Amendment, aimed at changing some rules on access to justice in EIA related cases, is currently being prepared. Currently (January 2021) the final version of the Amendment is not known yet.
[11] So called limited real rights i.e.: usufructs, easements (servitudes), pledges, cooperative ownership rights to premises and mortgages
[12] See also Case C-529/15, EU:C:2017:419.

Last update: 12/12/2023
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.
it is registered in a Court register or in a register maintained by the Starost (head of self-governmental authority in the district), as ad hoc groupings do not have standing; its participation in the proceedings is justified by the objects established in the by-laws of the organisation (in other words if the subject matter of the case is in conformity with the organization’s objectives); its participation in the proceedings is justified by the “public interest”. The public authority then assesses the motion and decides whether it considers it justified. The assessment is not limited to verification of formal requirements, but concerns also the merit justification (need) for participation by the organisation in a given case (in other words: the authority decides whether it considers it useful, from the point of view of the “public interest”, to allow the organisation to participate). A refusal may be challenged by the organisation to the authority of second instance and then - subsequently - to the administrative court. The organisation which took part in the preceding administrative proceedings on the basis of Article 31 of APC has standing also before the administrative courts. An NGO which has not taken part in the preceding administrative proceedings is not entitled to challenge the decision of the second instance authority, i.e. has no right to file a complaint to the administrative court (Article 50 § 1 PACLA). However, if the judicial-administrative proceedings, initiated by another party, concerns the scope of the NGO’s activity, participation of the organisation may be granted by the court of its own motion; the courts’ refusal may be challenged before the administrative court of second instance (Article 33 § 2 PACLA). According to case law, the court also has to verify whether the “public interest” speaks for the participation of the NGO. The rules described above may be modified by specific provisions regarding particular decisions: Article 185(1) EPLA limits the circle of parties in the proceedings regarding permits for emissions of gases into THE air (i.e. other than integrated permits) to the operator of the installation subject to the permit. Only in very exceptional cases - when a so-called “restricted use area” is to be created around the installation - are certain neighbours also regarded as parties to the proceedings. Article 401(1) WLA specifies that parties to the proceedings regarding decisions authorising the use of water (e.g. water permits) and hence entitled to challenge these decisions are: the project proponent and the persons who will be affected by the intended use of water or the entities within the range of impact of the planned water facilities. Art. 402 WLA excludes the participation of NGOs in these proceedings and their right to challenge the decisions issued. Article 41 GMLA specifies that parties to the proceedings regarding concessions for extraction of mineral resources are only the owners of properties on which the mining activity is to be carried out. Article 28(2) BLA specifies that parties to the proceedings regarding construction permits are only investors and owners, perpetual usufructuaries or managers of properties located in the area of impact of the building object. The term “impact of the building object” is defined by Article 3(20) BLA as “an area designated in the vicinity of a building object on the basis of specific regulations, introducing restrictions on development, including buildings, of that area”. Article 28(3) BLA excludes the participation of NGOs in these proceedings and their right to challenge the decisions issued. Decisions issued on the basis of the WLA, GMLA and BLA may concerns projects subject to EIA or other projects. The above limitations regarding persons having standing in such cases jeopardise the effectiveness of access to justice in these matters, as in practice in some cases only the developer (operator) who initiated the proceedings is entitled to challenge a decision. An appeal against the decision of the authority of the first instance to the authority of the second instance shall be filed within 14 days from the date when the decision of the first instance authority has been delivered to the appealing party. The decision of the second instance authority may be challenged before the administrative court within 30 days after the date when the decision has been delivered to a given party or NGO. The verdict of the regional administrative court may be challenged before the Supreme Administrative Court within 30 days after the verdict along with its written justification has been delivered to a given party.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality? Administrative review In an appeal lodged with the administrative authority of the second instance, the claimant may raise both procedural and substantive issues. The authority shall examine all the allegations but is not bound by the limits of the appeal, which means that it may find other flaws of the challenged decision than those presented by the claimant.

Judicial review In an appeal lodged with the administrative court, the claimant may raise both procedural and substantive issues. The administrative court of first instance is not bound by the limits of the appeal, which means that it may find other flaws in the challenged decision than those presented by the claimant (so in this sense the court may act on its own motion). The Supreme Administrative Court is in principle bound by the appeal save for certain serious errors in the proceedings listed in Article 183 § 2 PACLA. However, at the stage of court proceedings, the possibility to take and examine new evidence is strictly limited. The administrative court of first instance examines in principle the legality of the acts or omissions of the administrative authority which includes verifying whether the authority has correctly established or assessed the facts (merits) of the case. The verification by the court consists in examining the proceedings by the administrative authorities (of both instances), including determining whether the authorities had correctly taken into account and assessed the evidence available in the case, including the technical documents. According to Article 133 § 1 PACLA, the verification by the administrative court shall be based on the documents available in the file on the case and the court has no mandate to take evidence on its own. The only exception from this general rule is provided by Article 108 § 3 PACLA, according to which the court may examine additional documents as evidence, but only when it will not “excessively” prolong the proceedings, which means that there will be no need to adjourn the trial.

Administrative courts, unlike civil courts, have no competence to call expert witnesses. Consequently, the assessment of substantive issues raised by the parties is limited by the lack of scientific (technical etc.) knowledge of the judges. In practice, the administrative courts rely on the assessment by the administrative authorities, examining only whether the authorities took into account all evidence available, and whether they proved it in the reasoning behind the decision.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures? There is one exception to this rule, namely when the decision has been issued in the first instance by a Minister or a Self-governmental Appeal Board (authorities which have no “higher instance” over them). In such cases, a party dissatisfied with the decision may request the authority to reconsider the case (Art. 127 § 3 APC). In this situations, the party may decide not to exercise the right to request reconsideration, but to lodge a complaint directly to the administrative court instead (Art. 52 § 3 PACLA).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.? There is no requirement to participate actively in the administrative proceedings.
5) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
There are no grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase. However, at the stage of proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court only the proceedings before the administrative court of the first instance are subject to examination, so the arguments have to be focused on this phase.

6) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national legislation?
Although there is no separate provision transposing this requirement, the legal system in its entirety as described in this document, including provisions on legal aid, may be considered to provide for fair and equitable review proceedings.

7) How is the notion of "timely" implemented by the national legislation?
As explained under point 1.7.1) and 1.7.2), the administrative authority of the second instance should deliver its decision within a month after it receives the appeal (Article 35 § 3 APC). The appeal is however to be filed not directly to the authority of the second instance but via the authority of the first instance - which, within 7 days after receipt of the appeal, shall transfer it together with the entire documentation of the case to the authority of the second instance (Article 129 § 1 and Article 133 APC). The time limit to deliver the administrative decision is however called "instructional" for the authority which means that in practice this may take longer (according to Article 36 APC, any prolongation of the proceedings shall be reasonably justified and parties shall be informed; in case of excessive length of proceedings or administrative inaction the party may lodge a complaint to the administrative court). There no deadline set for the administrative court.

8) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
Rules on injunctive relief as described under point 1.7.2. apply to all administrative decisions.

9) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?
What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive, and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
Within the administrative review procedure, each party bears its own costs, which means that the winning party does not recover its costs (the second instance authority does not decide on costs).
Filing an appeal before the administrative authority of the second instance is however free of charge.
According to Article 200 PACLA, before the administrative court of first instance, if the authorities lose the case, they have to pay the claimant’s costs. This includes:
- the court fees,
- the costs of legal representation which are however limited to the cap set by specific provisions[2]. In cases in which no financial value is set (and the majority of environmental cases belong to this category[3]) this cap is PLN 480 which is about EUR 107 (normally these are not the real costs which the claimant paid).

If the authority wins, it is not entitled to claim its costs. Other participants in the court proceedings (persons referred to in Art. 33 PACLA) bear their own costs; the losing party is not obliged to cover them.
There is no express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive, however if the authority wins, it is not entitled to claim its costs.
Also, the above court fees are rather modest.

Articles 203 and 204 PACLA provide for rules on the distribution of costs in proceedings before the court of second instance. This includes the court fees and also the costs of legal representation but only up to the cap which in the vast majority of environmental cases brought by citizens or by environmental NGOs is PLN 480 (about EUR 107).

Article 203 regulates the situation when the court of second instance allowed the appeal. According to this provision:
in cases where the court of first instance dismissed the complaint and the court of second instance annulled the first instance court’s judgement, the authority whose decision was subject to proceedings before the court of first instance has to pay the costs of the person who filed the appeal, in cases where the court of first instance allowed the complaint and the court of second instance annulled the first instance court’s judgement, the claimant in the proceedings before the court of first instance has to pay the costs of the person/authority who filed the appeal.

Article 204 regulates the situation where the court of second instance dismissed the appeal. According to this provision:
in cases where the court of first instance dismissed the complaint and the court of second instance sustained the first instance court’s judgement - the person who filed the appeal has to pay the costs of the authority whose decision was subject to proceedings before the court of first instance, in cases where the court of first instance allowed the complaint and the court of second instance sustained the first instance court’s judgement - the person who filed the appeal has to pay the costs of the claimant before the court of first instance.
However, if an appeal was filed by an NGO acting in the public interest, the courts in practice do not order the NGO to reimburse the costs to another party (i.e., they exempt the NGO from the payment of costs).

1.2. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with national implementing legislation for the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC[4]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
In Poland, plans, programmes and other strategic documents, including those regarding environment, are to be adopted by:
- self-governmental authorities; there are three levels of self-governmental authorities: community (gmina), district or poviat (powiat) and region (województwo) or governmental authorities: either at the central level (by ministers or other central agencies) or at the regional level.
Specific Acts (ustawy) specify when and by whom a given document shall be adopted.
Certain of these documents have a status of ‘local law’ which means that they are sources of law recognized by the Polish Constitution; others do not have this status but still are important for the management of a given area (they influence the individual decisions, determine activities by the competent authorities, shape the development etc.).
The circle of persons entitled to challenge the plans and programmes is determined by the Acts providing the general basis for adoption of these plans and programmes (which are in this regard lex specialis in relation to the general rules provided by PACLA). These are:
- For plans and programmes to be adopted by various levels of self-governmental authorities:
The Act of 5 June 1998 on Poviat Self-Government – Art. 87(1),
For plans and programmes to be adopted by governmental authorities:

Standing of individual persons

The Act on Communal Self-Government and the Act on Poviats Self-Government stipulate that a strategic document adopted by the administration may be challenged by persons whose legal interest or right has been infringed by that document: these persons may file a claim to the administrative court (Article 101(1) of the Act on Communal Self-Government; Art. 87(1) of the Act on Poviats Self-Government).

The Act on Regional Self-Government allows people to challenge only the plans and programmes with the status of “local law” and grants the right to challenge them to persons whose legal interest or right has been infringed by the provision of the local law (Art. 90(1) of the Act on Regional Self-Government).

Also Article 63(1) of the Act on the Voivod and the Governmental Administration in the Voivodship allows for challenging the plans and programmes with the status of “local law” and grants the right to challenge these plans to persons whose legal interest or right has been infringed by the provision of the local law (thus the circle of persons entitled is exactly the same as in the above cited Acts on self-governmental authorities).

As explained above, the “legal interest” is understood in Poland as an interest protected by any provision of (administrative, civil or other) law - the classic example of such interest is ownership of property (which could be affected e.g. by a construction of a new project).

The above cited four Acts (on self-government authorities and on governmental authorities) grant access to justice to persons whose legal interest is “involved” in the case, and who can prove that their legal interest or right has been infringed (the mere threat or possibility of infringement is insufficient).

This means that the group of persons entitled to challenge a plan or programme is very narrow - narrower than in case of individual decisions, where it is sufficient to demonstrate the mere existence of a legal interest in the case and not its violation (this view was confirmed by the Supreme Administrative Court e.g. in the verdict of 22 February 2017 (II OSK 1497/15), in the verdict of 20 November 2014 r. (I OSK 1747/14) and in the decision of 8 October 2013 (II OZ 787/13).

In a number of verdicts, the administrative courts confirmed the above, narrow, understanding of standing to challenge plans or programmes and presented a narrow interpretation of the infringement of the legal interest or right.

For example, in the verdict of 17 October 2017, the Supreme Administrative Court held that the right to challenge the local spatial plan is granted to the person whose legal interest has been infringed by the contested plan, while the infringement must be direct, individual, objective and real, and the complainant must demonstrate a link between the contested resolution and its individual legal position (II OSK 2559/16).

In the verdict of 14 April 2011, the Supreme Administrative Court interpreted Article 87(1) of the Act on Poviats Self-Government and held that this Article should be interpreted narrowly and not in a broad way by deriving a breach of a legal interest from general values or principles of law (I OSK 5/11).

In the verdict of 30 March 2017, the Supreme Administrative Court, in interpreting Art. 101(1) of the Act on Communal Self-Government, held that in order to appeal against a resolution of the Commune Council, a person has to prove that their legal interest has been violated and only that they “have” a legal interest in the case (II OSK 1941/15).

Similar views have been expressed in other verdicts and decisions of the Supreme Administrative Court, e.g.: verdict of 14 November 2017 (II OSK 457/16), verdict of 20 June 2017 (II OSK 2648/15), verdict of 31 May 2017 (II OSK 2298/15), verdict of 20 April 2017 (II GSK 1912/15), verdict of 7 March 2017 (II OSK 1587/15), verdict of 10 February 2017 (II OSK 1344/15), verdict of 5 November 2014 (II OSK 977/13), verdict of 25 March 2014 (II OSK 355/14), verdict of 28 June 2007 (II OSK 1596/06).

Following the interpretations of the Supreme Administrative Court, the Regional Administrative Courts apply the same approach.

An appeal to the court is to be submitted at any time, there is no deadline (Art. 53.2a PACLA).

Standing of NGOs

As far as NGOs are concerned, it should be stressed that there is no provision in Polish law allowing them to challenge a plan or programme (unless they had their own legal interest or right infringed, which means they would act as private entities and not in the common interest).

The lack of standing for NGOs in cases concerning of strategic documents is confirmed by the jurisprudence of the Supreme Administrative Court (see verdict of 15 February 2017, II OSK 1277/15; verdict of 21 March 2017, II OSK 2865/15 and order of 23 January 2018, II OSK 3218/17).

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

Persons having standing may raise all aspects (regarding both procedural and substantive legality). However, according to jurisprudence the court examines the case only within the limits of the claimant’s legal interest. This means that for example in the case of a local spatial plan the court - although it examines the entire procedure regarding the plan - may annul it only with regard to the property of the claimant, as the claimant’s legal interest concerns only this piece of land (verdict of the Supreme Administrative Court of 5 June 2014, II OSK 117/13; verdict of the Supreme Administrative Court of 25 November 2008, II OSK 978/08).

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

In the case of strategic documents (plans and programmes) the exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review is not required.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

There is no requirement to participate actively in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure in order to have standing.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

The administrative court of the first instance may suspend execution of the administrative decision subject to complaint - ex officio or on the motion of a party (Article 61 § 3 PACLA).

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

In cases concerning plans or programmes, the court fee is fixed at PLN 300 (currently about EUR 66) for the court of first instance and PLN 150 (about EUR 33) for the court of second instance.

According to Article 200 PACLA, before the administrative court of first instance, if the authorities lose the case they have to pay the claimant’s costs. This includes the court fees and also the costs of legal representation but only up to the cap of PLN 480 (about EUR 107) - normally these are not the real costs which the claimant paid.

In case the authority wins, it is not entitled to claim its costs.

Articles 203 and 204 PACLA lay down rules on the distribution of costs in proceedings before the court of second instance. This includes the court fees and also the costs of legal representation but only up to the cap of PLN 480 (about EUR 107).
1.3. Decisions, acts or omissions concerning the administrative procedures to be followed to comply with the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention in respect of plans and programmes not submitted to the procedures set out in the Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) Directive 2001/42/EC \[5\]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedures for adopting the decision, act or omission (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
All rules, as well as the assessment of the effectiveness of the level of access to national courts as described under point 2.2, apply here.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

1.4. Decisions, acts or omissions also concerning plans and programmes required to be prepared under EU environmental legislation \[6\]

1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the content of the plan (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

2) Does the form in which the plan or programme is adopted make a difference in terms of legal standing (see also Section 2.5 below)?
Plans or programmes adopted in the form of a Regulation (rozporządzenie) by the Council of Ministers or a Minister are not subject to access to justice as described under point 2.2. For them the rules described under point 2.5 do apply.

3) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

4) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

5) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

6) Are there some grounds/arguments precluded from the judicial review phase?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

7) Fair, equitable - what meaning is given to equality of arms in the national jurisdiction?
Although there is no separate provision transposing this requirement, the legal system in its entirety as described in this document, including provisions on legal aid, may be considered to provide for fair and equitable review proceedings.

8) How is the notion of “timely” implemented by the national legislation?
There is no deadline set for the administrative court to deliver its judgment, so it is not implemented.

9) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

10) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court? What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?
All rules described under point 2.2 apply here.

1.5. Executive regulations and/or generally applicable legally binding normative instruments used to implement EU environmental legislation and related EU regulatory acts \[7\]
1) What are the applicable national statutory rules on standing for both individuals and NGOs wishing to obtain a) an administrative review and b) a legal challenge before a national court in respect of the procedure for adopting or the content of the decision, act or omission of the national regulatory act (in particular, the conditions to be fulfilled and any time limits that apply to the submission of a challenge)? How effective is the level of access to national courts in light of the CJEU case law and any related national case law?

There is no direct access to the court to challenge a normative instrument. Such an instrument may be subject to a "constitutional complaint" to be lodged with the Constitutional Tribunal, but only with regard to its compliance with the Constitution. According to Article 79 para 1 of the Constitution, "everyone whose constitutional freedoms or rights have been infringed, shall have the right to appeal to the Constitutional Tribunal for its judgment on the conformity to the Constitution of a statute or another normative act upon which basis a court or organ of public administration has made a final decision on his freedoms or rights or on his obligations specified in the Constitution".

This means that the conditions to lodge a constitutional complaint are:

- one has to obtain a final verdict or a final administrative decision deciding on this person’s constitutional rights or freedoms, the verdict or decision has to be based on a normative act subject to complaint;
- the constitutional complaint shall concern the compliance of that normative act with the Constitution.

In Poland only the water management plans (of those relating to the environment) have to be adopted by way of a normative act: a regulation by the minister in charge of water management. These plans are: river basin management plans, flood risk management plans (as required by Chapter IV of the Directive on the assessment and management of flood risks) and drought management plans. Although these plans may influence the individual administrative decisions, it seems unlikely that a decision could be regarded as "issued on the basis" of a given plan.

Moreover, bearing in mind the nature of the water management plans, it seems rather unlikely that they could be in non-compliance with the Constitution. Therefore the constitutional complaint is not applicable to these plans.

2) What is the scope of the administrative review (if applicable) and the judicial review (if applicable)? Does it cover both procedural and substantive legality?

The review by the Constitutional Tribunal encompasses conformity with the Constitution only.

3) Before filing a court action, is there a requirement of exhaustion of administrative review procedures prior to recourse to judicial review procedures?

Not applicable to the constitutional complaint (see answer to question 2.5.1).

4) In order to have standing before the national courts is it necessary to participate in the public consultation phase of the administrative procedure – to make comments, participate at hearing, etc.?

Not applicable to the constitutional complaint.

5) Is injunctive relief available? If yes what are the procedural requirements in order to be eligible for this? Are there special rules applicable to each sector apart from the general national provisions?

There is no injunctive relief.

6) What are the cost rules to bring a challenge on access to justice in these areas? What are the possible consequences if one loses a case before court?

What are the safeguards against the costs being prohibitive and do these include express statutory reference to a requirement that costs should not be prohibitive?

According to Article 54 of the Act of 30 November 2016 on the organisation and procedure of proceedings before the Constitutional Tribunal, the costs of the proceedings before the Tribunal shall be borne by the State Treasury. In the judgment accepting a constitutional complaint, the Tribunal shall award to the claimant the reimbursement of the costs of proceedings from the body which issued the normative act which is the subject of the constitutional complaint. In justified cases, the Tribunal may also award reimbursement of the costs if it has not accepted the constitutional complaint. The Tribunal may determine the amount of the costs of representation of a constitutional complaint by an advocate or legal adviser, depending on the nature of the case and the contribution of the representative in contributing to its clarification and resolution.

7) Is it possible to bring a legal challenge before a national court concerning any related EU regulatory act with a view to a validity reference under Article 267 TFEU, and if so how?[8]

There is no such procedure.

---

[2] Regulation of the Minister of Justice of 22 October 2015 on advocates’ fees (J.O. of 2015, item 1800 as amended) and Regulation of the Minister of Justice of 22 October 2015 on attorneys’ fees (codified text J.O. of 2018 item 265).

[3] For example complaints against permits for emissions, EIA decisions or other decisions allowing the use of the environment are considered as cases in which no financial value is set. The financial value may be attributed to complaints against decisions imposing environmental fees or fines, but in such cases only the company or other entity obliged to pay the fees or fines has standing (citizens or environmental NGOs have no standing here).

[5] See findings under Commission Notice C/2010/64 for an example of a plan not submitted to SEA but subject to the public participation requirements of Article 7 of the Aarhus Convention.

[6] These fall within the scope of both Article 7 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. See also relevant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union such as Case C-237/07, Janeczek (EU:C:2008:447) and cases such as Buxus and Solvay C-128/09 - C-131/09 and C-182/10 (EU:C:2011:667), as referred to under Commission Notice C/2017/2616 on access to justice in environmental matters.

[7] Such acts come within the scope of Article 8 and Article 9(3) of the Aarhus Convention. An example of such an act concerns the decision of the national administration that featured in Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, EU:C:2017:774.

[8] For an example of such a preliminary reference, see Case C-281/16, Vereniging Hoekschewaards Landschap, EU:C:2017:774.
Silence of administration
In cases where the authority fails to deliver the decision in time or to inform the parties about reasons for the delay (inaction of the authority), parties to the proceedings may file a reminder (ponaglenie) to the administrative authority of the second instance. The reminder is to be lodged via the authority which failed to act (Article 37 APC). If the reminder is ineffective, the party may lodge a complaint with the administrative court (Article 3 § 2 point 8 PACLA). The reminder, and then the court complaints, may also be lodged in cases where the proceedings are too lengthy (przewlekłość postępowania), i.e. when the extension of the deadline by the authority seems to be unjustified. The authority of second instance, and then the administrative court, orders the first instance authority to fix the case (to issue a decision).

Penalties to be imposed on public administration for failing to provide effective access to justice
There is no procedure for imposing such penalties.

Penalties for cases when the administration does not comply with a judgment (quasi contempt of the court)
The possibility to apply such penalties depends on the content and the nature of the judgement. In cases where the court finds inaction by authority or excessively lengthy proceedings, it may impose on the administrative authority a fine of up to ten times the average monthly salary in the previous year. Moreover, the court may grant a sum of money from the authority to the applicant up to half the aforementioned amount (Article 154 PACLA).

In certain cases, the court in its verdict may oblige the authority to issue a decision within a specified period of time, indicating the manner of resolving the case. In this case the competent authority shall notify the court of the decision within seven days of its issuance. If the court is not notified, it may decide to impose on the authority a fine of up to ten times the average monthly salary in the previous year. Moreover, the court may grant a sum of money from the authority to the applicant up to half the aforementioned amount (Article 145a PACLA).

Last update: 12/12/2023
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice in environmental matters - Portugal
To find more national information about access to justice in environmental matters, please click on one of the links below:

1. Access to justice at Member State level
3. Other relevant rules on appeals, remedies and access to justice in environmental matters

Last update: 18/12/2023
The national language version of this page is maintained by the respective Member State. The translations have been done by the European Commission service. Possible changes introduced in the original by the competent national authority may not be yet reflected in the translations. The European Commission accepts no responsibility or liability whatsoever with regard to any information or data contained or referred to in this document. Please refer to the legal notice to see copyright rules for the Member State responsible for this page.

Access to justice at Member State level
1.1. Legal order – sources of environmental law
1) General introduction to the system of protection of environment and procedural rights of persons (natural, legal, NGOs) in the specific national order
Portugal is governed by a civil legal system (as opposed to common law) and the 1976 Constitution of the Republic (CRP) is the main source of law[1]. Together with international and European Union (EU) law, ordinary laws, which include laws enacted by Parliament (Laws of the Assembly of the Republic), decree-laws (DL) issued by the Government and regional legislative decrees adopted by the Legislative Assemblies of the Autonomous Regions of the Azores and Madeira, constitute the main sources of statutory law.
These sources are complemented by regulations, or legal instruments with a lower legal status than laws, whose purpose is to supplement the laws, decrees and regional legislative decrees and fill out the details in order to allow their effective implementation and enforcement. These include regulatory decrees, regulations, decrees, regional regulatory decrees, decisions, rules, ministerial orders, executive rulings and police regulations[2]. Another source of law are the acts approving international conventions, multilateral or bilateral treaties or agreements with an effect equivalent to that of laws.
There is no environmental code in Portugal. In 1987 the Environmental Framework Law was approved - Law no. 11/87 of 7 of April -, which guarantees that all citizens have the right to a human and ecologically balanced environment[3]. It was revoked in 2014 by Law no. 19/2014 of 14 April. The new Environmental Framework Law ensures the right to the environment and quality of life[4], which is supported by the provisions of the CRP[5] under Articles 9 (on fundamental tasks of the state) and 66 (on environment and quality of life). The Environmental Framework Law states that the right to the environment comprises the following rights: defend against any aggression to the constitutional and international protected sphere of every citizen; and power to demand from the public entities the fulfilment of the environmental rights and obligations to which those entities are legally and internationally bound.
According to the State Liability Regime (noncontractual civil liability of the State and of public legal persons) approved by Law no. 67/2007 of 31 December 2007, as last amended by Law no. 31/2008 of 17 July 2008[6], the State is liable for damages caused by legislative, administrative or judicial bodies with or without fault[7], which, as pointed out by Prof. Aragão, is “objective liability in case of especially dangerous activities”. Law no. 67/2007 safeguards the special regimes of civil liability for damages arising from the administrative function (Article 2), such as the legal regime on environmental liability for environmental damage[8], approved by Decree-Law no. 147/2008 of 29 July 2008 (see question 1.8.3 below).
Environmental associations have been regulated since 1987 by Law no. 10/87 of 4 April, which provides the legal framework for their intervention and support. This Law has been revoked by Law no. 35/98[9], as amended by Law no. 82-D/2014, which currently defines the legal regime of environmental non-government organisations (ENGOs).
Court judgments and academic opinions are not a formal source of law but are used as a source of interpretation and for that purpose only. Case-law, i.e. the set of principles emerging from judgments and decisions handed down by the courts, has significance in revealing the meaning of legal provisions by providing solutions to problems of interpretation that may be followed in other instances according to the logical and technical arguments on which they are based.

2) Constitution – main (content of + including references) provisions on environment and access to justice in the national constitution (if applicable) including procedural rights
The core tasks of the State defined in Article 9 of the CRP[10] include: giving effect to the environment rights (indent d), defending nature and the environment, and safeguarding natural resources and ensuring proper land-use planning (indent e)].
The environment and quality of life are enshrined as both a civic right and a civic duty[11] in Article 66 under the chapter on economic, social and cultural rights and duties[12]. Article 52 of the CRP ensures the constitutional right to popular action (actio popularis)[13]; the right of people to take action in the cases and under the terms laid down in the law, including the right to apply for corresponding compensation due to injured party, is conferred on everyone, personally or through associations acting in protection of the interests concerned, in particular: (a) to promote the prevention, cessation or prosecution of infringements of public health, consumer rights, quality of life and the preservation of the environment and cultural heritage; (b) to ensure the protection of the assets of the State, autonomous regions and local authorities.

3) Acts, Codes, Decrees, etc. - main provisions on environment and access to justice, national codes, acts

Portugal provides a robust legal framework that grants legal standing to individuals and ENGOs if they wish to pursue court action against infringements by public authorities[14]. However, such framework “is not so robust regarding timelines or costs”, as pointed out by Prof. Aragão.

List of relevant legislation providing legal standing to individuals

Law no. 83/95 of 31 August 1995 approving the Popular Action Law (APL), as last amended by Decree-Law no. 214-G/2015 of 2 October[15], is the only Law that supports a robust legal framework that grants legal standing to individuals. It is anchored in Article 52 of the CRP[16] on public participation and actio popularis – APL states in Article 2 that any citizen and civil organisations that defend environmental interests (i.e. organisations that have in their statutes the defence of environmental interests according to Article 3, b)) have procedural rights of popular action, regardless of having or not having direct interest in the claim[17]. According to Article 12, popular action can take the form of an administrative action, in which case the rules of the Code of Procedure on the Administrative Courts (see next paragraphs of this question below) apply, or the form of a civil action, in which case the rules of the Code of Civil Procedure (Código de Processo Civil – CPC)[18] apply. According to Article 20, the right of popular action does not imply paying procedural costs in advance, and if the action is partially upheld the plaintiff is exempted from payment of full procedural costs. If the action is not fully upheld, the plaintiff shall pay only up to half of the procedural costs[19]. Procedural costs are costs that must be paid in order to bring any kind of process to the court, covering the judicial fee, the charges and the parties’ costs (see question 1.7.3, 1 below).

Law no. 19/2014 of 14 April[20] approving the Environmental Framework Law ensures in Article 7 environmental procedural rights, granting the right to full and effective review of the legally protected environmental rights and interests, which include in particular: the right to action in defence of subjective rights and legally protected interests and the right to popular action (Actio popularis); the right to promote the prevention, cessation and reparation of violations of environmental assets and values in the fastest possible way; and the right to request immediate cessation of activities causing threat or damage to the environment, to return to the situation prior to such threat or damage and to the payment of compensation. For instance, the following legal acts provide legally protected environmental rights and interests:

Law no. 50/2006 of 29 August 2006, as last amended by Law no. 25/2019 of 26 March 2019, approves the Environmental Administrative Offence Law[21] (Law 50/2006). Although not a distinctive feature of environmental offences, it is important to highlight, regarding access to justice, the rule of the time limit of prescription (meaning the statute of limitations) of environmental offences: after a certain time lapse, the right to punish is extinct, which is the general rule for every administrative offence (Article 40 of Law 50/2006 combined with Article 27 of the General Regime of Administrative Offences[22]). In fact, according to Professor Alexandra Aragão “the existence of a time limit for sanctioning shows that the system is not so “robust””. In Law 50/2006, the statute of limitations is 5 years for very serious and serious environmental offences and 3 years for light environmental offences. The criteria of classification of administrative offences in light, serious and very serious offences determine the applicable fine and take into account the relevance of the rights and interests infringed (Article 21). For each type of offence, the fines are graduated taking into account whether the offender is a legal or natural person and according to the degree of guilt. For instance: failure to comply with lawful written orders of the administrative authority is a light offence; building landfills in violation of city land-use planning is a serious offence; installation of waste facilities in violation of city land-use planning is a very serious offence.

Penal Code (Código Penal – CP)[23] provides for criminal responsibility of legal persons with regard to the environmental crimes of forest fire (Article 274), damage to nature (Article 278), pollution (Article 279), activities dangerous to environment (Article 279-A), pollution with common danger (Article 280) and aggravation by result (Article 285), Articles 278, 279, 279-A and 280 of CP (designated as eco-crimes) set as unlawful certain conducts when committed in violation of legal or regulatory provisions or of obligations imposed by the competent authority in compliance with those provisions.[24]

The Code of Procedure on the Administrative Courts (Código de Processo nos Tribunais Administrativos – CPTA), approved by Decree-Law no. 214-G/2015[25] of 2 October, as last amended by Law no. 118/2019 of 17 September 2019, provides in Article 9 par. 2[26] standing to any person and to civil organisations that defend environmental interests, the local authorities and the Public Prosecutor (which is the constitutional body responsible for bringing criminal prosecutions and representing the State, among other responsibilities set out in Article 219 par. 1 of the CRP)[27], regardless of having or not having personal interest in the claim. These persons and bodies have legal standing to propose and to intervene in the main process and in provisional procedures that are aimed at defending the constitutionally protected values and assets as well as to promote the execution of the court decisions. The environment is included in the list of such assets, as are public health, urban law, territorial planning, quality of life, cultural heritage and public assets. It is worth highlighting that these interests can be invoked in support of environmental claims when health risks are at stake or when environmental damage is caused by breaches to laws on urban development.

The exercise of the right of citizens to be informed by the Public Administration on the progress of processes where they have direct interest and to know the final decisions of such processes[28] is governed by the Administrative Procedures Code (Código de Procedimento Administrativo – CPA), approved by Decree-Law no. 4/2015 of 7 January[29]. CPA establishes the legal regime of access to administrative complaints procedures. Article 65 states that natural and private legal persons have legal standing in the administrative proceedings for the protection of diffuse interests (which include the environment). Article 68 states that citizens, civil organisations that defend environmental rights and local authorities have legal standing for protection of diffuse interests regarding acts or omissions of the Public Administration that cause relevant damage in fundamental assets such as the environment and other interests including: public health, housing, education, urban law, territorial planning, quality of life, cultural heritage, public assets and consumption of goods and services[30].

Law no. 35/98 of 18 July 1998, as amended by Law no. 82-D/2014 of 31 December 2014[31], defines the statute of environmental non-government organisations (ENGOs) (Estatuto das organizações não governamentais de ambiente), providing rules regarding legal standing of ENGOs. Under this Law, ENGOs have the right to access administrative information related to the environment (Article 5 of Law 35/98). Order no. 478/99 of 29 June[32] approves the Regulation of National ENGO Registration (Regulamento do Registo Nacional das Organizações não Governamentais de Ambiente (ONGA) e Equiparadas).

4) Examples of national case-law, role of the Supreme Court in environmental cases
The Supreme Administrative Court (Supremo Tribunal Administrativo – STA – see question 1.2, 1) below) judges appeals of judgments from the central administrative courts, conflicts of jurisdiction between administrative tribunals and appeals to standardise case-law. There is direct access to the STA in administrative matters relating to actions or omissions of the President, the Assembly of the Republic and its President, the Council of Ministers and the Prime Minister, among others. There is also direct access to the STA in cases of requests for adoption of interim measures relating to processes within its competence, requests regarding implementation of its decisions, as well as applications for early production of evidence, formulated in pending proceedings [33].

Regardless of the broad standing and special conditions of access to justice, the number of environmental proceedings is relatively limited[34]. The following tables include examples of case-law from the STA and from the Supreme Court of Justice (Supremo Tribunal de Justiça - STJ/[35]) on environmental issues, namely ten case-law judgments from STA and eight case-law judgments from STJ.

Case-law from STA

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Reference number and date</th>
<th>Environmental/procedural issues addressed</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>STA 01362/12[36] 28 January 2016</td>
<td>Litigious appeal, environmental protection, articles 2, 3, 7 and 10 of APL, article 66 of the CRP, actio popularis (popular action), legal standing of ENGOs, expert proof</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 0848/08[37] 7 January 2009</td>
<td>Summons to provide information, environmental protection, community law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA no. 01456/03[38] 5 April 2005</td>
<td>Wind farm, environmental protection law, environmental impact assessment, environmental impact declaration, protected area</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA no. 045296[39] 17 June 2004</td>
<td>Environmental law, National Ecological Reserve, environmental impact assessment</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 030275[40] 18 April 2002</td>
<td>Environmental law, legal presumption, waste management and treatment</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 047807[41] 1 August 2001</td>
<td>Requirements for suspension of the effects of administrative acts, damage difficult to repair, serious damage of public interest, environmental law, burden of proof, incineration and co-incineration of hazardous waste</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 46273A[42] 6 July 2000</td>
<td>Serious damage of public interest, environmental law, environmental protection</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 000347[43] 6 April 2000</td>
<td>Environmental protection, actio popularis (popular action), jurisdiction of administrative courts</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STA 044553[44] 16 June 1999</td>
<td>Legal standing, diffuse interests and environmental law</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Case-law from STJ

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Reference number and date</th>
<th>Environmental/procedural issues addressed</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>STJ 1853/11.2TBVFR.P2.S[47] 5 April 2018</td>
<td>Emission of fumes, car paint shop, significant harm, right to environment and quality of life</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 1491/06.1TBLSB.P2.S[48] 3 December 2015</td>
<td>Environment, personality rights, highway, right to quality of life, compensation, judicial presumption</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 990/10.5T20BR.C3-A-S1[49] 9 July 2015</td>
<td>Opposition of judgments, administrative offence, environment, fine</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 11109.7TBMRA.E1.S[50] 8 September 2011</td>
<td>Extra contractual liability, personality rights, environment, property right, administrative act, material jurisdiction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 07A134[51] 29 May 2007</td>
<td>Extra contractual liability, right to quality of life, local authority, environment, natural reconstitution, obligation to compensate, causal link, prescription</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 05B368[52] 26 January 2006</td>
<td>Landfill, administrative act, environment, pollution, generic risk, community directive</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STJ 98B109[53] 14 April 1999</td>
<td>Environment, diffuse interests, actio popularis (popular action), provisional procedures</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

5) Can the parties to the administrative procedure directly rely on international environmental agreements, or can only the national and EU transposing legislation be referred to?

The CRP establishes in its Article 8 that the rules and principles of general or common international law shall form an integral part of Portuguese law. In addition, the following also apply in national law: international conventions that have been duly ratified or approved, following their publication in the official journal[54], so long as they remain internationally binding with respect to the Portuguese State; rules made by the competent organs of international organisations to which Portugal belongs to the extent that their respective constitutive treaties provide; the provisions of the treaties that govern the EU and the rules issued by its institutions in the exercise of their respective responsibilities in accordance with EU law and with respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic State based on the rule of law. In conclusion, the parties to the administrative procedure can directly rely on international environmental agreements.

1.2. Jurisdiction of the courts

1) Number of levels in the court system

The following categories of court exist in the Portuguese judicial system: the judicial courts include the first instance judicial courts (as a rule, the district courts), the "second instance judicial courts (as a rule, the courts of appeal) and the STJ; the Constitutional Court (Tribunal Constitucional - TC) "assesses the constitutionality or legality of law and rules, as well as the constitutionality of a failure to legislate" and decides on the constitutionality of decisions from the judicial courts when there is a constitutional appeal of such decisions[55] (see this question 1.2, 1) below).
In accordance with the Statute of Administrative and Fiscal Courts (Estatuto dos Tribunais Administrativos e Fiscais - ETAF)[66] the administrative courts are the sovereign judicial bodies competent to deal with conflicts emerging from administrative legal relations (Article 212 of the CRP and Articles 1(1), 11(1) and (2) and 12(2) of ETAF)[67] and are organised in Circle Courts (Tribunais de Círculo) and Central Courts, from which appeals are possible to the Supreme Administrative Court (STA), which is the superior body of the hierarchy of the administrative and fiscal courts without prejudice to the competence of the TC.

There are two second instance Administrative Courts: one for the North and another for the South. There are also administrative and tax courts (three levels)[58], the Court of Auditors and the justices of the peace.

The judicial Courts are divided into civil, criminal and social chambers and are organised in three instances:

(i) Courts of first instance (Tribunais de Comarca), which can judge civil cases concerning amounts up to EUR 5,000 (no limitation is established for criminal matters);
(ii) Courts of second instance (Tribunais da Relação - Courts of Appeal), which can judge civil cases concerning amounts up to EUR 30,000 (no limitation is established for criminal matters); and
(iii) The STJ (Supreme Court of Justice / Supremo Tribunal de Justiça -STJ). The STJ has civil, criminal and social divisions. The STJ, except in the case of legally enshrined exceptions, only deals with matters of law. This means that the facts of the case are definitely decided by the lower courts and there is no possibility of appeal except in very limited cases, as pointed out by Prof. Aragão.

The rules on material and territorial jurisdiction are established by the Law of Organisation and Functioning of Judicial Courts (LOFTJ)[59]. In brief, the courts have territorial competence and there are specialised courts; some appeals depend on the economic value of the case, which is a common feature of the judicial system and not distinctive in relation to access to justice in environmental matters[60].

The decisions from the first instance courts may be brought to the second instance courts, which are the Courts of Appeal with jurisdiction in the Portuguese territory, and secondly to the Supreme Courts of Justice. The system of the Courts of Appeal includes the following:

The Civil Courts of Appeal (Tribunais da Relação), which have territorial jurisdiction under five judicial districts (Article 19 of LOFTJ): Lisboa Court of Appeal, Porto Court of Appeal, Coimbra Court of Appeal, Évora Court of Appeal and Guimarães Court of Appeal. An appeal shall be brought before the Court of Appeal of the district where the first instance courts belong.

The two Administrative Courts South and North (Tribunais Centrais Administrativos Sul e Norte - Lisboa and Porto)[61];

The two Administrative and Tax Sections of the Supreme Administrative Court (STF and STA)[62]; and

The last instance of appeal Constitutional Court (TC), which decides on questions regarding constitutionality of law which have been raised before the common courts.

There are three levels in the administrative jurisdiction: sixteen first instance (circle) administrative courts; two central administrative courts; one STA. Their competences are set out in ETAF. The first instance administrative courts have general competence for all the processes within the administrative jurisdiction. The central administrative courts judge appeals from decisions of first instance administrative courts and appeals of decisions rendered by arbitral tribunal on administrative matters. The STA judges appeals of judgments from the central administrative courts, conflicts of jurisdiction between administrative tribunals and appeals to standardise jurisprudence. See information on direct access to the STA in question 1.1, 1 above. For more information on how the courts work and their competences, see the data available in the e-Justice Portal for Portugal.

2) Rules of competence and jurisdiction – how is it determined if there is jurisdiction of the court, cases of conflict between different national tribunals (in different Member States)?

Rules of jurisdiction are provided in Articles 59, 62, 63 and 94 of the CPC. Portuguese courts have international jurisdiction in two cases:

(1) When the following elements of connection occur:

(i) when the action may be brought in a Portuguese court under the rules of jurisdiction laid down in Portuguese law;
(ii) when the fact that serves as cause of action, or some of the facts belonging to it, derive from Portuguese territory;
(iii) when the claimed right cannot become effective except through action filed in Portuguese territory or when the claimant has considerable difficulty in filing the action abroad, subject to the existence of a personal or real connecting factor between the object of the dispute and the Portuguese legal system.
(iv) in the area of real property and rental property located in Portuguese territory; however, in relation to property lease agreements concluded for temporary private use for a maximum period of six consecutive months, courts of the EU Member State in which the defendant is domiciled are equally competent, provided that the tenant is a natural person and the owner and the tenant are domiciled in the same Member State;
(v) as regards the validity of the constitution or the dissolution of companies or other legal persons having their headquarters in Portugal, as well as concerning the validity of decisions of their organs; to determine that seat, the Portuguese court shall apply its rules of private international law;
(vi) as regards the validity of entries in public records held in Portugal;
(vii) in respect of executions on real estate located in Portuguese territory;
(viii) insolvency or revitalisation of persons resident in Portugal or legal persons or companies whose headquarters are located in Portuguese territory.

(2) Or when the parties have agreed that Portuguese courts have jurisdiction to resolve a particular dispute or disputes which may arise from a particular legal relationship in accordance with the rules of Article 94 of the CPC[63].

In short, under the above conditions, and sometimes with certain restrictions, the grounds for accepting jurisdiction can be:

domicile;
place of business, residence or office;
assets located within jurisdiction;
an act complained of within jurisdiction;
contract governed by local law;
conventions;
clause attributing jurisdiction;
others: place of proceedings of bankruptcy of a company, incorporation of associations, public registries, immovable goods, civil liability, procedural incidents, subsidiary international competence of Portuguese courts; counterclaim and third-party proceedings.

Conflicts of jurisdiction are governed by Articles 109 to 114 of the CPC. There is a conflict of jurisdiction when two or more authorities belonging to different activities of the State, or two or more courts integrated in different jurisdictional orders, claim (positive conflict) or decline (negative conflict) the right to decide on the same matter. This only happens when the decisions of such courts on jurisdiction are not subject to appeal.
The appeal courts hear conflicts of jurisdiction between courts of first instance, complaints against orders handed down in the first instance, and the review of foreign court judgments in civil and commercial matters. The STJ (see question 1.2.1 above) hears cases involving conflicts of jurisdiction between courts of appeal and extraordinary appeals for the unification of case-law[64]. The matrix of the regime of the dispute resolution process regulated by Articles 109 to 114 of the CPC includes two access routes to the Court of Conflicts: the appeal of the decisions of the Courts of Appeal of both the judicial and administrative jurisdictions in cases of pre-conflict, and the request for resolution in the event of an effective conflict. Additionally, there is a new Law 91/2019 of 4 September regulating jurisdiction conflicts between judicial courts and administrative and tax courts, and regulating the competence, functioning and process of the Court of Conflicts. This new Law creates a third access route (Articles 15 to 17), allowing any court to address consultations to the Court of Conflicts on matters of jurisdiction which are intended to avoid as much as possible the proceedings concerning discussions on the competent jurisdiction. These consultations are subject to an immediate binding pronunciation by the Court of Conflicts.

For detailed information on jurisdiction of civil courts, including details on territorial jurisdiction, see Jurisdiction - Portugal.

3) Specialties as regards court rules in the environmental sector (special environmental tribunals), laymen contributing, expert judges

In Portugal, there are no specialities regarding court rules in the environmental sector. There are no environmental expert judges, but some judges of the administrative courts have some experience in environmental issues. Judges are given the opportunity by the State to build capacity on environmental issues [65]. Although there are no specialised courts, there are special rules regarding the protection of so-called “diffuse interests” (which comprise the environment as well as public health, urban law, territorial planning, quality of life, cultural heritage and public assets). As pointed out by Prof. Aragão, “the main differences are: broader standing rules, lower court fees, possibility of evidence collection ordered by the judge, possibility to suspend the execution of the administrative act, stronger powers of the Public Prosecutors”.

4) Level of control of judges in case of administrative appeals, concept of own motion, what are its limits? Rules on court action on its own motion.

In an actio popularis judgment, the powers of the judge are quite far reaching, namely in collecting evidence and in suspending the effects of the refuted act. Firstly, the judge is not bound by the evidence presented by the parties but can collect further evidence on their own initiative (Article 17 of APL). Secondly, even when the law does not grant suspensive effects to the appeal, the judge himself can do so, suspending the act or the decision under judgment (Article 18 of APL).

Also anchored in APL are the discretionary powers of the judge to arbitrate the amount of court fees to be paid by the authors of a popular action in the event that they lose the case, between 1/10 and 1/50 of the normal legal costs to be paid in similar cases (Article 20 par. 3 of APL).

In administrative appeals and application for judicial review, the judges have large discretion since there are no clear criteria defined in the legislation or case-law. The judge has to balance the public and private conflicting interests. There is a general requirement in the general system for administrative and judicial procedure that court procedures should be timely. There is no specific environmental requirement that the administrative/judicial procedures should be effective. As stated in question 1.7.1.4 below, there is a general requirement in Article 20 of the CRP regarding “access to law and effective judicial protection”[66]. There are no specific safeguards to ensure that frivolous applications are not considered[67].

Within the powers of the administrative courts set out in Article 3 of the CPTA, in order to ensure the effectiveness of the judicial protection (see question 1.7.1.3), the administrative court may, on its own motion (ex officio), set a time limit for the Public Administration to comply with the obligations established by the court, including, when necessary, imposing periodic penalty payments upon the Administration (Article 3 par. 2 of the CPTA).

1.3. Organisation of justice at administrative and judicial level

1) System of the administrative procedure (ministries and/or specific state authorities)

The Public Administration acts in the public interest with respect to citizens’ legally protected rights and interests pursuant to Article 266 of the CRP. The Public Administration is decentralised (Article 6 of the CRP) and the highest hierarchical body is the Government (Article 182 of the CRP). The Direct Administration includes the Ministers with competence in the different fields of the administration (Articles 2 and 4 of Law no. 4/2004 of 15 January establishing the principles and rules of the Direct Administration of the State[68]). The indirect administration includes the services and public institutes (Articles 1 and 2 of Law no. 3/2004 of 15 January establishing the legal framework of public institutes[69]), which are under the supervision of the Government through the relevant Ministry.

The Portuguese administration has the following structure: direct, indirect and autonomous administration. Direct administration bodies act as subordinate arms of central government. Depending on the geographical scope of intervention of direct administration bodies, these can either be considered central or peripheral (e.g. while a Directorate General is a central direct administration body – a subordinate government body within Portuguese borders – a Regional Directorate is a peripheral direct administration body – a subordinate central government body with geographical limitations to its intervention). Indirect administration bodies are identified by the fact that they have autonomous legal personality in relation to the Portuguese state, such as the Institute for Nature Conservation and Forests (Instituto da Conservação da Natureza e das Florestas - ICNF). In brief, they enjoy a moderate degree of independence: the government has oversight and tutelage over an indirect administration body, but not complete directorship. Autonomous administration is composed of municipalities and autonomous regions (Azores and Madeira archipelagos). In conclusion, Portugal has five administrative tiers[70].

The Ministry for Environment and Energy Transition (Ministério do Ambiente e Transição Energética – MATE) is presently the government body in charge of carrying out and enforcing environmental policies towards sustainable development in accordance with Article 26 par. 1 of Decree-Law no. 251-A/2015 of 17 December, which approves the organisation and functioning of the XXI Constitutional Government of Portugal[71]. It comprises the services, bodies and entities identified under its organic law, which has not yet been approved. MATE performs its tasks, namely through services integrated in the direct and indirect administration of the State supervising several departments, cabinets and institutes, including the Portuguese Environment Agency (Agência Portuguesa do Ambiente – APA), which is one of the main environment regulatory authorities, besides the Water and Waste Regulatory Authority (Entidade Reguladora dos Serviços de Águas e Resíduos – ERSAR), the General Inspection of Environment, Spatial Planning, Agriculture and Sea (Inspeção-Geral da Agricultura, do Mar, do Ambiente e do Ordenamento do Território – IGAMAOT), the ICNF and the Regional Spatial Planning Commissions (Comissões de Coordenação e Desenvolvimento Regional – CCDDR)[72].

For more detailed information, see “System for decision making” of Prof. Aragão[73].

2) How can one appeal an administrative environmental decision before court? When can one expect the final ruling?

The administrative courts have jurisdiction in disputes relating to prevention, cessation and reparation of violations to constitutionally protected assets in matters related to the environment when committed by public entities (or private entities acting for the public interest and on behalf of the state, namely companies providing essential services), except if concerning criminal offences. For such offences, only the judicial courts have jurisdiction (Article 4 par. 1 and 3 of EATAF). The administrative courts also have jurisdiction to protect rights granted by ordinary laws and legitimate interests of citizens.

The time period to challenge an administrative act is one year for the Public Prosecutor and three months for every other party, starting from the notification, publication or knowledge about the act or its implementation.
The administrative appeal must be submitted to the administrative court that is geographically competent (Articles 16 to 22 of the CPC). In practice, the final ruling of the court can be expected within several months, since there are no mandatory deadlines set in the law for the total length of the court procedures. However, the judge is required to make sure that the court proceedings progress quickly and without unnecessary delays, and has the power to dismiss any request or act of the party that is considered purely dilatory (Article 7-A of the CPC).

The administrative and tax courts are in charge of settling disputes arising out of administrative and tax relations (see question 1.2, 1) above). They include the STA, the central administrative courts, the Circle administrative courts and the tax courts. If there is an appeal, the final decision is taken by the STA, or the TC (see question 1.2, 1) above) in the event of an appeal of the decision of the STA to the TC.

Rules on claim preclusion (res judicata) state that the time limits that must be complied with by the Administration to execute a judicial decision from administrative courts begin to count when the decision cannot be appealed to a higher court (Article 160 of the CPTA); a judicial decision is considered to be res judicata when it is not susceptible of ordinary appeal or reclamation (Article 628 of the CPC).

3) Existence of special environmental courts, main role, competence

There are no special environmental courts in Portugal. All judicial courts may decide on environmental matters. For extensive information on the jurisdiction of specialised courts in Portugal, as opposed to general competence courts (i.e. the judicial courts), see Jurisdiction - Portugal.

4) Appeal against environmental administrative decisions delivered by competent authorities and appeal against Court orders and decisions (levels)

When the body taking the decision is not at the top of the administrative hierarchy, administrative appeal is always admitted, but if, considering the nature of the act, it is possible to go to court, the administrative appeal is merely voluntary. The administrative appeal does not suspend the efficacy, i.e. does not prevent the application of the contested decision. The decisions of the bodies directly dependent on the central government can be challenged through administrative appeal to the Ministry for Environment and Energy Transition (Ministro do Ambiente e Transição Energética). That is the case of decisions taken by APA and by the various General Directorate of the different sectors of the Ministry. There are independent institutions of appeal: the Commission for Access to Administrative Documents (CADA) and the Ombudsman. Each has the power to issue opinions which are not legally binding but have an important de facto power, since they are usually followed.

As summarised by Prof. Aragão, “all courts can hear environmental cases: the constitutional court, because the subjective right to a healthy and balanced environment is a fundamental right laid down in the constitution; criminal courts, because the criminal code has recently been changed to transpose the directives on environmental crimes and it is quite frequent to have very severe violations of environmental norms which amount to environmental crimes; general courts, because civil claims for damages are to be raised before general courts; the administrative courts, either because the environmental harm is caused by a direct action or omission of the State, or because, at the end of the day, most violations of environmental rights have an administrative norm or a licensing act behind them.”

Prof. Aragão also clarifies that “very often Court decisions are not substantive judgments on the merits of the case but rather formal decisions on the non-admissibility of the trial based on merely formal arguments” which are due to “the obsession with formal requirements” contributing along with other barriers to “low litigation rates in Portugal.”

Broadly, both individuals and ENGOs can contest, for instance, an administrative decision which might have an impact on the environment in an administrative court by invoking popular action and relying on legal aid to afford the lawyer, if needed. However, in practice some obstacles might arise later in the process, such as the Portuguese judges focusing too much on formalities and, as such, dismissing cases on procedural grounds rather than having their underlying arguments assessed, particularly in cases where environmental issues are at stake. The cause of these ruling trends “may lie in judges being unfamiliar with environmental issues.” In Portugal “the courts are said to limit their review to formal requirements, despite clear requirements in the law for a fuller scope of trial.”

The administrative complaint does not suspend the time limit for challenging the act in the administrative courts, except if such appeals are mandatory. The optional administrative complaint and administrative appeal against administrative acts suspend the time limit for bringing actions to the administrative courts. However, such suspension does not prevent the interested party from bringing actions to the administrative courts when the administrative appeal is already in course (Article 190 of the CPA).

The difference between administrative complaint and administrative appeal is that the former is brought before the administrative body instance and the latter before the administrative court.

Please see information on levels of the administrative court system (i.e. when administrative procedures are underway) above in point 1) of question 1.2. Decisions of the first instance judicial courts can be appealed to the second instance judicial courts (the courts of appeal), to the STJ or to the TC (see question 1.2, 1) above) if there is an issue regarding constitutionality of decisions of the judicial courts.

There are no special rules that apply to appeals in the environmental area.

In both civil and administrative actions, there is a possibility of extraordinary appeal to the STJ or to the STA when there is a contradiction between two different court decisions (Article 627 of the CPC and Article 152 of the CPTA).

In addition, there is the extraordinary revision appeal (Article 627 par. 2 and Article 696 of the CPC), which is an appeal where there is revision of a court decision that has already passed the deadline for ordinary appeal. There are eight conditions for a final decision to be revised. For example: when the decision under revision is based on false documents or false judicial acts, false deposition or false expert declarations; for presenting new documentary evidence that the party did not know about before or could not use before, assuming such new documentary evidence can by itself change the final decision in a more favourable way for the losing party; when it can give rise to the civil liability of the State for damages based on the exercise of the judicial function (Article 696 sub pars b, c) and h) of the CPC). Ipsi verbi for the criminal actions as established under Article 449 of the Code of Criminal Procedure - Código de Processo Penal – CPP.[83]

With regard to the interpretation or validity of EU law, the Public Prosecutor or the defendant can request a preliminary ruling before the court where a certain case is at trial aiming at interpreting EU law by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU).[84] However, this is not an appeal to be brought before the national court, merely a request that the parties may ask the court.[85]

The request for a preliminary ruling before the CJEU is voluntary for first instance courts where an interpretation question is at stake. It is mandatory for:

i) courts whose decisions cannot be appealed against if one of the parties requests it (including the defendant in a criminal procedure);
ii) where a question of invalidity of a European act is at stake;
iii) where questions on validity and interpretation of framework decisions are at stake and of decisions on interpretation of conventions established under areas of police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters and on validity and interpretation of its implementing measures.[87]

The Judicial Training Centre (Centro de Estudos Judiciários) makes available a practical guide on preliminary rulings with extensive information on national practices concerning this mechanism.[88] The request for preliminary ruling is mandatory for the high courts, namely the STJ and the STA (see question 1.2, 1) above) when the interpretation of EU law is required to decide a question brought before the national courts. There is not a pre-defined way to... formulate the question referred for a preliminary ruling. The structure of the question should be identical to a procedural issue. In order to comply with the timing of referral and the staying of national proceedings, whether the preliminary ruling is optional or mandatory, the judge should send the question to the CJEU in the phase of the national process when the facts are already set down, that is when the court already knows which facts will be the basis for the judicial decision. The procedure to send the request for preliminary ruling is that the judge should stay the proceedings and issue an order of preliminary ruling. This order should contain a summary of the case and the questions that the CJEU is requested to analyse.

6) Are there out of court solutions in the environmental area as regards solving conflicts (mediation, etc.)?

There are no special rules for the environmental area. The alternative means of solving conflicts, outside courts, are mediation, arbitration and actio popularis. There is a government online platform (Portal do Cidadão – Citizen Portal) for filing environmental claims. There are no special rules for the environmental area. The alternative means of solving conflicts in the environmental area are mediation and arbitration.

There is a government online platform (Portal do Cidadão – Citizen Portal) for filing environmental claims. There are no special rules for the environmental area. The alternative means of solving conflicts in the environmental area are mediation and arbitration.

Private mediation can be used in any field, including the environment. The use of mediation is admissible in various areas, but there are no specific measures adopted in Portugal to promote the use of mediation in environmental issues.

Arbitration is only for rights of a patrimonial nature.

7) How can other actors help (ombudsman (if applicable), public prosecutor), accessible link to the sites?

In Portugal there have been dedicated environmental units in the Public Prosecution services since 8 January 2020 when the ‘Central Department of State Electricity, Collective and Dispute Interests’ was created in the General Prosecutor of the Republic (Departamento Central de Contencioso do Estado e Interesses Coletivos e Difusos) of the Procuradoria-Geral da Republica - PGR, which is a coordinating body that represents the State before the Courts, is competent for civil, administrative and fiscal matters, is governed by the EMP (see question 1.1, 3) above and replaces the former Cabinet for Diffuse Interests (Gabinete de Interesses Difusos).

Also, measures have been in place since 2015 to ensure that there is adequate capacity in the prosecution services to address environmental issues in the form of several protocols that have been established between the prosecution services and environmental authorities.

The Portuguese Ombudsman has competences for the protection of fundamental rights, such as the right to a safe and balanced environment (Law no. 9/91 of 9 of April 1991, as last amended by Law no. 17/2013 of 18 February 2013). Its Statute is available in English (CRP and law of the ombudsman) as well as its website. The Website of the Public Prosecutor is also available in English.

1.4. How can one bring a case to court?

1) Who can challenge an environmental administrative decision (relevance of the concept of concerned public and NGOs)?

Portugal allows both individuals and environmental associations to bring legal actions on environmental matters, namely under Article 7 of the Law on Access to Justice (Law no. 34/2004 of 29 July, as amended by Law no. 47/2007 of 28 August). Law no. 34/2004 covers information related to both the right to access to justice and potential protection from prohibitive costs (be it as an individual or association). ENGOs have legal standing to promote the use of mediation in environmental issues.

The law grants legal standing to NGOs for intervening in judicial and administrative procedures, regardless of any direct interest in the case. There are no additional legal requirements for recognising legal standing of NGOs, such as time of constitution, effective activity or number of associates. NGOs may intervene in administrative proceedings (Article 68 par. 2 of the CPA) and in judicial proceedings (Article 31 of the CPC) provided that they have an environmental scope in their statutory regulations.

Legal standing is granted on the grounds of their qualification as an environmental NGO; they do not need to claim ‘sufficient interest’ or any ‘rights capable of being impaired’. In addition, NGOs also have the right of actio popularis, which is a constitutional right regulated by the Popular Action Law (Law no. 63/95), as stated above. The courts consistently interpret the concept of interest in a broad manner, and environmental NGOs have legal standing irrespective of whether or not they have an interest in the case. Although any citizen or civil organisations that defend environmental interests can challenge environmental decisions through actio popularis, where citizens or NGOs have had some interest in a case, the courts have refused to accept the case as an actio popularis case, which means, for instance, that the applicant must pay the court fees in full, as stressed by Prof. Aragão (further information on court fees can be found in question 1.2, 4) above.

2) Are there different rules applicable in sectoral legislation (nature conservation, water management, waste, EIA, IPPC/EED, etc.)?

No. There are no different or special rules applicable in sectoral legislation, since the general rules stated above apply to all sectoral legislation.

3) Standing rules applicable for NGOs and individuals (in administrative procedure and at judicial level, for organisations with legal personality, ad hoc groups of representatives of the public, standing for foreign NGOs, etc.)

The claimant has legal standing when they have a direct interest in the claim, meaning the utility derived from winning the action (Article 30 of the CPC). Insofar as concerns the protection of diffuse interests, namely the environment, any citizen has legal standing to promote and intervene in injunction proceedings, as well as associations and foundations that defend such interests (namely ENGOs, local authorities and the Public Prosecutor (Article 31 of the CPC).

As such, any person who claims to be a party in the material relationship at stake has standing to sue (Article 9 par. 1 of the CPTA), but also anyone who claims to hold a direct and personal interest, in particular those who have been harmed in their rights or legally protected interests by the challenged act (omission) has standing, as well as any public or private person in respect of their statutory rights and interests (Articles 55 and 68 of the CPTA).

Environmental harm can be caused by (illegal) activities/omissions. In administrative courts, as well as in civil courts, actio popularis extends the standing to any person, association or foundation for protection of the interests at stake, and local authorities and Prosecutors are also entitled to start lawsuits, regardless of personal interest in the demand. In criminal process, the author of an actio popularis can also participate as assistant, in spite of not being the victim of the environmental crime (Article 109 par. 1 of the CPTA).

Legal standing in environmental issues may always be granted to either individuals or ENGOs pursuant to Article 52 of the CRP, which, as mentioned above in question 1.1, 2), ensures the constitutional right to popular action.

The following aspects should be highlighted:

In particular, the exercise of the right of access to justice in actio popularis is not exclusive to Portuguese citizens, but also to all foreign persons who, in Portugal (or outside Portuguese territory due to the phenomenon of cross-border pollution), detect a threat to natural environmental assets. This is because the requirement of residence in Article 15 par. 3 of the APL does not apply to popular standing concerning diffuse interests (for example the environment).

The popular actions promoted by associations and foundations are subject to having an environmental scope in their statutory regulations (Article 3 of the APL), interpreted in light of the broad concept of "environment" under Article 66 of the CRP.
Petitions based on _actio popularis_ can be presented both before administrative and civil (judicial) courts. All forms of administrative action and appeal on the grounds of illegality, as well as all forms of civil claims, are admitted (Article 12 of APL). In _actio popularis_, the author represents, on his own initiative, all the other holders of rights and interests (Article 14 of APL), as long as they did not exercise their right to exclude themselves. This means that no mandate is needed and that the claim preclusion ( _res judicata_ ) effects of the decision are applicable, beyond the authors, to other holders of rights and interests at stake (Article 19 of APL).[105]

The idea that ENGOs have legal standing is reinforced by the Law on ENGO (Law no. 35/98), which establishes that ENGOs can legitimately go to court in protection of environmental rights, regardless of whether or not they have a direct interest in the claim (Article 10), recognising the right to propose legal actions necessary for the prevention, correction, suspension and termination of acts or omissions of public or private entities that are or could be a factor in environmental degradation; to initiate, under the law, legal actions to enforce civil liability relating to acts or omissions mentioned; to appeal administrative acts and regulations that violate laws that protect the environment; to present complaints and reports, as well as assist criminal proceedings for crimes against the environment and follow the administrative offence process; to present memorials, technical advice, suggestions for examinations or other measures of proof until the process is ready for final decision[106].

Within _actio popularis_ the Public Prosecutor has legal standing to represent natural and legal persons and ENGOs, namely in the event that the plaintiff withdraws from the process (Article 16 of APL). The Public Prosecutor also has legal standing regarding the environmental crimes foreseen in Articles 278 et seq. of CP which are public crimes (meaning they do not require a complaint from the offended, from others, or participation of an authority), in which case the Public Prosecutor shall only act at their request (Article 48 of the CPP). Environmental crimes are included in the Chapter of the CP concerning crimes of common danger (Articles 272 et seq.), which are characterised by their public nature, meaning that the initiative of the judiciary or police authorities, as well as voluntary denunciation by any person, is sufficient to initiate the criminal procedure. There is an obligation of denunciation upon the police authorities and upon civil servants in the exercise of their functions (Article 242, par. 1 of the CPP).

4) What are the rules for translation and interpretation if foreign parties are involved?

